CAMBRIDGE REFERENCE LIBRARY
DATE RECEIVED
5 FEB 2004

THE ALL ENGLAND LAW REPORTS 2003

Volume 4

Editor-in-Chief
CRAIG ROSE Barrister

Editor
KAREN WIDDICOMBE Solicitor

LexisNexis™ UK

Members of the LexisNexis Group worldwide

| | |
|---|---|
| United Kingdom | LexisNexis UK, a Division of Reed Elsevier (UK) Ltd, Halsbury House, 35 Chancery Lane, LONDON, WC2A 1EL, and 4 Hill Street, EDINBURGH EH2 3JZ |
| Argentina | LexisNexis Argentina, BUENOS AIRES |
| Australia | LexisNexis Butterworths, CHATSWOOD, New South Wales |
| Austria | LexisNexis Verlag ARD Orac GmbH & Co KG, VIENNA |
| Canada | LexisNexis Butterworths, MARKHAM, Ontario |
| Chile | LexisNexis Chile Ltda, SANTIAGO DE CHILE |
| Czech Republic | Nakladatelství Orac sro, PRAGUE |
| France | Editions du Juris-Classeur SA, PARIS |
| Germany | LexisNexis Deutschland GmbH, FRANKFURT and MUNSTER |
| Hong Kong | LexisNexis Butterworths, HONG KONG |
| Hungary | HVG-Orac, BUDAPEST |
| India | LexisNexis Butterworths, NEW DELHI |
| Ireland | LexisNexis, DUBLIN |
| Italy | Giuffré Editore, MILAN |
| Malaysia | Malayan Law Journal Sdn Bhd, KUALA LUMPUR |
| New Zealand | LexisNexis Butterworths, WELLINGTON |
| Poland | Wydawnictwo Prawnicze LexisNexis, WARSAW |
| Singapore | LexisNexis Butterworths, SINGAPORE |
| South Africa | LexisNexis Butterworths, DURBAN |
| Switzerland | Stämpfli Verlag AG, BERNE |
| USA | LexisNexis, DAYTON, Ohio |

© Reed Elsevier (UK) Ltd 2003

All rights reserved. No part of this publication may be reproduced in any material form (including photocopying or storing it in any medium by electronic means and whether or not transiently or incidentally to some other use of this publication) without the written permission of the copyright owner except in accordance with the provisions of the Copyright, Designs and Patents Act 1988 or under the terms of a licence issued by the Copyright Licensing Agency Ltd, 90 Tottenham Court Road, London, England W1T 4LP. Applications for the copyright owner's written permission to reproduce any part of this publication should be addressed to the publisher.

Warning: The doing of an unauthorised act in relation to a copyright work may result in both a civil claim for damages and criminal prosecution.

Crown copyright material is reproduced with the permission of the Controller of HMSO and the Queen's Printer for Scotland. Any European material in this work which has been reproduced from EUR-lex, the official European Communities legislation website, is European Communities copyright.

A CIP Catalogue record for this book is available from the British Library.

Printed and bound in Great Britain by William Clowes Ltd, Beccles and London

ISBN for the complete set of volumes: 0 406 85159 X for this volume:

ISBN 0-406-96516-1

9 780406 965165

Visit LexisNexis UK at www.lexisnexis.co.uk

CONSULTING EDITORS

Celia Fox Barrister

Kate O'Hanlon Barrister

Dilys Tausz Barrister

REPORTERS

James Brooks Barrister

Manjit Gheera Barrister

Martyn Gurr Barrister

Pamela Hardisty Barrister (NZ)

Alexander Horne Barrister

Stephen Leake Barrister

Melanie Martyn Barrister

Neneh Munu Barrister

Victoria Parkin Barrister

Sanchia Pereira Barrister

Lynne Townley Barrister

Aaron Turpin Barrister

Gareth Williams Barrister

James Wilson Barrister (NZ)

MANAGING EDITOR

Helen O'Shea Dip Law, Dip LP

DEPUTY EDITOR

Paul Hardy LLM

SENIOR SUB-EDITORS

Catherine Bayliss LLB, Dip LP

Rukhsana Hasnain LLB, Dip LP

SUB-EDITOR

Sarah Semple BA

House of Lords

The Lord High Chancellor of Great Britain:
Lord Falconer of Thoroton

Lords of Appeal in Ordinary

Lord Bingham of Cornhill
Lord Nicholls of Birkenhead
Lord Steyn
Lord Hoffmann
Lord Hope of Craighead
Lord Hutton
Lord Saville of Newdigate
Lord Hobhouse of Woodborough
Lord Millett
Lord Scott of Foscote
Lord Rodger of Earlsferry
Lord Walker of Gestingthorpe

Court of Appeal

The Lord High Chancellor of Great Britain

The Lord Chief Justice of England and Wales: Lord Woolf
(President of the Criminal Division)

The Master of the Rolls: Lord Phillips of Worth Matravers
(President of the Civil Division)

The President of the Family Division: Dame Elizabeth Butler-Sloss

The Vice-Chancellor: Sir Robert Andrew Morritt

Lords Justices of Appeal

Sir Paul Joseph Morrow Kennedy
Sir Simon Denis Brown
Sir Christopher Dudley Roger Rose
(Vice-President of the Criminal Division)
Sir Peter Leslie Gibson
Sir Robin Ernest Auld
Sir Malcolm Thomas Pill
Sir William Aldous (retired 17 October 2003)
Sir Alan Hylton Ward
Sir Konrad Hermann Theodor Schiemann
Sir Mathew Alexander Thorpe
Sir Mark Howard Potter
Sir Henry Brooke (Vice-President of the Civil Division)
Sir Igor Judge (Deputy Chief Justice)
Sir George Mark Waller
Sir John Frank Mummery
Sir Charles Barrie Knight Mantell
Sir John Murray Chadwick
Sir Richard Joseph Buxton
Sir Anthony Tristram Kenneth May (Vice-President of the Queen's Bench Division)
Sir Simon Lane Tuckey
Sir Anthony Peter Clarke
Sir John Grant McKenzie Laws
Sir Stephen John Sedley
Sir Jonathan Hugh Mance
Dame Brenda Marjorie Hale
Sir David Nicholas Ramsey Latham
Sir John William Kay
Sir Bernard Anthony Rix
Sir Jonathan Frederic Parker
Dame Mary Howarth Arden
Sir David Wolfe Keene
Sir John Anthony Dyson
Sir Andrew Centlivres Longmore
Sir Robert John Anderson Carnwath
Sir Thomas Scott Gillespie Baker
Dame Janet Hilary Smith
Sir Roger John Laugharne Thomas (Senior Presiding Judge for England and Wales)
Sir Robert Raphael Hayim (Robin) Jacob
(appointed 17 October 2003)

High Court of Justice

The Lord High Chancellor of Great Britain

The Lord Chief Justice of England

The President of the Family Division

The Vice-Chancellor

The Senior Presiding Judge for England and Wales

The puisne judges of the High Court

Chancery Division

The Lord High Chancellor of Great Britain

The Vice-Chancellor

Sir John Edmund Frederic Lindsay
Sir Edward Christopher Evans-Lombe
Sir Robert Raphael Hayim (Robin) Jacob (appointed Lord Justice of Appeal 17 October 2003)
Sir William Anthony Blackburne
Sir Gavin Anthony Lightman
Sir Colin Percy Farquharson Rimer
Sir Hugh Ian Lang Laddie
Sir Timothy Andrew Wigram Lloyd
Sir David Edmund Neuberger
Sir Andrew Edward Wilson Park
Sir Nicholas Richard Pumfrey
Sir Michael Christopher Campbell Hart
Sir Lawrence Anthony Collins
Sir Nicholas John Patten
Sir Terrence Michael Elkan Barnet Etherton
Sir Peter Winston Smith
Sir Kim Martin Jordan Lewison
Sir David Anthony Stewart Richards (appointed 1 October 2003)

Queen's Bench Division

The Lord Chief Justice of England

Sir Stuart Neil McKinnon
Sir Douglas Dunlop Brown
Sir Michael Morland
Sir Roger John Buckley
Sir Peter John Cresswell
Sir Christopher John Holland
Sir Richard Herbert Curtis
Sir Anthony David Colman
Sir John Thayne Forbes
Sir Michael Alexander Geddes Sachs (retired 30 September 2003)
Sir Stephen George Mitchell (retired 8 October 2003)
Sir Rodger Bell
Sir Michael Guy Vicat Harrison
Sir William Marcus Gage
Sir Thomas Richard Atkin Morison
Sir Andrew David Collins
Sir Maurice Ralph Kay
Sir Anthony Hooper
Sir Alexander Neil Logie Butterfield
Sir George Michael Newman
Sir David Anthony Poole
Sir Martin James Moore-Bick
Sir Gordon Julian Hugh Langley
Sir Robert Franklyn Nelson
Sir Roger Grenfell Toulson
Sir Michael John Astill
Sir Alan George Moses
Sir David Eady
Sir Jeremy Mirth Sullivan
Sir David Herbert Penry-Davey
Sir Stephen Price Richards
Sir David William Steel
Sir Charles Antony St John Gray
Sir Nicolas Dusan Bratza
Sir Michael John Burton
Sir Rupert Matthew Jackson
Dame Heather Carol Hallett
Sir Patrick Elias

[continued on next page]

Queen's Bench Division (continued)

Sir Richard John Pearson Aikens
Sir Stephen Robert Silber
Sir John Bernard Goldring
Sir Peter Francis Crane
Dame Anne Judith Rafferty
Sir Geoffery Douglas Grigson
Sir Richard John Hedley Gibbs
Sir Richard Henry Quixano Henriques
Sir Stephen Miles Tomlinson
Sir Andrew Charles Smith
Sir Stanley Jeffrey Burnton
Sir Patrick James Hunt
Sir Christopher John Pitchford
Sir Brian Henry Leveson
Sir Duncan Brian Walter Ouseley
Sir Richard George Bramwell McCombe
Sir Raymond Evan Jack
Sir Robert Michael Owen
Sir Colin Crichton Mackay
Sir John Edward Mitting
Sir David Roderick Evans
Sir Nigel Anthony Lamert Davis
Sir Peter Henry Gross
Sir Brian Richard Keith
Sir Jeremy Lionel Cooke
Sir Richard Alan Field
Sir Christopher John Pitchers
Sir Colman Maurice Treacy
Sir Peregrine Charles Hugo Simon
Sir Roger John Royce
Dame Laura Mary Cox
Sir Adrian Bruce Fulford
Sir Jack Beatson
Sir Michael George Tugendhat
Sir David Clive Clarke (appointed 1 October 2003)
Sir Richard MacLennon Wakerley
(appointed 1 October 2003)

Family Division

The President of the Family Division

Sir Robert Lionel Johnson
Dame Joyanne Winifred Bracewell
Sir Jan Peter Singer
Sir Nicholas Allan Roy Wilson
Sir Nicholas Peter Rathbone Wall
Sir Andrew Tristram Hammett Kirkwood
Sir Hugh Peter Derwyn Bennett
Sir Edward James Holman
Dame Mary Claire Hogg
Sir Christopher John Sumner
Sir Anthony Philip Gilson Hughes
Sir Arthur William Hessin Charles
Sir David Roderick Lessiter Bodey
Dame Jill Margaret Black
Sir James Lawrence Munby
Sir Paul James Duke Coleridge
Sir Mark Hedley
Dame Anna Evelyn Hamilton Pauffley
(appointed 1 October 2003)

Official Judgment Numbers and Paragraph References

Since 11 January 2001, official judgment numbers have been given to all judgments delivered in the House of Lords, Privy Council, both divisions of the Court of Appeal and the Administrative Court. All such judgments have fixed paragraph numbering, as do judgments delivered on or after 11 January 2001 in those parts of the High Court which did not then adopt the system of official judgment numbers (see Practice Note (judgments: neutral citation) [2001] 1 All ER 193 for the Court of Appeal and the High Court). On 14 January 2002 the system of judgment numbers was extended to all parts of the High Court (see Practice Direction (High Court judgments: neutral citation) [2002] 1 All ER 351). We have adopted the following practice in respect of judgments with official judgment numbers and official paragraph numbering:

- The official judgment number is inserted immediately beneath the case name;
- Official paragraph numbers are in bold in square brackets;
- Holding references in the headnotes, and any other cross-references, are to an official paragraph number, not to a page of the report;
- When such a judgment is subsequently cited in another report,

  (i) the official judgment number is inserted before the usual report citations in the case lists and on the first occasion when the case is cited in the text. Thereafter, only the report citations are given;

  (ii) All 'at' references are to the official paragraph number rather than to a page of a report, with the paragraph number in square brackets but not in bold;

  (iii) The 'at' reference is only given in conjunction with the first report cited; eg [2001] 4 All ER 159 at [16], [2001] AC 61. If an 'at' reference is included on the first occasion when the case is cited, it also appears alongside the official judgment number.

For the avoidance of doubt, these changes do not apply to reports of judgments delivered before 11 January 2001 or to the citation of such cases in other reports.

CITATION

These reports are cited thus:

[2003] 4 All ER

REFERENCES

These reports contain references to the following major works of legal reference described in the manner indicated below.

Halsbury's Laws of England

The reference 14 Halsbury's Laws (4th edn) para 185 refers to paragraph 185 on page 90 of volume 14 of the fourth edition of Halsbury's Laws of England.

The reference 15 Halsbury's Laws (4th edn reissue) para 355 refers to paragraph 355 on page 283 of reissue volume 15 of the fourth edition of Halsbury's Laws of England.

The reference 7(1) Halsbury's Laws (4th edn) (1996 reissue) para 9 refers to paragraph 9 on page 24 of the 1996 reissue of volume 7(1) of the fourth edition of Halsbury's Laws of England.

Halsbury's Statutes of England and Wales

The reference 14 Halsbury's Statutes (4th edn) (2003 reissue) 734 refers to page 734 of volume 14 of the fourth edition of Halsbury's Statutes of England and Wales.

The reference 40 Halsbury's Statutes (4th edn) (2001 reissue) 269 refers to page 269 of the 2001 reissue of volume 40 of the fourth edition of Halsbury's Statutes of England and Wales.

Halsbury's Statutory Instruments

The reference 14 Halsbury's Statutory Instruments (2001 issue) 201 refers to page 201 of the 2001 issue of volume 14 of the grey volumes series of Halsbury's Statutory Instruments.

Cases reported in volume 4

| | Page |
|---|---|
| A v Head Teacher and Governors of Lord Grey School [QBD] | 1317 |
| Adamson v Halifax plc [CA] | 423 |
| A-G of New Zealand, B v [PC] | 833 |
| Amalgamated Metal Trading Ltd v City of London Police Financial Investigation Unit [QBD] | 1225 |
| Amendment to the Consolidated Criminal Practice Direction (Appeals against sentence—the provision of notice to the prosecution) [CA] | 665 |
| Amicus Healthcare Ltd, Evans v [Fam D] | 903 |
| Amin (on the application of), R v Secretary of State for the Home Dept [HL] | 1264 |
| Anton Durbeck GmbH v Den Norske Bank ASA [CA] | 543 |
| Ashworth Hospital Authority, R (on the application of B) v [CA] | 319 |
| B v A-G of New Zealand [PC] | 833 |
| B (on the application of), R v Ashworth Hospital Authority [CA] | 319 |
| B (on the application of), R v Merton London BC [QBD] | 280 |
| Barking, Havering and Redbridge Hospitals NHS Trust, Lucas v [CA] | 720 |
| BASF AG v SmithKline Beecham plc [CA] | 1302 |
| Batchelor v Marlow [CA] | 78 |
| Buildlead Ltd, Re [Ch D] | 864 |
| BW, P v [Fam D] | 1074 |
| Camelot Group plc, Inter Lotto (UK) Ltd v [CA] | 575 |
| Casterbridge Properties Ltd (in liq), Re [CA] | 1041 |
| Celaire, R v [CA] | 869 |
| Central Valuation Officer, R (on the application of Edison First Power Ltd) v [HL] | 209 |
| City of London Police Financial Investigation Unit, Amalgamated Metal Trading Ltd v [QBD] | 1225 |
| Claims Direct Test Cases, Re [CA] | 508 |
| Clark v Cutland [CA] | 733 |
| Corbett v Halifax plc [CA] | 180 |
| Cutland, Clark v [CA] | 733 |
| D v East Berkshire Community Health NHS Trust [CA] | 796 |
| Darlington Memorial Hospital NHS Trust, Rees v [HL] | 987 |
| Davies (on the application of), R v Financial Services Authority [CA] | 1196 |
| Den Norske Bank ASA, Anton Durbeck GmbH v [CA] | 543 |
| Deutsche Morgan Grenfell Group plc v IRC [Ch D] | 645 |
| Dewsbury Healthcare NHS Trust, K v [CA] | 796 |
| DPP, Steward v [DC] | 1105 |
| Drew, R v [HL] | 557 |
| Driscoll, Hackney London BC v [CA] | 1205 |
| D'Souza v Lambeth London BC [HL] | 1113 |
| East Berkshire Community Health NHS Trust, D v [CA] | 796 |
| Edison First Power Ltd (on the application of), R v Central Valuation Officer [HL] | 209 |
| English Nature, Fisher v [QBD] | 366 |
| Entec Europe Ltd (t/a Exploration Associates), Graham v [CA] | 1345 |
| European Roma Rights Centre v Immigration Officer at Prague Airport (United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees intervening) [CA] | 247 |
| Evans v Amicus Healthcare Ltd [Fam D] | 903 |
| Farrar, Wardlaw v (Note) [CA] | 1358 |
| Fawdry & Co (a firm) v Murfitt (Lord Chancellor intervening) [CA] | 60 |
| Fernandez v McDonald [CA] | 1033 |
| Financial Services Authority, R (on the application of Davies) v [CA] | 1196 |
| First County Trust Ltd, Wilson v [HL] | 97 |
| Fisher v English Nature [QBD] | 366 |
| Football Association Premier League Ltd v Panini UK Ltd [CA] | 1290 |
| G, R v [HL] | 765 |
| Generics (UK) Ltd, SmithKline Beecham plc v [CA] | 1302 |
| Giambrone v JMC Holidays Ltd (No 2) [QBD] | 1212 |
| Giles (on the application of), R v Parole Board [HL] | 429 |
| Gill, R v [CA] | 681 |
| Golden Stavraetos Maritime Inc, Trafigura Beheer BV v [CA] | 746 |
| Gough, Mulvaney v [CA] | 83 |
| Governor of Belmarsh Prison, R (on the application of Van Hoogstraten) v [QBD] | 309 |
| Graham v Entec Europe Ltd (t/a Exploration Associates) [CA] | 1345 |
| Hackney London BC v Driscoll [CA] | 1205 |
| Hadley v Midland Fertility Services Ltd [Fam D] | 903 |
| Halifax plc, Adamson v [CA] | 423 |
| Halifax plc, Corbett v [CA] | 180 |
| Harrow London BC v Qazi [HL] | 461 |
| Hollins v Russell [CA] | 590 |
| Home Office, Wainwright v [HL] | 969 |
| igroup Ltd v Ocwen [Ch D] | 1063 |
| Immigration Officer at Prague Airport (United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees intervening), European Roma Rights Centre v [CA] | 247 |
| Inter Lotto (UK) Ltd v Camelot Group plc [CA] | 575 |

Page

IRC, Deutsche Morgan Grenfell Group plc v [Ch D] . . . . . 645
IRC v Laird Group plc [HL] . . . . . 669
Jeeves v Official Receiver [CA] . . . . 1041
JMC Holidays Ltd, Giambrone v (No 2) [QBD] . . . . . 1212
Jones v 3M Healthcare Ltd [HL] . . . . 1113
K v Dewsbury Healthcare NHS Trust [CA] 796
K v Oldham NHS Trust [CA] . . . . . 796
Katz, Quicksons (South and West) Ltd v [Ch D] . . . . . 864
Khan (on the application of), R v Secretary of State for Health [CA] . . . . 1239
Knight v Rochdale Healthcare NHS Trust [QBD] . . . . . 416
Laird Group plc, IRC v [HL] . . . . . 669
Lambert v Lambert [CA] . . . . . 342
Lambeth London BC, D'Souza v [HL] . . 1113
Laughton, Mullins v (Note) [Ch D] . . . . 94
Leonard, Nathan v [Ch D] . . . . . 198
Lloyds Bank Group Insurance Co Ltd, Lloyds TSB General Insurance Holdings Ltd v [HL] . . . . . 43
Lloyds TSB General Insurance Holdings Ltd v Lloyds Bank Group Insurance Co Ltd [HL] . . . . . 43
London Central Bus Co Ltd and other appeals (The Accident Group Test Cases), Sharratt v [CA] . . 590
Lord Grey School (Head Teacher and Governors of), A v [QBD] . . . . 1317
Lucas v Barking, Havering and Redbridge Hospitals NHS Trust [CA] . . . . 720
McDonald, Fernandez v [CA] . . . . . 1033
McFetrich (on the application of), R v Secretary of State for the Home Dept [DC] . . . . . 1093
Marlow, Batchelor v [CA] . . . . . 78
Meade-King (a firm), Official Receiver v [HL] . . . . . 18
Merton London BC, R (on the application of B) v [QBD] . . . . . 280
Miah v Secretary of State for Work and Pensions [CA] . . . . . 702
Midland Fertility Services Ltd, Hadley v [Fam D] . . . . . 903
Moyna v Secretary of State for Work and Pensions [HL] . . . . . 162
Mulkerrins v PricewaterhouseCoopers (a firm) [HL] . . . . . 1
Mullins v Laughton (Note) [Ch D] . . . . 94
Mulvaney v Gough [CA] . . . . . 83
Murfitt (Lord Chancellor intervening), Fawdry & Co (a firm) v [CA] . . . . 60
Nathan v Leonard [Ch D] . . . . . 198

Page

Nelligan, Secretary of State for Work and Pensions v [CA] . . . . . 171
Ocwen, igroup Ltd v [Ch D] . . . . . 1063
Official Receiver, Jeeves v [CA] . . . . 1041
Official Receiver v Meade-King (a firm) [HL] . . . . . 18
Oldham NHS Trust, K v [CA] . . . . . 796
P v BW [Fam D] . . . . . 1074
P v P (ancillary relief: proceeds of crime) [Fam D] . . . . . 843
Panini UK Ltd, Football Association Premier League Ltd v [CA] . . . . . 1290
Pantmaenog Timber Co Ltd (in liq), Re [HL] 18
Parole Board, R (on the application of Giles) v [HL] . . . . . 429
Poulton, R v [CA] . . . . . 869
Practice Direction (Coal Mining Hand Arm Vibration Syndrome (Vibration White Finger)) [CA] . . . . . 318
PricewaterhouseCoopers (a firm), Mulkerrins v [HL] . . . . . 1
Qazi, Harrow London BC v [HL] . . . . 461
Quicksons (South and West) Ltd v Katz [Ch D] . . . . . 864
R v Celaire [CA] . . . . . 869
R v Drew [HL] . . . . . 557
R v G [HL] . . . . . 765
R v Gill [CA] . . . . . 681
R v Poulton [CA] . . . . . 869
R v R [CA] . . . . . 882
R v T [CA] . . . . . 877
R v Wacker [CA] . . . . . 295
R (on the application of Amin) v Secretary of State for the Home Dept [HL] . . 1264
R (on the application of B) v Ashworth Hospital Authority [CA] . . . . . 319
R (on the application of B) v Merton London BC [QBD] . . . . . 280
R (on the application of Davies) v Financial Services Authority [CA] . . . . 1196
R (on the application of Edison First Power Ltd) v Central Valuation Officer [HL] . . . . . 209
R (on the application of Giles) v Parole Board [HL] . . . . . 429
R (on the application of Khan) v Secretary of State for Health [CA] . . . . 1239
R (on the application of McFetrich) v Secretary of State for the Home Dept [DC] . . . . . 1093
R (on the application of Uttley) v Secretary of State for the Home Dept [CA] . . 891
R (on the application of Van Hoogstraten) v Governor of Belmarsh Prison [QBD] . . 309

Page

Rees v Darlington Memorial Hospital NHS Trust [HL] .. .. .. .. .. 987
Relaxion Group plc v Rhys-Harper [HL] . 1113
Rhys-Harper, Relaxion Group plc v [HL]. 1113
Rochdale Healthcare NHS Trust, Knight v [QBD] .. .. .. .. .. 416
Russell, Hollins v [CA] .. .. .. .. 590
Secretary of State for Health, R (on the application of Khan) v [CA] .. .. .. 1239
Secretary of State for the Home Dept, R (on the application of Amin) v [HL] . 1264
Secretary of State for the Home Dept, R (on the application of McFetrich) v [DC] . .. .. .. .. 1093
Secretary of State for the Home Dept, R (on the application of Uttley) v [CA] 891
Secretary of State for Work and Pensions, Miah v [CA] .. .. .. .. .. 702
Secretary of State for Work and Pensions, Moyna v [HL]. .. .. .. .. 162
Secretary of State for Work and Pensions v Nelligan [CA] .. .. .. 171
Sharratt v London Central Bus Co Ltd and other appeals (The Accident Group Test Cases) [CA] .. .. .. .. .. 590
Sheridan v Stanley Cole (Wainfleet) Ltd [CA] .. .. .. .. 1181
Sonia, The [CA] .. .. .. .. .. 746
SmithKline Beecham plc, BASF AG v [CA] .. 1302
SmithKline Beecham plc v Generics (UK) Ltd [CA] .. .. .. .. 1302
Stanley Cole (Wainfleet) Ltd, Sheridan v [CA] .. .. .. .. .. .. 1181
Steward v DPP [DC] .. .. .. .. 1105
T, R v [CA] .. .. .. .. .. .. 877
Trafigura Beheer BV v Golden Stavraetos Maritime Inc [CA] .. .. .. .. 746
3M Healthcare Ltd, Jones v [HL] .. .. .. 1113
Uttley (on the application of), R v Secretary of State for the Home Dept [CA] .. 891
Van Hoogstraten (on the application of), R v Governor of Belmarsh Prison [QBD] 309
Wacker, R v [CA] .. .. .. .. .. 295
Wainwright v Home Office [HL] .. .. 969
Wardlaw v Farrar (Note) [CA] .. .. .. 1358
Waters v Welsh Development Agency [CA] 384
Welsh Development Agency, Waters v [CA] 384
Wermuth v Wermuth [CA] .. .. .. 531
Wilson v First County Trust Ltd [HL] .. 97

Digest of cases reported in volume 4

CHILD – Court proceedings in relation to child – Whether court proceedings in private in relation to child contrary to right to fair trial

P v BW .. .. .. .. .. .. .. .. .. .. .. Bennett J 1074

COMPANIES – Director making unauthorised transfers of company assets to trustees of pension fund – Whether assets traceable by company in hands of trustees – Whether value of assets transferred to be set off against debt owed to trustees by company

Clark v Cutland .. .. .. .. .. .. .. .. .. .. CA 733

COMPANY – Application for removal of liquidator – Approach to exercise of court's discretionary power requiring applicant to give security for liquidator's costs

Re Buildlead Ltd .. .. .. .. .. .. .. .. Evans-Lombe J 864

——Charge – Whether statutory power to rectify register of changes extending to information particulars submitted on prescribed forms by applicant for registration

igroup Ltd v Ocwen .. .. .. .. .. .. .. .. Lightman J 1063

——Compulsory winding up – Statutory provision empowering court on application of office-holder of company in liquidation to require any person to produce documents relating to company's affairs – Whether power could be invoked solely for purpose of obtaining evidence in directors disqualification proceedings

Re Pantmaenog Timber Co Ltd (in liq) .. .. .. .. .. .. HL 18

——Compulsory winding up – Whether court required to grant application for public examination of person concerned with management of company – Discretion of court on application to rescind order for public examination

Re Casterbridge Properties Ltd (in liq) .. .. .. .. .. .. CA 1041

COMPULSORY PURCHASE – Compensation – Construction of barrage in river estuary causing loss of wetlands – Claimants' land acquired to replace lost habitat – Whether value of compensation including increase in value of land due to necessity to replace lost habitat – Whether scheme consisting of nature reserve only or including barrage

Waters v Welsh Development Agency .. .. .. .. .. .. CA 384

CONFLICT OF LAWS – Jurisdiction – Special jurisdiction as regards dispute arising out of the operations of a branch, agency or other establishment

Anton Durbeck GmbH v Den Norske Bank ASA .. .. .. .. .. CA 543

CONSUMER CREDIT – Agreement – Whether court having jurisdiction to make declaration of incompatibility concerning Consumer Credit Act 1974 where agreement made before implementation of Human Rights Act 1998

Wilson v First County Trust Ltd . .. .. .. .. .. .. .. HL 97

COPYRIGHT – Infringement – Defence – Incidental inclusion of copyright material – Test to be applied

Football Association Premier League Ltd v Panini UK Ltd .. .. .. CA 1290

COSTS – Order for costs – Claimants paying claims handling service after-the-event (ATE) premium in respect risk of incurring liability in proceedings – Whether successful claimants entitled to recover whole amount of ATE premium in costs

Re Claims Direct Test Cases .. .. .. .. .. .. .. .. CA 508

COSTS (CONT'D) – Order for costs – Receiving party relying on conditional fee agreement and put to his election whether to disclose agreement to paying party or to prove entitlement to costs by other means – Guidance to costs judges where paying party alleges agreement unenforceable because of breach of statutory provisions

Sharratt v London Central Bus Co Ltd and other appeals (The Accident Group Test Cases) .. .. .. .. .. .. .. CA 590

COUNTY COURT – Practice – Defendant having knowledge of proceedings but not receiving notice of trial date – Whether order made at trial to be set aside

Hackney London Borough Council v Driscoll. .. .. .. .. .. CA 1205

CRIMINAL LAW – Arson – Recklessness whether property would be destroyed or damaged – Test for determining recklessness

R v G .. .. .. .. .. .. .. .. .. .. .. .. .. HL 765

——Manslaughter – Whether person criminally responsible for death of others engaged in joint unlawful activity

R v Wacker .. .. .. .. .. .. .. .. .. .. .. .. CA 295

DAMAGES – Measure of damages – Duty of building society mortgagee to exercise power of sale with reasonable care ensuring best price reasonably obtainable – Sale at undervalue by first mortgagee – Whether amount of damages awarded to mortgagor including secured sum owed by mortgagor to second incumbrancer but unclaimed by second incumbrancer

Adamson v Halifax plc .. .. .. .. .. .. .. .. .. CA 423

——Negligence – Whether disabled woman entitled to recover costs of bringing up healthy child attributable to her disability where child conceived as a result of negligently-performed sterilisation

Rees v Darlington Memorial Hospital NHS Trust .. .. .. .. .. HL 987

——Personal injury – Whether claimant in personal injury action able to recover damages in respect of gratuitous care – Approach to assessing awards

Giambrone v JMC Holidays Ltd (formerly Sunworld Holidays) (No 2) .. .. .. Judge MacDuff QC 1212

DISCOVERY – Collateral use of information obtained – Litigant applying to use documents subject to restriction order in different proceedings – Whether documents 'disclosed' voluntarily – Approach to lifting of restriction order

SmithKline Beecham plc v Generics (UK) Ltd .. .. .. .. .. CA 1302

DISCRIMINATION – Disability discrimination – Whether employment tribunal having jurisdiction to hear complaint relating to benefit arising from employment relationship and complaints relating to provision of references and failure to return employee's property after termination of employment

Relaxion Group plc v Rhys-Harper .. .. .. .. .. .. .. HL 1113

——Racial discrimination – Whether employment tribunal having jurisdiction to hear complaint relating to benefit arising from employment relationship after termination of employment and complaint of discrimination based on employer's failure to comply with reinstatement order

Relaxion Group plc v Rhys-Harper .. .. .. .. .. .. .. HL 1113

DISCRIMINATION (CONT'D) – Sex discrimination – Whether employment tribunal having jurisdiction to hear complaint relating to benefit arising from employment relationship after termination of employment – Whether tribunal having jurisdiction to hear complaint of sex discrimination with regard to employer's alleged failure to carry out proper investigation of allegation of sexual harassment

Relaxion Group plc v Rhys-Harper .. .. .. .. .. .. .. HL 1113

DIVORCE – Financial provision – Contribution by each of the parties to welfare of family – Whether concept of 'special contribution' by money-making partner legitimate in justifying unequal division of assets

Lambert v Lambert .. .. .. .. .. .. .. .. .. .. .. CA 342

——Financial provision – Husband bringing divorce proceedings in Germany – Wife subsequently bringing divorce proceedings in England – Judge granting wife's application for maintenance pending suit – Whether maintenance order 'provisional measure'

Wermuth v Wermuth .. .. .. .. .. .. .. .. .. .. CA 531

EASEMENT – Communal garden – Whether right to enjoy communal garden totally excluding any use of land by owners

Mulvaney v Gough .. .. .. .. .. .. .. .. .. .. .. CA 83

——Right to park cars – Land which could accommodate parking for no more than six cars – Whether right to park six cars on land during working hours capable of existing as easement

Batchelor v Marlow . .. .. .. .. .. .. .. .. .. .. CA 78

EDUCATION – Permanent exclusion of child of compulsory school age from school – Whether breach of right to education

A v Head Teacher and Governors of Lord Grey School . .. Stanley Burnton J 1317

ENVIRONMENT – Protection – Defendant confirming site as site of special scientific interest – Claimants having interest in site of special scientific interest – Whether defendant having discretion not to confirm

Fisher v English Nature .. .. .. .. .. .. .. .. Lightman J 366

EVIDENCE – Revenue suspecting that appellants failing to disclose details of assets and putting questions to appellants at 'Hansard' interview – Whether appellants' answers admissible at subsequent trial for cheating the public revenue

R v Gill .. .. .. .. .. .. .. .. .. .. .. .. .. CA 681

——Rule of procedure requiring expert's report to state all material 'instructions' – Whether 'instructions' including material supplied by instructing party to expert as basis on which he had been asked to advise

Lucas v Barking, Havering and Redbridge Hospitals NHS Trust .. .. CA 720

FINANCIAL SERVICES – Financial Services Authority (FSA) – Prohibition order – Whether FSA having power to make prohibition order in disciplinary proceedings

R (on the application of Davies) v Financial Services Authority .. .. CA 1196

HOUSING – Local authority – Local authority bringing automatic possession proceedings after secure tenancy terminated by operation of law – Whether breach of right to respect for home

Harrow London BC v Qazi .. .. .. .. .. .. .. .. HL 461

HUMAN RIGHTS – NHS hospital trust admitting liability for death of child in hospital before coming into force of human rights legislation – Availability of relief for breach of convention right in national courts

R (on the application of Khan) v Secretary of State for Health .. .. CA 1239

——Right to a fair hearing – Employment tribunal's decision referring to authorities which parties had had no opportunity to address – Proper approach for determining whether hearing rendered unfair in such circumstances

Sheridan v Stanley Cole (Wainfleet) Ltd .. .. .. .. .. .. CA 1181

——State's obligation to investigate death in circumstances where state arguably in breach of substantive obligation under convention right to life – Whether state's investigatory obligation requiring public inquiry with participation of deceased's family

R (on the application of Amin) v Secretary of State for the Home Dept .. HL 1264

——State's obligation to investigate death in circumstances where state arguably in breach of substantive obligation under convention right to life – Whether state's investigatory obligation requiring public inquiry with participation of deceased's family

R (on the application of Khan) v Secretary of State for Health .. .. CA 1239

IMMIGRATION – Asylum seeker – Determination of age of unaccompanied asylum seeker claiming to be under 18 years old – Guidance

R (on the application of B) v Merton London BC .. .. . Stanley Burnton J 280

——Leave to enter – Pre-entry clearance system at Prague Airport – Claimants Czech Roma – Whether system contrary to international refugee convention – Whether system discriminating against Czech Roma

European Roma Rights Centre v Immigration Officer at Prague Airport (United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees intervening) .. .. CA 247

INCOME TAX – Transaction in securities – Whether payment of dividend transaction in securities

IRC v Laird Group plc. .. .. .. .. .. .. .. .. .. HL 669

INSOLVENCY – Bankruptcy – Bankrupt bringing proceedings for negligence against professional advisers for failure to prevent making of bankruptcy order – County court holding that trustee in bankruptcy had no interest in right of action – Whether open to professional advisers to contend that right of action vested in trustee

Mulkerrins v PricewaterhouseCoopers (a firm) .. .. .. .. .. HL 1

INSURANCE – Liability insurance – Defendants insuring claimants against negligent advice – Representatives providing negligent advice – Whether individual policyholders' claims falling within aggregation clause – Whether series of claims constituting 'related series of acts or omissions'

Lloyds TSB General Insurance Holdings Ltd v Lloyds Bank Group Insurance Co Ltd.. .. .. .. .. .. .. .. .. .. HL 43

LANDLORD AND TENANT – Recovery of possession – Statutory provision requiring court to make order for possession of assured shorthold periodic tenancy if landlord serving notice specifying last date of period of tenancy and requiring possession thereafter – Whether notice valid if not specifying last date of period of tenancy but requiring possession on day known to be day immediately following last day of period

Fernandez v McDonald .. .. .. .. .. .. .. .. .. CA 1033

LIMITATION OF ACTION – Claimant seeking to rely on three-year limitation period in negligence action in respect of latent damage where facts relevant to cause of action not known at date of accrual – Loss adjuster aware of potential claim – Whether knowledge of loss adjuster appointed by claimant's insurers in subrogated claim attributable to claimant – Whether claimant's cause of action prima facie time-barred

Graham v Entec Europe Ltd (t/a Exploration Associates) .. .. .. CA 1345

——When time begins to run – Patient bringing action against surgeon – Parties settling proceedings and subsequently embodying settlement agreement in consent order – Whether time running for limitation purposes in contribution proceedings from date of agreement or date of consent order

Knight v Rochdale Healthcare NHS Trust .. .. .. .. .. .. Crane J 416

MAGISTRATES – Jurisdiction – Justices ruling no case to answer due to mistaken belief as to admissibility of evidence – Justices rescinding decision and convicting defendant – Whether justices functi officio

Steward v Director of Public Prosecutions . .. .. .. .. .. DC 1105

MEDICAL TREATMENT – Consent to treatment together of each of male and female gamete providers in treatment involving in vitro fertilisation, freezing and storage of embryos – Whether implantation of embryo in female gamete provider 'treatment together' – Whether requirement for consent by both partners contrary to right to respect for private and family life

Evans v Amicus Healthcare Ltd . .. .. .. .. .. .. .. Wall J 903

MENTAL HEALTH – Patient – Consent of patient not required for medical treatment given him for mental disorder from which he was suffering – Specified disorder being mental illness – Patient treated for psychopathic disorder – Whether treatment for psychopathic disorder requiring patient's consent

R (on the application of B) v Ashworth Hospital Authority .. .. .. CA 319

MISTAKE – Mistake of law – Money paid under mistake of law – Whether action for restitution time-barred – Whether payments of advance corporation tax made under mistake of law – Whether English law recognising claim in restitution to recover taxes paid under mistake of law

Deutsche Morgan Grenfell Group plc v IRC. .. .. .. .. .. Park J 645

MORTGAGE – Sale – Exercise of power of sale by mortgagee – Purchaser deceiving vendor mortgagee – Whether sale liable to be set aside

Corbett v Halifax plc .. .. .. .. .. .. .. .. .. .. CA 180

NEGLIGENCE – Accusations of child abuse made against parents – Accusations later proving unfounded – Whether duty of care owed by local authority to parents and children

D v East Berkshire Community Health NHS Trust .. .. .. .. CA 833

PARTNERSHIP – Dissolution – Whether accepted repudiatory breach of partnership deed dissolving partnership

Mullins v Laughton (Note) .. .. .. .. .. .. .. Neuberger J 94

PRACTICE – Ancillary relief – Arrangement involving acquisition, retention, use or control of criminal property – Guidance

P v P (ancillary relief: proceeds of crime) .. .. .. .. .. .. Fam D 843

PRACTICE (CONT'D) – Coal mining hand arm vibration syndrome (vibration white finger) actions – Commencement of proceedings

Practice Direction (Coal Mining Hand Arm Vibration Syndrome (Vibration White Finger)) .. .. .. .. .. .. .. .. CA 318

——Clinical negligence actions – Best practice in multi-track actions in county courts and High Court for published and unpublished literature upon which expert witness proposing to rely

Wardlaw v Farrar (Note) .. .. .. .. .. .. .. .. .. CA 1358

——Criminal proceedings – Consolidation of existing practice directions, practice statements and practice notes – Amendment – Appeals against sentence – Provision of notice to the prosecution

Amendment to the Consolidated Criminal Practice Direction (Appeals against sentence—the provision of notice to the prosecution) .. .. .. .. .. .. .. .. .. CA 665

——Transfer of proceedings from or to the Technology and Construction Court – No order transferring case listed in Queen's Bench Division to Technology and Construction Court drawn up – Whether fatal procedural error

Fawdry & Co (a firm) v Murfitt (Lord Chancellor intervening) .. .. .. CA 60

——Whether exclusion of existence of duty of care of local authority in performance its statutory duties to children constituting breach of right to fair trial

D v East Berkshire Community Health NHS Trust .. .. .. .. .. CA 796

PRISON – Access to legal adviser – Prisoner instructing foreign lawyer – Whether foreign lawyer falling within definition of 'legal adviser'

R (on the application of Van Hoogstraten) v Governor of Belmarsh Prison .. .. .. .. .. .. .. .. .. Jackson J 309

PROCEEDS OF CRIME – Declaratory relief – Claimant seeking consent of police to transfer moneys related to suspect transaction – Police refusing consent – Whether appropriate for claimant to seek declaration that moneys not proceeds of crime

Amalgamated Metal Trading Ltd v City of London Police Financial Investigation Unit .. .. .. .. .. .. .. ..Tomlinson J 1225

RATES – Valuation – Aggregate rateable value of hereditaments occupied for the purpose of generating electricity – Order containing annual formula calculating value based on generating capacity – Whether order ultra vires

R (on the application of Edison First Power Ltd) v Central Valuation Officer HL 209

ROAD TRAFFIC – Driving while unfit to drive through drink – No evidence called from doctor taking specimen of blood at police station – Whether requirement for doctor to give evidence mandatory

Steward v Director of Public Prosecutions .. .. .. .. .. .. DC 1105

SENTENCE – Custodial sentence – Statutory scheme providing for release of offender on licence rather than unconditionally – Whether scheme incompatible with convention prohibition on heavier retrospective penalties when applying to offences committed before scheme's implementation

R (on the application of Uttley) v Secretary of State for the Home Dept .. CA 891

SENTENCE (CONT'D) – Custodial sentence – Statutory provision empowering court to extend until end of sentence licence period in respect of sexual offences – Whether provision applying to sentence imposed for offence committed before its implementation ——Custodial sentence – Statutory provision empowering court to extend until end of sentence licence period in respect of sexual offences – Whether such extension violating convention prohibition on heavier retrospective penalties if imposed in respect of offence committed before provision implemented

R v T .. .. .. .. .. .. .. .. .. .. .. .. CA 877

R v R .. .. .. .. .. .. .. .. .. .. .. .. CA 882

——Custodial sentence – Whether convention right requiring periodic review of lawfulness of continued detention of offender who had served commensurate element of sentence

R (on the application of Giles) v Parole Board .. .. .. .. .. HL 429

——Life imprisonment for second serious offence – Whether imposition on mentally ill offender of automatic life sentence for second serious offence compatible with provisions of human rights convention

R v Drew .. .. .. .. .. .. .. .. .. .. .. .. HL 557

——Mandatory life sentence – Transfer of claimant from prison in Scotland to prison in England – Tariff fixed by Secretary of State of greater length than that recommended by trial judge in Scotland – Whether imposition of longer tariff heavier penalty than the one applicable at the time offence committed

R (on the application of McFetrich) v Secretary of State or the Home Dept DC 1093

——Manslaughter – Proper approach to sentencing where death caused in context of other criminal activity

R v Wacker .. .. .. .. .. .. .. .. .. .. .. .. CA 295

——Possession of an offensive weapon in a public place – Guidance

R v Poulton .. .. .. .. .. .. .. .. .. .. .. .. CA 869

SHIPPING – Suit barred unless brought within one year after delivery of goods or date on which goods should have been delivered – Claim brought within one year of delivery at second port but more than one year from notice of readiness at original discharge port – Whether claim time-barred

Trafigura Beheer BV v Golden Stavraetos Maritime Inc .. .. .. CA 746

SOCIAL SECURITY – Claimant's large family living in two houses – Whether both houses one dwelling occupied as the home for the purposes of capital disregards

Miah v Secretary of State for Work and Pensions .. .. .. .. CA 702

——Disability living allowance – Care component – 'Cooking test'

Moyna v Secretary of State for Work and Pensions .. .. .. .. HL 162

——Retirement pension – Entitlement

Secretary of State for Work and Pensions v Nelligan .. .. .. .. CA 171

TORT – Whether there was a general common law tort of invasion of privacy – Whether damages were recoverable for intentionally causing emotional distress which did not constitute psychiatric injury

Wainwright v Home Office .. .. .. .. .. .. .. .. HL 969

TRADE MARK – Registration – Effect of registration – Whether owner of registered trade mark having statutory right to use mark overriding another person's common law passing off rights

Inter Lotto (UK) Ltd v Camelot Group plc .. .. .. .. .. .. CA 575

WILL – Forfeiture clause – Clause leaving entire estate to two beneficiaries in event any other beneficiary contested will – Whether condition valid

Nathan v Leonard .. .. .. .. .. .. .. .. John Martin QC 198

House of Lords petitions

This list, which covers the period 1 August 2003 to 4 December 2003, sets out all cases which have formed the subject of a report in the All England Law Reports in which an Appeal Committee of the House of Lords has, subsequent to the publication of that report, refused leave to appeal. Where the result of a petition for leave to appeal was known prior to the publication of the relevant report a note of that result appears at the end of the report.

Donoghue v Folkestone Properties Ltd [2003] 3 All ER 1101. Leave to appeal refused 9 October 2003 (Lord Nicholls of Birkenhead, Lord Hoffmann and Lord Scott of Foscote).

R v Simpson [2003] 3 All ER 531. Leave to appeal refused 28 October 2003 (Lord Bingham of Cornhill, Lord Hobhouse of Woodborough and Lord Rodger of Earlsferry).

Cinderella Rockerfellas Ltd v Rudd [2003] 3 All ER 219. Leave to appeal refused 3 November 2003 (Lord Hoffmann, Lord Hope of Craighead and Lord Scott of Foscote).

Deutsche Morgan Grenfell Group plc v IRC [2003] 4 All ER 645. Leave to appeal refused 4 December 2003 (Lord Bingham of Cornhill, Lord Hoffmann and Lord Walker of Gestingthorpe).

Mulkerrins v PricewaterhouseCoopers (a firm)

[2003] UKHL 41

HOUSE OF LORDS

LORD BINGHAM OF CORNHILL, LORD NICHOLLS OF BIRKENHEAD, LORD MILLETT, LORD SCOTT OF FOSCOTE AND LORD WALKER OF GESTINGTHORPE

7, 31 JULY 2003

Insolvency – Bankruptcy – Bankrupt's estate – Vesting in trustee – Cause of action – Bankrupt bringing proceedings for negligence against professional advisers for failure to prevent making of bankruptcy order – Trustee in bankruptcy claiming right of action vesting in him – County court holding that trustee had no interest in right of action – Whether open to professional advisers to contend that right of action vested in trustee

The claimant owned a small but profitable business. She had outstanding debts, from a previous business, for which she and her then husband were both liable. After a bankruptcy petition was presented against her, she consulted the defendants, who were licensed insolvency practitioners. They advised her that she had a good chance of obtaining an individual voluntary arrangement (IVA), which would allow her to carry on the business and pay her creditors out of the profits. She accepted that advice, and the defendants undertook to prepare an IVA proposal. However, she was made bankrupt and her business was closed down. Just before her discharge from bankruptcy, she brought proceedings for negligence against the defendants, complaining of their failure to prevent the making of the bankruptcy order. In those proceedings, she claimed general damages for loss of status and business reputation, but the major part of her claim was for financial loss arising from the closure of the business. The claimant's trustee in bankruptcy considered that her right of action was vested in him for the benefit of her creditors. In a subsequent application by the claimant in the bankruptcy proceedings, the district judge held that the trustee had no interest in the claimant's right of action. The trustee did not appeal that decision. The claimant subsequently served her statement of claim, but the defendants, who had had no notice of the hearing before the district judge, applied to strike out part of the claim, contending that they should be sued by the trustee. The deputy judge dismissed the application, but his decision was reversed by the Court of Appeal. On the claimant's appeal to the House of Lords, their Lordships considered whether it was, in fact, open to the defendants to challenge the practical effect of the district judge's order.

Held – It was not open to the defendants to challenge the practical effect of the district judge's order. Right or wrong, that order had clearly and decisively determined the issue between the only two possible contenders to the right of action against the defendants. Its effect, binding on the trustee in bankruptcy, had been to declare that the right of action had not been affected by the bankruptcy. From the moment the right of action arose, it was at all material times in the legal and beneficial ownership of the claimant. If the trustee in bankruptcy, as the only possible rival claimant, was bound by the order, its practical effect was not open to challenge by the defendants. The claimant's right of action had to be taken to form no part of the bankrupt estate available to her creditors, and she was at liberty to pursue it in her own name and for her own benefit. Accordingly, the appeal would be allowed (see [1], [2], [19], [20], [41], [45], [46], below).

Dicta of Lord Hoffmann in Stein v Blake [1995] 2 All ER 961 at 972 considered.

Notes

For causes of action vesting in a trustee in bankruptcy, see 3(2) Halsbury's Laws (4th edn) (2002 reissue) para 435.

Cases referred to in opinions

Beckham v Drake (1849) 2 HL Cas 579, 9 ER 1213, HL.

Bell (a bankrupt), Re [1998] BPIR 26, BC SC.

Crown Estates Comrs v Dorset CC [1990] 1 All ER 19, [1990] Ch 297, [1990] 2 WLR 89.

Eaton (decd), Re, Shaw v Midland Bank Executor and Trustee Co Ltd [1964] 3 All ER 229, [1964] 1 WLR 1269.

Grady v Prison Service [2003] EWCA Civ 527, [2003] 3 All ER 745.

Linden Gardens Trust Ltd v Lenesta Sludge Disposals Ltd [1993] 3 All ER 417, [1994] 1 AC 85, [1993] 3 WLR 408, HL.

Moritz (decd), Re, Midland Bank Executor and Trustee Co Ltd v Forbes [1959] 3 All ER 767, [1960] Ch 251, [1959] 3 WLR 939.

Ord v Upton (as trustee to the property of Ord) [2000] 1 All ER 193, [2000] Ch 352, [2000] 2 WLR 755, CA.

Smith v Croft (No 2) [1987] 3 All ER 909, [1988] Ch 114, [1987] 3 WLR 405.

Stein v Blake [1995] 2 All ER 961, [1996] AC 243, [1995] 2 WLR 710, HL.

Weddell v JA Pearce & Major (a firm) [1987] 3 All ER 624, [1988] Ch 26, [1987] 3 WLR 592.

Wilson v United Counties Bank Ltd [1920] AC 102, [1918–19] All ER Rep 1035, HL.

Cases referred to in list of authorities

Airey, Re (1989) 70 OR (2d) 326, Ont SC.

Aitchison and Tuvaiti v NZI Life Superannuation Nominees Ltd [1996] BPIR 215, NZ HC.

Berridge, Re (2002) 117 ACWS (3d) 374, Alta QB.

Bowker v Evans (1885) 15 QBD 565, CA.

Brandstaetter, Re (1984) 36 BR 369, Bkrtcy D Wis; affd (1985) 767 F 2d 324, US Ct of Apps (7th Cir).

Brandt's (William) Sons & Co v Dunlop Rubber Co Ltd [1905] AC 454, [1904–7] All ER Rep 345, HL.

Brewer v Dew (1843) 11 M & W 625, 152 ER 955.
Brodie, Re [1969] 1 OR 285, Ont SC.
Bryant v Commonwealth Bank of Australia (1997) 75 FCR 545, Aust FC.
Bullock v Goodluck and the Transport Commission (1983) 48 ALR 217, Tas SC.
Campbell (a bankrupt), Re [1996] 2 All ER 537, [1997] Ch 14.
Chippendall v Tomlinson (1785) 4 Doug KB 318, 99 ER 900.
Collins v Official Receiver, Re Heenan [1996] BPIR 552, Aust FC.
Cork (as trustee in bankruptcy for Rawlins) v Rawlins [2001] EWCA Civ 202, [2001] 4 All ER 50, [2001] Ch 792, [2001] 3 WLR 300.
Cottrell, Re (1989) 876 F 2d 540, US Ct of Apps (6th Cir).
Cox v Journeau (No 2) (1935) 52 CLR 713, Aust HC.
Crofton v Poole (1830) 1 B & Ad 568, 109 ER 898.
Cummings and Fuller v Claremont Petroleum NL [1998] BPIR 187, Aust HC.
Davis v Trustee in Bankruptcy of the Estate of Davis [1998] BPIR 572.
Dawson v Great Northern and City Rly Co [1905] 1 KB 260, [1904–7] All ER Rep 913, CA.
Dove v Banhams Patent Locks Ltd [1983] 1 WLR 1436.
Edmonds Judd v Official Assignee [2001] BPIR 468, NZ CA.
Egan v Grayson (1956) 8 DLR (2d) 125, Alta SC.
Ex p Graham, Re Job (1870) 21 LT 802.
Faryab v Smith [2001] BPIR 246, CA.
Faulkner v Bluett (1981) 52 FLR 115, Aust FC.
Gano v Alberta Motor Assn Insurance Co (1998) 76 ACWS (3d) 489, Alta QB.
Gibson v Carruthers (1841) 8 M& W 321, 151 ER 1061, [1835–42] All ER Rep 565.
Giles v Thompson [1993] 3 All ER 321, [1994] 1 AC 142, [1993] 2 WLR 908, HL.
Glegg v Bromley [1912] 3 KB 474, [1911–13] All ER Rep 1138, CA.
Griffiths v Civil Aviation Authority [1997] BPIR 50, Aust FC.
Haig v Aitken [2000] 3 All ER 80, [2001] Ch 110, [2000] 3 WLR 1117.
Hamilton v Official Receiver [1998] BPIR 602.
Hatchard v Mège (1887) 18 QBD 771, DC.
Heath v Tang, Stevens v Peacock [1993] 4 All ER 694, [1993] 1 WLR 1421, CA.
Hinckley Island Hotel Ltd, Re, Craig v Humberclyde Industrial Finance Group Ltd [1998] 2 BCLC 526, [1999] 1 WLR 129, CA.
Hodgson v Sidney (1866) LR 1 Exch 313, Ct of Exch.
Hollister, Re [1926] 3 DLR 707, Ont SC.
Holmes v Goodyear Tyre & Rubber Co (Aust) Ltd (1984) 55 ALR 594, Qld SC.
Howard v Crowther (1841) 8 M & W 601, 151 ER 1179.
Hunt v Severs [1994] 2 All ER 385, [1994] 2 AC 350, [1994] 2 WLR 602, HL.
Ibeneweka v Egbuna [1964] 1 WLR 219, PC.
James, Ex p, re Condon (1874) LR 9 Ch App 609, [1874–80] All ER Rep 388, LJJ.
Kavanagh, Re, ex p The Bankrupt v Jackson (The Trustee) [1950] 1 All ER 39n, CA; affg [1949] 2 All ER 264, DC.
Ketteman v Hansel Properties Ltd [1988] 1 All ER 38, [1987] AC 189, [1987] 2 WLR 312, HL.
Khan v Official Receiver [1997] BPIR 109, CA.
Leach v Official Assignee [1975] 1 NZLR 83, NZ SC.
Lonrho plc v Fayed (No 2) [1991] 4 All ER 961, [1992] 1 WLR 1.
McMahon (a bankrupt), George, Re [1932] NZLR 1196, NZ SC.
Minna Craig Steamship Co and James Laing v Chartered Mercantile Bank of India, London and China [1897] 1 QB 460, CA.
Muir's Trustee v Braidwood 1958 SC 169.

Nitrigin Eireann Teoranta v Inco Alloys Ltd [1992] 1 All ER 854, [1992] 1 WLR 498.
Official Assignee v Dowling [1964] NZLR 578, NZ SC.
Official Receiver v Davis [1998] BPIR 771.
Papaloizou, Re [1999] BPIR 106.
Patel v Jones [2001] EWCA Civ 779, [2001] BPIR 919; affg sub nom Jones v Patel and the London Borough of Brent [1999] BPIR 509.
Performing Right Society Ltd v London Theatre of Varieties Ltd [1924] AC 1, HL.
Potts, Re, ex p Taylor [1893] 1 QB 648, CA.
Pressos Cia Naviera SA v Belgium (1995) 21 EHRR 301, [1995] 17849/91, ECt HR.
Rae, Re [1995] BCC 102.
Rahall v McLennan (1996) 66 ACWS (3d) 407, Alta QB.
Richter, Re [1929] NZLR 364, NZ SC.
Ritenburg v Crown Trust Co (1961) 33 DLR (2d) 498, Alta SC.
Roberts, Re [1900] 1 QB 122, CA.
Rogers v Spence (1846) 12 Cl and Fin 700, 8 ER 1586, HL; affg (1844) 13 M & W 571, 153 ER 239, Ex Ch.
Rose v Buckett [1901] 2 KB 449, CA.
Ryal v Rowles (1749) 1 Ves Sen 375, 27 ER 1074.
Sibley v Nason (1907) 196 Mass 125, Mass SC.
Sierra Switchboard Co v Westinghouse Electric Corp (1986) 789 F 2d 705, US Ct of Apps (9th Cir).
Silk v Osborn (1794) 1 Esp 140, 170 ER 305.
Smith v Braintree DC [1989] 3 All ER 897, [1990] 2 AC 215, [1989] 3 WLR 1317, HL.
Steel Wing Co Ltd, Re [1921] 1 Ch 349, [1920] All ER Rep 292.
Stock v London Underground Ltd (1999) Times, 13 August, [1999] CA Transcript 1412.
Three Rivers DC v Bank of England [1995] 4 All ER 312, [1996] QB 292, [1995] 3 WLR 650, CA.
Tignor v Parkinson (1984) 729 F 2d 977, US Ct of Apps (4th Cir).
Timmings v Treadgold [1923] NZLR 73, NZ SC.
Trendtex Trading Corp v Crédit Suisse [1981] 3 All ER 520, [1982] AC 679, [1981] 3 WLR 766, HL.
Vickery (a bankrupt), Trustee of the property of v Modern Security Systems Ltd [1998] 1 BCLC 428, CA.
Vine, Ex p, re Wilson (1878) 8 Ch D 364, CA.
Walter & Sullivan Ltd v J Murphy & Sons Ltd [1955] 1 All ER 843, [1955] 2 QB 584, [1955] 2 WLR 919, CA.
Wenlock v Moloney (1967) 111 So Jo 437, CA.
Wright v Fairfield (1831) 2 B & Ad 727, 109 ER 1314.

Appeal

The claimant, Barbara Anne Mulkerrins, appealed with permission of the Appeal Committee of the House of Lords given on 29 April 2002 from the order of the Court of Appeal (Kennedy, Laws and Jonathan Parker LJJ) on 13 December 2000 ([2001] BPIR 106) allowing an appeal by the defendant firm, PricewaterhouseCoopers (PwC), from the order of Jules Sher QC, sitting as a deputy judge of the High Court, on 15 February 2000 ([2000] BPIR 506), whereby he held on the trial of a preliminary issue that Ms Mulkerrins had title to sue PwC in negligence and dismissed PwC's application to strike out the statement of claim as disclosing no reasonable cause of action. The Official Receiver was given permission to intervene in the appeal. The facts are set out in the opinion of Lord Millett.

Ivan Krolick and Jeremy Gordon (instructed by Hewetts, Reading) for Ms Mulkerrins.
Robin Knowles QC and John Briggs (instructed by Boyes Turner, Reading) for PwC.
Stephen Davies QC and Brian Watson (instructed by TLT Solicitors, Bristol) for the Official Receiver.

Their Lordships took time for consideration

31 July 2003. The following opinions were delivered.

LORD BINGHAM OF CORNHILL.

[1] My Lords, I have had the advantage of reading in draft the opinions of my noble and learned friends Lord Walker of Gestingthorpe and Lord Millett. I am in full agreement with them and for the reasons which they give I would allow the appeal and make the order which Lord Walker proposes.

LORD NICHOLLS OF BIRKENHEAD.

[2] My Lords, I have had the opportunity of reading in draft the speech of my noble and learned friend Lord Walker of Gestingthorpe. For the reasons he gives, with which I agree, I would allow this appeal and make the order he proposes.

LORD MILLETT

[3] My Lords, Ms Mulkerrins claims damages from her former professional advisers PricewaterhouseCoopers (PwC) for having negligently failed to protect her from bankruptcy. Her claim has yet to be tried and her allegations have not been established. Even allowing for this, however, she has been shamefully ill served by her former advisers, by the law of insolvency, and by the civil justice system.

[4] At the beginning of the story Ms Mulkerrins owned a freehold property where she ran a small but profitable business as the proprietor of a nursing home. She faced the prospect of bankruptcy as a result of the failure of a business which she and her husband had formerly carried on together. The situation was tailor-made for an individual voluntary arrangement (IVA). Bankruptcy would destroy the business and yield relatively little for the creditors. An IVA, on the other hand, would preserve the business and enable the creditors to receive payments from the income of the nursing home. She consulted PwC, who were licensed insolvency practitioners, and on their advice made all the necessary arrangements to enter into an IVA with a view to avoiding bankruptcy.

[5] Despite this Ms Mulkerrins has been made bankrupt and the nursing home has been closed down by the Official Receiver, who did not have the funds to carry it on. She alleges that this would not have happened but for PwC's negligence. Her attempts to obtain redress have been thwarted at every turn. First, she had to fight off her trustee in bankruptcy, who somewhat implausibly claimed that her cause of action had vested in him for the benefit of the creditors. She won that round when the district judge in the Reading County Court sitting in bankruptcy ruled that her trustee had no interest in the claim (because her creditors had none). He did not appeal and she duly brought proceedings against PwC. They strongly objected to being sued by their own former client. Taking advantage of their own alleged wrong in failing to take the necessary steps to prevent her bankruptcy in the first place they insisted that, now that she had become bankrupt, they should be sued by her trustee. This was more than a little impudent, even brazen. It meant that Ms Mulkerrins had to fight the same battle all over again. She effectively won again before the deputy judge in the High Court ([2000] BPIR 506), but PwC had greater determination (or resources) than the trustee, and this time she was taken to the Court of Appeal ([2001] BPIR 106), where she lost. Her action has been struck out. She has now been discharged from bankruptcy and the trustee has been released, with the result that the Official Receiver has become trustee in his place: see s 300(2) of the Insolvency Act 1986. He is under the trustee's ordinary duty to realise the assets of the bankrupt estate for the benefit of the creditors. Relying on the decision of the Court of Appeal he has conducted an auction of Ms Mulkerrins' claim and proposes to distribute most of the proceeds to the creditors, despite the fact that they are bound by an order of the bankruptcy court that it is an asset in which they have no interest at all.

[6] Ms Mulkerrins has thus lost her business, had her claim for redress struck out, and faces the prospect of losing the value of her business for a second time. But for an order of a district judge she would now be suffering the ultimate misfortune of being a party to a leading case in your Lordships' House brought to resolve one of the more intractable problems in the law of insolvency. This is the problem which was recently considered by the Court of Appeal in Ord v Upton (as trustee to the property of Ord) [2000] 1 All ER 193, [2000] Ch 352 namely to what extent does a 'hybrid' claim of a bankrupt vest in his trustee on bankruptcy. A hybrid claim is constituted by a single cause of action which is partly for personal injury or loss of reputation (to which the creditors are not entitled) and partly for financial loss (to which they normally are).

[7] Ms Mulkerrins claims damages for having been made bankrupt. Her claim is a 'hybrid' one, for she claims damages for loss of reputation as well as damages for loss of assets and earning capacity. By far the greater part of her claim, however, is for financial loss arising from the closure of the business by the Official Receiver. This would not have occurred but for the bankruptcy, and was a readily foreseeable and indeed virtually inevitable consequence of the making of the bankruptcy order. She seeks to be placed in the financial position she would have been in if PwC had acted with proper skill and care and she had been made the subject of an IVA instead of a bankruptcy order.

[8] The first question is: what was the effect of the order of the bankruptcy court? The dispute which it was called upon to decide was whether the chose in action which represented Ms Mulkerrins' claim against PwC was an asset which had vested in the trustee for the benefit of the creditors or remained vested in Ms Mulkerrins for her own benefit. The district judge held that the trustee had no interest in the claim. In the High Court the deputy judge considered that this referred to the beneficial interest; he held that the effect of the district judge's order was that title to sue had vested in the trustee but he held it in trust for Ms Mulkerrins and not for the creditors. This was rejected by the Court of Appeal. Jonathan Parker LJ observed ([2001] BPIR 106 at 116 (para 61)) that—

> 'the district judge was not in any way concerned with accountability, or with the beneficial ownership of the cause of action. She was concerned only with the legal ownership: with the question—Who can sue PWC? The district judge was not contemplating that the Trustee would be accountable for anything. She was contemplating that it would be Ms Mulkerrins who would sue, not the Trustee ...'

[9] This is true so far as it goes, but it is not the whole truth. The district judge was certainly dealing with the legal title to the chose in action—the right to sue

PwC. But she was not dealing with the bare legal title. She ruled that the trustee had no interest in the claim, and her reasoning shows that she meant no interest at all whether at law or in equity. She considered that the claim had not vested in the trustee because it was not an asset which was available to the creditors, that is to say it was not part of the bankrupt estate. She did not overlook the basic rule that, with few exceptions, the property of a bankrupt vests in his trustee for the benefit of his creditors; or that at least so much of a chose in action as represents a claim to compensation for financial loss vests in him. To her credit she recognised that Ms Mulkerrins' claim was of an unusual kind, as neither the deputy judge nor the Court of Appeal seems to have done. It was a claim for damages for being made bankrupt. As she put it, 'the bankruptcy itself is the cause of action'. The district judge did not consider that a claim of this character could vest in the trustee for the benefit of the creditors; though she seems to have considered that this was a matter of timing which made the cause of action after-acquired property.

[10] Both the deputy judge and the Court of Appeal thought that the district judge's decision was wrong. The cause of action did not arise after the bankruptcy order but in the same instant as the bankruptcy order. The Court of Appeal distinguished between 'the Ord v Upton world', which they thought was the real world, and 'the artificial world' created by the district judge's order. As between the parties to a judicial decision, however, it does not matter whether the decision is right or wrong. As I observed in Crown Estates Comrs v Dorset CC [1990] 1 All ER 19 at 23, [1990] Ch 297 at 305, res judicata (or to give it its full name estoppel per rem judicatam) is a form of estoppel which gives effect to the policy of the law that the parties to a judicial decision should not afterwards be allowed to relitigate the same question, even though the decision may be wrong. If it is wrong, it must be challenged by appeal or not at all. As between themselves, the parties are bound by the decision, and may neither relitigate the same cause of action nor reopen any issue which was an essential part of the decision. The doctrine comes into its own only when the decision is wrong; if it is right, it merely serves to save time and costs.

[11] The district judge's order, therefore, bound the trustee and through him the creditors. As between Ms Mulkerrins and the creditors, her claim against PwC and its proceeds belonged to her and did not form part of the bankrupt estate available to them. The Court of Appeal, with respect, overlooked the fact that, whatever world PwC inhabited, the trustee and the creditors lived in the world created by the district judge's order.

[12] PwC, of course, were not parties to the proceedings in the bankruptcy court. They were not given notice of the proceedings and took no part in them. They are not, therefore, bound by the order of the district judge. But this does not mean that they can simply ignore it or that they are unaffected by it. It means only that they cannot be prejudiced by it. They cannot relitigate the issue, not because it is res judicata as against them, but because they have no legitimate interest in doing so.

[13] The general rule is that the benefit of a contract may be assigned to a third party without the consent of the other contracting party. If this is not desired, it is open to the parties to agree that the benefit of the contract shall not be assignable by one or either of them, either at all or without the consent of the other party. There is nothing objectionable in this; a party is entitled to insist that he deal only with the particular party with whom he has contracted: see Linden Gardens Trust Ltd v Lenesta Sludge Disposals Ltd [1993] 3 All ER 417 at 429, [1994] 1

AC 85 at 105 per Lord Browne-Wilkinson. But unless he takes the precaution of including in the contract a prohibition of assignment, he has no right to object to it. A debt is freely assignable both at law and in equity without the debtor's consent. Section 136 of the Law of Property Act 1925 requires notice of the assignment to be given to the debtor if it is to be effective at law; it does not require his consent.

[14] An assignment of a claim for unliquidated damages in tort may be open to challenge on the grounds of maintenance and champerty; but not on the ground that such an assignment needs the consent of the proposed defendant. It is now established that a trustee may properly discharge his duty to obtain the best price for the assets of a bankrupt estate by assigning the bankrupt's claim against a third party. It is common ground that PwC could not have prevented the trustee from reassigning Ms Mulkerrins' claim against them back to her had the district judge's decision gone the other way.

[15] The reason that the debtor's consent is not required to an assignment of a debt is that the assignment cannot prejudice him. The assignment is subject to equities, which means that any set-off which the debtor may have against the assignor can be asserted against the assignee. On bankruptcy the trustee is in no better position than his bankrupt; a creditor's right to sue his debtor vests in his trustee subject to equities. It would have been inappropriate to allow PwC to take any part in the proceedings in the bankruptcy court. They were brought to resolve a dispute between Ms Mulkerrins on the one hand and her creditors, represented by the trustee, on the other. PwC were debtors with an adverse interest to Ms Mulkerrins and her estate. They could not be prejudiced by the vesting of Ms Mulkerrins' claim vesting in her trustee; and a fortiori they could not be prejudiced if it remained in her. They had no legitimate interest in the question to be decided.

[16] In the event no question of assignment arose. The district judge held that the claim did not vest in the trustee but remained vested in Ms Mulkerrins despite her bankruptcy. PwC are being sued by their own former client, the very person to whom they owed a duty of care. In the circumstances their protests have a very hollow ring to them.

[17] So far I have been content to assume that the decision of the district judge may have been wrong. But it should not be assumed that it was. Ms Mulkerrins' claim is an unusual one, for she complains of PwC's failure to prevent the making of a bankruptcy order against her. She claims damages representing the difference between her financial position as a result of the bankruptcy order and the financial position she would have enjoyed if she had entered into an IVA instead. Treating this claim as being wholly or mainly a claim in respect of financial loss, and even assuming that (contrary to the view of the district judge) it was not after-acquired property, it would be very surprising if a claim of this character could be made available to the creditors. They would be claiming damages for the making of the very bankruptcy order under which their claim arose. The greater part of their claim would represent damages for the closure of the nursing home, even though it was a going concern when it supposedly vested in the Official Receiver and was closed down by him. The creditors have received the full value of the bankrupt estate. The damages which Ms Mulkerrins claims represent the value of what she lost by the making of the bankruptcy order; but while this could have been available to the creditors under an IVA, it could never have been made available to them in a bankruptcy.

[18] The Court of Appeal assumed that the claim vested in the trustee because it was wholly or largely a claim for financial loss, without considering the particular nature of the claim. The question has not been argued before us and is not covered by authority. I prefer to express no concluded view upon it, but to leave it open for decision when the need arises, while expressing the view that it should not be taken to be concluded by the judgment of the Court of Appeal in the present case.

[19] It is sufficient to dispose of this case by saying that, right or wrong, the district judge's order bound the trustee and through him the creditors. Ms Mulkerrins' claim must be taken to form no part of the bankrupt estate available to her creditors, and she is at liberty to pursue it in her own name and for her own benefit. In agreement with my noble and learned friend, Lord Walker of Gestingthorpe, whose speech I have had the advantage of reading in draft and with which I agree, I would allow the appeal.

LORD SCOTT OF FOSCOTE.

[20] My Lords, I have had the advantage of reading the opinions of my noble and learned friends Lord Millett and Lord Walker of Gestingthorpe. I agree with them and for the reasons they give I, too, would allow this appeal and make the order Lord Walker has proposed.

LORD WALKER OF GESTINGTHORPE.

[21] My Lords, on the making of a bankruptcy order the bankrupt's estate vests automatically in the trustee in bankruptcy as soon as he becomes trustee. The bankrupt's estate is widely defined (s 283(2) of the Insolvency Act 1986), subject to some exceptions (including business equipment and household necessities) as comprising 'all property belonging to or vested in the bankrupt at the commencement of the bankruptcy'. Property is widely defined (s 436 of the 1986 Act) as including—

> 'money, goods, things in action, land and every description of property wherever situated and also obligations and every description of interest, whether present or future or vested or contingent, arising out of, or incidental to, property'.

That is the effect of ss 283, 306 and 436 of the 1986 Act, which replaced similar but by no means identical provisions in a succession of earlier statutes.

[22] However, the wide language used in successive statutes to describe the bankrupt's estate was from an early stage interpreted by the court as excluding rights of action which are classified as personal to the bankrupt, rather than relating to his property. The most notable early case was the decision of your Lordships' House in Beckham v Drake (1849) 2 HL Cas 579, 9 ER 1213, but the report of counsel's argument in that case refers to numerous authorities going back to the time of Lord Mansfield. The point was explained as follows by Erle J ((1849) 2 HL Cas 579 at 603–604, 9 ER 1213 at 1222), one of the judges who advised the House:

> 'This was an action on a contract for hiring and service, whereby the plaintiff was to serve for seven years, and the defendant to pay weekly wages during that time; and the breach was a dismissal during the seven years. The plaintiff, after this breach, and before the commencement of the action, became bankrupt; and the question is, whether this cause of action passed from the plaintiff to his assignees. The general principle is, that all rights of the bankrupt which can be exercised beneficially for the creditors do so pass, and the right to recover damages may pass though they are unliquidated ... This principle is subject to exception. The right of action does not pass where the damages are to be estimated by immediate reference to pain felt by the bankrupt in respect of his body, mind or character, and without immediate reference to his rights of property. Thus it has been laid down that the assignees cannot sue for breach of promise of marriage, for criminal conversation, seduction, defamation, battery, injury to the person by negligence, as by not carrying safely, not curing, not saving from imprisonment by process of law ...'

[23] The line of authority includes the decision of your Lordships' House in Wilson v United Counties Bank Ltd [1920] AC 102, [1918–19] All ER Rep 1035. Major Wilson had left England on active service soon after the beginning of the First World War, leaving his business affairs (which seem to have been in a fairly precarious state) in the hands of his bank. The jury found that the bank had failed in its duty to supervise his business affairs and to take reasonable steps to maintain his credit and reputation. Major Wilson was made bankrupt and he and his trustee in bankruptcy joined in an action against the bank. The jury awarded damages of about £45,000 for depreciation in the bankrupt's business and estate caused by the bank's negligence (although the House was not unanimous as to whether this finding was justified on the evidence) and £7,500 for damage to his credit and reputation. The former sum was recoverable by the trustee in bankruptcy, and the latter by the bankrupt personally, even though (as Lord Atkinson observed ([1920] AC 102 at 128, [1918–19] All ER Rep 1035 at 1038)) the damages arose from the same breach of contract.

[24] Wilson's case can therefore be described as a hybrid claim, the term used by Aldous LJ in Ord v Upton (as trustee to the property of Ord) [2000] 1 All ER 193 at 203, [2000] Ch 352 at 366. That case was concerned with a claim which a bankrupt labourer (aged 30 at the time of his bankruptcy) brought against a doctor who had treated him, some years before his bankruptcy, for back pain. Liability was admitted and the claim was substantial, including over £170,000 for loss of past earnings and over £730,000 for loss of future earnings. The Court of Appeal, following the decision of the Supreme Court of British Columbia in Re Bell (a bankrupt) [1998] BPIR 26, held that both parts of the claim for loss of earnings formed part of the estate, and that Mr Ord himself was entitled only to the damages for pain and suffering. Aldous LJ (with whom Kennedy and Mantell LJJ agreed) summarised the decision as follows ([2000] 1 All ER 193 at 207–208, [2000] Ch 352 at 371):

'The authorities are only consistent with the conclusion that the trustee is entitled to the damages for past and future loss of earnings and is not entitled to the damages for pain and suffering. As there is a single cause of action, it vested in the trustee. There is in my view nothing in that conclusion which imposes practical difficulties with which the law cannot deal. The trustee as constructive trustee would have to account to the bankrupt for the property which he obtained inadvertently or by arrangement in an action which vested in him for the benefit of the creditors. The idea that the cause of action should vest in the bankrupt would not be acceptable and compulsory joinder of both could lead to difficulties when the claim for loss of earnings was small compared with the potential costs of the litigation. In such a case, > the trustee, if the cause of action vested in him, would have to consider carefully his duty to the bankrupt and would probably, if requested, assign the cause of action to him.'

[25] The most recent authority is the decision of the Court of Appeal in Grady v Prison Service [2003] EWCA Civ 527, [2003] 3 All ER 745. It concerned a claim for unfair dismissal made by an administrative officer who had been a bankrupt about a year after the termination of her employment. The Court of Appeal (in a judgment of the court delivered by Sedley LJ) observed (at [14]) that there is 'no bright line' between personal rights of action and those which form part of a bankrupt's estate, but (at [24]) that all the reasoning in the authorities—

> 'tends to place on the non-vesting side of the line a claim which is primarily directed at the restoration of a contractual relationship in which the claimant's skill and labour are the essential commodity'.

[26] The Official Receiver, who was given leave to intervene in this appeal, has (both in his petition for leave and in his printed case) placed before your Lordships some thoughtful and well-researched submissions, including a helpful survey of Commonwealth and United States authorities. He has drawn attention to the apparently anomalous results which can flow from accidents of timing of different stages in the prosecution of a right of action, and to the practical problems which may arise from a trustee in bankruptcy prosecuting a hybrid right of action, partly on behalf of the creditors and party on behalf of the bankrupt himself. But in the event your Lordships did not find it necessary, and did not consider it appropriate, to hear all argument on these points. That is because the very unusual facts of the present appeal permit it to be disposed of on much narrower grounds, and make it an unsuitable case for exploration of the wider issues.

[27] The appellant, Ms Barbara Mulkerrins, is an experienced state registered nurse. In 1995 she was separated from her husband (Mr Woodward, to whom she is no longer married). She was running a small nursing home in Berkshire providing specialised 24-hour care for four mentally disabled adults. Ms Mulkerrins was the sole proprietor of the business, and owned the freehold of the property, subject to a mortgage. The residents were paid for by a care association, and the high level of fees (£650 per resident per week) reflected the labour-intensive nature of the business.

[28] Considered on its own, the nursing home was financially viable. But Ms Mulkerrins had outstanding debts, for which she and her husband were both liable, in connection with a property business. On 25 October 1994 a builders' merchant presented a bankruptcy petition against Ms Mulkerrins in the Reading County Court. After some adjournments it was due to be heard on 26 June 1995. Ms Mulkerrins consulted insolvency practitioners, Coopers & Lybrand, now PricewaterhouseCoopers (PwC). Mr Rutlen of PwC advised her to apply to the county court for an IVA under Pt VIII of the 1986 Act. He advised that she had a good chance of obtaining an IVA under which she would for a period of three years pay to her creditors £500 a month out of the profits of the nursing home business. Ms Mulkerrins accepted that advice. She paid PwC an amount on account of their charges and PwC undertook to prepare an IVA proposal with a partner in PwC as the nominee. PwC attended the hearing on 26 June 1995 and an interim order was made suspending the bankruptcy proceedings. The petition was adjourned to the next open date (subsequently fixed as Monday 21 August 1995). An application to continue the interim order was to be made on Friday 18 August 1995. The nominee was required to lodge a report with the court by Wednesday 16 August 1995. a [29] Then, as the deputy judge (Mr Jules Sher QC) said in his judgment ([2000] BPIR 506 at 508) disaster struck. Ms Mulkerrins was due to go to Ireland for about a fortnight for a family reunion on the twenty-fifth anniversary of her father's death. Her case (which PwC denies) is that she asked Mr Rutlen whether b she should attend court on either the Friday or the Monday and was told that it was unnecessary. She went to Ireland. PwC did not lodge the nominee's report on the Wednesday. It reached the court by post on the Thursday (with a letter stating that the nominee did not propose to attend, but requesting continuation of the interim order) but these documents did not get placed before the district c judge. On Friday 18 August 1995 no one appeared and the district judge discharged the interim order. On Monday 21 August 1995 there was again no appearance, and Ms Mulkerrins was adjudicated bankrupt.

[30] She heard this news by telephone on Thursday 24 August 1995. By then the Official Receiver had learnt of the existence of the nursing home (which was d apparently unknown to the petitioner) and had visited it. He formed the view that the business must be closed down at once. He arranged with Berkshire Social Services for the residents to be moved to other accommodation and on the afternoon of 23 August 1995 he obtained an order from the district judge authorising him 'in the absence of the bankrupt' to close down the business. The order records that the district judge heard representations by telephone from e solicitors instructed by PwC. The residents were moved out on 24 August 1995. There was subsequently an application (paid for by PwC) to annul the bankruptcy order, but it failed. In any case the nursing home business had by then effectively ceased to exist.

[31] Naturally enough, Ms Mulkerrins was extremely upset. She wished to f sue PwC for breach of their professional duty. Towards the end of 1995 Mr Blake of KPMG was appointed as her trustee in bankruptcy. There were some without prejudice discussions between Ms Mulkerrins' solicitors, Mr Blake, and PwC and its solicitors (particulars of these discussions were ordered to be struck out of Ms Mulkerrins' reply). But nothing significant came of them and on 19 August 1998 (just before her discharge from bankruptcy) Ms Mulkerrins issued a writ g against PwC. Her statement of claim was served on 17 May 1999. It claimed general damages for 'loss of status and business reputation' and special damages for the loss of her assets, including the nursing home.

[32] The considerable interval between the issue of the writ and the service of h the statement of claim is explained, at least in part, by discussions which took place between Ms Mulkerrins and Mr Blake. Each claimed to be the proper person to prosecute the claim against PwC. In order to resolve the difference of opinion Ms Mulkerrins made an application to the Reading County Court. It was an ordinary application in her bankruptcy proceedings, made under s 303 of the 1986 Act, which provides: j

> '(1) If a bankrupt or any of his creditors or any other person is dissatisfied by any act, omission or decision of a trustee of the bankrupt's estate, he may apply to the court; and on such an application the court may confirm, reverse or modify any act or decision of the trustee, may give him directions or may make such other order as it thinks fit.

(2) The trustee of a bankrupt's estate may apply to the court for directions in relation to any particular matter arising under the bankruptcy.'

[33] There was a contested hearing before District Judge Henson on 3 February 1999 (that is, about ten months before Ord v Upton (as trustee to the property of Ord) [2000] 1 All ER 193, [2000] Ch 352 was decided by the Court of Appeal). Both sides were represented by counsel. The district judge heard argument, adjourned for a short while to consider the matter and then gave judgment. There is no official transcript but there is a full note prepared by the trustee in bankruptcy's solicitor. A covering letter from the solicitor indicates that it was common ground between counsel that there could only be one cause of action in respect of the damage to her reputation and the financial loss, and that it was therefore a question as to whether the entire cause of action vested in the trustee in bankruptcy or in Ms Mulkerrins.

[34] The district judge's reasoning is recorded as follows in the note:

'I have to say that I agree with the applicant. The bankruptcy itself is the cause of action and could not accrue until the bankruptcy order was made. I do not think the argument that the cause of action arose before the bankruptcy order, as a result of which the bankruptcy order was inevitable, is convincing and I do not believe the definition of property can include the bankruptcy of this person.'

The relevant part of the order was the declaration:

'The respondent has no interest in the following chose in action, namely a right of action by the applicant against Coopers & Lybrand (a firm) for personal injuries, loss and damage arising out of her bankruptcy which was caused by their negligence and breach of contract as licensed insolvency practitioners.'

The heading to the order as drawn up contains two errors. It refers to s 303(2) (rather than s 303(1)) and it refers to the respondent as KPMG (rather than Mr Blake). But no one has suggested that either error casts any doubt on the substance of the order. Mr Knowles QC (appearing in your Lordships' House for PwC) accepted that 'no interest' means what it says—that is no interest at all, legal or equitable.

[35] There is no suggestion that this order was in any way collusive. On the contrary, it was clearly made after vigorous argument. It has never been appealed, probably because the trustee in bankruptcy had no funds available. At a hearing which took place before another district judge at the end of 2001, it was suggested that the order of 3 February 1999 might be discharged or revoked under s 375(1) of the 1986 Act, which provides that every court with bankruptcy jurisdiction may review, rescind or vary any order made by it in the exercise of that jurisdiction. But it would be extraordinary to contemplate rescinding an order which has now stood for over four years, and has been acted on in litigation which has now reached your Lordships' House. Mr Davies QC for the Official Receiver very properly recognised that that is no longer a practical possibility.

[36] PwC were not given notice of the hearing on 3 February 1999 and did not know that it was taking place. The first they heard of it was in a letter dated 1 April 1999 from Ms Mulkerrins' solicitor. The absence of notice to PwC is at the heart of their submission that the order of 3 February 1999 was wrong, that it does not bind PwC, and that it should for practical purposes be ignored. The Official Receiver (who became involved in the matter again after Mr Blake's discharge) did indeed appear to disregard the order in negotiations which he conducted, during 2001, for the assignment of the cause of action in which (according to the order of 3 February 1999) he had no interest.

[37] On 7 September 1999 PwC applied to strike out part of Ms Mulkerrins' claim. This application overlapped a preliminary issue which had been directed by the master. On the very eve of the hearing before the deputy judge the Court of Appeal handed down judgment in Ord's case. This led to rapid reassessment of both sides' arguments and the enlargement of the scope of the strike-out application.

[38] In his judgment the deputy judge referred to the two elements of Ms Mulkerrins' claim as the personal loss and the financial loss. He was satisfied that PwC's breach of contract (if eventually established at trial) occurred on Friday 18 August 1995 at the latest. He rejected the submission that the right of action could be regarded as after-acquired property (which does not vest automatically in the trustee in bankruptcy but may be acquired by him under s 307 of the 1986 Act, subject to the qualifications set out in that section). The deputy judge listed, and proceeded to reject, four arguments which had been relied on by Mr Krolick on behalf of Ms Mulkerrins ([2000] BPIR 506 at 516):

> '(1) The decision of the Reading County Court in Bankruptcy is binding upon the defendants; (2) In the alternative, it is an abuse of process to assert that the cause of action is vested in the trustee in bankruptcy; (3) The defendants are estopped from denying the cause of action is vested in the claimant; (4) The decision of the Reading County Court in Bankruptcy was correct, and the cause of action is vested entirely in the claimant.'

[39] The deputy judge then turned (at 520) to a fifth argument, which he himself had prompted:

> 'Although, as I have held, the defendants are not bound by the Reading County Court judgment, the [trustee in bankruptcy] is; and, once the time for appealing that judgment went by, the position as between the claimant and him became permanent and clear: as between the two of them it was she who was entitled to the claim against the defendants and all the damages that might be awarded in pursuance of that claim. The corollary is that, as against the claimant, the [trustee in bankruptcy] was not entitled to such damages for the benefit of the creditors. In short, once the time for appealing had gone by, the claimant's beneficial entitlement to the claim against the defendants was unassailable. The defendants are not bound by the judgment of the Reading County Court but they cannot challenge the fact that it was made and the consequence that the claimant became beneficially entitled to the claim and its proceeds. The same is not true of the legal title to the claim. That, as I have held, was vested in the [trustee in bankruptcy] and, as the defendants are not bound by the judgment, they remain entitled to assert, as they do of course assert, that the legal title remains vested in the [trustee in bankruptcy]. If he sued, and recovered, he would hold the proceeds upon trust for the claimant. Even in the absence of the Reading County Court proceedings, he would have been a trustee of that part of such proceeds as represented damages in respect of the personal loss: see Ord v Upton. The effect of the Reading County Court judgment was to extend her beneficial entitlement from the damages in respect of the personal loss to all the damages recovered, irrespective of whether they represented personal or financial loss.'

[40] The deputy judge then referred to the decision of Scott J in Weddell v JA Pearce & Major (a firm) [1987] 3 All ER 624, [1988] Ch 26, and to some well-known authorities discussed by Scott J in his judgment. The deputy judge concluded that Ms Mulkerrins' proceedings were not a nullity, but that the Official Receiver should be joined as a defendant. On that basis, he dismissed the strike-out application and determined the preliminary issue in favour of Ms Mulkerrins.

[41] PwC appealed to the Court of Appeal ([2001] BPIR 106), which took the same view as the deputy judge had taken on the arguments raised in Ms Mulkerrins' respondent's notice. But the Court of Appeal took a different view on what had become the main issue. Jonathan Parker LJ (with whom Kennedy and Laws LJJ agreed) referred in his conclusions (at 116 (para 60)) to what he called the 'Ord v Upton world', and then (in para 61) to what he called the artificial world of the Reading judgment (of 3 February 1999). He said:

> 'The difficulty with this [the deputy judge's approach], to my mind, is that the district judge was not in any way concerned with accountability, or with the beneficial ownership of the cause of action.'

That is so, up to a point. On 3 February 1999 Aldous LJ's judgment in Ord's case lay in the future, and the notion of a trustee in bankruptcy being accountable (as a constructive trustee) in respect of part of the recovery to be achieved by prosecuting a right of action was, I think, unheard of. But it is, with respect, incorrect to say that the district judge was not in any way concerned with the beneficial ownership of the right of action and (as Jonathan Parker LJ went on to say) that she was concerned only with legal ownership. The fact is that she was concerned with both legal and beneficial ownership, viewed globally and without any need for differentiation between them. That was the all-or-nothing choice which counsel had placed before her as their agreed position. Whether it was right or wrong, the order of 3 February 1999 clearly and decisively determined the issue between the only two possible contenders for the right of action against PwC. But the Court of Appeal treated it as an 'artificial world' and concluded that the deputy judge's reasoning was fallacious. The Court of Appeal allowed the appeal, determined the preliminary issue against Ms Mulkerrins, and dismissed her action.

[42] In his oral submissions to your Lordships Mr Knowles concentrated (as I have already mentioned) on the fact that PwC had not had notice of the hearing on 3 February 1999. He accepted that if the trustee in bankruptcy had made a legal assignment of his right of action to Ms Mulkerrins, or if Ms Mulkerrins had obtained the right to sue in the trustee's name, PwC would have had to put up with the consequences, unwelcome though they were. But in the absence of such an assignment PwC could, he said, object to being faced with a claimant who has legal aid, and is likely to be unable to pay PwC's costs if her claim ultimately fails. This potential problem about costs gave PwC a sufficient interest to give them standing to oppose the making of the order, had they known of the application.

[43] In my opinion this submission is mistaken, for reasons which were explained by Lord Hoffmann in Stein v Blake [1995] 2 All ER 961 at 972, [1996] AC 243 at 260:

'It is a matter of common occurrence for an individual to become insolvent while attempting to pursue a claim against someone else. In some cases, the bankruptcy will itself have been caused by the failure of the other party to meet his obligations. In many more cases this will be the view of the bankrupt. It is not unusual in such circumstances for there to be a difference of opinion between the trustee and the bankrupt over whether a claim should be pursued. The trustee may have nothing in his hands with which to fund litigation. Even if he has, he must act in the interests of creditors generally and the creditors will often prefer to receive an immediate distribution rather than see the bankrupt's assets ventured on the costs of litigation which may or may not yield a larger distribution at some future date. The bankrupt, with nothing more to lose, tends to take a more sanguine view of the prospects of success. In such a case the trustee may decide, as in this case, that the practical course in the interests of all concerned (apart from the defendant) is to assign the claim to the bankrupt and let him pursue it for himself, on terms that he accounts to the trustee for some proportion of the proceeds. It is understandable that a defendant who does not share the bankrupt's view of the merits of the claim may be disappointed to find that notwithstanding the bankruptcy, which he thought would result in a practical commercial decision by an independent trustee to discontinue the proceedings, the action is still being pursued by the bankrupt. His disappointment is increased if he finds that the bankrupt as plaintiff in his own name has the benefit of legal aid which would not have been available to the trustee. Similar considerations apply to an assignment of a right of action by the liquidator of an insolvent company to a shareholder or former director. In such a case there is the further point that the company as plaintiff can be required to give security for costs. The shareholder assignee as an individual cannot be required to give security even if (either because he does not qualify or the legal aid board considers that the claim has no merits) he is not in receipt of legal aid.'

Lord Hoffmann concluded that the systemic defect, if there was one, lay in the arrangements for legal aid and costs orders and not in the law of insolvency. His observations were directed to a different situation (where the trustee in bankruptcy assigned a right of action for financial loss which had undoubtedly vested in him) but they are also relevant to the present case.

[44] PwC's grievance about its likely inability to recover its costs, if Ms Mulkerrins is ultimately unsuccessful, would not in my opinion have given it the right to be heard on the application under s 303 of the 1986 Act. Under r 7.7(4) of the Insolvency Rules 1986, SI 1986/1925 the district judge could no doubt have directed that notice of the application should be given to PwC, but that would in my opinion have been a very unusual step to take. The district judge cannot be criticised for not having taken it. The hearing was an exercise of the court's supervisory jurisdiction over the bankruptcy process, and PwC was a stranger to that process, with interests directly opposed to those of both the creditors and the bankrupt herself. Even if PwC had happened to be a creditor, the conflict of interest would have reduced their claim to be heard on a question of this sort (compare the practice of the Chancery Division on a summons to consider whether trustees should take proceedings against a defendant who happens to be a beneficiary, as explained in Re Moritz (decd), Midland Bank Executor and Trustee Co Ltd v Forbes [1959] 3 All ER 767, [1960] Ch 251 and Re Eaton (decd), Shaw v Midland Bank Executor and Trustee Co Ltd [1964] 3 All ER 229; and, on a comparable situation in the Companies Court, Smith v Croft (No 2) [1987] 3 All ER 909 at 957, [1988] Ch 114 at 185–186).

[45] If (as I think) PwC had no right to be heard on the question of entitlement to the right of action, it is irrelevant that PwC was not bound by the district judge's order in such a way as to create an estoppel per rem judicatam. There is a statement in Spencer Bower, Turner and Handley Res Judicata (3rd edn, 1996) p 130 (para 251):

> 'An English judicial decision which operates upon a thing by effecting a disposition of it determines its status and may be set up by, or against, any member of the English public, as conclusive in rem.'

But it is simply not necessary to explore this difficult area. In relation to the points raised in Mr Krolick's respondent's notice in the Court of Appeal it may be accepted that the order of 3 February 1999 was erroneous, and that it does not bind PwC by estoppel per rem judicatam or indeed by any other form of estoppel. But as the deputy judge said, the order certainly did bind the trustee in bankruptcy who was the only other possible contender for title to the right of action. The substantial effect of the order was not to assign the right of action, but to declare that it had not been affected by the bankruptcy. From the moment that the right of action arose, it was at all material times in the legal and beneficial ownership of Ms Mulkerrins. If the trustee in bankruptcy, as the only possible rival claimant, was bound by the order, its practical effect was not open to challenge by PwC.

[46] It was not necessary for the deputy judge to direct that the Official Receiver (who is now performing the residual functions of the trustee in bankruptcy) should be joined as a defendant to the proceedings. For these reasons and for the further reasons given in the speech of Lord Millett, with which I agree, I would allow the appeal and restore the deputy judge's order, other than his direction for joinder of the Official Receiver.

Appeal allowed.

Celia Fox Barrister.

Re Pantmaenog Timber Co Ltd (in liquidation)

Official Receiver v Meade-King (a firm) and others

[2003] UKHL 49

HOUSE OF LORDS

LORD STEYN, LORD HOFFMANN, LORD HOPE OF CRAIGHEAD, LORD MILLETT AND LORD WALKER OF GESTINGTHORPE

3 JUNE, 31 JULY 2003

Company – Compulsory winding up – Examination of officer of company etc – Production of documents – Directors disqualification proceedings – Statutory provision empowering court on application of office-holder of company in liquidation to require any person to produce documents relating to company's affairs – Whether power could be invoked solely for purpose of obtaining evidence in directors disqualification proceedings – Insolvency Act 1986, s 236 – Company Directors Disqualification Act 1986, s 7(4).

The Official Receiver became provisional liquidator of a company on its compulsory winding up by the court. Subsequently, the Official Receiver, acting on the direction of the Secretary of State, instituted disqualification proceedings against two former directors of the company under the Company Directors Disqualification Act 1986 (the Disqualification Act). For the sole purpose of obtaining evidence for use in those proceedings, the Official Receiver, who had by then ceased to be the company's liquidator, applied to the court, under s 236[a] of the Insolvency Act 1986, for orders requiring the production of documents by three professional firms which had acted for the company at the material time. Section 236 empowered the court, on the application of the 'office-holder', to require any person whom the court thought capable of giving information concerning the dealings, affairs or property of the company, to produce any documents in his possession relating to those matters. The expression 'office-holder' was defined to mean the administrator, administrative receiver, liquidator or provisional liquidator of the company, but s 236 extended it to include the Official Receiver, whether or not he was the liquidator, in a case where the company was being wound up by the court. The district judge made the orders sought, but they were discharged on appeal by the judge on the ground that the purpose of s 236 was to assist the liquidator of a company in carrying out his functions as liquidator, and that those functions did not include bringing disqualification proceedings against the company's former directors. The judge's decision was affirmed by the Court of Appeal. On the Official Receiver's appeal to the House of Lords, their Lordships were required to determine whether the Official Receiver was entitled to have recourse to s 236 for the sole purpose of obtaining evidence for use in disqualification proceedings. In dealing with that question, their Lordships considered whether an affirmative answer would be contrary to, or render otiose, s 7(4)[b] of the Disqualification

a Section 236, so far as material, is set out at [58], below

Act—a provision which empowered the Secretary of State or the Official Receiver to require existing or former office-holders to furnish him with such information with respect to any person's conduct as a director of the company, and to produce and permit inspection of such papers relevant to that person's conduct as such a director, as the Secretary of State or Official Receiver might reasonably require for the purpose of determining whether to exercise, or of exercising, any of his functions under s 7.

Held – The powers conferred by s 236 of the Insolvency Act 1986 could be lawfully exercised, whether on the application of the Official Receiver or of a liquidator or other office-holder, solely or principally to obtain evidence for use in proceedings under the Disqualification Act. Section 236 contained no express limitation on the purpose for which it might be invoked, and the sole implicit limitation in that section was that it could be invoked only for the purpose of enabling the applicant to exercise his statutory functions in relation to the company which was being wound up. Whether the applicant was the Official Receiver or the liquidator or other office-holder, those functions included the provision of information to the Secretary of State or the Official Receiver which was relevant to the bringing or continuing of disqualification proceedings. Moreover, although s 7(4) of the Disqualification Act did not oblige the office-holder to invoke s 236 of the Insolvency Act 1986 in order to obtain the information for which the Secretary of State had asked, it did not forbid it. On the contrary, it brought the provision of such information to the Secretary of State for the purpose of disqualification proceedings squarely within the functions of the liquidator. Nor would s 7(4) be otiose if the Official Receiver could invoke s 236 to require the office-holder to provide information in relation to disqualification proceedings. It might not be unreasonable in a particular case for the office-holder to refuse to invoke s 236 at the expense of the estate where the sole purpose of the application was to enable the Secretary of State or the Official Receiver to bring or continue disqualification proceedings. Furthermore, disqualification proceedings often concerned the conduct of a director in relation to more than one company. Unless the other companies were also in compulsory liquidation and the Official Receiver of the lead company obtained authority to act as Official Receiver of those companies, s 236 would not enable him to obtain information in respect of them. Accordingly, the appeal would be allowed (see [1]–[3], [17], [31], [64], [67], [71], [72], [75], [76], [88], below).

Dicta of Vinelott J in Re Polly Peck International plc, ex p the joint administrator [1994] BCC 15 at 16 approved.

Decision of the Court of Appeal [2001] 4 All ER 588 reversed.

Notes

For inquiry into company's dealings and for request for information from office-holders, see 7(3) Halsbury's Laws (4th edn) (1996 reissue) paras 2439, 2880.

For the Insolvency Act 1986, s 236, see 4 Halsbury's Statutes (4th edn) (1998 reissue) 904.

For the Company Directors Disqualification Act 1986, s 7, see 8 Halsbury's Statutes (4th edn) (1999 reissue) 844.

b Section 7(4) is set out at [42], below

Cases referred to in opinions

Bishopsgate Investment Management Ltd (in prov liq) v Maxwell [1992] 2 All ER 856, [1993] Ch 1, [1992] 2 WLR 991, CA.

British and Commonwealth Holdings plc (Joint administrators) v Spicer & Oppenheim (a firm) [1992] 4 All ER 876, [1993] AC 426, [1992] 3 WLR 853, HL.

Campbell Coverings Ltd, Re [1953] 2 All ER 74, [1953] Ch 488, [1953] 2 WLR 1135, CA.

Campbell Coverings Ltd (No 2), Re [1954] 1 All ER 222, [1954] Ch 225, [1954] 2 WLR 204.

Levitt (Jeffrey S) Ltd, Re [1992] 2 All ER 509, [1992] Ch 457, [1992] 2 WLR 975.

London and Globe Finance Corp Ltd, Re [1903] 1 Ch 728, [1900–3] All ER Rep 891.

North Australian Territory Co, Re (1890) 45 Ch D 87, CA.

Paget, Re, ex p Official Receiver [1927] 2 Ch 85, [1927] All ER Rep 465, CA.

Polly Peck International plc, Re, ex p joint administrators [1994] BCC 15.

Seagull Manufacturing Co Ltd (in liq), Re [1993] 2 All ER 980, [1993] Ch 345, [1993] 2 WLR 872, CA.

Tweddle (John) & Co Ltd, Re [1910] 2 KB 697, CA.

Cases referred to in list of authorities

Barnes, Ex p [1896] AC 146, [1895–9] All ER Rep 1275, HL.

Blackspur Group plc, Re [1998] 1 WLR 422, CA.

Carecraft Construction Co Ltd, Re [1993] 4 All ER 499, [1994] 1 WLR 172.

Castle New Homes Ltd, Re [1979] 2 All ER 775, [1979] 1 WLR 1075.

Circle Holidays International plc, Re, Secretary of State for Trade and Industry v Smith [1994] BCC 226.

Civil, Naval and Military Outfitters Ltd, Re [1899] 1 Ch 215, CA.

Cloverbay Ltd (Joint administrators) v Bank of Credit and Commerce International SA [1991] 1 All ER 894, [1991] Ch 90, [1990] 3 WLR 574, CA.

Esal (Commodities) Ltd, Re [1989] BCLC 59, CA.

Grayan Building Services Ltd (in liq), Re [1995] Ch 241, [1995] 3 WLR 1, CA.

Khanna v Lovell White Durrant (a firm) [1994] 4 All ER 267, [1995] 1 WLR 121.

Launchexcept Ltd, Re, Secretary of State for Trade and Industry v Tillman [2000] 1 BCLC 36, CA.

Minotaur Data Systems Ltd, Re, Official Receiver v Brunt [1999] 3 All ER 122, [1999] 1 WLR 1129, CA.

O'Toole v Mitcham (1977) 2 ACLR 471, Vict SC.

Rolls Razor Ltd, Re [1968] 3 All ER 698.

Schofield, Ex p, Re Firth (1879) 12 Ch D 337, CA.

Secretary of State for Trade and Industry v Ettinger, Re Swift 736 Ltd [1993] BCLC 896, CA.

Secretary of State for Trade and Industry v Hickling [1996] BCC 678.

Silkstone and Dodworth Coal and Iron Co, Re, (Whitworth's Case) (1881) 19 Ch D 118, CA.

Smith v Braintree DC [1989] 3 All ER 897, [1990] 2 AC 215, [1989] 3 WLR 1317, HL.

Three Rivers DC v Bank of England (No 4) [2002] EWCA Civ 1182, [2002] 4 All ER 881, [2003] 1 WLR 210.

Westmid Packing Services Ltd, Re [1998] 2 All ER 124, CA.

Williams (Rex) Leisure plc, Re [1994] 4 All ER 27, [1994] Ch 350, [1994] 3 WLR 745, CA; affg [1993] 2 All ER 741, [1994] Ch 1, [1993] 3 WLR 685.

Appeal

The Official Receiver appealed with permission of the Appeal Committee of the House of Lords given on 22 July 2002 from the decision of the Court of Appeal (Kennedy and Chadwick LJJ) on 25 July 2001 ([2001] EWCA Civ 1227, [2001] 4 All ER 588, [2002] Ch 239) dismissing his appeal from the decision of Judge Weeks QC, sitting as a judge of the High Court at Bristol, on 14 November 2000 ([2001] 1 WLR 730) allowing an appeal by Andrew Thomas George Hay, a defendant to disqualification proceedings brought by the Official Receiver under the Company Directors Disqualification Act 1986, from the orders of District Judge Frenkel made at Bristol County Court on 2 October 2000 under s 236 of the Insolvency Act 1986, requiring three third party professional firms, Meade-King, Wadge Rapps & Hunt and Grant Thornton, to produce within seven days documents in their possession relating to Pantmaenog Timber Co Ltd, a company in compulsory liquidation, of which Mr Hay had formerly been a director. The firms took no part in the proceedings before Judge Weeks, the Court of Appeal or the House of Lords. Mr Hay took no part in the proceedings before the House of Lords. The facts are set out in the opinion of Lord Millett.

Jonathan Crow and Malcolm Davis-White QC (instructed by the Treasury Solicitor) for the Official Receiver.

Philip Jones (instructed by the Treasury Solicitor) as amicus curiae.

Their Lordships took time for consideration.

31 July 2003. The following opinions were delivered.

LORD STEYN.

[1] My Lords, for the reasons given in the opinions prepared by my noble and learned friends Lord Hope of Craighead, Lord Millett and Lord Walker of Gestingthorpe I would also allow the appeal.

LORD HOFFMANN.

[2] My Lords, for the reasons given by my noble and learned friends, I too would allow this appeal.

LORD HOPE OF CRAIGHEAD.

[3] My Lords, the facts and legislative background have been described and analysed by my noble and learned friend Lord Millett, whose speech I have had the privilege of reading in draft and with which I am in full agreement. I should like to add just a few words of my own, simply to explain why I have come to the same conclusion as he has done on the issue which is before us in this appeal.

[4] The question is whether the powers conferred by s 236 of the Insolvency Act 1986 on the office-holder of a company which is in liquidation or is the subject of administration or receivership proceedings can lawfully be exercised for the purpose only of obtaining evidence for use in disqualification proceedings under s 6 of the Company Directors Disqualification Act 1986 (the Disqualification Act). The expression 'office-holder' is defined in s 234(1) of the Insolvency Act 1986. It means the administrator, the administrative receiver, the liquidator or the provisional liquidator, as the case may be. For the purposes of s 236 the expression includes, in the case of a company which is being wound up by the court in England and Wales, the Official Receiver, whether or not he is the liquidator. a [5] The applications with which this case is concerned were made by the Official Receiver. At the time they were made on 26 September 2000 he was not the liquidator of the company, as a liquidator was appointed in his place in June 2000 under s 137 of the Insolvency Act 1986. But the issue is of interest to all office-holders as defined in s 234(1), not just to the Official Receiver of a b company which is being wound up by the court in England and Wales who is not its liquidator. This is because the powers conferred by s 236 are exercisable by anyone else who for the time being in relation to the company is an office-holder within the meaning of s 234(1). The jurisdiction which is given to the court to make the order does not distinguish between different kinds of office-holder. But the fact that they are exercisable by the Official Receiver, whether or not he is the c liquidator, as well as by the persons mentioned in s 234(1), has an important bearing on the purpose or purposes for which those powers may be exercised.

[6] Had it not been for the extended meaning which is given to the expression 'office-holder' by s 236(1), one might have thought that the powers in ss 235 and 236 were conferred on the liquidator (to take the example of a d company which is in liquidation) solely to assist him in the task of getting in and realising the assets of the company for the benefit of the creditors. It is clear that this is the purpose for which s 234 was enacted. Sections 235 and 236 appear in the same group of sections. At first sight they appear to have been designed to assist the liquidator to carry out these tasks as quickly and effectively as possible. e Sections 234 and 236 replace with modifications, and extend to administration and receivership proceedings, ss 551 and 561 of the Companies Act 1985 which re-enacted ss 258 and 268 of the Companies Act 1948. Those sections were included in a group of sections dealing with the general powers of the court in the case of a winding up by the court. They were enacted long before the introduction by Pt II of the Insolvency Act 1985 of the procedure now contained f in ss 6 and 7 of the Disqualification Act for the disqualification of unfit directors of insolvent companies.

[7] But account must now be taken of the fact that s 100 of the Insolvency Act 1985, which replaced s 561 of the Companies Act 1985 and was the immediate predecessor of s 236 of the Insolvency Act 1986, enabled the Official Receiver to apply to the court for an order under that section 'whether or not he is g the liquidator of the company'. This provision, which was enacted for the first time in s 100(6) of the Insolvency Act 1985, is now incorporated in s 236(1) of the Insolvency Act 1986. It is plain that its purpose is to assist the Official Receiver in the performance of his investigative role, even although he may not for the time being be the liquidator for the company. The effect is to extend the scope of the h powers which are now conferred by s 236. In his case, at least, it cannot be said that they may be used only for the purpose of getting in and realising the assets of the company for the benefit of the creditors.

[8] In my respectful opinion Chadwick LJ's conclusion in the Court of Appeal ([2001] EWCA Civ 1227 at [37], [2001] 4 All ER 588 at [37], [2002] Ch 239), that j those powers are conferred solely for the better discharge by the liquidator of his functions in the winding up begs the question which lies at the heart of this appeal. I think that it is self-evident that the powers are conferred for the better discharge of those functions or, in the case of administration or receivership proceedings, for the better discharge of their functions in those proceedings by the relevant office-holders. The question that has to be asked and answered is, what are those functions? Are they confined to the basic tasks of getting in and managing or realising the assets of the company?

[9] The wording of s 236 contains no such limitation. It is not concerned solely with the transfer of the property of the company to the office-holder. Its scope is indicated by sub-s (3), which provides that the court may require any of the persons mentioned in sub-s (2) to submit an affidavit to the court containing an account of his dealings with the company or to produce any books, papers or other records in his possession or under his control relating to the company or the matters mentioned in para (c) of sub-s (2). The matters mentioned in sub-s (2)(c) are 'the promotion, formation, business, dealings, affairs or property of the company'. There may be a question as to how the court should exercise its discretion when it is making an order under this section. But the jurisdiction which the court is given is expressed in the widest terms.

[10] No mention is made of the Disqualification Act in s 236. But there is no doubt that these two measures are intended to be read together (see s 21 of the Disqualification Act which provides for the interaction of the two statutes, s 22 which ensures that the terms and expressions that they use are compatible and s 25 which states that they are to come into force simultaneously). There is also a close and important link between s 236(3) of the Insolvency Act 1986 and s 7(3) of the Disqualification Act. Section 236(3) describes the information which may be the subject of an order made by the court under that subsection on the application of the office-holder. Section 7(3) provides for the making by the office-holder of a report to the Secretary of State if it appears to him that the conditions for disqualification in s 6(1) of the Disqualification Act are satisfied as respects a person who is or has been a director of the company. Information gathered under s 236(3) which leads to this conclusion must be reported.

[11] I would conclude that the functions of the office-holder include the making of a report to the Secretary of State under s 7(3) if he comes into the possession of information that leads to the conclusion that the conditions for disqualification are satisfied. As Vinelott J observed in Re Polly Peck International plc, ex p joint administrators [1994] BCC 15 at 16, the purposes of the liquidation, the administration or the receivership, as the case may be, must include the gathering of information as to the conduct of the affairs of the company and those responsible for it in order that the office-holder can report to the Secretary of State as he is required to do by s 7(3) (see also Bishopsgate Investment Management Ltd (in prov liq) v Maxwell [1992] 2 All ER 856 at 890, [1993] Ch 1 at 47–48 per Stuart Smith LJ).

[12] Section 7(4) of the Disqualification Act provides that the Secretary of State or the Official Receiver may require the liquidator, administrator or administrative receiver of a company, or the former liquidator, administrator or administrative receiver of a company, to furnish him with such information relevant to any person's conduct as a director of a company as he may reasonably require for the purpose of determining whether to exercise, or of exercising, his functions under that section. Here again the language of the subsection is in the widest terms. There is not even the qualification which is built into s 236(3) of the Insolvency Act 1986, that the information requested must be in the possession or under the control of the office-holder. The only qualifications are that the information must be relevant and the requirement must be reasonable.

[13] What then are the conclusions that are to be drawn from these provisions? The Secretary of State and the Official Receiver are both given the power to require information to be furnished to them under s 7(4) of the Disqualification Act by an office-holder or former office-holder. But the Secretary of State cannot apply to the court for an order under s 236 of the Insolvency Act 1986. Only the Official Receiver can do so, whether or not he is the liquidator. Furthermore, while all the office-holders mentioned in s 7(4) can apply to the court for an order under s 236, former office-holders cannot do so. The use of the present tense in s 234(1) of the Insolvency Act 1986, which is incorporated into s 236(1) by reference, indicates that this group of sections is designed to assist the office-holders while they are in office and not afterwards. This pattern may appear to be untidy, but it is a consequence of the width of the powers conferred by s 7 of the Disqualification Act. It does not provide a reason for reading those powers narrowly.

[14] Then there is the question whether the fact that the Official Receiver has power to require information to be given to him by the office-holders and former office-holders under s 7(4) renders the use by him of s 236 for the purpose of disqualification proceedings otiose (see [2001] 4 All ER 588 at [38] per Chadwick LJ). Here again the pattern may appear to be rather untidy. The powers conferred on the Official Receiver by s 236 are confined to information about the particular company which is being wound up or is in administration or receivership. The power to require information to be furnished by an office-holder or former office-holder under s 7(4) extends to the office-holders and former office-holders of 'a company'. It enables information to be obtained about the person's conduct as a director or former director of more than one company. In the case of former office-holders, the only information that can reasonably be required of them is information which is already in their possession or under their control. But existing office-holders have the power given to them by s 236 to seek out more information about the matters mentioned in sub-s (2)(c) than they already have. These features suggest that the correct approach is to treat these provisions as complementary to each other, and that it would be wrong to read them as having been designed to be read narrowly.

[15] There is a further reason for taking a broad view of these provisions and reading them generously. The overriding purpose of the disqualification regime is to protect the public interest. Success or otherwise in the prosecution of cases for an order under s 6 of the Disqualification Act will depend on the amount and quality of the information that is available. A narrow interpretation of s 236, confining its reach to information which the office-holder needs to get in the property of the company, would increase the risk that instances of commercially culpable conduct will go unpunished. That would not serve the public interest, and it is hard to believe that it was intended by Parliament. Moreover there is nothing in the wording of s 236 to prevent an office-holder, other than the Official Receiver, seeking to make use of the powers under that section for disqualification purposes. Nor is there anything in the wording of s 236 read with s 7(4), when read together, to prevent the Official Receiver from using the same powers for those purposes whether or not he is the liquidator.

[16] There are practical considerations, too, which point to the same conclusion. Information sought under s 236 may be of use for more than one purpose. Information gathered solely for the purpose of getting in and managing or realising the property of the company may be relevant also for disqualification purposes. It may be quite unclear before the information has been ingathered and scrutinised whether it contains anything to suggest that the conditions mentioned in s 6(1) are satisfied as respects any of the directors or former directors of the company. Yet if it does contain information to that effect the office-holder is obliged to report the matter to the Secretary of State under s 7(3). Is the office-holder to be stopped from getting in such information deliberately, while he is plainly under a duty to report if he obtains it unexpectedly or by accident? A limitation on the powers conferred by s 236 which gave rise to artificial distinctions of that kind would be unsatisfactory. It would require clear language before one could regard this as having been intended by the Act. I do not find any such language, so I would reject an interpretation of the section which had that effect.

[17] For these reasons, and those given by my noble and learned friend Lord Millett, I too would allow the appeal.

LORD MILLETT.

[18] My Lords, the question in this appeal is whether the Official Receiver can have recourse to the powers conferred by s 236 of the Insolvency Act 1986 for the sole purpose of obtaining evidence for use in disqualification proceedings against a former director.

THE FACTS

[19] Pantmaenog Timber Co Ltd (the company) ceased trading in 1997 and was compulsorily wound up by the Bristol County Court on 17 June 1999. The Official Receiver thereupon became provisional liquidator of the company.

[20] In due course the Official Receiver reported to the Secretary of State under s 7(3) of the Company Directors Disqualification Act 1986 (the Disqualification Act) that in his view the conduct of Mr Andrew Hay and Mr Peter Hay as directors of the company made them unfit to be concerned in the management of a company. The Secretary of State considered that it would be expedient in the public interest that disqualification orders should be made against them, and he directed the Official Receiver to bring proceedings for that purpose.

[21] The Official Receiver instituted such proceedings in the Bristol County Court in February 2000. He made three allegations of misconduct against the defendants. (i) They had caused the company to redeem its preference shares before paying its unsecured creditors and the balance of a fine which had been imposed on the company by the local magistrates' court. (ii) They had failed to ensure that the company maintained adequate accounting and other records. (iii) They had caused the company to contravene its felling licence.

[22] The redemption of the preference shares, which was the most serious of the misconduct alleged, took place after Mr Andrew Hay had resigned as a director in December 1997. This raised the question whether he had nevertheless continued to act as a de facto director of the company after that date.

[23] The Official Receiver filed evidence with a view to showing that despite his resignation Mr Andrew Hay had continued to act as a director of the company until it was wound up in June 1999. In September 2000 he applied to the Bristol County Court under s 236 for orders for the production of documents by two firms of solicitors and a firm of accountants which had acted for the company at the material time. The Official Receiver conceded that his sole purpose in seeking such orders was to obtain evidence for use in the disqualification proceedings.

[24] Mr Andrew Hay objected to the production of the documents in question. None of the firms concerned had any objection to the production of the documents or to the orders sought, but the documents were obviously confidential and they naturally wished to have the protection of a court order before producing them to the Official Receiver. a [25] Meanwhile, believing that there might be assets to be recovered for the benefit of creditors, the Official Receiver had asked the Secretary of State to appoint an insolvency practitioner as liquidator in his place under s 137 of the Insolvency Act 1986. A partner in a well-known firm of accountants was duly appointed liquidator in June 2000. It then came to light that, unknown to the b Official Receiver, the company's name had been struck off the register and the company had been dissolved in November 1999.

[26] The dissolution of the company meant that disqualification proceedings could not be brought in the name of the Official Receiver or in the county court. The existing proceedings were thus irregularly constituted. The Official Receiver c accordingly applied for and obtained an order for the proceedings to be transferred to the High Court and for the Secretary of State to be substituted as applicant. He also obtained an order for the company's name to be restored to the register. This had the effect of treating the company as having continued in existence as if it had never been dissolved. It retrospectively regularised the d disqualification proceedings and the appointment of the liquidator in place of the Official Receiver and all steps taken by either of them since the dissolution of the company.

[27] The s 236 application was made in the winding up and not in the disqualification proceedings and so remained with the Bristol County Court. In October 2000 the district judge made the orders sought. They were discharged e on appeal by Judge Weeks QC on the ground that the purpose of s 236 was to assist the liquidator of a company in carrying out his functions as liquidator, and these did not include bringing disqualification proceedings against the company's former directors. The Court of Appeal dismissed the Official Receiver's appeal.

[28] After the dismissal of his appeal the Official Receiver was able to obtain f the production of relevant documents from one of the firms of solicitors concerned by the service of a witness summons in the disqualification proceedings.

[29] The disqualification proceedings were subsequently tried by Neuberger J in the High Court. Neither of the defendants attended the hearing. On 28 January 2003 Neuberger J made orders disqualifying each of the defendants g from being concerned in the management of a company. Mr Peter Hay was disqualified for five years and Mr Andrew Hay for seven years.

[30] The resolution of the present appeal can thus no longer affect the outcome of the proceedings which gave rise to it. Neither of the defendants to the disqualification proceedings and none of the firms concerned in the s 236 h applications have taken any part in the hearing. The House is greatly indebted to counsel appointed as amicus curiae for the assistance he has given on the proper disposal of the appeal.

[31] The House gave the Official Receiver leave to appeal because the case raises an important question of principle and one which is not confined to cases j where the Official Receiver is involved. The question is whether the powers conferred by s 236 can lawfully be exercised, whether on the application of the Official Receiver or of a liquidator or other office-holder, solely or principally to obtain evidence for use in disqualification proceedings; or whether their exercise is confined to cases where such use is at most incidental to the recovery and distribution of the company's assets among its creditors and contributories.

PROCEEDINGS FOR A DISCRETIONARY DISQUALIFICATION ORDER

[32] The power of the court to make a disqualification order prohibiting a person from being concerned in the management of a company was introduced by s 75 of the Companies Act 1928 (subsequently consolidated as s 275 of the Companies Act 1929) on the recommendation of the Report of the Company Law Amendment Committee, Cmd 2657 (1926) under the chairmanship of Mr Wilfrid Greene KC. Application for an order was to the court having jurisdiction to wind up the company and could be made by the Official Receiver or the liquidator or any creditor or contributory of the company. Except where there had been a conviction the power was limited to cases where it appeared in the course of a winding up that any business of the company had been carried on with intent to defraud and the maximum period for which a disqualification order could be made was five years. The power to make such an order was discretionary. The grounds upon which a disqualification order could be made were later extended by s 33 of the Companies Act 1947 (subsequently consolidated as s 188 of the Companies Act 1948) following the Report of the Committee on Company Law Amendment, Cmd 6659 (1945) under the chairmanship of Cohen J.

[33] The grounds upon which a disqualification order could be made were further extended by s 28 of the Companies Act 1976 and s 9 of the Insolvency Act 1976. Section 28 of the Companies Act 1976 covered the case where a person had been persistently in default in relation to statutory requirements for returns, accounts or other documents. Application was to the High Court and could be made only by the Secretary of State. This was the first occasion on which the function of applying for a disqualification order was given to the Secretary of State, but it was unavoidable given that it was not a requirement that the company should be insolvent or in the course of winding up. The Secretary of State was not given power to obtain evidence from third parties, but this was not necessary since all the relevant information would have been in the possession of the Registrar of Companies.

[34] Section 9 of the Insolvency Act 1976 covered the case where a person had been a director of more than one company which had gone into liquidation while insolvent and his conduct as a director of any of those companies made him unfit to be concerned in the management of a company. Application in England and Wales was to the High Court and in Scotland to the Court of Session. Where the person against whom the order was sought was a person who was or had been a director of a company which was being wound up by the court, the application had to be made in England and Wales by the Official Receiver and in Scotland (where there is no office of Official Receiver) by the Secretary of State; where the relevant company was being wound up voluntarily it had to be made by the Secretary of State. The application could not be made by a liquidator or other office-holder or by a past or present member or creditor; and it was made by the Secretary of State only where it could not be made by the Official Receiver.

[35] The powers of the court to make disqualification orders were further extended by s 93 of the Companies Act 1981. The power to make an order remained discretionary, but the maximum period of disqualification was extended to 15 years. Application to a court with jurisdiction to wind up the company could now be made by the Secretary of State or the Official Receiver or by the liquidator or any past or present member or creditor of any company in relation to which the person against whom an order was sought had committed or was alleged to have committed an offence or default. These provisions were consolidated in ss 295–299 of the Companies Act 1985 and Pt I of Sch 12 thereto and are now contained in ss 2–5 of the Disqualification Act.

[36] Sections 2–4 of the Disqualification Act give the court a discretionary power to make a disqualification order in prescribed circumstances (conviction of an indictable offence in connection with the promotion, formation, management, liquidation or striking off of the company; persistent breaches of companies legislation; fraud or breach of duty as an officer or liquidator of the company). Section 5 gives the magistrates' court a discretionary power to make a disqualification order on summary conviction for failure to comply with statutory requirements for filing returns, accounts or other documents. As under the 1981 and 1985 Acts application for an order under ss 2–4 may be made to a court with jurisdiction to wind up a company by the Secretary of State or the Official Receiver or by the liquidator or any past or present member or creditor of a company in relation to which the person against whom an order is sought has committed or is alleged to have committed an offence or other default (see s 16 of the Disqualification Act). The individual is protected from oppressive use of the jurisdiction by the discretion of the court to decline to make an order.

PROCEEDINGS FOR A MANDATORY DISQUALIFICATION ORDER

[37] The Disqualification Act introduced the new concept of mandatory disqualification. Section 6 obliges the court to make a disqualification order if it is satisfied that the defendant's conduct as a director of a company makes him unfit to be concerned in the management of a company. The court has no discretion to decline to make an order. The minimum period of disqualification is two years and the maximum period is 15 years. Application for an order under s 6 is to the court by which the company is being wound up; if the company is being wound up voluntarily, any court which has jurisdiction to wind it up; and if the company is in administration, to the court which made the administration order (see s 6(3)). This has since been amended to include the case where the company is in administrative receivership.

[38] The introduction of mandatory disqualification gave effect to a recommendation of the Insolvency Law Review Committee under the chairmanship of Sir Kenneth Cork (the Cork Committee) (see Insolvency Law and Practice, Report of the Review Committee, Cmnd 8558 (1982)). It recommended that application for a mandatory order should be made by the liquidator or, with the leave of the court, by a creditor. This was not acceptable to Parliament, which understandably considered that greater safeguards are necessary in the case of a mandatory order than are required where the court retains a discretion to decline to make an order.

[39] Section 7(1) of the Disqualification Act provides that an application for a mandatory order under s 6 can be made only if it appears to the Secretary of State that it is expedient in the public interest that such an order should be made. The Secretary of State is under a continuing duty to keep the position under review. Proceedings can be brought and continued only if it appears, and continues to appear, to the Secretary of State that it is expedient in the public interest that an order be made.

[40] Application for a mandatory order must be made by the Secretary of State or, if the Secretary of State so directs in a case where the person against whom the order is sought is or has been a director of a company which is being wound up by the court in England and Wales, by the Official Receiver. As originally enacted, this meant that, if the winding up had been completed and the company dissolved, the application could be made only by the Secretary of State. Accordingly the words 'is being wound up' have been amended by the Insolvency Act 2000 to read 'is being or has been wound up'.

[41] The Secretary of State can form an opinion whether it is expedient in the public interest that an order should be made under s 6 only if it is based upon adequate information. Section 7(3) and (4) contain provisions which enable him to obtain such information. Section 7(3) provides that, if it appears to the responsible office-holder that the conditions for making a mandatory order under s 6 are satisfied, he must forthwith report the matter to the Secretary of State. In the case of a company which is being wound up by the court in England and Wales, the Official Receiver is the responsible office-holder. In other cases, the liquidator, administrator or administrative receiver as the case may be is the responsible office-holder.

[42] Section 7(4) lies at the heart of this appeal. It provides:

> 'The Secretary of State or the official receiver may require the liquidator, administrator or administrative receiver of a company, or the former liquidator, administrator or administrative receiver of a company—(a) to furnish him with such information with respect to any person's conduct as a director of the company, and (b) to produce and permit inspection of such books, papers and other records relevant to that person's conduct as such a director, as the Secretary of State or the official receiver may reasonably require for the purpose of determining whether to exercise, or of exercising, any function of his under this section.'

THE OFFICIAL RECEIVER

[43] The office of Official Receiver was established by the Bankruptcy Act 1883. His role was originally confined to personal bankruptcy, but it was extended to companies in compulsory liquidation by the Companies (Winding Up) Act 1890. It is a statutory office held by persons appointed by the Secretary of State from among the civil servants employed within the Department of Trade and Industry. They are members of the Insolvency Service, which is an executive agency of the department with overall responsibility for the administration of insolvency in England and Wales, and acts under the ultimate direction and control of the Secretary of State. The Insolvency Service is headed by the Secretary of State but her involvement in day-to-day matters is normally exercised on her behalf by officials. She must make arrangements to ensure that there is at least one Official Receiver attached to each court having bankruptcy jurisdiction. The Official Receiver is an officer of the court to which he is attached and is answerable to the court for the carrying out of its orders and for the discharge of his statutory functions. As the holder of a statutory office, he has standing to bring proceedings and has a right of audience before the court to which he is attached. He sues and is sued not in his personal name but as 'the Official Receiver'. The definite article is appropriate because in the case of each company there is only one Official Receiver.

[44] Upon the making of a compulsory winding up order of a company in England and Wales, the Official Receiver attached to the court in which the winding up is proceeding becomes the liquidator of the company by virtue of his office and continues in office until another person is appointed liquidator in his place (see s 136(2) of the Insolvency Act 1986). He is also by virtue of his office the liquidator during any vacancy (see s 136(3)). At any time when he is liquidator he may take steps to have a liquidator appointed in his place (see s 136(4)). In Scotland these functions are performed by the insolvency practitioner (known as 'the interim liquidator') appointed by the court when making the winding up order.

Investigation and report

[45] Where a winding up order is made by the court in England and Wales, it is the duty of the Official Receiver to investigate the causes of the company's failure and to inquire generally into the promotion, formation, business, dealings and affairs of the company, and to make such report (if any) to the court as he thinks fit (see s 132 of the Insolvency Act 1986, which can be traced back to s 8 of the 1890 Act). He was formerly but is no longer obliged as a matter of course to submit a report to the court and in practice he seldom does so. But it remains his duty to investigate the causes of the company's failure and take appropriate action. This may include making a report to the Secretary of State pursuant to s 7(3) of the Disqualification Act. He is under the same duty whether or not he is also the liquidator.

Public examination

[46] Where a company is being compulsorily wound up the Official Receiver (or in Scotland the liquidator) can apply to the court under s 133 of the Insolvency Act 1986 to direct the public examination of any person who is or has been an officer of the company, or has acted as an office-holder of the company, or has been concerned or taken part in the promotion, formation or management of the company.

[47] Before the Insolvency Act 1986 a public examination could be ordered only against a person who was suspected of fraud in relation to the company. By 1982 the procedure had fallen into disuse. The Cork Committee recommended that it should be revived. It expressed the hope that by exposing serious misconduct it would help to promote higher standards of commercial and business morality and serve as a sanction against former officers of a failed company who had not adequately assisted the Official Receiver and the liquidator in their investigations into the company's affairs.

[48] In Re Paget, ex p Official Receiver [1927] 2 Ch 85 at 87–88, [1927] All ER Rep 465 at 466 Lord Hanworth MR explained that the object of the public examination of the debtor was not merely to obtain a full and complete disclosure of his assets and the facts relating to the bankruptcy in the interests of the creditors, but was also for the protection of the public. He said:

> 'To concentrate attention upon the mere debt collecting and distribution of assets is to fail to appreciate one very important side of bankruptcy proceedings and law.'

The judge had disallowed a question on the ground that the answers would not assist in the collection of the debtor's assets. Lord Hanworth rejected this as a sufficient ground for disallowing the question ([1927] 2 Ch 85 at 92, [1927] All ER Rep 465 at 468) on the ground that it excluded—

> 'a side of the bankruptcy law which we are constantly affirming in this Court, where it has been necessary over and over again to point out that in matters of bankruptcy it is not merely the creditors who have their rights, but it is also the public themselves whose interests have to be safeguarded.'

[49] The Cork Committee recommended that the court conducting the public examination should have power, during the course of or at the conclusion of the public examination, to make a disqualification order. This proposal was not accepted; but there can be no doubt that the Official Receiver could apply for a public examination if he suspected that there had been serious misconduct on the part of a former director which rendered him unfit to be concerned in the management of a company. The court could decline to direct a public examination if it considered that it would be oppressive; but there can equally be no doubt that evidence obtained by a public examination could form the basis of an application for a disqualification order. It would be odd if the same were not true of a private examination under s 236.

Disqualification proceedings

[50] It is also the duty of the Official Receiver, as I have explained, to bring proceedings under s 6 of the Disqualification Act for a mandatory disqualification order if directed by the Secretary of State to do so; and to furnish the Secretary of State with information not only for the purpose of enabling her to determine whether such proceedings should be brought or continued but also for the purpose of bringing or continuing them.

The functions of the liquidator

[51] The principal function of the liquidator of a company is to carry out the winding up of its affairs by collecting the assets and distributing them among the creditors with a view to the ultimate dissolution of the company. But his functions are not confined to this. Under the heading 'The liquidator's functions' s 143 of the Insolvency Act 1986 describes the general functions of the liquidator in a winding up by the court as follows:

> 'General functions in winding up by the court.—(1) The functions of the liquidator of a company which is being wound up by the court are to secure that the assets of the company are got in, realised and distributed to the company's creditors and, if there is a surplus, to the persons entitled to it.
>
> (2) It is the duty of the liquidator of a company which is being wound up by the court in England and Wales, if he is not the official receiver—
>
> (a) to furnish the official receiver with such information, (b) to produce to the official receiver, and permit inspection by the official receiver of, such books, papers and other records, and (c) to give the official receiver such other assistance, as the official receiver may reasonably require for the purposes of carrying out his functions in relation to the winding up.'

The words 'in relation to the winding up' are wider than 'in the winding up'. Since the Official Receiver is ex hypothesi not the liquidator in the case envisaged, 'his functions in relation to the winding up' cannot extend, still less be limited, to the collection, realisation and distribution of the company's assets. They must encompass the functions which are conferred on him in the public interest in relation to the company which is being wound up, including the investigation into the reasons for the company's failure and the conduct of those concerned in its management. It does not stretch the language of the section to read it as including the Official Receiver's functions under s 7 of the Disqualification Act.

[52] From the earliest days of the joint stock company the liquidator has exercised functions which serve the public interest and not merely the financial interests of the creditors and contributories. The Cork Committee observed

(p 53 (para 192) of its Report): 'The law of insolvency takes the form of a compact to which there are three parties: the debtor, his creditors and society.' In consequence insolvency proceedings (p 390 (para 1734))—

> 'have never been treated in English law as an exclusively private matter between the debtor and his creditors; the community itself has always been recognised as having an important interest in them.'

Criminal proceedings

[53] Under s 167 of the Companies Act 1862 one of the functions of a liquidator was to bring criminal proceedings against directors and others who were alleged to have committed offences in relation to the company. The proceedings were brought at the expense of the estate, and this served as a powerful disincentive. But the court could direct the liquidator to bring such proceedings, and would do so if appropriate. In Re London and Globe Finance Corp Ltd [1903] 1 Ch 728 at 734–735, [1900–3] All ER Rep 891 at 894 the prosecuting authorities declined to bring criminal proceedings. The court authorised the liquidator (who happened to be the Official Receiver) to do so at the expense of the company. Buckley J observed that s 167 was concerned with enforcing commercial morality and was 'not measured or limited or even concerned with pecuniary benefit to be obtained for the shareholders or creditors'.

[54] The legislation remained in the same form until the Companies Act 1928, when s 77(1) authorised the court in a compulsory winding up to direct the liquidator either to prosecute the offender himself or to refer the matter to the Director of Public Prosecutions. If it appeared to the liquidator in a voluntary winding up that any past or present director, manager or other officer of the company had been guilty of an offence in relation to the company for which he was criminally liable, s 77(2) required him to report the matter to the Director of Public Prosecutions. It also required the liquidator to give the Director of Public Prosecutions information and access to documents in his possession or under his control. If the Director of Public Prosecutions decided not to bring proceedings against the offender, the liquidator could do so himself though only with the leave of the court. This was a safeguard against the company's assets being wasted on frivolous or vexatious proceedings.

[55] The present law is contained in s 218 of the Insolvency Act 1986. In the case of a compulsory winding up, s 218(3) provides that if it appears to the liquidator, not being the Official Receiver, that any past or present officer of the company or any member of it has been guilty of an offence in relation to the company for which he may be criminally liable he must report the matter to the Official Receiver. In the case of a voluntary winding up s 218(4) provides that the liquidator must report the matter, in the case of a winding up in England and Wales, to the Secretary of State and, in the case of a winding up in Scotland, to the Lord Advocate. The liquidator is subject to a duty as before to give the Secretary of State or the Lord Advocate as the case may be information and access to documents which are in his possession or under his control.

Public examination

[56] Although the Companies Acts have expressly required an application for a public examination to be made by the Official Receiver, and it was generally assumed before 1953 that a public examination could not be directed unless the company was in compulsory winding up and the application was made by the Official Receiver, this was not the case. Section 307 of the Companies Act 1948 provided that in a voluntary winding up the liquidator or any creditor or contributory could apply to the court inter alia 'to exercise ... all or any of the powers which the court might exercise if the company were being wound up by the court'. It was held that the effect of this section was that the court could direct a public examination on the application of the liquidator in a voluntary winding up (see Re Campbell Coverings Ltd [1953] 2 All ER 74, [1953] Ch 488 and Re Campbell Coverings Ltd (No 2) [1954] 1 All ER 222, [1954] Ch 225). Section 307 has been re-enacted as s 112 of the Insolvency Act 1986 and has the same effect (see Bishopsgate Investment Management Ltd (in prov liq) v Maxwell [1992] 2 All ER 856 at 870, 889, [1993] Ch 1 at 24, 46).

Investigation and report

[57] I have already referred to s 7(3) of the Disqualification Act, which imposes a duty on the liquidator to report to the Secretary of State if it appears to him that the conditions for a mandatory disqualification order are satisfied; and to s 143 of the Insolvency Act 1986 and s 7(4) of the Disqualification Act, which impose a duty on the liquidator to assist the Official Receiver in carrying out his functions in relation to the winding up and to furnish the Secretary of State or the Official Receiver with information. I shall have to return to s 7(4) later.

SECTION 236

[58] So far as material s 236 of the Insolvency Act 1986 reads as follows:

> '(2) The court may, on the application of the office-holder, summon to appear before it—(a) any officer of the company, (b) any person known or suspected to have in his possession any property of the company or supposed to be indebted to the company, or (c) any person whom the court thinks capable of giving information concerning the promotion, formation, business, dealings, affairs or property of the company.
>
> (3) The court may require any such person as is mentioned in subsection (2)(a) to (c) to submit an affidavit to the court containing an account of his dealings with the company or to produce any books, papers or other records in his possession or under his control relating to the company or the matters mentioned in paragraph (c) of the subsection.'

The expression 'office-holder' is defined in s 234(1) to mean the administrator, administrative receiver, liquidator or provisional liquidator of the company as the case may be. Where the company is being wound up by the court in England and Wales s 236(1) extends the expression to include the Official Receiver whether or not he is the liquidator.

THE JUDGMENT OF THE COURT OF APPEAL

[59] The judgment of the Court of Appeal ([2001] EWCA Civ 1227, [2001] 4 All ER 588, [2002] Ch 239) was given by Chadwick LJ. He gave two reasons (at [37]–[38]) for his conclusion that the court has no power to make an order on the application of the Official Receiver under s 236 for the production of documents in circumstances where the sole purpose of the application is to obtain information or documents for use as evidence in pending proceedings under the Disqualification Act. They are closely reasoned and merit being set out in full.

'[37] ... The reason, as it seems to me, is that the powers conferred by ss 235 and 236 are conferred on the liquidator for the better discharge of his functions in the winding up; and are not conferred to enable the Secretary of State to obtain, indirectly, information and documents which Parliament has not thought it necessary or appropriate to enable him to obtain directly. There is no reason to think that Parliament intended that the powers to obtain information and documents for use in disqualification proceedings should be any greater in a case where the company was being wound up by the court in England and Wales than in a case where the company was in voluntary winding up. As I have sought to explain, the role of the Official Receiver in relation to disqualification proceedings in a case where the company is being wound up by the court is attributable to considerations of convenience and cost; there is no reason to explain that role on the basis that it reflects an intention to provide enhanced powers in relation to the obtaining of information and documents.

[38] Second, in a case where the company is being wound up by the court in England and Wales, the function of the Official Receiver, under the Insolvency Act, is to investigate the causes of failure and to make a report to the court (see s 132 of that Act). It was plainly intended that the Official Receiver should be able to invoke the powers conferred by ss 235 and 236 for the purpose of discharging that function. Equally, as it seems to me, information which he obtains in the course of discharging his function under s 132 of the Insolvency Act is information to which he is intended to have regard, and to take into account, in making the report to the Secretary of State which s 7(3)(a) of the Disqualification Act requires. And, information which he obtains in the course of discharging his function under s 132 of the Insolvency Act is information which he is intended to use in pursuing disqualification proceedings, if that role is entrusted to him under s 7(1)(b) of the Disqualification Act. But the Official Receiver cannot have been intended to invoke the powers conferred by ss 235 and 236 of the Act either (i) for the purpose of carrying out his role under s 7(3) of the Disqualification Act—save in so far as that is incidental to the discharge of his function under s 132 of the Insolvency Act—or (ii) for the purpose of obtaining evidence for use in disqualification proceedings of which he has conduct under s 7(1)(b) of the Disqualification Act—again, save in so far as that is incidental to the discharge of his function under s 132 of the Insolvency Act. The reason is to be found in s 7(4) of the Disqualification Act. Unlike the Secretary of State—who may require information or documents under that section for the purpose of determining whether it is expedient in the public interest that a disqualification order should be made—the only purpose for which the Official Receiver could require an office-holder to provide information or documents under s 7(4) of the Disqualification Act would be that he reasonably required that information in connection with his functions under s 7(3)(a) or s 7(1)(b) of that Act. But, if those were functions in connection with which the powers conferred by ss 235 and 236 of the Insolvency Act could be invoked, s 7(4)—in so far as it applies to the Official Receiver—would be otiose. There would be ample power to obtain, under s 235(3)(c), any information which the Official Receiver required from a liquidator, administrator or administrative receiver. The inference, as it seems to me, is that Parliament included a reference to the Official Receiver in s 7(4) of the Disqualification Act because it was necessary to do so. It was thought necessary to do so, because Parliament did not contemplate that the Official Receiver would be able to invoke ss 235 and 236 of the Insolvency Act for that purpose. It is pertinent to keep in mind that the Insolvency Act and the Disqualification Act were enacted on the same day (25 July 1986) and form part of the same corpus of legislation.'

[60] The last observation is well made. The provisions of the Disqualification Act and the Insolvency Act 1986 form part of the same statutory scheme formerly contained in the Insolvency Act 1985 and must be read together (see Re Jeffrey S Levitt Ltd [1992] 2 All ER 509 at 522–523, [1992] Ch 457 at 473–474 per Vinelott J, approved by the Court of Appeal in Bishopsgate Investment Management Ltd (in prov liq) v Maxwell [1992] 2 All ER 856 at 876, [1993] Ch 1 at 31).

[61] I shall examine these two reasons in turn.

THE FIRST REASON

[62] There are two strands to this part of Chadwick LJ's reasoning. (i) The liquidator of a company in voluntary liquidation cannot invoke the section for the purpose of disqualification proceedings and the Official Receiver's power to invoke the section can be no greater than that of the liquidator. (ii) The Secretary of State cannot invoke the section directly, and Parliament cannot have intended that the Official Receiver should be able to do so in order to enable the Secretary of State to obtain indirectly information and documents which it considered that he should have no power to obtain directly.

[63] The first of these strands proceeds from the premise that the powers conferred by s 236 are conferred on a liquidator 'for the better discharge of his functions in the winding up' ([2001] 4 All ER 588 at [37]). These words are not derived from the express terms of the section but are evidently considered to be implicit in it. The unspoken assumption is that a liquidator's 'functions in the winding up' are limited to the collection and distribution of the company's assets. I agree that the bringing of disqualification proceedings is not a function which is conferred on the Official Receiver 'in the winding up'; if it were, the costs of the proceedings would be payable out of the assets of the estate. It is not necessary to consider whether the gathering of evidence for the purpose of such proceedings is part of 'his functions in the winding up', for this formulation is unduly narrow. The liquidator's functions in relation to the company which is being wound up are not and never have been limited to the recovery and distribution of the company's assets. It would be very odd if the liquidator of a company in voluntary liquidation could apply to the court to direct a public examination in the wider public interest but could not invoke s 236 to order a private examination in the same interest. In practice the liquidator would usually prefer to invite the Official Receiver to make the application; and even where the application was made by the liquidator the court would be disposed to invite the views of the Official Receiver. But it is impossible to say that the liquidator would be acting outside his proper role in the one case and not in the other.

[64] Section 236 contains no express limitation on the purpose for which it may be invoked. Of course it may be invoked only for a legitimate purpose in relation to the company which is being wound up, and the court, which has discretion to make or refuse an order, should be astute to see that the powers conferred by the section are not abused. It would plainly be an abuse to use those powers for a purpose which is foreign to the functions of the applicant in relation to the company which is being wound up. But I reject the unspoken assumption that the functions of a liquidator are limited to the administration of the insolvent estate. This is only one aspect of an insolvency proceeding; the investigation of the causes of the company's failure and the conduct of those concerned in its management are another. Furthermore such an investigation is not undertaken as an end in itself, but in the wider public interest with a view to enabling the authorities to take appropriate action against those who are found to be guilty of misconduct in relation to the company. If the investigation yields information material to the Secretary of State's decision to bring or continue disqualification proceedings, it must be reported.

[65] I would endorse the observations of Vinelott J in Re Polly Peck International plc, ex p joint administrators [1994] BCC 15 at 16:

> '... it is quite clear that the purposes of the administration must include the gathering of information as to the conduct of the affairs of the company and those responsible for it by an administrator in order that he can report to the Secretary of State as he is required to do. He must do so in order that the Secretary of State can perform his duty, which is the important one of taking proceedings if it appears that a disqualification order should be made.'

[66] Moreover, there is no justification for the assumption that the Official Receiver's powers are circumscribed by the reference to the functions of a liquidator in a voluntary winding up. Significantly in this context s 236(1) authorises the Official Receiver to make the application whether or not he is the liquidator. If he is not the liquidator, he is not responsible for the collection and distribution of the assets. Yet he is expressly authorised to invoke the section. This makes it impossible to say that the section can be invoked only for this limited purpose. It must be available to the Official Receiver to enable him to carry out his investigative and reporting functions.

[67] In my opinion, the only limitation which is implicit in s 236 is that it may be invoked only for the purpose of enabling the applicant to exercise his statutory functions in relation to the company which is being wound up. Whether the applicant is the Official Receiver or the liquidator or other office-holder these include the provision of information to the Secretary of State or the Official Receiver which is relevant to the bringing or continuing of disqualification proceedings.

[68] The second strand to the reasoning depends upon the unspoken assumption that by not permitting the Secretary of State to invoke s 236 directly Parliament evinced an intention that he should not have recourse to the section at all whether directly or indirectly. But there is another and more plausible explanation, viz that Parliament considered that it was neither necessary nor desirable that the application should be made by the Secretary of State and that it was better made by the Official Receiver. The liquidator is closest to the company whose affairs are under investigation; the Official Receiver, when not the liquidator, is at one step removed. The Secretary of State is still further removed, and there are only limited functions which he is obliged to exercise personally. He cannot, for example, delegate the decision whether it is expedient in the public interest to bring disqualification proceedings; but once he decides that it is he is not obliged to bring them himself. He can and usually does direct the Official Receiver to bring them. Historically he has usually been authorised to take action only where there is no Official Receiver to do so. It has never been the function of the Secretary of State to conduct an investigation or to gather information. He relies on information obtained by others; hence the investigative and reporting duties imposed on the Official Receiver and the responsible office-holder.

[69] This brings me to s 7(4) of the Disqualification Act. This authorises the Secretary of State or the Official Receiver to require the liquidator or other office-holder to furnish the Secretary of State with such information and documents as the Secretary of State may reasonably require for the purpose of determining whether to exercise, or for the purpose of exercising, his function in relation to disqualification proceedings. Section 7(4) is not expressly limited to information and documents in the office-holder's possession; and I see no ground for implying such a limitation. I do not think that s 7(4) obliges the office-holder to invoke s 236 in order to obtain the information for which the Secretary of State has asked: it may not be reasonable for him to do so at the expense of the estate. But s 7(4) certainly does not forbid it; on the contrary, it brings the provision of such information to the Secretary of State for the purpose of disqualification proceedings squarely within the functions of the liquidator.

THE SECOND REASON

[70] The second reason is based on the fact that s 7(4) authorises the Official Receiver to require the office-holder to provide information in relation to disqualification proceedings. This, Chadwick LJ reasoned, would be otiose if the Official Receiver could invoke s 236 for this purpose.

[71] There are, I think, two reasons why s 7(4) is not otiose. In the first place, it may not be unreasonable in a particular case for the office-holder to refuse to invoke s 236 at the expense of the estate where the sole purpose of the application is to enable the Secretary of State or the Official Receiver to bring or continue disqualification proceedings. In the second place, and perhaps more cogently, disqualification proceedings often concern the conduct of a director in relation to more than one company. Section 6(1) of the Disqualification Act obliges the court to make a disqualification order against a person where it is satisfied that he has been a director of a company which has at any time become insolvent and that—

> 'his conduct as a director of that company (either taken alone or taken together with his conduct as a director of any other company or companies) makes him unfit to be concerned in the management of a company.' (My emphasis.)

[72] The other company or companies need not have become insolvent, but they usually will have done, since otherwise the person's misconduct as a director of those other companies is unlikely to have come to the attention of the Secretary of State or the Official Receiver. But unless the other companies are also in compulsory liquidation and the Official Receiver of the lead company obtains authority to act as Official Receiver of those companies, s 236 will not enable him to obtain information in respect of them.

[73] Section 7(4) replaces s 9(6) of the Insolvency Act 1976, under which similar powers were conferred on the Secretary of State alone. As the amicus curiae observed, disqualification proceedings under that Act required two insolvent liquidations. There must have been many cases where one company was in voluntary liquidation and the other in compulsory liquidation. If the Official Receiver of the company in compulsory liquidation were to bring disqualification proceedings, he could not invoke s 236 to obtain information in relation to the other company, because the section is not available to obtain information in relation to matters which are unconnected with the company in respect of which the application is made. The inclusion of the Official Receiver in s 7(4) closes this lacuna.

CONCLUSION

[74] The consequences of the Court of Appeal's decision would be most unfortunate and cannot have been intended by Parliament. Where the company had no assets worth recovering, neither the Official Receiver nor the office-holder would be able to invoke s 236 for the purpose of investigating the conduct of former directors, since this would not be incidental to 'his functions in the winding up' as the Court of Appeal conceived them to be ([2001] 4 All ER 588 at [37]). Serious misconduct would go undetected and the public unprotected. Moreover applications under s 236 would be complicated by the need for detailed consideration of the reasons for the application, and in particular whether the information was sought for the benefit of creditors and contributories (and only incidentally for the purpose of disqualification proceedings) or solely for the purpose of disqualification proceedings. Not only would this inevitably delay the disqualification proceedings, which ought to proceed with expedition, but it would make the collection of the necessary evidence serendipitous and the protection of the public adventitious.

[75] I reject the assumption that the powers conferred by s 236 are conferred only for better discharge of the applicant's functions 'in the winding up', if these are confined to the recovery of the company's assets and their distribution among the creditors and contributories. In my opinion they are conferred for the better discharge of the applicant's wider statutory functions, both powers and duties, in relation to the company being wound up; and these include the provision of information to the Secretary of State for the purpose of disqualification proceedings. I would allow the appeal and make a declaration to this effect.

LORD WALKER OF GESTINGTHORPE.

[76] My Lords, I have had the advantage of reading in draft the speech of my noble and learned friend Lord Millett. I agree with his speech and for the reasons which he gives I would allow this appeal and make the order which he proposes. I add some observations of my own because of the interest and importance of the issue.

[77] The decision of the Court of Appeal ([2001] EWCA Civ 1227, [2001] 4 All ER 588, [2002] Ch 239) appears to have been based on an assumption, not fully spelled out in the judgment of Chadwick LJ, as to the relatively limited nature of the Official Receiver's functions in a winding up. It seems to have been assumed that those functions do not include the conduct of disqualification proceedings under s 6 of the Company Directors Disqualification Act 1986 (the Disqualification Act). Any such assumption would in my view be incorrect. It would overlook the fact that winding up has, and has had almost throughout the history of company law, a dual purpose. One purpose is the orderly settlement of a company's liabilities and the distribution of any surplus funds, prior to the company being dissolved. The other is the investigation and the imposition of criminal or civil sanctions in respect of misconduct on the part of persons (especially directors of an insolvent company in compulsory liquidation) who may be shown to have abused the privilege of incorporation with limited liability. The first function is primarily a concern of a company's creditors and shareholders; the second function serves a wider public interest.

[78] Mr Philip Jones, appearing to assist the House in the absence of any respondent, has indeed provided valuable assistance with a clear, detailed and scholarly survey of the development of corporate insolvency, including the office of Official Receiver, first instituted (initially for purposes connected with individual bankruptcy) by the Bankruptcy Act 1883. His survey shows that what I might call the public element in winding up has changed a good deal in the course of a century and a half. That is not surprising. The development of the law has responded to major social changes, including the establishment of prosecuting authorities, the emergence of a body of skilled and responsible professionals undertaking work as insolvency practitioners, and the recognition that the protection of the public against reckless or dishonest businessmen may be better attained by civil procedures (in particular disqualification of persons unfit to act as company directors) rather than by criminal proceedings. But although the practice and procedure have varied over the years the need to protect the public against the abuse of limited liability is a clear and constant theme.

[79] There have been three principal procedures available on winding up for the protection of the public: the initiation of criminal proceedings, originating in s 167 of the Companies Act 1862; summary proceedings for misfeasance or some other breach of duty in the course of the winding up, originating in s 10 of the Companies (Winding up) Act 1890; and proceedings for disqualification, originating in s 75(4) of the Companies Act 1928 (but only in respect of a director found guilty of fraudulent trading). The modern forms into which these three procedures have evolved are now found respectively in ss 218 and 212–214 of the Insolvency Act 1986 and the Disqualification Act. It is unnecessary to set out the intermediate history. Ever since the 1862 Act the court has made clear that these procedures exist for the protection of the general public, not in the interests of the creditors or shareholders of the particular company which is in liquidation. Indeed it may be contrary to the financial interests of the creditors and shareholders for these procedures to be invoked.

[80] That can be illustrated by the observation of Buckley J in Re London and Globe Finance Corp Ltd [1903] 1 Ch 728, [1900–3] All ER Rep 891. That was the case of a company which had gone from voluntary winding up, first to winding up under supervision and then to compulsory winding up, with the Official Receiver as liquidator. The company's former managing director was suspected of fraud, but the law officers declined to prosecute. Some of the shareholders wished to prosecute him, mainly at the expense of the company's assets (although they offered to pay into court at least £1,250 of their own money) while others opposed the prosecution as a waste of money. Buckley J authorised a prosecution at the expense of the company (so far as the subscribed fund was insufficient). He said ([1903] 1 Ch 728 at 734, [1900–3] All ER Rep 891 at 894):

> '... the general scheme of the Acts with reference to the liquidation of a company no doubt is that the assets are to be realized to the best advantage for the benefit of those who are entitled to share in their distribution. But indications are not wanting that the assets may under the Acts be applied for some purposes other than these. Sect. 167 of the [1862 Act] is, having regard to the reasons which I have just given, one example of this, and in the [1890 Act] the same intent may be traced in ss. 7 and 8 of that Act. These are sections which require the preparation of a statement of the company's affairs at the expense of the assets leading to a preliminary report, which is to shew whether further inquiry is desirable as to matters relating to the promotion and the like, and, if necessary, to a public examination of parties incriminated, with the purpose, of course, of enforcing commercial morality. It is, therefore, in my judgment plain that the principle upon which I am to apply, or refuse to apply, s. 167 is not measured or limited or even concerned with pecuniary benefit to be obtained for the shareholders or creditors.' a b

[81] Similarly Farwell LJ said in Re John Tweddle & Co Ltd [1910] 2 KB 697 at 707, in relation to the Official Receiver's inquiries and report leading up to the public examination of former directors:

'Now those are functions of a judicial character which are cast upon him, not in the liquidation of the company for the benefit of the assets, but primarily at any rate for the protection of the public. One has to bear in mind that in 1890 there had been various company failures, and it was thought that more drastic legislation was required against directors and promoters and people standing in that position, and I have no doubt that this section was passed for that purpose. It is said, and with some truth, perhaps, that it is a little hard on the company if the view that we take is correct that the costs of all this should come out of the company's assets; but a company only exists by favour of and on the conditions imposed by the Legislature, and it is not immaterial to observe that as long ago as 1862, under the 167th section of the Act of 1862, if directors were prosecuted (as mentioned in that section) the expense of the prosecution came out of the assets of the company.' c d e

[82] Much more recently the same considerations carried weight with the Court of Appeal in Bishopsgate Investment Management Ltd (in prov liq) v Maxwell [1992] 2 All ER 856 at 876, [1993] Ch 1 at 31 in deciding that a person required to answer questions under s 236 of the Insolvency Act 1986 may not refuse to answer on the ground of self-incrimination. Dillon LJ said: f

'It is plain to my mind—and not least from the Cork Report—that part of the mischief in the old law before the Insolvency Act 1985 was the apparent inability of the law to deal adequately with dishonesty or malpractice on the part of bankrupts or company directors ... That was a matter of public concern, and there is a public interest in putting it right. As steps to that end, Parliament has, by [the Insolvency Act 1986], greatly extended the investigative powers available to office-holders, with the assistance of the court, and has expressly placed the officers of the company and others listed in s 235(3), under a duty to assist the office-holder.' g h ought not to be used oppressively (see for instance Re North Australian Territory Co (1890) 45 Ch D 87).

[83] Having identified the three main public elements in winding up as prosecution, remedies for misfeasance and disqualification, I must go back to identify the investigatory duties and powers which Parliament has conferred at different times, and the persons by whom they have been exercisable. The starting point is s 115 (together with s 117) of the 1862 Act, in a part of that Act headed 'Extraordinary Powers of Court'. In those days there was no insolvency service ('official liquidator' simply meant a liquidator appointed in a compulsory liquidation) and no body of licensed insolvency practitioners. The court seems to have been ready to take a hands-on approach. But it was (in an age which may have set a higher value on privacy) conscious that its powers under ss 115 and 117 j

[84] The office of Official Receiver was introduced by the 1883 Act. Official Receivers were organised so that each was attached to a particular court exercising jurisdiction in bankruptcy. The 1890 Act extended this arrangement to courts exercising winding up jurisdiction, and when a court ordered a company to be wound up the Official Receiver attached to that court became provisional liquidator, although another liquidator might subsequently be appointed.

[85] Section 8 of the 1890 Act required the Official Receiver to submit a preliminary report to the court as soon as possible, including (s 8(1)):

> '(b) if the company has failed, as to the causes of the failure; and (c) whether in his opinion further inquiry is desirable as to any matter relating to the promotion, formation, or failure of the company, or the conduct of the business thereof.'

A further report might lead to the public examination of a company promoter, director or officer, but only if the Official Receiver stated that in his opinion fraud had been committed. The provisions of s 8 of the 1890 Act can be traced through to ss 132 and 133 of the Insolvency Act 1986, although the making of a report by the Official Receiver is now optional, and is fairly rare in practice. The procedure for public examination was little used in the middle of the twentieth century but the Cork Committee perceived possible advantages in reinvigorating it (see Re Seagull Manufacturing Co Ltd (in liq) [1993] 2 All ER 980, [1993] Ch 345 (especially the submissions of counsel for the Official Receiver at [1993] Ch 345 at 349)).

[86] Although the court has always been concerned to see that its extraordinary powers should not be exercised oppressively, the nineteenth century and early twentieth century cases do not show any inclination to limit investigation to matters of direct concern to creditors and shareholders. Nor do they reveal any 'Rubicon' test being applied (for the history of that supposed test, see the judgment of Chadwick LJ ([2001] 4 All ER 588 at [26]) in the Court of Appeal in this case). On the contrary, the process of public examination (which was regarded as the most stringent and intrusive weapon in the court's armoury) was available only when the Official Receiver had already formed the opinion that fraud had taken place. That requirement has not been preserved in s 133 of the Insolvency Act 1986, but public examination remains a measure of last resort.

[87] Under the Disqualification Act the Official Receiver is very often the applicant for an order under s 6. That course has obvious convenience because the Official Receiver's report is prima facie evidence of its contents (see r 3(2) of the Insolvent Companies (Disqualification of Unfit Directors) Proceedings Rules 1987, SI 1987/2023). The Official Receiver can apply to the court only if directed to do so by the Secretary of State, but when a direction is made the application is the Official Receiver's, not the Secretary of State's. Conducting disqualification proceedings is certainly a mainstream function of the Official Receiver. Parliament's decision to set out the code relating to the disqualification of company directors in a separate statute might be thought to give some superficial support to the view that the Official Receiver's functions under the Disqualification Act are not functions in a winding up. But in my opinion that view is mistaken. The provisions of the Disqualification Act are part of the same body of law as the Insolvency Act 1986 (see the observations of Vinelott J in Re Jeffrey S Levitt Ltd [1992] 2 All ER 509 at 522–523, [1992] Ch 457 at 473–474, approved by the Court of Appeal in Bishopsgate Investment Management Ltd (in prov liq) v Maxwell [1992] 2 All ER 856 at 876, [1993] Ch 1 at 31). a

[88] For these reasons and for the further reasons set out in the speech of Lord Millett, I would allow this appeal. I would emphasise that the appeal was argued on the question of jurisdiction only, without reference to the very important element of discretion, considered by your Lordships' House in British and Commonwealth Holdings plc (Joint administrators) v Spicer & Oppenheim (a firm) [1992] 4 All ER 876, [1993] AC 426. It will be rare for any application under s 236 of the Insolvency Act 1986 to be made for the sole purpose of proceedings under the Disqualification Act, and in such a case the court will be well aware of the need to avoid any oppressive exercise of its powers. In this case the Official Receiver's concession, before Judge Weeks, that the application was made solely for the purposes of the disqualification proceedings, appears in retrospect rather surprising, as Mr Crow acknowledged in the course of his reply. The liquidator who was mistakenly appointed (after the company had been struck off the register) had intended to issue misfeasance proceedings claiming £387,000. But it is unnecessary to go further into that aspect of the matter, since your Lordships are concerned only with the issue of jurisdiction. b c d

Appeal allowed.

Dilys Tausz Barrister.

Lloyds TSB General Insurance Holdings Ltd and others v Lloyds Bank Group Insurance Co Ltd

[2003] UKHL 48

HOUSE OF LORDS

LORD NICHOLLS OF BIRKENHEAD, LORD HOFFMANN, LORD HOBHOUSE OF WOODBOROUGH, LORD MILLETT AND LORD WALKER OF GESTINGTHORPE

7, 8 APRIL, 31 JULY 2003

Insurance – Liability insurance – Determination of proximate cause – Claimants providing personal pension plans – Defendants insuring claimants against negligent advice – Claimants failing properly to train representatives selling pension plans – Representatives providing negligent advice – Claimants liable to investors – Whether individual policyholders' claims falling within aggregation clause – Whether series of claims constituting 'related series of acts or omissions'.

The claimant companies marketed personal pension schemes. The marketing of such schemes was investment business within the Financial Services Act 1986 and could be undertaken only by authorised persons. To be authorised a person had to belong to the appropriate self-regulating organisation, which in the case of the majority of the claimants was the Life Assurance and Unit Trust Regulatory Organisation (LAUTRO), and comply with the organisation's rules as if they had been made under the 1986 Act. Rule 3.4(4)(a) of LAUTRO's rules provided that members should ensure that their company representatives complied with the LAUTRO code of conduct. The LAUTRO rules also required members to establish training schemes for their employees and to arrange to monitor their performance to ensure that they complied with the code of conduct. Under the 1986 Act a breach of the LAUTRO rules affecting an investor was actionable as a breach of statutory duty. It became apparent that the claimants' representatives selling the pensions had frequently failed to comply with the code of conduct in that they failed to give what the code defined as 'best advice' to investors. Nor had the claimants established the required training and monitoring schemes. Some 22,000 claims for mis-selling were made by investors against the claimants. No single claim was for more than £35,000 but the total paid out by the claimants exceeded £125m. The claimants held an insurance policy with the defendant insurers which included an indemnity in respect of their legal liabilities to third parties for third party claims. The mis-selling claims fell within the terms of the policy but the policy covered only the part of each and every third party claim which exceeded the deductible amount of £1m. However, an aggregation clause provided that if a series of third party claims resulted from 'any single act or omission (or related series of acts or omissions)' then all such claims were to be considered to be a single third party claim for the purposes of the application of the deductible. The effect of the definition of 'act or omission' in the policy was that it meant a breach of the LAUTRO rules in respect of which civil liability arose on the part of the claimants. The claimants sought an indemnity under the policy. In order to decide the effect of the aggregation clause, the trial as a preliminary issue was ordered of the questions of whether the mis-selling claims resulted from: (i) a single act or omission by the claimants, their officers or employees; and or (ii) a related series of acts or omissions by the same persons; and were therefore to be considered to be a single claim subject to a single deductible. The claimants succeeded in the Commercial Court where the judge held that their breaches of their duties under the LAUTRO rules to establish training and monitoring schemes were an act or omission or series of acts or omissions that had been the cause of all 22,000 claims, which could therefore be aggregated and treated as a single claim. The insurers appealed to the Court of Appeal which held that while the lack of training and monitoring systems had not been a single act or omission from which liability had resulted, the words 'related series of acts or omissions' meant acts or omissions which had a single underlying cause or common origin, such as the failure to have proper systems, and dismissed the appeal. The insurers appealed to the House of Lords, and the claimants cross-appealed. The appeal was argued on the basis of three LAUTRO members, without distinguishing between them and the other two companies.

Held – The language of the aggregation clause, read with the definition of 'act or omission' showed that the insurers had not been willing to accept as a unifying factor a common cause more remote than the act or omission which had actually constituted the cause of action. An act or omission could qualify as a unifying factor in respect of more than one loss only if it gave rise to civil liability in respect of both losses. In the instant case, the act or omission which gave rise to the civil liability in respect of each claim, which was failure to give best advice to that investor, was different from the acts or omissions giving rise to the other claims. The only unifying factor which the clause provided for describing acts or omissions as 'related' and a 'series' was that they resulted in a series of third party claims. The unifying element was a common causal relationship. That meant that acts or events formed a related series if they together resulted in each of the claims. In the instant case the acts or omissions of the individual consultants which gave rise to the financial loss suffered by the third parties were not a related series of acts or omissions. Each arose from a separate contravention of r 3.4(4)(a) of the LAUTRO rules. Accordingly the appeal would be allowed, the cross-appeal would be dismissed and the questions in the preliminary issue answered in the negative (see [1], [23], [27], [29], [51], [53]–[55], below).

Decision of Court of Appeal [2002] 1 All ER (Comm) 42 reversed.

Notes

For the nature of liability insurance, see 25 Halsbury's Laws (4th edn reissue) paras 660, 661.

Cases referred to in opinions

AXA Reinsurance (UK) Ltd v Field [1996] 3 All ER 517, [1996] 1 WLR 1026, HL.
Cox v Bankside Members Agency Ltd [1995] 2 Lloyd's Rep 437, QBD and CA.
Caudle v Sharp [1995] LRLR 433, CA.
Municipal Mutual Insurance Ltd v Sea Insurance Co Ltd [1998] Lloyd's Rep IR 421, CA.

Cases referred to in list of authorities

American Centennial Insurance Co v INSCO Ltd [1996] LRLR 407.
Athel Line Ltd v The Liverpool and London War Risks Insurance Association Ltd [1945] 2 All ER 694, [1946] 1 KB 117, CA.
Banque Bruxelles Lambert SA v Eagle Star Insurance Co Ltd [1995] 2 All ER 769, [1995] QB 375, [1995] 2 WLR 87, CA; rvsd sub nom South Australia Asset Management

Corp v York Montague Ltd, United Bank of Kuwait plc v Prudential Property Services Ltd, Nykredit Mortgage Bank plc v Edward Erdman Group plc [1996] 3 All ER 365, [1997] AC 191, [1996] 3 WLR 87, HL.

BHP Petroleum (Timor Sea) Pty Ltd v Minister for Resources (1994) 49 FCR 155, Aust FC.

Caudle v Sharp, Grove v Sharp [1995] LRLR 80.

Chandris v Isbrandtsen-Moller Co Inc [1950] 2 All ER 618, [1950] 1 KB 240, CA.

Clover, Clayton & Co Ltd v Hughes [1910] AC 242, [1908–10] All ER Rep 220, HL.

Cox v Bankside Members Agency Ltd [1995] 2 Lloyds Rep 437, CA.

Deeny v Gooda Walker Ltd (in liq) [1996] LRLR 183.

Dunham v Clare [1902] 2 KB 292, CA.

Fenton v J Thorley & Co Ltd [1903] AC 443, HL.

Galoo Ltd (in liq) v Bright Grahame Murray (a firm) [1995] 1 All ER 16, [1994] 1 WLR 1360, CA.

Goddard & Smith v Frew [1939] 4 All ER 358, CA.

Gray v Barr [1971] 2 All ER 949, [1971] 2 QB 554, [1971] 2 WLR 1334, CA.

Haydon v Lo & Lo (a firm) [1997] 1 WLR 198, PC.

Heskell v Continental Express Ltd [1950] 1 All ER 1033.

Investors Compensation Scheme Ltd v West Bromwich Building Society, Investors Compensation Scheme Ltd v Hopkin & Sons (a firm), Alford v West Bromwich Building Society, Armitage v West Bromwich Building Society [1998] 1 All ER 98, [1998] 1 WLR 896, HL.

Lawrence v The Accidental Insurance Co Ltd (1881) 7 QBD 216, DC.

Leyland Shipping Co Ltd v Norwich Union Fire Insurance Society Ltd [1918] AC 350, [1918–19] All ER Rep 443, HL.

Lloyd (JJ) Instruments Ltd v Northern Star Insurance Co Ltd, The Miss Jay Jay [1987] 1 Lloyd's Rep 32, CA.

Lord v Pacific Steam Navigation Co Ltd, The Oropesa [1943] 1 All ER 211, [1943] P 32, CA.

Ocean Steamship Co Ltd v Liverpool and London War Risks Insurance Association Ltd, The Priam [1946] 2 All ER 355, [1946] 1 KB 561, CA.

Reischer v Borwick [1894] 2 QB 548, [1891–4] All ER Rep 531, CA.

Rothschild (J) Assurance plc v Collyear [1999] Lloyd's Rep IR 6.

Rothwell v Caverswall Stone Co Ltd [1944] 2 All ER 350, CA.

Smith New Court Securities Ltd v Scrimgeour Vickers (Asset Management) Ltd [1996] 4 All ER 796, [1997] AC 254, [1996] 2 WLR 1051, HL.

Wayne Tank and Pump Co Ltd v Employers' Liability Assurance Corp Ltd [1973] 3 All ER 825, [1974] QB 57, [1973] 3 WLR 483, CA.

West Wake Price & Co v Ching [1956] 3 All ER 821, [1957] 1 WLR 45.

Williams v Natural Life Health Foods Ltd [1998] 2 All ER 577, [1998] 1 WLR 830, HL

Yorkshire Dale Steamship Co Ltd v Minister of War Transport, The Coxwold [1942] 2 All ER 6, [1942] AC 691, HL.

Appeal

Lloyds Bank Group Insurance Co Ltd (the insurers), appealed in part, with leave to appeal given by the Appeal Committee of the House of Lords on 16 May 2002, and Lloyds TSB General Insurance Holdings Ltd, TSB Life Ltd, TSB Pensions Ltd, TSB Bank plc and Lloyds TSB Life Assurance Co Ltd (the TSB companies) cross-appealed in part, from the order of the Court of Appeal (Potter, Hale and Longmore LJJ) on 8 November 2001 ([2001] EWCA Civ 1643, [2002] 1 All ER (Comm) 42) dismissing the insurers' appeal from the order of Moore-Bick J on 5 October 2000 ([2001] 1 All ER (Comm) 13) determining preliminary issues arising in proceedings brought by the TSB companies against the insurers. The facts are set out in the opinion of Lord Hoffmann.

Mark Hapgood QC and Timothy Howe (instructed by Simmons & Simmons) for the TSB companies.

Jonathan Sumption QC and Guy Philipps QC (instructed by Barlow Lyde & Gilbert) for the insurers.

Their Lordships took time for consideration.

31 July 2003. The following opinions were delivered.

LORD NICHOLLS OF BIRKENHEAD.

[1] My Lords, I have not found this question of interpretation as easy as others. The conclusion reached in the Commercial Court ([2001] 1 All ER (Comm) 13) and the Court of Appeal ([2001] EWCA Civ 1643, [2002] 1 All ER (Comm) 42) has considerable attraction. In the end, and not without a degree of doubt, I agree that for the reasons given by my learned friends Lord Hoffmann and Lord Hobhouse of Woodborough this appeal should be allowed and the cross-appeal dismissed.

LORD HOFFMANN.

[2] My Lords, in 1994 the Securities and Investment Board (SIB) carried out an investigation into what it found to have been widespread breaches of the Financial Services Act 1986 (the FSA) by companies selling personal pension schemes. The marketing of such schemes was 'investment business' within the meaning of the FSA and could be undertaken only by authorised persons. To be authorised, the company had to belong to the appropriate self-regulating organisation. It had to comply with the rules of that organisation as if they had been made under the FSA.

[3] The relevant self-regulating organisation was at the time the Life Assurance and Unit Trust Regulatory Organisation (LAUTRO). Its rules provided, by r 3.4(4)(a), that 'the member shall ... ensure that its company representatives comply with the Code of Conduct (insofar as it applies to them)'. The code of conduct, scheduled to the rules, contained detailed provisions about the duties of salesmen selling personal pension schemes. These had been widely marketed after the Social Security Act 1986 gave employees or ex-employees the right to transfer the value of accrued benefits in their employer's occupational scheme to a personal scheme in which the investments were managed by a company of their own choice.

[4] Whether it was in the interests of an employee to leave his employer's occupational scheme and commit his future to a personal scheme was often a difficult question. A fully informed decision required the employee to be aware of the respective risks, costs and benefits of the choices open to him. Much depended upon his personal and family circumstances. The LAUTRO code of conduct required a sales representative to make a detailed analysis in order to give the investor what was compendiously called 'best advice' on all relevant aspects of the decision. It imposed a positive duty upon the salesman (who was usually paid commission on the schemes which he sold) to advise the employee against giving up his rights under the occupational scheme unless he honestly thought it was in the employee's best interests to do so.

[5] The 1994 investigation suggested that, in breach of the code of conduct, many employees had been persuaded to transfer to personal schemes without adequate advice about the risks, advantages and disadvantages. These breaches of the code by salesmen were commonly called 'mis-selling'. The underlying reasons for mis-selling were partly the method by which salesmen were paid but largely the inadequacy of the training and monitoring of their performance provided by the companies employing them. These failures were also breaches of the LAUTRO rules, which required members to establish training schemes for their employees (r 3.4A) and to make arrangements for monitoring their performance to ensure that they complied with the Code of Conduct (r 3.4(3)).

[6] A breach of the LAUTRO rules affecting an investor is actionable as a breach of statutory duty (see s 62 of the FSA) and the companies' breaches of r 3.4(4)(a) by failure to 'ensure' that their representatives complied with the code of conduct therefore gave rise to claims for compensation by investors who had suffered financial loss in consequence of mis-selling. After its investigation, the SIB required members of LAUTRO to inform persons to whom pensions had been sold that they might be entitled to a remedy in damages. The result was a flood of claims.

[7] The respondents to this appeal, then members of the TSB group (the TSB companies) received about 22,000 claims. (The TSB group has since become part of the Lloyds group.) Most of the claims were for relatively small amounts; so far, no single one has exceeded £35,000. But the total sum of money involved was large. The TSB companies have paid out more than £125m in compensation.

[8] The question in this appeal is whether the TSB companies can recover any part of this money under a bankers composite insurance policy under which they and other members of the TSB group were then insured. This policy, as its name suggests, covered the group companies against a variety of risks. It was divided into four sections, each covering a different type of risk. Broadly speaking, section 1 dealt with loss caused to the insured by the dishonest or fraudulent acts of employees, section 2 with electronic and computer crime, section 3 with liability to third parties arising from breaches of common law or statutory duties by employees and section 4 with the personal liabilities of directors and officers.

[9] The insured companies carried on widely different financial activities: they included Hill Samuel Bank Ltd, a well-known merchant bank; United Dominions Trust, equally well-known in hire purchase finance; TSB Bank plc, an old-established retail bank; as well as the other TSB companies. The appellant insurer, then called TSB Group Insurance Co Ltd and now Lloyds Bank Group Insurance Co Ltd, was a captive within the group. The group risks under the policy were reinsured and the reinsurers are the real parties in interest in this appeal.

[10] The risk of liability for mis-selling under the FSA fell within the insuring clause of section 3 of the policy:

> 'This Policy ... provides an indemnity to the Assured in respect of the Assured's legal liability to third parties for any third party claim ... which meets the following requirements:—
>
> Any third party claim must:
>
> (i) be for compensatory and/or restitutionary damages; and
>
> (ii) be first made against the Assured during the policy period; and
>
> (iii) ... (g) be for financial loss caused by a breach on the part of the Assured or an Officer or Employee of the Assured of the provisions of the Financial Services Act 1986 (including without limitation any rules or regulations made by any Regulatory Authority or any Self Regulatory Organisation pursuant to the provisions of the Act) ... in respect of which civil liability arises on the part of the Assured ...' a [11] There is no dispute that each of the claims for mis-selling satisfied these requirements. But the policy included a 'Schedule of Underlying Deductibles' which was said to form part of sections 1, 2 and 3. For section 3, there was to be a deductible of £1m 'each and every claim'. The same was repeated in item 7 of the schedule to section 3. The effect of the deductible in section 3 was stated in para 2 of the conditions: b

'... the Underwriters shall be liable only for that part of each and every third party claim during the Policy Period ... which exceeds the Deductible stated in Item 7 of the Schedule ... The Deductible shall apply to each and every third party claim and shall be subject to no aggregate limitation.' c

[12] So far, so bad—from the TSB companies' point of view. No single claim came anywhere near exceeding the £1m deductible. But the TSB companies rely, and have so far succeeded, on the 'aggregation clause' which follows the clauses I have already quoted: d

'If a series of third party claims shall result from any single act or omission (or related series of acts or omissions) then, irrespective of the total number of claims, all such third party claims shall be considered to be a single third party claim for the purposes of the application of the Deductible.' e

[13] In order to decide the effect of the aggregation clause, the following preliminary issue was ordered to be tried:

'Whether ... the Mis-Selling Claims constitute a series of third party claims which resulted from: (1) A single act or omission by the TSB Companies their officers or employees ... (2) A related series of acts or omissions by the TSB Companies their officers or employees ... and are therefore to be considered a single third party claim subject to a single Deductible for the purposes of Condition 2 of the ... Policy.' f

[14] Moore-Bick J said ([2001] 1 All ER (Comm) 13 at 24 (para 24)) that the purpose of an aggregation clause was: g

'... to enable two or more separate losses covered by the policy to be treated as a single loss for deductible or other purposes when they are linked by a unifying factor of some kind.' h

[15] That seems to me a fair description. The unifying factor is often a common origin in some act or event specified by the clause. But much will turn upon the precise nature of the act or event which, for the purposes of aggregation, the clause treats as a unifying factor. The more general the description of that act or event, the wider the scope of the clause. For example, j in Municipal Mutual Insurance Ltd v Sea Insurance Co Ltd [1998] Lloyd's Rep IR 421 the unifying cause was expressed in very general terms: '... all occurrences of a series consequent on or attributable to one source or original cause ...'

[16] This meant that as long as one could find any act, event or state of affairs which could properly be described as a cause of more than one loss, they formed part of a series for the purposes of the aggregation clause. Hobhouse LJ held that a series of losses caused by theft and vandalism from the port of Sunderland over a period of time were attributable to one original cause, namely the inadequacy of the port's system for protecting the goods of which it was bailee. On the other hand, in AXA Reinsurance (UK) Ltd v Field [1996] 3 All ER 517 at 526–527, [1996] 1 WLR 1026 at 1035 Lord Mustill contrasted the words 'arising from one originating cause' which had been used in Cox v Bankside Members Agency Ltd [1995] 2 Lloyd's Rep 437 with the words 'arising out of one event' which was the unifying factor designated by the clause then before the House. An 'event', he said, was 'something which happens at a particular time, at a particular place, in a particular way'. A 'cause' on the other hand, was less constricted: it could be a continuing state of affairs or the absence of something happening. The word 'originating' was also in his opinion chosen to 'open up the widest possible search for a unifying factor'. This meant that in the AXA case the incompetence of a Lloyds underwriter was not an 'event' giving rise to the losses under a number of separate policies which he had written on behalf of various syndicates, whereas in Cox's case it had been held to be the 'originating cause' of such losses.

[17] The choice of language by which the parties designate the unifying factor in an aggregation clause is thus of critical importance and can be expected to be the subject of careful negotiation; as Lord Mustill observed in the AXA case [1996] 3 All ER 517 at 526, [1996] 1 WLR 1026 at 1035, among players in the reinsurance market 'keen interest [is] shown ... in the techniques of limits, layers and aggregations'.

[18] In the present case the unifying factor is, as in the examples so far given, a common cause, but that cause must be a 'single act or omission' or, by an extension in the parenthesis, a 'related series of acts and omissions'. So the question turns upon the meaning of an 'act or omission' or 'related series of acts or omissions'.

[19] Moore-Bick J said ([2001] 1 All ER (Comm) 13 at 24 (para 24)) that an 'act or omission' included any acts or omissions 'of the kinds described in the insuring clause'. In his view, this included the TSB companies' breach of their duty under the LAUTRO rules to establish training schemes for their employees and to make arrangements for monitoring their performance. For the purposes of the preliminary issue the TSB companies admitted, indeed, asserted, that they had been in breach of these duties. Moore-Bick J held that these breaches were an act or omission or series of acts and omissions within the meaning of the aggregation clause and that they had been the cause of all the 22,000 claims. So they could all be aggregated and treated as a single claim for the purposes of the deductible.

[20] The Court of Appeal (Potter, Hale and Longmore LJJ) ([2001] EWCA Civ 1643, [2002] 1 All ER (Comm) 42) did not agree. They drew attention to cl 2(g) of the endorsement to section 3 of the policy, which defines the term 'act or omission'. For present purposes, the relevant part of the definition is that the words are deemed to mean a breach of the provisions of the LAUTRO rules 'as described in the insuring clause'. The relevant part of the insuring clause is para (iii)(g), which insures against a breach 'in respect of which civil liability arises on the part of the assured'. The Court of Appeal said that an 'act or omission' must therefore be something which constitutes the investor's cause of action. It cannot mean an act or omission which is causally more remote.

[21] It is therefore necessary to examine the nature of the cause of action asserted by the 22,000 claimants. It is a contravention of r 3.4(4)(a); to 'ensure that' company representatives comply with the code of conduct. A duty to 'ensure that' something does or does not happen is the standard form of words used to impose a contingent liability which will arise if the specified act or omission occurs. Even if the act or omission is that of a third party, such as a company representative, the liability is not vicarious. The company is not liable for the representative's act or omission: that is simply the contingency giving rise to the company's own liability. Nor should one be misled by the word 'ensure' into thinking that the effect is to impose upon the company a duty to do something. No doubt the company will be well advised to take whatever steps it can to prevent the contingency from happening, but the question of whether it took such steps or not is legally irrelevant to its liability. It is liable simply upon proof that the contingency has occurred.

[22] It follows that the absence of a training or monitoring system, even though an independent breach of the rules, was legally irrelevant to the civil liability of the TSB companies. Even without any such system, they would not have been liable unless their representatives actually contravened the code. Likewise, any such contravention would have given rise to liability whether they had a training and monitoring system or not. It cannot therefore have been an act or omission from which liability resulted.

[23] Thus far I respectfully agree with the Court of Appeal. The language of the aggregation clause, read with the definition of 'act or omission', shows that the insurers were not willing to accept as a unifying factor a common cause more remote than the act or omission which actually constituted the cause of action. An act or omission could qualify as a unifying factor in respect of more than one loss only if it gave rise to civil liability in respect of both losses. In the present case, the act or omission which gave rise to the civil liability in respect of each claim (failure to give best advice to that investor) was different from the acts or omissions giving rise to the other claims.

[24] But the Court of Appeal then turned to the words in parenthesis '(or related series of acts or omissions)'. And in construing these words, they produced exactly the result which they had rejected in their construction of the primary words 'single act or omission'. They said that acts or omissions could be 'related' and form a 'series' if they had a 'single underlying cause' or common origin (Potter LJ at [50], Hale LJ at [55]) or if they were 'the same omission' which had occurred on more than one occasion (Longmore LJ at [58]). The appeal was therefore dismissed.

[25] This result seems to me paradoxical. It means that the parties started by choosing a very narrow unifying factor: not 'any underlying cause', not 'any event' or even 'any act or omission', but only and specifically an act or omission which gives rise to the civil liability in question. Having chosen this as the opening and, one must assume, primary concept to act as unifying factor, they have then, by a parenthesis, produced a clause in which the unifying factor is as broad as one could possibly wish. It is sufficient that all the claims have a common underlying cause or (on the view of Longmore LJ) the breaches of duty are the same, which I take to mean sufficiently similar. In my opinion this construction is allowing the tail to wag the dog. I do not think that it is reasonable to understand the parties as having intended the parenthesis to stand the rest of the clause on its head.

[26] When one speaks of events being 'related' or forming a 'series', the nature of the unifying factor or factors which makes them related or a series must be expressed or implied by the sentence in which the words are used. It may sometimes be necessary to imply a unifying factor from the general context. But the express language may make such an implication unnecessary or impermissible.

[27] In the present case, the only unifying factor which the clause itself provides for describing the acts or omissions in the parenthesis as 'related' and a 'series' is that they 'result' in a series of third party claims. In other words, the unifying element is a common causal relationship. But that common causal relationship is, so to speak, downstream of the acts and omissions within the parenthesis. They must have resulted in each of the claims. This obviously does not mean that it is enough that one act should have resulted in one claim and another act in another claim. That provides no common causal relationship. It can only mean that the acts or events form a related series if they together resulted in each of the claims. In this way, the parenthesis plays a proper subordinate role of covering the case in which liability under each of the aggregated claims cannot be attributed to a single act or omission but can be attributed to the same acts or omissions acting in combination.

[28] The Court of Appeal was unwilling to accept that the clause itself provided the unifying factor to justify the use of the words 'related' and 'series'. They appear to have thought that it was in practice unlikely that acts or omissions having a common causal relationship with a series of claims would occur. So the Court of Appeal sought the unifying factor outside the clause, by implying a reference to a common underlying cause upstream of the acts or omissions in the parenthesis, or some similarity between them. The clause itself says nothing about such unifying factors. Not only that; the narrow formulation of the primary concept, 'single act or omission', suggests that it was anxious to avoid them. In my view, such an implication of an unstated unifying factor is impermissible. I would reserve my opinion on the example given by my noble and learned friend Lord Hobhouse of Woodborough of the salesman who presents the identical document to a number of customers in succession. I would not be inclined to accept that these acts are a series just because they are very similar, although I can see it might be said that the relevant single act or series of acts can be described as the distribution of the document and the method of distribution (sending it simultaneously to a number of people, showing it to them in succession or reading it to them at a meeting) is causally irrelevant.

[29] It is in my opinion quite possible that one could have separate losses caused to a number of people by the combination of more than one act or omission, none of which would have been caused by the one without the other. For example, to adapt an example of my noble and learned friend Lord Hobhouse, they may have been caused by the distribution of a misleading document in identical terms by someone who was not himself negligent but ought to have been corrected by someone else who was. The two acts or omissions would be a series which together caused each of the losses. But in any case, I think that it is wrong to allow doubts about the possibly practical application of the parenthesis (particularly when the clause may have to be applied to the wide variety of circumstances covered by the insuring clause of section 3 of the policy) to produce a construction which undermines the balance of the clause. Each of the claims did not arise from a 'single act or omission'. Nor did each of them arise from a 'related series of acts or omissions'. Each arose from a separate contravention of r 3.4(4)(a). I would therefore allow the appeal, dismiss the cross-appeal, and answer each of the preliminary issues, No.

LORD HOBHOUSE OF WOODBOROUGH.

[30] My Lords, this appeal has raised a question of the construction of an aggregation clause in a policy of insurance covering inter alia third party liability risks. The context is the policy deductible, i e the provision which states the level up to which the assured must self-insure (or insure elsewhere) before he has a right of recovery under the relevant policy. This provision may be qualified by an aggregation clause which enables the assured to aggregate self-insured losses together so as to exceed in aggregate the deductible and give a right of recovery. Policies also normally contain clauses which limit the liability of the insurer under the policy and such clauses may provide a limit by reference to individual losses or claims but give the insurer the right to aggregate losses or claims so as to enable him to apply the limit to that aggregate. It will, therefore, be appreciated that aggregation clauses may favour the assured or the insurer and in some policies the same aggregation clause, because it qualifies both a deductible clause and a limit clause, may at times work in favour of the assured and at other times in favour of the insurer. Aggregation clauses thus require a construction which is not influenced by any need to protect the one party or the other. They must be construed in a balanced fashion giving effect to the words used.

[31] Another preliminary observation which needs to be made, which is true of very many professionally drafted commercial and financial contracts, and is particularly true in the present case, is that there are often well established alternatives open to the parties in the drafting of their agreement. The choice made from among these alternatives represents part of the bargain struck by the parties and must be respected by anyone (judge or arbitrator) adjudicating upon a dispute arising under the document. As noted by Lord Mustill in AXA Reinsurance (UK) Ltd v Field [1996] 3 All ER 517 at 522–527, [1996] 1 WLR 1026 at 1031–1035, and, as I will explain below, aggregation clauses come in different well established forms. The clause in the present case is no exception. The form it takes is plain and apparent from the language which the parties have used. It is an impressive feature of this litigation that both the Commercial judge (Moore-Bick J) ([2001] 1 All ER (Comm) 13) and the three members of the Court of Appeal (Potter, Hale and Longmore LJJ) ([2001] EWCA Civ 1643, [2002] 1 All ER (Comm) 42) have all arrived at the same conclusion. But it can be questioned whether that conclusion does not fail to give effect to the clause which the parties have chosen to include in this policy.

THE POLICY

[32] The policy was a 'Bankers Composite Insurance' covering what was then 'The TSB Group' for 12 months from 1 November 1993. It was in four effectively self-contained sections covering a variety of classes of risk and loss relevant to the business of the group. The section with which this appeal is concerned is section 3—'Professional Indemnity'. The relevant assured were members of the group to whom a deductible of £1m 'each and every' claim applied in respect of this section. The insurer was also a TSB company and the financial significance of liability under this policy would appear to be to its reinsurers rather than to the TSB Group insurer as such.

[33] The section 3 policy was a 'claims made' policy providing an indemnity in respect of the assured's legal liability to third parties for any third party claim which is for compensatory or restitutionary damages and first made against the relevant assured during the policy period and is for financial loss falling within any of ten listed categories, (a) to (j). These include financial loss caused by a negligent act, negligent error or negligent omission on the part of an officer or employee of the assured, or the breach of a fiduciary or professional duty, or misrepresentation on the part of the assured or an officer or employee of the assured. But the risk primarily relied on in the present case was:

> '(g) ... financial loss caused by a breach on the part of the Assured or an Officer or Employee of the Assured of the provisions of the Financial Services Act 1986 (including without limitation any rules or regulations made by any Regulatory Authority or any Self-Regulatory Organisation pursuant to the provisions of the Act) or of any other statute enacted in the United Kingdom, or the Channel Islands including breach of a statutory duty in respect of which civil liability arises on the part of the Assured ...'

There was a very high limit on the insurer's overall liability under the policy which is therefore irrelevant for present purposes. The deductible is dealt with in cl 2 which provides that the policy only covers 'that part of each and every third party claim' which exceeds the deductible and continues:

> 'The Deductible shall apply to each and every third party claim and shall be subject to no aggregate limitation.
>
> If a series of third party claims shall result from any single act or omission (or related series of acts or omissions) then, irrespective of the total number of claims, all such third party claims shall be considered to be a single third party claim for the purposes of the application of the Deductible.'

This provision uses the phrase 'act or omission' which is later defined to mean exactly the same as the categories (a) to (j) in the insuring clause which it again quotes in full. So, if the third party claim qualifies under (g) it is the wording of (g) which defines 'act or omission' as used in the aggregation clause.

THE FACTS

[34] For the purpose of this appeal there is no dispute about the relevant facts. The facts are those pleaded by the assureds which must be assumed for the purposes of the preliminary issue to be true.

[35] The Social Security Act 1986 enabled employees who would otherwise be entitled to benefits under their employers' occupational pension schemes to transfer benefits from, opt out of, or not to join, those occupational pension schemes and instead to invest for their retirement in personal pension plans. Each of the claimants (save for the fifth claimant, Lloyds TSB Life Assurance Co Ltd) was engaged in the marketing and sale of personal pension plans to such employees ('pension transfer business'). The conduct of such business was subject to regulation as 'investment business' under the Financial Services Act 1986 (the FSA), in accordance with a regime of self-regulation administered by the responsible self-regulating organisation which until 18 July 1994 was the Life Assurance and Unit Trust Regulatory Organisation (LAUTRO) and thereafter was the Personal Investment Authority. Three of the claimants (the second, third and fifth) were at the material times members of LAUTRO; the other two were not. The appeal has however been argued on the basis of the three LAUTRO members, without distinguishing between them and the other two. The actual marketing and sale of personal pension plans was at all material times done by 'consultants' employed by one of the claimants as the case might be.

[36] Rule 3.4(4)(a) of the rules of LAUTRO provided that a member shall 'ensure that its company representatives comply with the Code of Conduct (insofar as it applies to them)'. Rule 3.4(3) of the rules of LAUTRO provided that a member 'shall make arrangements ... for the monitoring of the performance of its company representatives to ensure that they comply with the Code of Conduct (insofar as it applies to them)'. The LAUTRO code of conduct (Sch 2 to the LAUTRO rules) was expressly made for the purpose of ensuring that members and their representatives maintained high standards of integrity and fair dealing, in particular in relation to investors, exercised due skill care and diligence in providing services, and generally took proper account of the interests of investors in the course of carrying out investment business. The relevant duties of 'consultants' engaged in pensions transfer business were set out in the code. Thus, the code required the 'consultants' to give investors 'best advice' and prohibited them from advising investors on any matter unless competent to do so. The requirements of 'best advice' included giving advice in relation to sales of personal pension plans to members of occupational pension schemes with the obligation in particular to carry out a full and detailed analysis of and comparison between the costs and risks of and the benefits under the investor's occupational pension scheme and the proposed personal pension plan and to advise the investors upon them and included a positive duty not to advise an investor to give up his rights under the occupational pension scheme unless it was bona fide believed to be in his best interest to do so. Section 62 of the FSA provides that a contravention of (inter alia) the LAUTRO rules by a member of LAUTRO should be actionable against the member at the suit of any person who suffers loss as the result of the contravention, subject to any available defences.

[37] Following public expressions of concern which led to a review carried out by the Securities and Investment Board in 1994, more than 22,000 mis-selling claims were made by investors against one or other of the claimants, claiming compensation for the losses they had individually suffered by reason of the alleged mis-selling. Each of the mis-selling claims was based on or included allegations that best advice had not been given to the investor. The failure on the part of the 'consultant' concerned to give best advice to the investor constituted a breach of the code on the part of the 'consultant'. The failure on the part of the relevant claimant to ensure that the 'consultant' concerned gave best advice to the investor was also a breach on the part of the relevant claimant of the rules of LAUTRO. The mis-selling claims were claims against the claimants for damages for financial loss caused by (inter alia) breach of statutory duty giving rise to civil liability on their part under s 62 of the FSA.

[38] It is alleged, and must for present purposes be assumed to be true, that at all material times the claimant concerned, its officers or employees failed to consider, identify and satisfy the requirements of best advice in relation to pension transfer business and, specifically, that the relevant claimant—(a) initially failed to give any specific consideration to the requirements of best advice and failed to provide any specific internal compliance guidance or training to its 'consultants'; (b) subsequently misinterpreted the requirements of best advice in relation to pension transfer business, and mistakenly believed that it was unnecessary for its 'consultants' to evaluate the comparative risks and benefits for the investor to invest in a personal pension plan as opposed to membership of an occupational pension scheme, or to give advice to the investor accordingly; and (c) failed at all material times to establish and maintain adequate resources, policies, practices and procedures to ensure that the conduct of pension transfer business by the claimant and its 'consultants' as a whole complied with the requirements of the rules of LAUTRO and the code, and in particular failed to instruct train, equip, monitor and supervise its 'consultants' as a whole for the purpose of conducting pension transfer business in compliance with the requirements of best advice. It is alleged, and must for present purposes be assumed to be true, that (i) the failures to give best advice on the part of the 'consultants' concerned and (ii) the acceptance of, or failure to reject, proposed pension transfer business on the part of the claimant concerned, its officers or employees, arose from the same underlying origin or were of an identical or very similar nature.

[39] The various claimants have paid compensation to investors exceeding £125m in total. However, no single claim has exceeded the deductible of £1m. Indeed, no single claim has exceeded about £35,000 in amount. It follows that the entitlement of the various claimants to be indemnified by the insurer in respect of the compensation paid by them to investors depends in the first instance upon whether the aggregation clause in section 3 of the policy entitles them to aggregate the mis-selling claims for the purposes of the deductible. The issues for determination are thus whether the mis-selling claims against the various claimants were 'a series of third party claims' which resulted from 'a single act or omission' on the part of the various claimants, their officers or employees and, if not, whether they were 'a series of third party claims' which resulted from 'a related series of acts or omissions' on the part of the various claimants, their officers or employees.

THE COURT OF APPEAL

[40] The judgments in the Court of Appeal did not wholly adopt the same reasoning as that of the judge. None treated their decision as concluded by binding authority. They rejected the argument that there had been a single act or omission but accepted the argument that there had been a related series of acts or omissions. Potter LJ ([2002] 1 All ER (Comm) 42 at [47]) rejected the 'single act or omission' argument on the ground that the failure to ensure that the 'consultants' gave best advice was not the cause of the liability to the third party as they 'were no more than regulatory duties not giving rise to duties directly enforceable by action by a member of the public'. But he accepted (at [50]) the argument that 'a series of acts or omissions may be related by reason of having a single underlying cause or common origin' which need not be within the list of insured items. So he considered that the failure to have a proper system, as alleged in this case, was such an underlying cause or origin. He considered the word 'related' was 'wholly apt' to apply to a series of acts or omissions which were of the same or a 'very similar nature and which share a common causal origin'.

[41] Hale LJ (at [54]) stressed that the conduct which gave rise to the individual third party claims for which the assureds were respectively liable was 'not the systemic management failure which is said to be the explanation for all those individual misdeeds'. But referring to the phrase 'related series' she found assistance in the variety of family relationships familiar to family lawyers, including 'kindred and affinity'. She treated the 'single underlying cause' as decisive to give rise to a sufficient relationship.

[42] Longmore LJ (at [56]) stressed that the liability of the assured was personal not vicarious. 'Once it is established that "Best Advice" has not been given, liability is automatic.' He summarised his view (at [57]), saying:

> '... if a number of different people are responsible for [the] omissions [to give best advice] and such omissions give rise to different losses for different customers, the omissions are nevertheless, in my view, related and constitute a related series of omissions because they are an omission to do the same thing, although the consequences of each omission are, of course, different.' a

DISCUSSION

[43] The scheme of the relevant parts of section 3 of this policy is firstly that it has a carefully drafted insurance clause which defines the cover given. It is of no avail to the assureds to present arguments which involve saying that the b proximate cause or causes of the relevant third party losses is something other than the insured cover there defined. This scheme is reinforced by the inclusion of the definition clause in effectively identical terms inserted for the purpose of defining the phrase 'act or omission' as used in the aggregation clause. The result is that, for present purposes, the third party claim has to be one which is 'for c financial loss caused by a breach on the part of the assured or an officer or employee of the assured' of the FSA or the LAUTRO rules and the acts or omissions relied upon to trigger the aggregation clause have also to fit that description. This was recognised by Potter LJ (at [50]). It has to be what proximately caused the loss suffered by the third party and that was the act or omission of the 'consultant'. It may be that one should assume that all the d 'consultants' were untrained and incompetent. But the fact remains that on occasions they may happen to have given what was in fact the best advice or that the advice which they gave did not in fact cause the third party any financial loss. The essential factor in every case has to be that the breach—act or omission—caused the third party financial loss. There is thus no 'single act or e omission': there were as many acts and omissions as there were third party claims. Similarly, if there is to be a related series of acts and omissions, that description has to be true of the 22,000 claims notwithstanding that each claimant will have been different, each financial loss will have been different and the actual failure to give the best advice will have been on the part of many different employees of the relevant different assureds. It is of no assistance to the assureds f to say that they were themselves each in breach of their obligation to ensure that best advice was given. That statutory requirement merely creates for the relevant assured an absolute liability for the breach of its relevant employee.

[44] The second part of the structure of section 3 to which I wish to draw attention is the deductible clause. It applies across the board, to all ten heads of g cover; it is not specific to these individual assureds or to the FSA cover. So, it is not necessary or right to construe it specifically by reference to the FSA cover. The deductible applies to 'each and every third party claim'. This is the starting point for the consideration of the aggregation clause. The further fact that for these assureds the deductible is set at £1m shows that the primary intention is to confine the cover to large third party claims. h

[45] The aggregation clause is applicable if there is a series of third party claims which either have resulted from a 'single act or omission' or have resulted from a 'related series of acts or omissions'. The phrase 'series of third party claims' clearly carries with it the possibility that the claims may have been made by a number of third parties and each relate to the financial loss suffered by an j individual third party but do not, as such, import anything more. The following phrase 'result from any single act or omission' reinforces this. The single act or omission must be the proximate cause of the financial loss caused to the third parties. This in the present context has to be an identifiable single failure by an identifiable 'consultant' to give the third parties 'Best Advice'. One can visualise how this might happen when a 'consultant' makes a single presentation to a room-full of people to persuade them to sign up to a pension scheme sold by his employer, one of the assureds. But this is not the scenario which the assureds invoke, no doubt because such aggregation would be insufficient to assist them in their claims against the insurer. What they seek to rely upon is the liability of the assureds by reason of the obligation to 'ensure'. But this does not provide them with an answer: there are as many failures to ensure as there have been failures by the various 'consultants' to give best advice. Further, a failure to ensure is not itself an 'act or omission' in any physical sense, as is implied by the use of the adjective 'single'; it is rather a word describing a personal responsibility for the failure of some other individual. The assureds' argument on the cross-appeal does not survive scrutiny and the Court of Appeal were right to reject it.

[46] The second basis of aggregation provided for in the clause is third party claims resulting from a 'related series' of acts or omissions. It is upon this phrase that the argument before your Lordships has mainly turned. As I have stated, this argument succeeded before the Court of Appeal. But, on examination, it can be seen to raise the same fundamental difficulties as the argument on the primary phrase, 'single act or omission'. The claims still have to result from something done or omitted as between the relevant 'consultant' and the relevant third party. The obligation of the relevant assured to 'ensure' does not suffice to bridge the gap nor could it unless one gave a different meaning to the words 'act(s) or omission(s)' in the two adjoining phrases. Here again one can visualise a situation which might be capable of leading to aggregation under this part of the wording. Suppose a 'consultant' prepares a document which misrepresents the merits of the pension scheme he is endeavouring to sell and gives that document to a succession of people; the people who buy into the scheme as a result of having been given the misleading document by the 'consultant' could each have a claim against the assured employing that 'consultant'. Each act of giving the misleading document to a person would be a distinct act. But they could together form a 'related series of acts' from which a 'series of third party claims' had resulted. But here again, this was not the way the assureds put their case, no doubt for the same reasons as before and because it was not in fact what happened. They however rely upon the use of the word 'ensure' and the assumed fact that all the acts of mis-selling arose from the same underlying origin or were of an identical or a very similar nature.

[47] The assureds' argument therefore runs as follows. Each of the assureds was under a statutory obligation to take the steps indicated in the code of conduct to guard against mis-selling. They did not do so. As a result, 'consultants' did not give best advice and mis-selling occurred. It follows that the various assureds did not ensure that it did not occur. The underlying cause of all the cases of mis-selling was the same—the failure to take the steps required by the code to guard against mis-selling. The requisite steps and the failure to take them were either the same in every case or very similar. This argument therefore takes the inquiry back to an earlier stage. It looks at not what caused the financial loss to the third party, the subject of the third party claim, but at the underlying situation which gave rise to the conduct of the 'consultant' vis-à-vis the third party. It can be commented that the underlying situation could equally well have been the failure of the assured to pay its 'consultants' a viable salary so that they became over-dependent upon commissions and were thus unduly influenced not to perform their duty to give best advice, a temptation to which a proportion of the 'consultants' would predictably succumb. The way in which the argument seeks to get round the basic difficulties is to say that the failure of each relevant assured to take the requisite steps, whilst not being the act or omission itself or the proximate cause of the third party's loss, provides the relationship between the various acts and omissions so as to justify the description of them as a 'related series', or, as Hale LJ might have put it, they all had the same parent, ie the failures of the assureds (or, perhaps, the same parent or uncles and aunts). Is this the correct construction to place on this clause?

[48] It is possible to have an aggregation clause which may have this effect. In AXA Reinsurance (UK) Ltd v Field [1996] 3 All ER 517 at 521, [1996] 1 WLR 1026 at 1029, the policies discussed included two different sets of wording, one referring to 'each and every loss and/or occurrence ... and/or series of losses and/or occurrences ... arising out of one event' and the other referring to 'any claim or claims arising from one originating cause or series of events or occurrences attributable to one originating cause (or related causes)'. Lord Mustill said:

> 'In my opinion these expressions are not all the same, for two reasons. In ordinary speech, an event is something which happens at a particular time, at a particular place, in a particular way ... A cause is to my mind something altogether less constricted. It can be a continuing state of affairs; it can be the absence of something happening. Equally, the word "originating" was in my view consciously chosen to open up the widest possible search for a unifying factor in the history of the losses which it is sought to aggregate. To my mind the one expression has a much wider connotation than the other.' (See [1996] 3 All ER 517 at 526–527, [1996] 1 WLR 1026 at 1035.)

Accordingly where the words falling into the second category were used, losses caused by a mistake shared in common by three different underwriters as to the nature of the LMX spiral could be the single underlying cause of their having entered into a series of fatally defective reinsurance treaties and could therefore be the unifying factor justifying the aggregation of the losses suffered under those treaties, whereas the use of words falling into the first category would not suffice.

[49] Similar reasoning had earlier been adopted by Evans LJ, giving the leading judgment of the Court of Appeal in Caudle v Sharp [1995] LRLR 433 at 439–440. That case involved the former type of wording—'each and every loss and/or occurrence ... and/or series of losses and/or occurrences ... arising out of one event'. He did not in the context of that policy consider that the 'one event' need be an insured peril but rejected the idea that anything that happened could properly be described as 'an event'. He distinguished between a historical event such as the hundred years war and a single event such as a particular hurricane. The case was about a series of 32 asbestosis reinsurance contracts which Mr Outhwaite had underwritten without doing any proper assessment of the risk. Mr Outhwaite's repeated negligence, his sustained state of ignorance of the truth, could not be described as a single event.

[50] Similarly, in a later case Municipal Mutual Insurance Ltd v Sea Insurance Co Ltd [1998] Lloyd's Rep IR 421, the Court of Appeal made the same distinction between a simple 'any one event' clause and a clause, which was the clause in the policy with which the Court of Appeal were concerned, which included the words 'or arising out of all occurrences of a series consequent on or attributable to one source or original cause'. Accordingly they held (at 433–434) that, where a large piece of machinery had been left unguarded and unprotected on the dockside for some 18 months and progressively stripped during that period by petty thieves, the losses fell to be aggregated under the clause because 'on an ordinary use of language, the acts of pilferage and vandalism were a series of occurrences attributable to a single source or original cause'.

[51] Returning to the aggregation clause in the present policy, there are no words of equivalent strength to those found in the AXA and Municipal cases—'attributable to'—'a single source'—'originating cause'. The argument of the assureds has to be built upon the inclusion of the phrase 'related series'. But this does not have the same force or create such a strong and wide connecting factor. One is still left with the necessity to look at the acts and omissions of the individual 'consultants' which gave rise to the financial loss suffered by the third party and ask whether they were a related series of acts or omissions. In my opinion they were not. The parties could, if they had so chosen, have used a clause such as that found in the AXA and Municipal cases. They chose not to and, no doubt, the cost of obtaining insurance cover was reduced as a result. Their choice should be respected.

[52] The assumed facts expressly postulate two facts: that the losses 'arose from the same underlying origin' and that the 'consultants' failures to give best advice and the various assureds' failure to reject the pension transfer business sold by the 'consultants' 'were of an identical or very similar nature'. The first of these facts if it is to justify aggregation requires exactly the type of reclassification and redrafting of the clause which the authorities demonstrate is not permissible. The second without the first proves too much. It would lead to the aggregation of individual acts of negligence by individual employees which were independent of each other but merely could be described as having a very similar character, eg bad advice by bank managers. The essential component of the assureds' case remains that they must say that this aggregation clause is an 'original cause' clause. That is not a permissible construction to place upon it.

[53] Accordingly, the appeal should be allowed and the cross-appeal dismissed and the questions should be answered as contended for by the insurers.

LORD MILLETT.

[54] My Lords, I have had the advantage of reading in draft the speeches of my noble and learned friends, Lord Hoffmann and Lord Hobhouse of Woodborough. I agree with them, and for the reasons they give I too would allow the appeal and dismiss the cross-appeal.

LORD WALKER OF GESTINGTHORPE.

[55] My Lords, I have had the advantage of reading in draft the speeches of my noble and learned friends, Lord Hoffmann and Lord Hobhouse of Woodborough. For the reasons which they give I would allow the appeal, dismiss the cross-appeal and answer the preliminary issues in the way they propose.

Appeal allowed. Cross-appeal dismissed.

Celia Fox Barrister.

Fawdry & Co (a firm) v Murfitt (Lord Chancellor intervening)

[2002] EWCA Civ 643

COURT OF APPEAL, CIVIL DIVISION

WARD, SEDLEY AND HALE LJJ

16, 17 APRIL, 14 MAY 2002

Practice – Transfer of proceedings from or to the Technology and Construction Court – Case listed in Queen's Bench Division transferred to circuit judge authorised to hear cases in Technology and Construction Court but not general Queen's Bench cases – No order transferring case to Technology and Construction Court drawn up – Parties having no opportunity to be heard on transfer or consent to transfer – Whether lack of opportunity vitiating transfer – Whether fatal procedural error – CPR 3.10, PD 49C, para 2.2.

The claimant firm brought proceedings in the High Court to recover fees allegedly due for consultancy work done for the defendant. The claim was for an amount such that it would in normal circumstances have been transferred to the county court but had remained in the High Court in order that the judgment would be enforceable in Jersey. The case was listed for trial in the Southampton District Registry in January 2001 but the day before the hearing the judge to whom it had been allocated informed the court group diary manager that he would not have sufficient time to hear it. The diary manager discovered that a circuit judge, who was authorised or 'ticketed' to sit as a judge of the Family Division of the High Court and in the Technology and Construction Court (TCC), but not to hear Queen's Bench cases, would be available to hear the case in Portsmouth. She faxed a memo to the presiding judge of the circuit asking for his approval for the case to be 'released' to that judge 'who is ticketed to hear TCC matters'. The presiding judge telephoned the diary manager and told her to do so. He considered that his instruction amounted to an order to transfer the case to the TCC, so that the judge could try it, although no order was ever drawn up to that effect. CPR PD 49C, para 2.2[a] provided that no order for a transfer of proceedings from or to the TCC should be made unless the parties had either been heard on the issue or consented. The parties were informed of the transfer to Portsmouth but not of any transfer to the TCC. At trial the judge dismissed the claim. The claimant thereafter discovered that the judge did not have a general Queen's Bench 'ticket', and was not told until July 2001 that the case had been transferred to the TCC. He appealed against the judge's decision on the ground that she had had no jurisdiction to hear the case. He argued: (i) that the presiding judge had not in fact transferred the case to the TCC; (ii) that even if he had transferred it the requirement in PD 49C para 2.2 had not been complied with; (iii) that that failure in compliance was so fundamental that (a) the transfer was thereby vitiated and (b) it was not covered by CPR 3.10(a)[b], which conferred on the court a general power of dispensation where there had been a procedural error and provided 'the error does not invalidate any steps taken in the proceedings unless the court so orders'.

a Paragraph 2, so far as material, is set out at [11], below

b Rule 3.10, so far as material, is set out at [13], below

Held – The presiding judge had had the power to transfer the case to the TCC, and the evidence was that that was what he had thought he was doing. The court would usually have a discretion whether or not to disapply r 3.10(a) in which a number of factors would have to be balanced. Prominent among those factors would be the prejudice to the parties. There might be good reasons to object to a transfer to the TCC list but in the instant case the purpose of the transfer was purely to secure the trial of the action on the date which had already been fixed and for which the parties were prepared. That in itself fulfilled the criteria for a transfer to that list. Moreover, the case was the sort of case which the judge was eminently well qualified to hear; it was a straightforward claim for services rendered of the sort that was usually dealt with in the county court. The judge had been nominated to deal with the much more complex cases, often involving difficult points of law as well as fact, which were tried in the TCC. There was no reason why a transfer should not have been ordered and no reason to think that either party had been prejudiced either by the transfer or by not having been given an opportunity to be heard on the matter. For the court to order otherwise under r 3.10 would substantially prejudice the successful party. Accordingly the transfer of the instant case to the TCC list to be heard by the judge was a valid order of the court and effective to give her power to hear it. The appeal would, accordingly, be dismissed (see [12], [16], [17], [38], [39], [52], [62], below).

Notes

For transfer of proceedings within the High Court and for the Technology and Construction Court, see 37 Halsbury's Laws (4th edn reissue) para 124, and 10 Halsbury's Laws (4th edn reissue) para 616 respectively.

Cases referred to in judgments

Adams v Adams (A-G intervening) [1970] 3 All ER 572, [1971] P 188, [1970] 3 WLR 934.

Aldridge, Re (1897) 15 NZLR 361, NZ CA.

Bagot's Case (1469) YB 9 Edw 4.

Buckley v Edwards [1892] AC 387, PC.

Curtin v Barton (1893) 139 NY 505, NY CA.

Daisystar Ltd v Town and Country Building Society, Townroots Ltd v Raja [1992] 2 All ER 321, [1992] 1 WLR 390, CA.

EE v Federal Republic of Germany App No 18889/91 (14 October 1992, unreported), E Com HR.

James (an insolvent) (A-G intervening), Re [1977] 1 All ER 364, [1977] Ch 41, [1977] 2 WLR 1, CA.

Millar v Dickson (Procurator Fiscal, Elgin) [2001] UKPC D4, [2002] 3 All ER 1041, [2002] 1 WLR 1615; rvsg 2000 JC 648, HC of Just.

Norton v Shelby County (1886) 118 US 425.

Pfeifer v Austria (1992) 14 EHRR 692, [1990] ECHR 11855/95, ECt HR.

R v Bedford Level Corp (1805) 6 East 356, 102 ER 1323.

R v Cronin [1940] 1 All ER 618, CA.

Starrs v Ruxton, Ruxton v Starrs 2000 JC 208, HC of Just.

State v Carroll (1871) 38 Conn 449, Connecticut SC.

Stubbings v UK (1996) 1 BHRC 316, ECt HR.

SW v UK, CR v UK (1995) 21 EHRR 363, ECt HR.
Tameside Metropolitan BC v Grant [2002] 3 FCR 238, [2002] Fam 194, [2002] 2 WLR 376.
Zand v Austria (1978) 15 DR 70, E Com HR.

Cases also cited or referred to in skeleton arguments
Abbot of Fountaine's case (1431) 9 H VI 33.
Metroinvest Anstalt v Commercial Union Assurance Co Ltd [1985] 2 All ER 318, [1985] 1 WLR 513, CA.
Stieringer v Germany (App No 28899/95) (25 November 1996, unreported), E Com HR.
Storer v British Gas plc [2000] 2 All ER 440, [2000] ICR 603, [2000] 1 WLR 1237, CA.
Walker v UK (2000) 29 EHRR CD 276, E Com HR.

Appeal
By notice of appeal dated 9 February 2001, the claimant firm, Fawdry & Co, appealed from the decision of Judge Linda Davies sitting as a judge in the Technology and Construction Court, on 26 January 2001, dismissing its claim against the defendant, Colin Douglas Murfitt, for payment of £19,340. The Lord Chancellor intervened in the appeal. The facts are set out in the judgment of Hale LJ.

Nicholas Isaac (instructed by Fawdry & Co) for the appellant.
Philip Sales (instructed by the Treasury Solicitor) for the Lord Chancellor.
The defendant did not appear.

Cur adv vult

14 May 2002. The following judgments were delivered.

HALE LJ.

[1] This is the claimant's appeal against the dismissal of his claim by Judge Linda Davies, sitting in Portsmouth, on 26 January 2001. The claim was brought in the Queen's Bench Division of the High Court. Judge Davies is authorised to sit as a judge of the Family Division of the High Court and in the Technology and Construction Court (TCC) but she is not authorised (colloquially 'ticketed') to sit as a judge of the Queen's Bench Division. The sole issue in this appeal is whether she had jurisdiction to hear this case. The successful defendant has played no part in the appeal, but with the court's permission, the Lord Chancellor's Department has intervened and filed evidence of the circumstances in which Judge Davies came to hear it.

FACTS

[2] The appellant is a firm owned by Mr Colin Slinn who acted in person until the matter reached this court. The firm brought proceedings in the High Court to recover fees allegedly due for consultancy work done for the defendant. The total claimed was £19,340. Such a claim would normally be transferred to the county court but had apparently remained in the High Court because the claimant wished to be able to enforce the judgment in Jersey.

[3] It was listed for trial on Friday 26 January 2001 in the Southampton District Registry before Judge Thompson QC. Judge Thompson does have authority to try Queen's Bench Division cases (and the presiding judge of the Western Circuit, Toulson J, had earlier decided that it be allocated to him). However, two urgent matters were also listed before him that Friday and therefore on Thursday 25 January, the day before the hearing, he informed Mrs O'Callaghan, the Winchester group diary manager, that he would not have sufficient time to hear this case.

[4] Mrs O'Callaghan discovered that Judge Davies would be available to hear it in Portsmouth. She was aware that Judge Davies was not authorised to hear Queen's Bench cases but was authorised to sit in the TCC. She faxed a memo to Toulson J asking for his approval for the case to be 'released' to Judge Davies 'who is ticketed to hear TCC matters'. He telephoned Mrs O'Callaghan about 4 pm and told her to do so. Toulson J was also aware that Judge Davies did not have a Queen's Bench 'ticket'. He has since said that he considered that his instruction amounted to an order to transfer the case to the TCC list so that Judge Davies could try it. No order was ever drawn up to that effect. The order made by Judge Davies is stated to have been made in the High Court of Justice, Queen's Bench Division, Portsmouth District Registry.

[5] The parties were immediately informed of the transfer to Portsmouth but not of any transfer to the TCC. Mr Slinn says that he inquired on arrival at court next morning whether Judge Davies was authorised to hear the case. Soon after the hearing began, Judge Davies observed:

> 'The matter is in the High Court, as I understand it, because that is the only basis upon which any judgment could be enforced in Jersey, and otherwise it would not be in the High Court. It comes before me, sitting as a High Court judge today, it being released—having been released to me for the purpose of this hearing.'

Ultimately, Judge Davies decided that although the claimant had undoubtedly done a considerable amount of work for the defendant, it had not been proved that this was done under an agreement that it be paid for rather than as a favour to a friend. She therefore dismissed the claim with costs summarily assessed at £1,976·90. The following Monday, 29 January, Mr Slinn set about investigating her authority to hear the case and discovered that she did not have a general Queen's Bench 'ticket'. He also gained the impression in conversation with Mrs O'Callaghan that it was Judge Thompson who had released the case to her. Although that impression was corrected in her letter of 6 February, no mention was made of any transfer to the TCC. The first he heard of this was in a letter dated 25 July 2001 from an official in the Lord Chancellor's Department in response to inquiries made by the Civil Appeals Office. In those circumstances it is scarcely surprising that Mr Slinn is puzzled as to what actually took place and questions its validity.

ISSUES IN THIS APPEAL

[6] I have found the researches and arguments of counsel, Mr Philip Sales for the Lord Chancellor's Department and Mr Nicholas Isaac for the appellant, both interesting and instructive. They have identified three issues. (1) What in fact happened on 25 January and was it effective to give Judge Davies authority to hear the case? This depends upon whether there was an effective transfer to the TCC and whether the undoubted breaches of the rules which took place were fatal to her jurisdiction. (2) If she did not have jurisdiction, was her sitting rescued by the common law doctrine of de facto authority? (3) If it was so rescued, is this sufficient to comply with the requirement that the court be 'established by law' for the purpose of art 6 of the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms 1950 (as set out in Sch 1 to the Human Rights Act 1998)?

DID THE JUDGE HAVE AUTHORITY TO HEAR THE CASE?

[7] In recent years, especially following the Woolf reforms and the Civil Procedure Rules 1998, there has been increasing integration between the different courts in the civil justice system. Nevertheless, the High Court and the county courts are still separate courts, constituted under different statutes, with different judges appointed in different ways and under different terms of appointment. While High Court judges automatically have jurisdiction in the county courts (by virtue of s 5(3) of the County Courts Act 1984), the same is not true in reverse. There are two provisions in the Supreme Court Act 1981 under which circuit judges may be given power to exercise the jurisdiction of the High Court: s 9 of the 1981 Act is headed 'Assistance for transaction of judicial business of Supreme Court' and s 68 of the 1981 Act is headed 'Exercise of High Court jurisdiction otherwise than by judges of that court'.

[8] Section 9(1) provides:

> 'A person within any entry in column 1 of the following Table may ... at any time, at the request of the appropriate authority, act—(a) as a judge of a relevant court specified in the request; or (b) if the request relates to a particular division of a relevant court so specified, as a judge of that court in that division.'

Column 1 is headed 'Judge or ex-judge' and includes 'A Circuit judge' at item 5. Column 2 is headed 'Where competent to act on request' and against item 5 says 'The High Court and the Court of Appeal'. By s 9(2)(b) the 'appropriate authority' to make the request for a circuit judge to sit in the High Court is the Lord Chancellor. By s 9(3)(b) it is the duty of a circuit judge to comply with such a request. There is nothing to suggest that such a request cannot be made ad hoc or orally. In practice, however, the Lord Chancellor, after consultation with the senior judiciary, appoints individual circuit judges as 'section 9 judges' to sit in one or more divisions of the High Court. He has not delegated this function to the presiding judges. Hence there is no suggestion that Toulson J could have requested Judge Davies to sit under s 9. What might have happened had Mrs O'Callaghan instead contacted the judicial appointments branch of the Lord Chancellor's Department one can only speculate, but it seems unlikely that they would have been able to respond favourably in such a short space of time. It follows that the only way in which Toulson J could have given Judge Davies authority to hear this case was by transferring it to the TCC list.

[9] The TCC is not a separate court constituted by statute. It is the modern name, adopted in 1998, for that part of the business of the High Court which was done by official referees. The Supreme Court of Judicature Acts 1873 and 1875 created 'Official Referees of the Supreme Court of Justice' to whom any question could be referred for trial if it involved prolonged investigation of documents or accounts or any scientific or local investigation. Initially they could not give judgment or make orders as to costs, but in the Supreme Court of Judicature Act 1884 they were given power to give a judgment, make orders for costs and exercise all the powers of the High Court in a case referred to them. When the office of circuit judge was created in the Courts Act 1971 it was provided that in future official referees' business would be dealt with by such circuit judges as the Lord Chancellor should determine.

[10] The present legislative provision is contained in s 68(1) of the 1981 Act:

> 'Provision may be made by rules of court as to the cases in which jurisdiction of the High Court may be exercised by—(a) such Circuit judges, deputy Circuit judges or Recorders as the Lord Chancellor may from time to time nominate to deal with official referees' business ...'

That provision was formerly made under RSC Ord 36. Official referees' business included any cause or matter begun in the Chancery or Queen's Bench Division which met the criteria laid down in the 1873 Act or for which trial by an official referee was 'desirable in the interests of one or more of the parties on grounds of expedition, economy or convenience or otherwise'. Cases which were begun in the Chancery or Queen's Bench Division in the usual way could be treated as official referees' business from the outset or transferred to be so dealt with.

[11] The relevant rules are now the CPR. CPR Pt 49 deals with 'Specialist Proceedings'. Rule 49(1) provides that the CPR shall apply to the listed proceedings subject to the provision of the relevant practice direction which applies to those proceedings. The list, in r 49(2)(e), contains 'Technology and Construction Court Business (as defined by the relevant practice direction)'. The relevant practice direction is CPR PD 49C. Paragraph 1.2 defines a 'TCC claim' as one 'which involves issues or questions which are technically complex or for which a trial by a judge of the TCC is for any other reason desirable'. Such claims may now be begun and dealt with either in the High Court or in a county court but unless a judge of the TCC otherwise directs must be dealt with by a judge of the TCC. As before they may be allocated to the TCC at the outset or transferred there later. Paragraph 2.2 provides:

> 'The TCC is a specialist list for the purposes of the CPR Part 30 (Transfer) but no order for the transfer of proceedings from or to the TCC shall be made unless the parties have either: (1) had an opportunity of being heard on the issue, or (2) consented to the order.'

CPR Pt 30 deals with transfers between and within courts. Rule 30.5(2) provides that the court may order proceedings to be transferred to or from a specialist list (though any application for this has to be made to a judge dealing with claims in that list). Rule 30.4(1) provides that where the court orders proceedings to be transferred, the court from which they are transferred must give notice to all parties. The practice direction, CPR PD 30, para 4.1 also provides that the transferring court will immediately send notice of the transfer to the receiving court.

[12] Mr Isaac, on behalf of the appellant, first argued that Toulson J did not in fact transfer the case to the TCC list: that is not what he was asked to do, not therefore what he agreed to do, and not what Judge Davies thought he had done, nor was there any written order or other record made of such a transfer. Mr Isaac concedes, however, that Toulson J had power to order the transfer and the evidence is that this is indeed what Toulson J thought he was doing. This is scarcely surprising, given that he knew that this was the only way in which he could authorise Judge Davies to hear the case.

[13] It is obvious, however, that in making that order, several provisions of the CPR and practice direction were not complied with, principally the requirement in PD 49C, para 2.2 that the parties consent or be given an opportunity to be heard upon such a transfer. The question, therefore, is whether such a failure is so fundamental as to vitiate the transfer or whether it is covered by CPR 3.10:

> 'Where there has been an error of procedure such as a failure to comply with a rule or practice direction—(a) the error does not invalidate any step taken in the proceedings unless the court so orders; and (b) the court may make an order to remedy the error.'

[14] The argument is that there are some failures to comply with the rules, or even the practice directions, which are so fundamental that they cannot be described simply as an 'error of procedure' and r 3.10 cannot apply to them. Some colour is given to that argument in this case by s 68(1) of the 1981 Act, because the jurisdiction of the High Court may only be exercised by the judges nominated to deal with official referees' business in those cases for which provision is made by rules of court. To that extent the rules are conferring a jurisdiction upon a person which he or she would not otherwise have. One problem with that argument is that, as Mr Isaac concedes, there are some breaches of the rules relating to transfer to which r 3.10 does apply. It is difficult therefore to conclude that it cannot cover PD 49C, para 2.2.

[15] The question is more whether in this case it would be wrong for it to do so, so that this court should 'order otherwise'. The failure to afford an opportunity to be heard will sometimes be such a denial of natural justice as to render the application of any such cure completely inappropriate, irrespective of whether the opportunity would have made any difference: refusing to listen to one of the parties during the trial of the action is an obvious example. The failure to afford an opportunity to be heard on a purely procedural matter is less likely to fall into that category but could do so, particularly if the matter cannot be cured by reconsidering the original decision.

[16] More commonly, however, the court will have a discretion whether or not to disapply r 3.10(a) in which a number of factors will have to be balanced. Prominent amongst these will be the prejudice to each party if that does, or does not, happen. There may of course be good reasons to object to a transfer to the TCC list, but in this case its purpose was purely to secure the trial of the action on the date which had already been fixed and for which parties were prepared. This in itself fulfilled the criteria for a transfer to that list. It would be different if such a transfer had been used as a device to enable a judge to try a case which he or she was not qualified to hear: an example might be a complex medical negligence case. But this was the sort of case which this judge was eminently well qualified to hear: it was a straightforward claim for services rendered of the sort that is usually dealt with in a county court. The judge has been nominated to deal with the much more complex cases, often involving difficult points of law as well as fact, which are tried in the TCC. There was no reason not to order a transfer in this case and there is no reason now to think that either party was prejudiced either by the transfer or by not being given an opportunity to be heard on the matter. For us to order otherwise under r 3.10 now would substantially prejudice the successful party. He would be deprived of the benefit of the judgment and put to the trouble and expense of defending himself all over again. It is only if, for example, the alternative was to fix the claimant with the judgment of an unqualified or inappropriate tribunal that a contrary interest should come into the reckoning.

[17] I therefore conclude that the transfer of this case to the TCC list to be heard by Judge Davies was a valid order of the court and effective to give her power to hear it. I do however have considerable sympathy for the appellant. There is little point in having two different courts and an elaborate system for deciding which judge is qualified and suited to hear which sort of case if it can be circumvented in this fashion. It was a fortunate chance that Judge Davies was a nominated TCC judge. It might be thought preferable for the Lord Chancellor to ensure that there are sufficient judges authorised under s 9 of the 1981 Act to cater for emergencies of this sort or alternatively to have an appropriate rapid response system.

ACTS OF A DE FACTO OFFICER

[18] That is sufficient to determine this appeal. Nevertheless, we have heard argument on whether, even if the case had not been validly transferred to the TCC, the judge's order is valid as the act of a de facto officer. This long-standing doctrine of the common law is summarised thus in Wade and Forsyth Administrative Law (8th edn, 2000) pp 291–292:

> 'The acts of an officer or judge may be held to be valid in law even though his own appointment is invalid and in truth he has no legal power at all. The logic of annulling all his acts has to yield to the desirability of upholding them where he has acted in the office under a general supposition of his competence to do so.'

[19] It was held by Sir Jocelyn Simon P in Adams v Adams (A-G intervening) [1970] 3 All ER 572, [1971] P 188 that despite the lack of modern English authority applying the doctrine, it was still part of the English common law (and had been overlooked in R v Cronin [1940] 1 All ER 618). He referred ([1970] 3 All ER 572 at 588, [1971] P 188 at 211) to 'two masterly judgments of great learning', State v Carroll (1871) 38 Conn 449, in the Supreme Court of Connecticut, and Re Aldridge (1897) 15 NZLR 361, in the Court of Appeal of New Zealand, and also to an even more learned article by Sir Owen Dixon, later Chief Justice of Australia, 'De Facto Officers' (first published in Res Judicatae (Melbourne, 1938) reproduced in Woinarski, ed Jesting Pilate (1965) pp 229–237).

[20] Sir Owen explains that the doctrine has its origin in the medieval conception of an office as property, an incorporeal thing, to which the usual principles of the law of property applied. Thus a person who dispossessed another of his office, a disseisor, was nevertheless entitled to exercise the authority of that office, unless and until the disseisee exercised his right of re-entry. Nowadays, the rule is based not on that technicality but on public policy. Sir Owen quotes (p 231) from Curtin v Barton (1893) 139 NY 505 at 511:

> 'When a court with competent jurisdiction is duly established, a suitor who resorts to it for the administration of justice and the protection of private rights should not be defeated or embarrassed by questions relating to the title of the judge, who presides in the court, to his office.'

[21] Despite its technical rationale in the notion of disseisin, the authorities show that the de facto officer must have some basis for his assumption of office, variously expressed as 'colourable title' or 'colourable authority'. Quite what suffices for that purpose has been debated, a particularly broad view being taken in State v Carroll (1871) 38 Conn 449. In that case, the elected judge of the city court not being available, the clerk of the court invited a justice of the peace to act in his place. The report does not reveal whether or not that justice knew that he had no lawful authority to sit. After an extensive review of the authorities,

Butler CJ (at 471–472) summarised the circumstances in which the doctrine would apply:

> 'An officer de facto is one whose acts, though not those of a lawful officer, the law, upon principles of policy and justice, will hold valid so far as they involve the interests of the public and third persons, where the duties of the office were exercised, First, without a known appointment or election, but under such circumstances of reputation or acquiescence as were calculated to induce people, without inquiry, to submit to or invoke his action, supposing him to be the officer he assumed to be. Second, under color of a known and valid appointment or election, but where the officer had failed to conform to some precedent requirement or condition, as to take an oath, give a bond, or the like. Third, under color of a known election or appointment, void because the officer was not eligible, or because there was a want of power in the electing or appointing body, or by reason of some defect or irregularity in its exercise, such ineligibility, want of power, or defect being unknown to the public. Fourth, [under an unconstitutional statute, not relevant here] ...'

The first was sufficient to validate the justice's acts.

[22] But the judge must not be a mere usurper who is known to have no such colourable authority. The doctrine depends upon his having been generally thought to be competent to act and treated as such by those coming before him. The contrast is well illustrated by Re Aldridge (1897) 15 NZLR 361 and Adams v Adams (A-G intervening) [1970] 3 All ER 572, [1971] P 188. Mr Sales also suggests that the doctrine does not apply where the person concerned knows himself to be a usurper even if the litigants appearing before him do not. That is consistent with the approach and dicta in those two cases. It is harder to reconcile with all the authorities, including the robust approach of Lord Denning MR in his dissenting judgment in Re James (an insolvent) (A-G intervening) [1977] 1 All ER 364, [1977] Ch 41, quoted by Ward LJ at [58], below: he would also have applied the doctrine to the facts of Adams' case.

[23] In Re Aldridge (1897) 15 NZLR 361, the New Zealand Court of Appeal applied the doctrine to the acts of Mr Edwards, a barrister who had been appointed as a Supreme Court judge in the proper fashion by the Governor but whose appointment had later been declared invalid by the Privy Council (see Buckley v Edwards [1892] AC 387) because Parliament had only provided for four such judges and he was the fifth. It was argued that the doctrine could not apply where the office to which he had purportedly been appointed did not exist, but the Court of Appeal held otherwise. Prendergast CJ (1897) 15 NZLR 361 at 366) put it this way:

> 'It may be assumed that on the occasion there was a duly-appointed session of the Court; that there was no de jure Judge there; that the officers of the Court and others then present received and treated Mr. Edwards as a Judge of the Supreme Court; that he had prior to the occasion of the then sitting performed judicial acts under the bona fide pretence or colour of being a Judge of the Court; and, in short, that in repute he was on the occasion of the sitting a Judge of the Court.'

[24] The authorities are extensively reviewed in the judgment of Richmond J, who also quotes from State v Carroll. Richmond J observed (at 372):

'It may well be that the principle which validates the acts of a Judge de facto cannot be invoked for their own protection by any who wilfully abuse the office, still less by mere usurpers.'

Similarly, Denniston J (at 379):

'He cannot be termed a usurper of his office, and the result of all the authorities seems to me to be that it is only in the case of a usurper—that is, a person without a colourable title—that judicial acts done in due form in a competent Court are other than valid and unimpeachable.'

Connolly J also referred (at 380) to the fact that Mr Edwards was not a usurper and continued:

'The error in appointing Mr. Edwards as a Judge when there was no judgeship vacant was that of the Governor and his Advisers, and cannot, in my opinion, prejudice the position de facto of his appointee ...'

[25] In Adams v Adams (A-G intervening) [1970] 3 All ER 572, [1971] P 188, however, Sir Jocelyn Simon P declined to recognise a divorce decree granted in Rhodesia by a judge who had been appointed under the constitution adopted in 1965 after the Unilateral Declaration of Independence. The case did not fall within the de facto doctrine 'even so widely stated' as in State v Carroll because the circumstances of his appointment which made it invalid in the eyes of English law were very well known, indeed notorious. Sir Jocelyn Simon P commented ([1970] 3 All ER 572 at 590, [1971] P 188 at 214): '... I can find no trace of its ever being applied during a rebellion to accord recognition to the judicial or official acts or under a usurping power ...'

[26] It is not unknown for statute to provide for this sort of problem expressly. Section 9(1) of the Courts and Legal Services Act 1990 gives power to the Lord Chancellor to direct that certain kinds of family proceedings in the county courts shall be allocated to specified judges or specified descriptions of judges: this is the basis for the system of 'ticketing' judges to hear cases concerning children. Section 9(3) of the 1990 Act provides:

'Where any directions have been given under this section allocating any proceedings to specified judges, the validity of anything done by a judge in, or in relation to, the proceedings shall not be called into question by reason only of the fact that he was not a specified judge.'

[27] This calls to mind the first statute passed after the accession of Edward IV, about which Sir Jocelyn Simon P in Adams' case and Richmond J in Aldridge's case disagreed. According to Richmond J ((1897) 15 NZLR 361 at 369):

'On the accession of Edward IV. the three preceding kings of the Lancastrian line were declared to have been usurpers; which might have occasioned uncertainty as to the validity of judicial acts done by those kings, and by Judges of their appointment. To avoid doubts on this and other cognate subjects, an Act was passed (1 Edward IV.) which declares valid judicial acts, recoveries, and processes in any Court held in the times of Henry IV., Henry V., and Henry VI. (described as "lately kings de facto sed non de jure"), and confirms the commissions of the Judges appointed by those kings, and all processes, determinations, executions, &c., thereto appendant. This Act is declaratory, and is expressed to be, to eschew (eschuer)—i.e. avoid—doubts which might arise; and, accordingly, in Bagot's case ((1469) YB 9 Edw 4) it was treated by both parties and by the Court as merely affirming the common law.' a

[28] Sir Jocelyn Simon P, in Adams' case [1970] 3 All ER 572 at 589–590, [1971] P 188 at 213, did not agree that this statute was merely declaratory; nor was the Act for Confirmation of Judicial Proceedings passed in 1660. But he did not read these as calling in question the general de facto doctrine. He merely regarded them as no exception to the principle which he enunciated, that the doctrine had not been applied to the prejudice of any right of a sovereign. For what it is worth, therefore, I would not regard a provision such as s 9(3) of the 1990 Act as calling in question the continued applicability of the common law doctrine. b

[29] The circumstances of this case clearly do fall within the doctrine. Judge Davies is indeed a judge, validly appointed as such. All those involved in arranging for her to hear this case believed that the case had been properly assigned to her. She herself believed the same. She sat as such and was treated as such by everyone involved. The query raised by Mr Slinn at the outset, to which he received the answer given by the judge, was not such as to deprive her of the de facto authority which flowed from all those circumstances. It could not be said that her want of authority was notorious. c d

[30] It is not necessary to express a view upon whether the doctrine would apply had the circumstances been different. What, for example, would be the case if Mrs O'Callaghan, knowing perfectly well that Judge Davies did not have the requisite ticket, had persuaded her to sit? Would that be covered provided that Judge Davies thought that Mrs O'Callaghan had secured the necessary request from the Lord Chancellor's Department? Would it make any difference if Judge Davies had allowed herself to be persuaded to sit knowing that she should not? From the point of view of the litigants who went through the whole case thinking that she was authorised to hear it, none of this should make any difference at all. However desirable it might be to state the doctrine in such a way as to discourage officials and judges from behaving like this, the public policy considerations which lie behind it point in the other direction. But what if the court usher had been persuaded to sit and everyone in court had behaved as if he were entitled to do so? There must come a point at which, whatever the public perception, there is no basis for applying the de facto doctrine. The dividing line between what is and is not sufficient 'colour' in borderline cases may not be as clear as one would like, but fortunately the point does not arise for decision here. e f g

ARTICLE 6

[31] Under art 6(1) of the convention, everyone is entitled, in the determination of his civil rights and obligations, to a fair hearing before 'an independent and impartial tribunal established by law'. If Judge Davies had not been properly authorised to hear this case, could the court be 'established by law' for this purpose? Mr Sales argues that the de facto doctrine, being itself part of the common law, is sufficient to fulfil this requirement. It is for the national law to determine what is and is not a lawful tribunal. The convention does not impose any particular requirements, other than that it be independent and impartial. Judge Davies was both independent and impartial in this case. h j

[32] Mr Isaac argues that the doctrine is designed to validate the acts of someone who by definition was not legally entitled to perform them rather than to validate the appointment itself. The court cannot therefore be regarded as 'established by law' even if its acts are not susceptible to challenge.

[33] Mr Isaac relies upon the decision of the European Court of Human Rights in Pfeifer v Austria (1992) 14 EHRR 692. Two of the judges who had acted as investigating judges in Mr Pfeifer's case also presided at his trial, despite a clear provision of the Code of Criminal Procedure disqualifying them. Obviously they knew about this. The European Commission of Human Rights (the Commission) dealt with whether the court was 'established by law' separately from whether it was 'impartial' and held that it was not. The court held that the two complaints coincided: the court was not established by law because of the disqualification which national law had imposed so as to remove all reasonable doubt as to the impartiality of trial courts. Hence there was a breach of art 6(1) (and there had not been an effective waiver of the applicant's rights). Not surprisingly, although the object of the ticketing system has nothing to do with avoiding bias, Mr Isaac argues that the lack of proper qualification and authority to try this case should be equated with the disqualification in Pfeifer's case.

[34] Mr Sales points out that there was no Austrian equivalent to the de facto doctrine. This, he argues, does something more than merely validate the acts of an invalid tribunal. It is properly understood as a rule of law which establishes the lawful composition of the court. It determines which tribunals will be recognised as acting legitimately as a court for the purpose of our legal system. This is consistent with the object of the legality requirement in art 6(1) as stated by the Commission in Zand v Austria (1978) 15 DR 70 at 80 (para 69)—

> 'that the judicial organization in a democratic society must not depend on the discretion of the Executive, but that it should be regulated by law emanating from Parliament.'

But this did not mean that Parliament had to regulate every detail: some things could be left to delegated powers of the minister. Holding valid Judge Davies' acts does not improperly expand the power of the executive. It is a judge-made rule designed to protect the interests of the litigants and public generally, and to promote certainty and finality in litigation, which are in themselves legitimate objectives: see Stubbings v UK (1996) 1 BHRC 316. In EE v Federal Republic of Germany App No 18889/91 (14 October 1992, unreported), the Commission had said that it was for the national courts to examine the question of their jurisdiction under national law: they were entitled to conclude that an adult criminal court had not acted arbitrarily (in assuming jurisdiction over someone who had only later claimed to be a juvenile). There is nothing arbitrary about the operation of the rule in this case.

[35] Mr Sales accepts, of course, that the rule must also comply with the usual requirements of accessibility and foreseeability (for which a better word might be predictability). A long-standing rule of the common law is sufficiently accessible even if it is often forgotten (there was no reference to it, for example, in the recent case of Tameside Metropolitan BC v Grant [2002] 3 FCR 238, [2002] Fam 194, where one of the three justices sitting in a family proceedings court was not a member of the family panel). All rules require interpretation to elucidate doubtful points and adapt to changing circumstances. This is acceptable as long as the result is consistent with principle and can reasonably be foreseen (see SW v UK, CR v UK (1995) 21 EHRR 363).

[36] I have no difficulty in concluding that the doctrine is sufficiently accessible and foreseeable. Despite the discussion earlier about the precise scope of the concept of 'colourable title' or 'colourable authority', its determination is no more unpredictable than many other questions in the common law. With rather more hesitation, but assisted by the concept that there must be some basis for the authority assumed by the judge, I also conclude that the rule can be regarded as validating the establishment of the tribunal as well as the acts it performs. It is not there, in modern times, to protect usurpers. Rather it protects the individual citizen, who had good reason to think that he was appearing before a properly constituted court, acted accordingly and should not without more be deprived of the rights he has established as a result.

CONCLUSION

[37] As Mr Sales has been at pains to remind us throughout, the other party to this case has an interest in not being deprived of the benefit of his order and not being made to go through the whole process again unless there was something materially wrong with it. There was nothing materially wrong with this trial and it would be wrong to set it aside.

[38] I would dismiss this appeal.

SEDLEY LJ.

[39] I agree with Hale LJ that Judge Davies had authority de jure to hear the case as a judge of the Technology and Construction Court despite the want of notice of transfer. I agree too, however, that the alternative argument that the judge in any case possessed de facto authority deserves at least provisional attention, and I adopt with gratitude Hale LJ's scholarly account of the law.

[40] If the outcome depended on it I would be troubled nevertheless by Hale LJ's proposition (at [29], above) that the judge's response to Mr Slinn's query about her status—'The matter ... comes before me, sitting as a High Court judge today ...'—was not such as to deprive Judge Davies of the de facto authority flowing from the surrounding circumstances. I entirely agree that the judge's want of authority in that capacity was not notorious; but might it be said that it was or should have been known to her?

[41] None of the reported cases deals in terms with the situation of the judge who is believed by the public and the litigants to have due authority but who himself knows, or ought to know, that he does not. Mr Sales readily accepted in argument that de facto authority should not extend to such a case. In a subsequent written submission he has pointed to passages in Re Aldridge (1897) 15 NZLR 361 which at least lean towards this proposition. Thus Richmond J said (at 372):

> 'It may well be that the principle which validates the acts of a Judge de facto cannot be invoked for their own protection by any who wilfully abuse the office, still less by mere usurpers.'

Denniston J said (at 379):

> '... the result of all the authorities seems to me to be that it is only in the case of a usurper—that is, a person without a colourable title—that judicial acts done in due form in a competent Court are other than valid and unimpeachable.'

All the judges held that Mr Edwards was not a mere usurper. But it is apparent from the report that the claim was based on the non-existence in law of the office to which he had been purportedly appointed. The New Zealand Court of Appeal was not, it seems, invited to consider whether Mr Edwards must have known that he was being appointed to a non-existent office and, if so, whether that made him a usurper.

[42] Mr Sales' further submission that Lord Ellenborough CJ had the same point in mind when he spoke in R v Bedford Level Corp (1805) 6 East 356 at 368–369, 102 ER 1323 at 1328, of a de facto officer as 'one who has the reputation of being the officer he assumes to be' is very doubtful. The primary meaning of 'assume' until relatively recent times was 'claim'.

[43] In the present state of authority the position of the usurper, in the sense of someone who discharges an office in the actual or constructive knowledge that he has no title to it, is in my view uncertain. If the purpose of the de facto doctrine is the maintenance of stability and confidence in the legal system and the prevention of technical disputes about the formalities of appointment, it might well be said that a sufficiently clearly reputed tenure of office should not be open to challenge even on the ground of the purported officer's knowledge of his own incapacity. Yet, as Mr Sales' response on behalf of the Lord Chancellor confirms, it goes entirely against the grain to validate the acts of someone who knows, even if the world does not, that he is not qualified to hold the office he is exercising.

[44] The expression 'colourable authority', upon which some of the decided cases turn, I find opaque. The adjective itself, which (so far as it is used at all) ordinarily connotes something specious and therefore false (see the Oxford English Dictionary entry), has acquired a legal meaning which is almost the opposite: 'Capable of being presented as true or right; having at least a prima facie aspect of justice or validity' (definition 2.b.). This too tends to collapse reality into appearance.

[45] In Millar v Dickson 2000 JC 648, the High Court of Justiciary had to consider the consequences for subsequent convictions and sentences passed by temporary sheriffs of its earlier decision in Starrs v Ruxton, Ruxton v Starrs 2000 JC 208 that a temporary sheriff was not an independent and impartial tribunal. Its decision that the objection had been impliedly waived was overset by the Privy Council in its judgment of 24 July 2001 (Millar v Dickson (Procurator Fiscal, Elgin) [2001] UKPC D4, [2002] 3 All ER 1041, [2002] 1 WLR 1615). But the Scottish court had also dealt with a second argument, namely that the temporary sheriffs were in any event de facto judges and their acts consequently beyond challenge. This argument the High Court of Justiciary rejected, and it was not revived on the appeal to the Privy Council.

[46] The leading opinion, that of Lord Prosser, contains a valuable consideration of the nature and effect of the de facto doctrine in a situation where the most it could achieve was to make unlawful acts unchallengeable by equiparating them with the de jure acts. His conclusion, in which the other judges concurred, was that this could have no bearing where the challenge was not directly to the tribunal but to the Lord Advocate's decision to pursue prosecutions before it. In particular, however, Lord Prosser said (2000 JC 648 at 663 (para 38)):

> 'The fact that the illegality of the prosecution flows from the tribunal not being independent and impartial does not mean that the tribunal itself is tainted with any illegality. The situation is quite different from that which obtains when there is a fundamental nullity, and a want of power which cannot be cured by waiver.'

[47] That Lord Prosser's second category exists seems clearly right in principle, but—and especially if the first proposition is also right—one wants to know what factual situations it embraces. In such a highly problematical area, different objectives of legal and public policy can pull in different directions and legal doctrine begins to verge on the metaphysical. But a point must come at which the undesirability of undoing ostensibly valid judgments has to yield to the greater undesirability of letting unqualified people adjudicate on people's legal rights and obligations.

[48] It is clear that the last word has not been said about this; but the present case fortunately does not depend on the prickly issues which I have been inspecting from the safety of the unassailable proposition that Judge Davies had legal authority to adjudicate.

WARD LJ.

[49] I am extremely grateful to Mr Philip Sales for his very informative skeleton argument submitted on behalf of the Lord Chancellor's Department dealing with the history of official referees' business and its development to the present-day position of the Technology and Construction Court (TCC). Mr Sales, who appeared on the Department's behalf, added to the learning through his researches on the de facto doctrine. It led to a fascinating argument in which Mr Nicholas Isaac as counsel for the appellant played a full part. In the result, I entirely agree with Hale LJ that the appeal must be dismissed for the reasons she gives.

[50] Mr Slinn is understandably bewildered by what happened and by the explanations he has been given for what happened. This court owes him an explanation. The confusion arises because Judge Davies said at the outset of the case coming before her:

> 'The matter is in the High Court, as I understand it, because that is the only basis upon which any judgment could be enforced in Jersey, and otherwise it would not be in the High Court. It comes before me, sitting as a High Court judge today, it being released—having been released to me for the purpose of this hearing.'

[51] Having discovered after the trial that Judge Davies was only authorised to sit in the Family Division of the High Court and not in the Queen's Bench Division, Mr Slinn wrote to Mrs O'Callaghan, the diary manager for that part of the Western Circuit, and complained that the judge had acted without proper authority, that the mere fact that the case was 'released to her' did not in his view give her authority to act in a division of the High Court where she was not authorised. He contended accordingly that the trial was null and void. She replied:

> 'The presiding judge of the Western Circuit Toulson J released the case to Judge Davies in her capacity as a High Court judge. He has authority to nominate a judge for certain cases.'

In her witness statement filed for the purpose of this appeal she acknowledges:

> 'With hindsight I probably ought to have provided a fuller explanation of what had happened but at the time I did not see that Mr Slinn had any real grounds of complaint.'

[52] She has given us that fuller explanation and I have no reason whatever to disbelieve it. Indeed Mr Isaac quite properly did not challenge any of the evidence submitted to us by the Lord Chancellor's Department. Thus the undisputed position is that she knew that Judge Davies was not 'ticketed' for Queen's Bench matters but was ticketed to hear TCC matters. She therefore sought Toulson J's approval for the case to be released to her. The mechanics of the release were by way of the transfer of the matter from the general business of the Queen's Bench Division to the specialist list for proceedings in the TCC (which, as it happens, is still a part of that Division). That is what Toulson J did. He was entitled to do so by virtue of CPR 30.5(2). He ought to have given Mr Slinn the opportunity of being heard as required by CPR PD 49C, para 2.2 but that breach did not invalidate the transfer because of the operation of CPR 3.10(a). For the reasons given by Hale LJ, I, too, would not now order that the error has invalidated the transfer. In the result I am satisfied that Judge Davies was properly authorised to try the action as an appointed judge of the TCC to which the matter had been validly transferred.

[53] I appreciate that such a technical explanation may not satisfy Mr Slinn's legitimate query about the judge's apparent perception, which on the analysis I have just conducted was a wrong perception, that she was 'sitting as a High Court judge', the case having been 'released to me for the purposes of this hearing'. The case may have been 'released' to her, but she was not sitting as a High Court judge, only as a TCC judge. When she was asked to explain that remark, she told a member of the Lord Chancellor's Department that what she had said was in accordance with her understanding of her authority to hear the case. I have no reason whatever to doubt her explanation. I am totally satisfied that she sat genuinely believing she was authorised to do so.

[54] It is easy to see how she could have come to think that. Mrs O'Callaghan did not speak to Judge Davies personally but left a message for her with the listing officer at the Portsmouth Combined Court. It is apparent that at least part of the message was that the case had been released to Judge Davies because approval of that release was what she had sought from and been granted by Toulson J. If told, as she must have been, that the case had been released to her, I can readily understand that she, like most judges, would simply accept what she had been told and would get on with the job she was paid to perform, trying the cases put in front of her. For most judges the 'ticketing' process is an arcane mystery known only to the Lord Chancellor and presiding and liaison judges. It is not within the ken of ordinary mortals. Judges may know they do not have a full s 9 ticket (see s 9 of the Supreme Court Act 1981) but may assume that ad hoc authority can be and has been conferred to cover the trial of a particular case if the presider says that case has been released to that judge. That seems to me to have been Judge Davies' perception.

[55] It is not clear from Mrs O'Callaghan's evidence whether the listing officer in Portsmouth was told that the mechanism of the release was by way of transfer of the case to the TCC. Even if it was explained, I am not at all surprised that the listing officer would not have grasped the technicalities or conveyed them to Judge Davies. I am quite sure that if the judge had been told or had appreciated what had actually happened she would have said so. There was no reason not to do so. She would have explained that the transfer solved both problems. It was an expedient device which not only kept the case in the Queen's Bench Division for enforcement purposes but also made available a judge qualified to try the matter and so saved the fixture.

[56] In my judgment none of this speculation really matters. The two points upon which I am utterly clear are: (i) this was not an invalid transfer to the TCC in which the judge was authorised to sit and for that reason the judgment is not a nullity; (ii) the judge genuinely believed that, one way or another, she was authorised to hear this case.

[57] The former conclusion is the end of the appeal, but I am prepared to deal with Mr Slinn's anxiety that if she was sitting as a judge of the Queen's Bench Division and was not authorised to exercise that jurisdiction, then the invalidity in her appointment should nullify her judgment. There is some authority for that proposition that I have been able to trace. In R v Cronin [1940] 1 All ER 618 the appellant had been convicted at a borough quarter session presided over by a person appointed to act as a deputy recorder. This deputy was not, and never had been, a barrister as was required: he was a solicitor. The Court of Criminal Appeal held that the proceedings were void ab initio. I regard that decision to be of doubtful authority as no argument was addressed to the court on the application of the de facto doctrine. The deputy recorder, like Judge Davies in the circumstances postulated by Mr Slinn and assumed for the purpose of this argument was, in the words of Lord Ellenborough CJ in R v Bedford Level Corp (1805) 6 East 356 at 368–369, 102 ER 1323 at 1328: 'An officer ... who has the reputation of being the officer he assumes to be, and yet is not a good officer in point of law.'

[58] There is an interesting discussion on the application of the doctrine by Lord Denning MR in Re James (an insolvent) (A-G intervening) [1977] 1 All ER 364, [1977] Ch 41. Even if Geoffrey Lane LJ did not totally agree, Scarman LJ found it unnecessary to comment on Adams v Adams (A-G intervening) [1970] 3 All ER 572, [1971] P 188 which met with Lord Denning MR's criticism. Lord Denning MR said ([1977] 1 All ER 364 at 373, [1977] Ch 41 at 65–66):

> 'I cannot think it right that the validity of a divorce should depend on which particular judge hears the case. The decision [in Adams' case], if correct, applies to any case coming before the High Court of Rhodesia during the interregnum. It makes the validity depend on which particular judge makes any particular order. That seems to me absurd. Not only absurd, but quite unjust. When a person applies after UDI to the court in Rhodesia seeking justice, he cannot choose his judge. He cannot say whether his case will come in front of a judge of that court who was appointed before UDI or a judge who was appointed afterwards. He may not even be able to find out. At any rate, he cannot say, "I will not have Mr Justice Beck—I want Mr Justice Goldin". Simple justice demands that it should make no difference. No matter by whom the man was appointed a judge, no matter at what date he was appointed, he is sitting as a judge of the court and the order made by him is an order of the High Court of Rhodesia. He sits in the seat of a judge. He wears the robes of a judge. He holds the office of a judge. Maybe he was not validly appointed. [I add the emphasis for Mr Slinn's benefit.] But, still, he holds the office. It is the office that matters, not the incumbent. I remember when I was first appointed a judge, a senior but disappointed member of the Bar raised his hat to me, saying: "I raise my hat, if not to you, at any rate to the office." So long as the man holds the office, and exercises it duly and in accordance with law, his orders are not a nullity. If they are erroneous, they may be upset on appeal. But if not erroneous, they should be upheld. Such is the theme which runs through the important case in the Supreme Court of Connecticut: [State v Carroll (1871) 38 Conn 449]; and the Court of Appeal in New Zealand in Re Aldridge ((1897) 15 NZLR 361). The point is well put in the United States Court, Norton v

Shelby County ((1886) 118 US 425 at 444–445): "Where an office exists under the law, it matters not how the appointment of the incumbent is made, so far as the validity of his acts are concerned. It is enough that he is clothed with the insignia of the office, and exercises its powers and functions ... The official acts of such persons are recognized as valid on grounds of public policy, and for the protection of those having official business to transact." In the light of these cases, I think the decision of the Court of Criminal Appeal in R v Cronin ([1940] 1 All ER 618) was wrongly decided. So was Adams' case ([1970] 3 All ER 572, [1971] P 188).'

[59] I am quite satisfied that even if there were some defect in the appointment of Judge Davies, the de facto doctrine operates so as to protect her judgment from the charge that it was invalid.

[60] It is, therefore, quite unnecessary to speculate about the position of the impostor or the judge who acts in bad faith but very interesting questions would arise in either of the fanciful scenarios where: (i) the usher with delusions of grandeur locks the new recorder in his room and takes his place on the Bench; or (ii) the new recorder, on his first outing and being ever anxious to please the county court where he is to sit for the first time, is prevailed upon to do everybody a favour and hear the Queen's Bench action next door knowing full well it is beyond his jurisdiction. We all have experience (in courts other than our own, of course!) of fire-breathing listing officers who must be obeyed and we know how hard it is to refuse them.

[61] We have not had full argument on these questions which do not arise in this appeal and what follows is my tentative first impression. In the former case the 'judge' is not a judge at all, has no colour of office and cannot assume it. For what it is worth, I would treat the judgment as a nullity. In the latter case a 'proper' judge knew he was exceeding his jurisdiction. There would be a clash of two principles of public policy—the need for certainty which underpins the de facto doctrine, and the need for justice to be administered by judges who are honest and impartial. The judgment of a judge infected with actual bias would probably be a nullity. I noted in Millar v Dickson (Procurator Fiscal, Elgin) [2001] UKPC D4, [2002] 3 All ER 1041, [2002] 1 WLR 1615, to which Sedley LJ has referred, an observation of Lord Prosser in Starrs v Ruxton, Ruxton v Starrs 2000 JC 208 at 232: 'I would regard the concept of a partial judge as a contradiction in terms.' So too a judge who knows he is not a judge authorised to exercise the judicial function in the trial or matter before him. His judgment would be 'a decision that never was' of the kind contemplated by Lord Donaldson of Lymington MR in Daisystar Ltd v Town and Country Building Society, Townroots Ltd v Raja [1992] 2 All ER 321 at 324, [1992] 1 WLR 390 at 394.

[62] Having warned myself that it is idle to speculate, I should heed my own warning and say no more than that I agree that the appeal should be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

Kate O'Hanlon Barrister.

Batchelor v Marlow and another

[2001] EWCA Civ 1051

COURT OF APPEAL, CIVIL DIVISION

HENRY, TUCKEY AND KAY LJJ

28 JUNE 2001

Easement – Right to park cars – Claimant owning land which could accommodate parking for no more than six cars – Judge holding that defendants had right to park six cars on land during working hours – Whether right capable of existing as easement.

The defendants, who ran a garage business, parked cars on land belonging to the claimant. No more than six cars could be parked on the land. In proceedings between the parties, the defendants asserted that they had an easement to park and store cars on the land. The judge held that they had acquired an exclusive prescriptive right to park six cars on the land between 8.30 am and 6.00 pm Monday to Friday in connection with their business. In so holding, the judge concluded that such a right was capable of subsisting as an easement since, being limited in time, it did not, as a matter of degree, amount to such exclusion of the claimant as to preclude the right from subsisting. The claimant appealed.

Held – The right found to exist by the judge was not capable of being an easement. The claimant had no use of the land for parking during the whole of the time that parking space was likely to be needed. Moreover, his right to use his land for any other purpose was curtailed altogether for intermittent periods throughout the week. Such a restriction would have made his ownership of the land illusory. The appeal would, accordingly, be allowed (see [18]–[21], below).

Notes

For ownership and exclusive use, see 14 Halsbury's Laws (4th edn) para 34.

Cases referred to in judgments

Bilkus v London Borough of Redbridge (1968) 207 EG 803.

Copeland v Greenhalf [1952] 1 All ER 809, [1952] Ch 488.

Dyce v Lady James Hay (1852) 1 Macq 305, HL.

London and Blenheim Estates v Ladbroke Retail Parks Ltd [1993] 1 All ER 307, [1992] 1 WLR 1278; affd [1993] 4 All ER 157, [1994] 1 WLR 31, CA.

Cases also cited or referred to in skeleton arguments

A-G of Southern Nigeria v John Holt & Co (Liverpool) Ltd [1915] AC 599, [1914–15] All ER Rep 444, PC.

Barings plc (No 2), Re, Secretary of State for Trade and Industry v Baker [1999] 1 All ER 311, [1999] 1 WLR 1985, CA.

Crawley BC v Hickmet Ltd (1997) 75 P&CR 500, CA.

Johnson v Gore Wood & Co (a firm) [2001] 1 All ER 481, [2002] 2 AC 1, [2001] 2 WLR 72, HL.

Leon Asper Amusements Ltd v Northmain Carwash & Enterprises Ltd (1996) 56 DLR (2d) 173, Manitoba QB.

Marlow v Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions [2000] CA Transcript 686.

Miller v Emcer Products Ltd [1956] 1 All ER 237, [1956] Ch 304, [1956] 2 WLR 267, CA.

Newman v Jones (22 March 1982, unreported), ChD.

Appeal

William Batchelor appealed with permission of Mummery LJ granted on 8 August 2000 from the decision of Nicholas Warren QC sitting as a deputy judge of the Chancery Division on 11 May 2000 declaring that his entitlement to be registered as proprietor of freehold land known as Albert Road, Sutton, Surrey was subject to the right of the respondents, Peter Robert Marlow and Patricia June Marlow, to park up to six cars on a specified part of the property between the hours of 8.30 am and 6 pm on working days. The facts are set out in the judgment of Tuckey LJ.

Bridget Williamson (instructed by Penningtons, Newbury) for the appellant.

Mark West (instructed by WH Matthews & Co, Kingston-upon-Thames) for the respondents.

TUCKEY LJ (giving the first judgment at the invitation of Henry LJ).

[1] Albert Road in Sutton is an unadopted dirt road which now belongs to the appellant, Mr Batchelor. The public right of way over this road does not however extend to its whole width. The appeal concerns an L-shaped strip of land to the south and west of the public highway, effectively its verge. This land is shown marked pink on the large scale plan which we have been given.

[2] Mr Nicholas Warren QC, sitting as a deputy judge of the Chancery Division ([2001] RTR 175), held that the respondents, who run a nearby garage business, had acquired an exclusive prescriptive right to park up to six cars on the pink land between 8.30 am and 6 pm Monday to Friday. The appellant contends, firstly, that such a right is not capable of being a valid easement and in any event that the judge's findings of fact did not justify the conclusion that such a right had been acquired. We have only heard argument on the first point.

[3] It is common ground that only six cars can be parked on the pink land. If the respondents' right to park in this way is upheld, the adjoining land, which does not belong to the appellant, will probably not be able to be developed since the present planning permission for its development requires the pink land to be used as a small roundabout or turning circle in connection with the development.

[4] In the proceedings the respondents asserted rights to park and store cars on the pink land and other parts of the appellant's land along Albert Road. It was common ground that a right to park could exist as an easement but there was some argument before the judge as to whether such a right could be acquired by prescription. The judge stated his conclusion about this as follows (at 186):

> '35 ... obviously the evidence has to establish the right claimed: there may be difficulties in establishing a prescriptive easement of a detailed nature which could be created by express grant ...
>
> 36 However ... if the evidence does establish use which is consistent and only consistent with a right which, if it had been expressly granted, would have been capable of subsisting as an easement, the court should recognise that right as capable of being established by prescription.' a

[5] This conclusion is not challenged, although Miss Williamson, for the appellant, argues that when one comes to consider whether the right asserted was capable of being an easement it was relevant to take account of the fact that it had been acquired by prescription. Thus she submitted a clear distinction should be drawn between cases where there was an express grant over land designated and/or laid out for parking and cases where the right had been acquired by prescription and therefore without the actual consent of the owner of the servient tenant and over land which had not been so designated or laid out. b

[6] For the purpose of this case I do not think it is necessary to decide whether Miss Williamson is right about this. I shall proceed on the assumption that there is no difference between the two situations for the simple reason that once the right is established the route by which that has been done does not matter. c

[7] In dealing with the point at issue on this appeal the judge simply said (at 190 (para 44)):

'... I consider that the exclusive right to park six cars during normal business hours on Mondays to Fridays in connection with the business carried on [by the respondents] is capable of subsisting as an easement ... In my judgment, such a right, being limited as it is in time, does not, as a matter of degree, amount to such exclusion of the claimant and his predecessors in title as to preclude it subsisting as an easement.' d e

[8] Earlier in his judgment he referred to the authorities and accepted that the question he had to answer was one of degree. This followed the approach adopted by Judge Paul Baker QC in London and Blenheim Estates v Ladbroke Retail Parks Ltd [1993] 1 All ER 307 at 317, [1992] 1 WLR 1278 at 1288 who, after reviewing the earlier authorities on car parking, said: f

'The essential question is one of degree. If the right granted in relation to the area over which it is to be exercisable is such that it would leave the servient owner without any reasonable use of his land whether for parking or anything else, it could not be an easement, though it might be some larger or different grant.' g

[9] It was common ground before us that that was the essential question in this case and that there was no authority which provided the answer to it.

[10] The underlying principle is set out in Gale on Easements (17th edn, 2002) p 30 (para 1-52) which says: h

'... an easement ... involves a diminution of natural rights of ownership, and a grant under which the proprietary rights of the so-called servient owner are either shared or usurped cannot create an easement. For instance, "no man can be considered to have a right of property, worth holding, in a soil over which the whole world has the privilege to walk and disport itself at pleasure". The line is difficult to draw, and each new case would probably be decided on its own facts in the light of common sense.' j

[11] The authority for this proposition is cited as Dyce v Lady James Hay (1852) 1 Macq 305 at 309 where the House of Lords said:

'There can be no prescriptive right in the nature of a servitude or easement so large as to preclude the ordinary uses of property by the owner of the lands affected.'

[12] That case was referred to by Upjohn J in the well-known case of Copeland v Greenhalf [1952] 1 All ER 809, [1952] Ch 488 about which considerable argument was addressed to us. Miss Williamson relied on it because she said the facts were similar to those in our case and the judge had held that the rights asserted were not capable of being easements because they would deprive the servient owner of any reasonable use of his land. Mr West, for the respondents, said that the facts were not similar and the judge only decided that the rights asserted were too uncertain to amount to an easement.

[13] In view of the fact that the parties are agreed what the right question is and that the answer to it depends upon the facts of each case, I see no need to grapple with these arguments, other than to say that I think it is clear from his judgment that Upjohn J rejected the claim because the rights asserted were both uncertain and too extravagant.

[14] Mr West referred us to the facts in London and Blenheim Estates v Ladbroke Retail Parks Ltd [1993] 1 All ER 307, [1992] 1 WLR 1278 and in Bilkus v London Borough of Redbridge (1968) 207 EG 803, in an attempt to demonstrate that the courts were prepared to uphold extravagant easements to park. I do not think however that these cases help. The nature of the right considered by the judge in the Blenheim Estates case is not at all clear. In Bilkus' case the court had to construe the terms of a covenant given by the council to the claimant. It was not a case about easements at all, although the judge did characterise the covenant as an easement. I suspect that the covenant in that case fell within Judge Paul Baker QC's category of 'some larger or different grant'.

[15] After that short diversion I return to the question which has to be answered in this case. Does an exclusive right to park six cars for nine-and-a-half hours every day of the working week leave the appellant without any reasonable use of his land, whether for parking or anything else?

[16] Miss Williamson emphasises the fact that the right asserted is exclusive of all others, including the appellant. Car parking over the whole of the land is highly intrusive because no other use can be made of it when cars are parked on it. In practice it prevents the appellant from making any use of his land and makes his ownership of it illusory. Not so, says Mr West. Mathematically the respondents only have use of the land for 47-and-a-half hours per week, whereas the appellant has 120-and-a-half hours. He suggests various uses which the appellant could make of the land. He could sell it to the respondents or charge them for using it outside business hours, if that is what they wanted. Outside those hours he could park on the land himself or charge others for doing so. He would be able to concrete over the surface of the land without interfering with the right.

[17] I think these suggestions demonstrate the difficulties which Mr West faces. Sale to the respondents would amount to a recognition that the rights they asserted had given them in practice a beneficial interest and no doubt the price would reflect this fact. The appellant could of course park himself at night or the weekends but the commercial scope for getting others to pay for doing so must be very limited indeed. I cannot see how the appellant would benefit from concreting over the land, although this would certainly enhance the respondents' right.

[18] If one asks the simple question: 'Would the appellant have any reasonable use of the land for parking?' the answer, I think, must be 'No'. He has no use at all during the whole of the time that parking space is likely to be needed. But if one asks the question whether the appellant has any reasonable use of the land for any other purpose, the answer is even clearer. His right to use his land is curtailed altogether for intermittent periods throughout the week. Such a restriction would, I think, make his ownership of the land illusory.

[19] I therefore accept Miss Williamson's submissions on this aspect of the case. It follows that I do not think the right found to exist by the judge was capable of being an easement. In reaching this conclusion I am of course differing from the judge to whom I should pay tribute for his detailed and clear judgment in which he resolved a number of issues which are not the subject of this appeal. On the issue with which we are concerned, however, it does not seem to me from the passage which I have cited from his judgment that the judge fully realised the implications of his finding upon the appellant's right to make use of his own land. For these reasons I would allow this appeal.

KAY LJ.

[20] I agree.

HENRY LJ.

[21] I also agree.

Appeal allowed.

Alexander Horne Barrister.

Mulvaney v Gough and others

[2002] EWCA Civ 1078

COURT OF APPEAL, CIVIL DIVISION

SIMON BROWN, MANCE AND LATHAM LJJ

8, 24 JULY 2002

Easement – Communal garden – Right to enjoy communal garden – Whether right to enjoy communal garden totally excluding any use of land by owners

The claimant owned one of a group of cottages. The defendants owned the land behind the cottages, which had long been used by all the cottage owners as their back yard and communal garden. The claimant cultivated a garden, consisting of a flower bed and a grassed area, on part of the land. The defendants, who intended to gravel the surface to create vehicular access to adjoining land, removed the flower bed and part of the grass. In response, the claimant commenced proceedings for a declaration that she was entitled to rights over the land for the purposes of cultivating, mowing and otherwise enjoying it. The defendants contended that the right claimed effectively excluded them from any use of the land, and was for that reason incapable of being an easement. The district judge, concluding that the use claimed was long established and capable of being an easement, granted a declaration that the claimant was entitled to reinstate and maintain the flower bed. That decision was affirmed by the circuit judge. The defendants appealed to the Court of Appeal.

Held – The claimant was entitled to a right to use the land as a communal garden for recreational and amenity purposes, along with the other cottage owners. That right did not exclude the defendants from any use that they might want to make of the land. It restricted that use only to the extent necessary to ensure that the land, as a whole, could still be used as a communal garden. However, the district judge's declaration had gone further than had been necessary to reflect the right which had been established on the evidence. In so far as it suggested that the claimant had the right to the restoration of the flower bed, in the sense that the existence of the flower bed in that position had been the consequence of the right which the district judge concluded had been established, it was wrong. Whether any particular proposal by the defendants to create a driveway would substantially interfere with the claimant's rights would be a matter for consideration of all the facts. If, however, the defendants wished to carry out any works on the land, they would have to do so in a way that would substantially maintain its character as a communal garden for recreational and amenity purposes. It followed that the appeal would be allowed only to the extent of amending the declaration to reflect the right that had been established (see [24]–[27], [29]–[31], below).

Re Ellenborough Park, Re Davies (decd), Powell v Maddison [1955] 3 All ER 667 considered.

Notes

For ownership and exclusive use, see 14 Halsbury's Laws (4th edn) para 34.

Cases referred to in judgments

Batchelor v Marlow [2001] EWCA Civ 1051, [2003] 4 All ER 78, [2003] 1 WLR 764, CA.

Copeland v Greenhalf [1952] 1 All ER 809, [1952] Ch 488.

Dyce v Lady Hay (1852) 1 Macq 305, HL.

Ellenborough Park, Re, Re Davies (decd), Powell v Maddison [1955] 3 All ER 667, [1956] Ch 131, [1955] 3 WLR 892, CA; affg [1955] 2 All ER 38, [1956] 1 Ch 131, [1955] 3 WLR 91.

Grigsby v Melville [1973] 1 All ER 385, [1972] 1 WLR 1355; affd [1973] 3 All ER 455, [1974] 1 WLR 80, CA.

London and Blenheim Estates Ltd v Ladbroke Retail Parks Ltd [1993] 1 All ER 307, [1992] 1 WLR 1278; affd [1993] 4 All ER 157, [1994] 1 WLR 31, CA.

Wright v Macadam [1949] 2 All ER 565, [1949] 2 KB 744, CA.

Appeal

Colin Gough, Bryan Holmes, Thomas Holmes and Emily Jackson appealed with permission of Longmore LJ granted on 20 September 2001 from the decision of Judge Kershaw QC in the Preston County Court on 16 July 2001 dismissing their appeal from the order of District Judge Ashton on 9 November 2000 declaring that the respondent, Elizabeth Carole Rachel Mulvaney, was entitled to reinstate and maintain a flower bed on land owned by the appellants which was adjacent to her own property. The facts are set out in the judgment of Latham LJ.

Sean Kelly (instructed by Jobling & Knape, Carnforth) for the appellants.

Jonathan Gaunt QC and Mark Harper (instructed by Oglethorpe Sturton & Gillibrand, Lancaster) for the respondent.

Cur adv vult

24 July 2002. The following judgments were delivered.

LATHAM LJ (giving the first judgment at the invitation of Simon Brown LJ).

[1] This appeal is concerned with an easement to which the respondent claims that she is entitled over land adjacent to her cottage, 7 East View, Galgate, Lancashire. Her cottage is one of a group of cottages which forms a block shaped like a reversed 'L', with the west aspect of the 'L' facing Chapel Street, and the southern side being bordered by a lane running east to west at right angles from Chapel Street. The respondent's property is the easternmost cottage. It lies on the junction between the lane and a strip of land running along the east side of her property of at least carriageway width which emerges onto open land on the north. Behind the cottages, within the confines of the inverted 'L', and emerging onto that strip of land is an area which forms the back yard of the cottages. The dispute is over the extent of the respondent's rights to use the back yard and the strip of land which are owned by the appellants. I shall refer to the back yard and the strip of land together as the 'blue land'.

[2] The cottages and the blue land were at one time owned by the appellants' predecessor in title, Joseph Holmes, who died on 5 December 1950. The cottages were gradually sold off. When the respondent's cottage was sold in 1970, the conveyance included—

> 'a right of way at all time and for all purposes in common with the vendors and all persons having the like right over and above the open yard adjoining the said premises and coloured blue on the said plan ("the blue land").'

[3] The respondent, however, claims that the right appurtenant to her cottage is more extensive by reason of the use of the blue land that has been made over the years. She had tended a garden on the strip of land consisting of a grassed area and a flower bed abutting the wall along the east side of the strip. On 11 April 1996, she returned to her cottage to find that a JCB had been used to remove the flower bed and part of the grassed surface of that area. The appellants were clearly seeking to exercise what they believed were their rights over that strip of land in order to create vehicular access to land both to the north and to the east. They were intending to gravel its surface, and had deposited gravel for that purpose. From the relevant dimensions set out on a plan with which we have been provided they clearly considered that they would be unable to obtain sufficient width for vehicular access unless the flower bed was removed, particularly as the respondent's back door opens outwards onto the strip of land.

[4] The respondent commenced proceedings claiming a declaration that she was entitled to 'freehold rights' over the blue land 'for the purposes of cultivating, mowing and otherwise enjoying the same and hanging washing' being a right acquired by use and passing as part of the title under s 62 of the Law of Property Act 1925. The appellants contended that the right claimed could not exist as an easement as it was so extensive that it amounted to nothing less than the right to shared possession of the blue land, so that, accordingly, the respondent was only entitled to the express grant of the right of way recorded in the conveyance to which I have referred. This argument was later modified to assert that the right claimed effectively excluded the appellants from any use of the land, and was for that reason incapable of amounting to an easement.

[5] The action was heard as a fast-track case by District Judge Ashton in the first instance. He heard the evidence and concluded that the use claimed was a long-established use and was capable of amounting to an easement. On 9 November 2000, he granted a declaration that the respondent was entitled to reinstate and maintain the flower bed in question. The appellants appealed. The appeal was heard by Judge Kershaw QC as a review of the district judge's decision; and he dismissed the appeal on 16 July 2001. He held that the facts found by the district judge were sufficient to found an easement known to law. The question before us is whether he was right.

[6] The relevant findings of fact were set out in the judgment of District Judge Ashton; it is necessary to set these out in some detail. He said:

> 'This case concerns the environment of a cottage known as 7 East View, Galgate, Lancashire, owned and occupied by the claimant. It is one of a group of cottages situated in East View and Chapel Street with an enclosed back yard. Most if not all of these cottages have been provided with modern amenities but they were originally served by water closets in the yard and such buildings still exist, although now used for other purposes if at all. The cottages were acquired by Joseph Holmes in 1932 and occupied by tenants, but following his death in 1950 the trustees of the estate have progressively sold them and some have changed hands several times since. Although rights were not always expressed in the same way, the policy of the trustees was (when possible) to sell just the cottages with rights over the yard and to retain ownership of the water closets. Thus when 7 East View (the [respondent's] cottage) was sold off to Mrs Plahatu in 1970 the conveyance merely included "a right of way at all times for all purposes in common with the vendors or persons having the like right over and upon the open yard adjoining the said premises coloured blue on the said plans". Yet in 1959 when 1 East View was sold the conveyance had included, in addition to express water supply and coal bunker rights: "... A right of way and of use for drying purposes, over and in the said yard ... upon payment of a proportionate part of the expense of repairing and maintaining the same." And there was the standard agreement and declaration that all easements and quasi-easements should remain as they existed under one ownership. In 1974 when 9 Chapel Street was sold such provisions were reduced to: "The joint use of the yard or ground to the rear of the said property coloured blue on the said plan." One may wonder whether any distinction was intended, but in practice none was adopted by the residents and development of the yard by the owners would be effectively prevented by the terms of the conveyance of 1950 (of which there were several). The many witness statements from existing and former residents testify not only to a "communal" yard on "the blue land" but also to happy relationships between all residents. I am satisfied that over the decades, and certainly predating these sales, the entirety of the yard was used by the residents as amenity and garden land on a shared basis. That would have been the intention when the cottages were built in the nineteenth century and the way it was occupied when in common ownership. Nothing appears to have been done when the cottages were sold off to prevent this long-established regime from continuing and no distinction appears to have been made as regards any part of the land invariably shown coloured blue on these deeds. The evidence shows certain "ground rules" or understandings grew out of the need to avoid anarchy and this included provision of washing lines, space for dustbins and allocation of small flower beds so that the yard would resemble a domestic garden and be more attractive as an amenity enjoyed by all. To the extent the late Joseph Holmes and subsequently the trustees continued to own some of these properties they must have known and indeed acquiesced in what was going on and benefited from the higher prices that would be obtained when they came to sell individual properties. Whilst the yard regime was not spelt out in conveyances it was recounted to prospective purchasers and I am satisfied that there was no systematic attempt by either the Holmes family to inform initial and successive owners that all this was done with their permission which could be revoked at any time on a whim. Purchasers were inclined to take the situation on trust and not to insist that it was spelt out in the deeds. In so far as pieces of land were allocated for cultivation adjacent to each cottage this was part of the overall scheme. Acceptance by all would be essential because these small flower beds inevitably obstructed the mutual rights of way over the yard. Whilst each registered resident could say: "That is my garden", this would not be a claim to legal ownership but allocation as part of the overall scheme of the communal garden. During some period one occupier may have less time or be uninterested in the chore of garden maintenance and I have no doubt that an informal arrangement would be made with someone else for the upkeep of the allocated land. But generally each flower bed was regarded as being attributed to a particular cottage. The unallocated part of the yard was grassed over and there is evidence that people took it in turns to cut this and keep it tidy. There is an abundance of evidence, collected by the [respondent] in the form of both statements and photographs, of the enjoyment of the communal yard—now a garden—by the residents over many years. There is also evidence of steps being taken by certain residents to question anyone who "trespassed" there ... I am satisfied that these communal rights have been acquired by prescription over the "blue land" by the [respondent] and those property owners to whom express rights as joint user were not granted. This long-standing basis of user and occupation with the cottages does not depend upon the express consent of the Holmes family as they now seek to allege. It is the de facto situation based upon more than 50 years' history ... The evidence of an already established communal yard is uncontested, not contestable now by reason of consent and not negatived by any express provision in [the respondent's] conveyance. At the very least this claimant will enjoy rights over the blue land equivalent to those expressed in the 1974 conveyance, that is joint use of the entire yard shown coloured blue on the plan. The nature and extent of that joint use depends upon what has been going on in the previous year and has continued during the 30 years since her cottage was sold off. There is no question but that the flower border on the passage adjacent to the cottage was part of the established scheme of things so that the [appellants] were not entitled to summarily remove it in 1996. The [respondent] has status to assert and protect the communal rights.'

[7] The district judge's reasons for granting a more restricted declaration than that which the respondent claimed was set out in a later passage in his judgment in which he said:

'There is also the question of the removal of the grass surface of the passage, being that part of the blue land between the [respondent's] flower bed and her cottage. The passage is part of the right of way enjoyed by all the cottages as an essential means of gaining direct access to the communal yard and their back doors. This area is more of an access road than the enclosed yard and the surface does not have to be grass. Although I condemn the manner in which the [appellants] removed this surface I am not, in the exercise of any discretion I may have, prepared to grant any relief to the claimant provided that the [appellants] now resurface this land in an acceptable manner so it can again be used as a right of way in all weather.'

[8] The appellants appealed to the circuit judge on a number of grounds, only one of which was pursued. It was in the following terms:

'The district judge erred in law in finding that a right to cultivate the common garden, hang washing and generally enjoy land was capable of existing as an easement and/or was capable of being acquired by prescription or implied grant.'

[9] The circuit judge, on those facts, held that the respondent had established a right known to law over the blue land, which he described as a right to use the land as a communal garden. The grounds of appeal to this court are that—

'The judge erred in law in holding that the right claimed by the [respondent] that is to say the right in common with the owners of the freehold properties surrounding the freehold land shown edged in blue and hatched black on the plan annexed to the defence ("the blue land") to use the blue land as their communal garden was capable of existing as an easement and/or could be acquired by prescription or implied grant.' a

[10] The appellants accept that the findings of fact made by District Judge Ashton were sufficient to justify his conclusion that, if the use made of the blue land was capable of amounting to an easement, it had continued for sufficiently long to entitle the respondent to that easement either by prescription or implied grant under s 62 of the 1925 Act. It was submitted, however, that the easement as defined by the district judge and Judge Kershaw was so extensive as to amount, in effect, to a claim to use the land to the exclusion of the appellants, and was an attempt to dress up a claim for adverse possession, which could not succeed because of the shared nature of the use, as a claim for an easement. It was submitted that such an extensive use could not be justified as an easement even if the subject of an express grant, but certainly could not be created by way of prescription. We were referred to the House of Lords decision in Dyce v Lady Hay (1852) 1 Macq 305, in which the side note reads as follows: b c

'There can be no prescriptive right in the nature of a servitude or easement so large as to preclude the ordinary uses of property by the owner of the lands affected. Semble—That where a claim in the nature of a servitude or easement is incapable of judicial control and restriction, it cannot be sustained by prescription. It does not follow that rights sustainable by grant are necessarily sustainable by prescription.' d

[11] This principle was applied by Upjohn J in Copeland v Greenhalf [1952] 1 All ER 809, [1952] Ch 488. In that case the plaintiff was the owner of an orchard, access to which was over a strip of land owned by the plaintiff. The defendant was a wheelwright, whose premises were opposite to the strip of land across a road, also owned by the plaintiff. The plaintiff brought an action against the defendant claiming to restrain him from placing and leaving vehicles on the strip. The defendant's claim was, as proved at the trial, that for 50 years he and his father before him had with the knowledge of the plaintiff and of her predecessors in title, continuously stored along the strip, except for a space left for access to the orchard, customers' vehicles awaiting and undergoing repair, and awaiting collection after repair. The judge held that the right exercised and claimed was too extensive to constitute an easement in law as it amounted practically to a claim to the whole beneficial use of that part of the strip of land over which it had been exercised. Upjohn J said ([1952] 1 All ER 809 at 812–813, [1952] Ch 488 at 498): e f g

'... in my judgment the right claimed here goes wholly outside any normal idea of an easement, that is, a right of the occupier of a dominant tenement over a servient tenement. This claim really amounts to a claim to a joint user of the land by the defendant. Practically he is claiming the whole beneficial user of the strip of land on the south-east side of the track so that he can leave there as many or as few lorries as he likes for any time that he likes and enter on it by himself, his servants and agents, to do repair work. In my judgment, that is not a claim which can be established as an easement. It is virtually a claim to possession, if necessary to the exclusion of the owner, or, at any rate, to a joint user, and no authority has been cited to me which would justify me in coming to the conclusion that a right of this wide and undefined nature can be the proper subject-matter of an easement. It seems to me that for this claim to succeed it must really amount to a right of possession by long h j adverse possession. I say nothing, of course, as to the creation of such rights by grant or by covenant. I am dealing solely with the question of a claim arising by prescription.'

[12] The appellants accept that this court has held in Re Ellenborough Park, Re Davies (decd), Powell v Maddison [1955] 3 All ER 667, [1956] Ch 131 that an express grant of the right to the enjoyment of a communal garden can constitute an easement. In that case the owners of Ellenborough Park sold off surrounding plots of land also owned by them by conveyances which granted each purchaser—

'the full enjoyment ... at all times hereafter in common with the other persons to whom such easements may be granted of the pleasure ground [the park] ... but subject to the payment of a fair and just proportion of the costs charges and expenses of keeping in good order and condition the said pleasure ground ...' (See [1955] 3 All ER 667 at 674, [1956] Ch 131 at 165.)

[13] The vendors covenanted to keep the park as an ornamental pleasure ground. Amongst the issues raised on the appeal from the decision of Danckwerts J ([1955] 2 All ER 38, [1956] 1 Ch 131) that this created an easement known to law, was the argument that the dominant owners' rights were too wide and vague and inconsistent with the rights of the servient owners.

[14] This court concluded that as a matter of construction, the park became a communal garden for the benefit and enjoyment of those whose houses adjoined it and were in its close proximity. It formed the collective garden of the neighbouring houses giving the owners the right to enjoy the amenities that it provided. The servient owners retained the right to the produce from the garden, and to design and maintain it as they wished subject only to the obligation that it should remain available as a communal garden to the dominant owners. In the court's judgment Lord Evershed MR said ([1955] 3 All ER 667 at 682, [1956] Ch 131 at 176):

'We see nothing repugnant to a man's proprietorship or possession of a piece of land that he should decide to make of it and maintain it as an ornamental garden, and should grant rights to a limited number of other persons to come into it for the enjoyment of its amenities.'

[15] The appellants submitted, however, that this decision is of no assistance in the present case. They pointed out that the right in question was the subject matter of an express grant with detailed provisions as to the nature of the respective rights and obligations of the dominant and servient owners. They pointed out that the garden was created, controlled and maintained by the servient owners. In contrast, they submitted that in the present case the use relied upon by the respondent as establishing her prescriptive right indicates that the respondent and the other cottage owners were asserting the right themselves to control and maintain the area as a communal garden and amenity space, with no evidence as to the correlative rights or obligations of the appellants themselves which could in any way circumscribe what is therefore a wide ranging entitlement akin to that asserted by the defendant in Copeland v Greenhalf [1952] 1 All ER 809, [1952] Ch 488, and effectively excluding the appellants from any beneficial use of the blue land.

[16] We were referred to a number of other authorities which, it is submitted, underline the general principle that the right claimed must not to be such as would leave the servient owner without any reasonable use of his land if it is to exist as an easement. In Grigsby v Melville [1973] 1 All ER 385 at 392–393, [1972] 1 WLR 1355 at 1364 Brightman J said that the asserted right to use premises as a store gave, in effect, an exclusive right of user over the whole of the servient tenement and he would, if it had been necessary to do so, have followed Copeland's case. In London and Blenheim Estates Ltd v Ladbroke Retail Parks Ltd [1993] 1 All ER 307, [1992] 1 WLR 1278, Judge Paul Baker QC sitting as a judge of the High Court applied that same test to a claimed right to park cars, and concluded on the facts of that case that the right claimed did not preclude use of the servient tenement in such a way as to fall foul of the principle. However, in Batchelor v Marlow [2001] EWCA Civ 1051, [2003] 4 All ER 78, [2003] 1 WLR 764, another case involving a claim to the right to park cars, this court concluded that the right there claimed was so extensive as to make the servient owner's rights of ownership of the land illusory, and accordingly held that the right claimed was not capable of amounting to an easement.

[17] The only case in which what apparently amounted to exclusive use of premises was claimed as an easement was Wright v Macadam [1949] 2 All ER 565, [1949] 2 KB 744. In that case the tenant of a flat in a property claimed the right to use a shed in the garden for the storage of coal. The main argument in the case concerned the question of whether or not the use was essentially by permission and licence, which the Court of Appeal concluded in the tenants' favour. Jenkins LJ, during the course of his judgment, said ([1949] 2 All ER 565 at 571–572, [1949] 2 KB 744 at 752):

> 'Next, the right was, as I understand it, a right to use the coal-shed in question for the purpose of storing such coal as might be required for the domestic purposes of the flat. In my judgment, that is a right or easement which the law will clearly recognise, and it is a right or easement of a kind which could readily be included in a lease or conveyance by the insertion of appropriate words in the parcels.'

[18] The appellants submitted that this case is of no assistance to the court. The point in Copeland's case was never argued. It was a completely different factual situation. And in particular, in dealing with any apparent conflict between Wright's case and Copeland's case, Brightman J in Grigsby's case considered that the difference in the facts was such that he was at liberty to follow Copeland's case.

[19] The respondent submitted that the appellants' argument is based on a false premise. The facts found by District Judge Ashton did not preclude the appellants from using the land. That was recognised by his refusal to grant a declaration in relation to the grassed surface of the strip of land, restricting relief as he did to the flower bed. It was submitted that all that is claimed, and all that the evidence established, was that the blue land had been used as a communal garden for recreational and amenity purposes, and a right of way. The right to enjoy the land as a communal garden was clearly a right capable of subsisting as an easement provided that there was the necessary connection between the dominant and the servient tenement, as was established in Re Ellenborough Park [1955] 3 All ER 667, [1956] Ch 131. The fact that the owners of the dominant tenements had, as a matter of fact, maintained the garden did not as a matter of law mean that the appellants had been excluded from using it. On a proper analysis, the respondent submitted, the dominant owners had simply been carrying out that which they were entitled to do, namely such works as were necessary to enable them to enjoy the right to use the garden as a communal garden for recreational and amenity purposes. On that analysis, the appellants retain the right themselves to enter the blue land and do whatever they wish to do on that land, provided that it maintains its character as a garden which can be enjoyed by the dominant owners.

[20] The respondent further submitted that there is no uncertainty about the respective rights and obligations, despite the absence of any deed. The appellants are entitled to exercise their undoubted rights over the blue land provided that they do not substantially interfere with the respondent's right to enjoy it as a garden. It follows that District Judge Ashton's order was justified in that the destruction of the flower bed had been carried out without notice and without any intent that the blue land would retain its character as a garden. It was submitted that the district judge was right to conclude:

> 'As stated in Re Ellenborough Park the categories of easement are not closed and in my experience many older properties enjoy rights over communal gardens and yards. It may be that reallocation of the layout of such areas may be required from time to time but the land owner cannot simply do this for his own convenience without prior consultation with all concerned. That is what happened in this case and it will not be supported by a court of equity.'

[21] It was submitted that this requires the appellants, if they wish to exercise their rights, to do so on reasonable notice, with reasonable proposals, and for good reason.

[22] In general terms, I consider the respondent's arguments are correct. In Re Ellenborough Park [1955] 3 All ER 667 at 673, [1956] Ch 131 at 163 Lord Evershed MR said:

> 'For the purposes of the argument before us counsel were content to adopt, as correct, the four characteristics formulated in DR CHESHIRE'S MODERN REAL PROPERTY (7th Edn.), p. 456 et seq. They are (i) There must be a dominant and a servient tenement: (ii) an easement must accommodate the dominant tenement: (iii) dominant and servient owners must be different persons: and (iv) a right over land cannot amount to an easement unless it is capable of forming the subject-matter of a grant.'

[23] Clearly in the present case the first three characteristics have been met. As to the fourth characteristic, the Court of Appeal in Re Ellenborough Park held that an easement to use land as a communal garden was capable of forming the subject matter of a grant. However there is no doubt that there is a real difference between a case in which the easement claimed is said to have been the subject matter of an express grant, and one which is said to arise by reason of prescription or under s 62 of the Law of Property Act 1925. In the former case, the issue is simply one of construction of the grant. And the court will undoubtedly lean in favour of the creation of an easement if the intention of the parties was clearly to that end. In the latter case, the court has the more difficult task of assessing the evidence as to alleged use in order to determine whether the claimed right has been established. But if it is clear from that evidence that use has been made of the land for the requisite period which is capable of amounting to an easement, it seems to me that a court should not be deflected from declaring the existence of an easement which can sensibly be formulated by the fact that, of necessity, its parameters may not be so clearly defined as they could be in a deed.

[24] In my judgment, the findings of fact by District Judge Ashton are conclusive of the matter in the respondent's favour. Even though the appellants had not themselves created or maintained the communal garden, the blue land had been used as such ever since the sale of the properties. The fact that the appellants had been content to allow the dominant owners over the years to determine the layout of the garden and to have maintained it themselves does not seem to me to derogate from the conclusion that they have been prepared to set aside this land for the use of the dominant owners as a communal garden. As the district judge himself recognised, this was a potential advantage to the appellants and their predecessors in title at the time that the properties were originally sold.

[25] I am therefore satisfied that the facts found by District Judge Ashton were sufficient to justify both his and the circuit judge's conclusions that the respondent was entitled to a right to use the blue land as a communal garden along with the other dominant owners. Those facts do not justify the conclusion that the right created by the established use excluded the appellants from any use which they might wish to make of the land. It restricted that use only to the extent necessary to ensure that the blue land as a whole could still be enjoyed by the dominant owners, and in particular the respondent, as a communal garden for recreational and amenity purposes. However, the declaration made by the district judge goes further than is necessary to reflect the right which he had concluded had been established on the evidence. In so far as it suggested that the respondent had a right to the restoration of the flower bed, in the sense that the existence of a flower bed in that position was the consequence of the right which he concluded had been established, it was wrong.

[26] But by removing the flower bed without notice, and without giving her any opportunity to recreate or relocate it or its contents elsewhere in the way they did, the appellants undoubtedly did interfere with that right. That does not mean that the appellants are not entitled to create a gravelled driveway over that strip of land. That would not itself necessarily interfere with the respondent's right to use the blue land, as a whole, as a communal garden together with the other dominant owners, bearing in mind that a right of way exists over that strip of land for the benefit of all the dominant owners. Whether any particular proposal by the appellants to create such a driveway would substantially interfere with the respondent's rights would be a matter for consideration of all the facts. The proper way to reflect the respective rights of the parties seems to me to require an amendment of the declaration granted by District Judge Ashton to a declaration that: 'The respondent is entitled to a right to use the blue land as a communal garden for recreational and amenity purposes.'

[27] This will inevitably require the appellants, if they wish to carry out any works on the blue land, to do so in a way which will substantially maintain its character as a communal garden for recreational and amenity purposes. And this will require them to demonstrate that any proposed work would maintain that character, and in practice the work is likely to require prior consultation, and preferably agreement, if it is not to amount to a significant interference with the respondent's rights.

[28] District Judge Ashton awarded the respondent £200 damages for the destruction of her flower bed. Although he considered that the respondent's rights over the flower bed were more extensive than I consider them to be, none the less, the destruction without notice of the flower bed was, as I have already said, a substantial interference with her right which is capable of sounding in damages. I see no reason to interfere with the district judge's figure of £200.

a [29] I would therefore allow the appeal but only to the limited extent to which I have indicated.

MANCE LJ.

[30] I agree.

b SIMON BROWN LJ.

[31] I also agree.

Appeal allowed only to the extent indicated. Appellants to pay 75% of respondent's costs.

Alexander Horne Barrister.

Note

Mullins v Laughton and others

[2002] EWHC 2761 (Ch)

CHANCERY DIVISION

NEUBERGER J

4–8 NOVEMBER, 19 DECEMBER 2002

Partnership – Dissolution – Effect – Whether accepted repudiatory breach of partnership deed dissolving partnership.

In the course of giving judgment in a partnership dispute NEUBERGER J said:

'[87] The question whether a partnership can be dissolved by one or more partners accepting a repudiatory breach on the part of other partners was discussed in some detail by Lord Millett in Hurst v Bryk [2000] 2 All ER 193 at 198–202, [2002] 1 AC 185 at 193–196. In that case, it had been common ground between the parties that a partnership could be dissolved by an accepted repudiation, but Lord Millett, in the passage to which I have referred, questioned whether this was correct, albeit that he expressly left the point undecided. The other members of the House of Lords ([2000] 2 All ER 193 at 195, [2002] 1 AC 185 at 189) agreed with the speech of Lord Millett; Lord Nicholls of Birkenhead expressly said that he also preferred to keep the point open.

[88] Before the decision in Hurst's case, it would seem, according to Lord Millett ([2000] 2 All ER 193 at 200, [2002] 1 AC 185 at 194), that eighteenth and nineteenth century judges would have been likely to—

> 'have rejected the idea that the dissolution of a partnership at the instance of one partner, however wronged, and against the wishes of his fellow partners can be withdrawn from the discretion of the court and left to the unilateral decision of the innocent partner.'

Indeed, he described the idea as 'unhistorical'.

[89] As Lord Millett went on to point out, there is fairly recent, first instance, authority to support the proposition that a partnership can be dissolved by an accepted repudiation. In Hitchman v Crouch Butler Savage Associates (1983) 80 LS Gaz 550, Harman J held that the doctrine of accepted repudiation did apply to a partnership, although it is noteworthy that the then current, fourteenth edition of Lindley on Partnership (1979), doubted that view (p 611–612). The authority of that decision is not enhanced by the fact that it was reversed by the Court of Appeal on a different point: see (1983) 127 SJ 441.

[90] Lord Millett's analysis speaks for itself. While his observations were obiter and he expressly left the point open, it seems pretty clear that he would have held, at least on the basis of the arguments as they then appeared to him, that a partnership could not be dissolved by an accepted repudiation.

[91] The Law Commission Paper Partnership Law (Consultation Paper No 159) discusses the issue in paras 6.28–6.31. The Law Commission (para 6.29) 'respectfully question Lord Millett's view'. It seems to have been assumed that he held that the partnership contract could be terminated by accepted repudiation, so that the un-terminable partnership would merely be 'a partnership at will which the accepting parties may then terminate immediately'. I am not at all convinced that that is the consequence of Lord Millett's analysis. Indeed, on the basis that a partnership could not be dissolved by an accepted repudiation, I think that this analysis is wrong. Lord Millett observed ([2000] 2 All ER 193 at 199, [2002] 1 AC 185 at 193), that the doctrine of accepted repudiation could 'apply to an agreement to enter into partnership or to the contractual obligations which the partners mutually undertake to observe after the partnership has come to an end'. This indicates to me that he was suggesting that accepted repudiation could not determine the contract (or the partnership) while the partnership was in existence. That certainly seems to have been the view of the editors of the current, eighteenth edition of Lindley and Banks on Partnership (2002) p 677–678 (para 24-06). Unlike a lease, where there is an interest in land which is effectively detached from the contract which created it, a partnership cannot be detached from the partnership agreement: the relationship is contractual, but is subject to equitable principles and the provisions of the Partnership Act 1890. Accordingly, I am unconvinced that the continuing contract can be determined without the relationship being determined.

[92] Interestingly, the Law Commission expressed (para 6.31) the 'provisional view' that 'acceptance of a repudiatory breach should not terminate the contract and dissolve the partnership', but that any partner who wished to dissolve the partnership on the basis of 'repudiatory breaches' should 'apply to the court for dissolution'. This conclusion contrasts with the view of the current edition of Lindley and Banks, where the editors suggest (p 678 (para 24-07)) as their strongest point against Lord Millett's provisional view, that it appears to have 'failed to take into account ... the position in which the innocent partner is thereby placed'. The editors go on to explain that, if accepted repudiation could not dissolve the partnership, then an innocent party would be left in a state of uncertainty while he made an application to the court for dissolution pursuant to s 35 of the 1890 Act, during which period he would be left in an unfair state of uncertainty, and indeed would be unable to put an end to the partnership in the meantime. I do not think that is a negligible point, but it does not seem to me to be very forceful, and the present case provides a good example of why that is so. Even if the doctrine of accepted repudiation applies to a partnership, an innocent partner, who purports to accept a repudiatory breach, would often not be certain as to whether or not the partnership has been brought to an end, until the court decides on the issue of whether the breach was in fact repudiatory, and, indeed, on any other issue, such as waiver, which might prevent the innocent partner relying on dissolution.

[93] While the point is plainly difficult, I have reached the conclusion that, on the basis of the written material, and the brief oral argument on the topic, Lord Millett's provisional view should prevail. First, although he expressly left the point open, his characteristically thorough and careful analysis plainly favours the view that dissolution of a partnership by accepted repudiation is not possible. Indeed, the fact that he devoted three pages of close argument and analysis to question whether a partnership could be dissolved by acceptance of a repudiatory breach, when it had been assumed on all sides, is of significance in itself, as is the fact that none of the other four members of the House of Lords disagreed with him. Secondly, apart from the sole decision of Harman J (which, as I have mentioned, was reversed on another point by the Court of Appeal) the weight of previous authority, at least as considered and analysed by Lord Millett, is against the view that a partnership could be dissolved by an accepted repudiation. Thirdly, the reasons advanced in the Law Commission paper and in the current edition of Lindley and Banks, for questioning Lord Millett's provisional view, do not appear to me to be particularly convincing, and, indeed, the main reason each gives seems to me to be undermined by the other.'

Neneh Munu Barrister.

Wilson v First County Trust Ltd

[2003] UKHL 40

HOUSE OF LORDS

LORD NICHOLLS OF BIRKENHEAD, LORD HOPE OF CRAIGHEAD, LORD HOBHOUSE OF WOODBOROUGH, LORD SCOTT OF FOSCOTE AND LORD RODGER OF EARLSFERRY

10–13 MARCH, 10 JULY 2003

Consumer credit – Agreement – Form and content of agreement – Restrictions on enforcement – Whether court having jurisdiction to make declaration of incompatibility concerning Consumer Credit Act 1974 where agreement made before implementation of Human Rights Act 1998 – Consumer Credit Act 1974, s 127(3) – Human Rights Act 1998, ss 3(1), 4.

Under an agreement made in January 1999, the defendant pawnbroker lent the claimant borrower a sum of money for six months on the security of her car. The agreement was a regulated agreement for the purposes of the Consumer Credit Act 1974. Such an agreement was not properly executed unless the document signed contained all the prescribed terms. Those terms included the amount of the credit. By virtue of s 127(3)[a] of the 1974 Act, a failure to state all the prescribed terms precluded the court from enforcing the agreement. In the absence of enforcement by the court, the agreement was altogether unenforceable. When the borrower failed to repay the loan, the pawnbroker sought repayment, failing which the car would be sold. In response, the borrower commenced county court proceedings, claiming that the agreement was unenforceable because it did not show the correct amount of the credit. The judge rejected that contention, and the borrower appealed to the Court of Appeal. The appeal was heard shortly after the implementation, in October 2000, of the Human Rights Act 1998. Unlike the judge, the Court of Appeal held that the agreement did not contain the amount of the credit and was accordingly unenforceable. It therefore allowed the appeal, and as a result the borrower was entitled to keep the amount of her loan, pay no interest and recover her car. At a subsequent hearing, however, the Court of Appeal granted a declaration under s 4[b] of the 1998 Act that s 127(3) of the 1974 Act was incompatible with two of the rights guaranteed to the pawnbroker by the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms 1950 (as set out in Sch 1 to the 1998 Act)—the implied right of access to the court under art 6(1)[c] and the right to property under art 1[d] of the First Protocol. The Secretary of State, who had been joined as a party to the Court of Appeal proceedings, appealed to the House of Lords, contending that the court had no jurisdiction to make a declaration of incompatibility in relation to events occurring before the implementation of the 1998 Act. Since the court could only make such a declaration if it had concluded that it was not possible to read and give effect to legislation in a way that was compatible with convention rights, as

a Section 127(3) is set out at [100], below

b Section 4, so far as material, provides: '… (2) If the court is satisfied that the provision is incompatible with a Convention right, it may make a declaration of that incompatibility.'

c Article 6, so far as material, provides: '1. In the determination of his civil rights and obligations … everyone is entitled to a fair … hearing …'

d Article 1, so far as material, is set out at [38], below

it was otherwise required to do by s 3(1)[e] of the 1998 Act, the issue arose as to whether s 3(1) applied. a

Held – Where an agreement governed by the 1974 Act had been entered into before the implementation of the 1998 Act, the court could not make a declaration of incompatibility in respect of the 1974 Act. Section 3(1) of the 1998 Act did not apply to such a case because Parliament could not have intended its b application to have the effect of altering parties' existing rights and obligations under the 1974 Act. It followed that, for the purposes of identifying the rights of the borrower and the pawnbroker under their agreement, the 1974 Act was to be interpreted without reference to s 3(1) of the 1998 Act. Accordingly, the Court of Appeal had lacked jurisdiction to make a declaration of incompatibility, and the appeal would therefore be allowed (see [22], [23], [26], [101], [102], [124], [145], c [161], [162], [178], [220], below).

Per curiam. (1) Article 6(1) of the convention is not engaged by the complaint that s 127(3) of the 1974 Act renders a regulated agreement unenforceable unless the debtor signs a document containing all the prescribed terms. That is a restriction on the scope of the rights a creditor acquires under a regulated d agreement, and does not bar access to court to decide whether a case is caught by the restriction (see [36], [165], [178], below).

(2) Section 127(3) of the 1974 Act is compatible with art 1 of the First Protocol to the convention. In suitable instances it is open to Parliament, when it considers the public interest so requires, to decide that compliance with certain formalities is an essential prerequisite to enforcement of certain types of e agreement. Considered overall, that may well be a proportionate response in practice to a perceived social problem even though it will sometimes yield a seemingly unreasonable result in a particular case. Money-lending transactions as a class give rise to significant social problems, and Parliament may properly make compliance with the formalities required by the 1974 Act regarding f prescribed terms an essential prerequisite to enforcement (see [74], [75], [78], [109], [138], [169], [170], [178], below).

(3) Where a regulated agreement has been rendered unenforceable by s 127(3) of the 1974 Act, there is no relevant restitutionary remedy available to the lender in respect of the money lent. Since the lender is intended by Parliament to be left g without recourse against the borrower, the lender cannot assert that the borrower has been unjustly enriched. A conclusion to the contrary is inconsistent with the parliamentary intention in rendering the entire agreement unenforceable (see [49], [121]–[123], [172], [178], below); Orakpo v Manson Investments Ltd [1977] 3 All ER 1 and Dimond v Lovell [2000] 2 All ER 897 applied.

(4) When the court is determining whether a statutory provision is h compatible with a convention right, there may be occasion for it to have regard to matters stated in Parliament if those matters constitute background information tending to show, for instance, the likely practical impact of the statutory measure and the nature and extent of the social problem at which the legislation is aimed. By having regard to such material, the court will not be j questioning proceedings in Parliament or intruding improperly into the legislative process or ascribing to Parliament the views expressed by a minister. The court will merely be placing itself in a better position to understand the legislation. Beyond that use of Hansard as a source of background information, the content of parliamentary debates has no direct relevance to the issues the court is called upon to decide in compatibility cases, and hence those debates are not a proper matter for investigation or consideration by the courts. The proportionality of legislation is not to be judged by the quality of the reasons advanced in support of it in the course of parliamentary debate, or by the subjective state of mind of individual ministers or other members (see [63]–[65], [67], [116]–[118], [141]–[143], [173], [178], below).

e Section 3(1) is set out at [155], below

(5) When the court is considering the issue of proportionality for the purposes of determining whether a statutory provision is compatible with convention rights, it is the current effect and impact of the legislation which matter, not the position when the legislation was enacted or came into force (see [62], [144], [173], [178], below).

Decision of the Court of Appeal [2001] 3 All ER 229 reversed.

Notes

For the requirement, so far as possible, to read and give effect to legislation in a way which is compatible with convention rights, see 1(1) Halsbury's Laws (4th edn) (2001 reissue) para 87, for the convention right of access to a court and the convention right to property, see 8(2) Halsbury's Laws (4th edn reissue) paras 141, 165, and for prescribed terms of regulated agreements and the consequences of improper execution, see 9(1) Halsbury's Laws (4th edn reissue) paras 167–169.

For the Consumer Credit Act 1974, s 127, see 11 Halsbury's Statutes (4th edn) (2000 reissue) 107.

For the Human Rights Act 1998, ss 3, 4, Sch 1, Pt I, art 6, Pt II, art 1, see 7 Halsbury's Statutes (4th edn) (2002 reissue) 532, 533, 554, 556.

Cases referred to in opinions

Abbott v Minister for Lands [1895] AC 425, PC.

A-G v Vernazza [1960] 3 All ER 97, [1960] AC 965, [1960] 3 WLR 298, HL.

Ambruosi v Italy (2002) 35 EHRR 125, ECt HR.

Athlumney, Re, Ex p Wilson [1898] 2 QB 547, [1895–9] All ER Rep 329.

Beswick v Beswick [1967] 2 All ER 1197, [1968] AC 58, [1967] 3 WLR 932, HL.

Black-Clawson International Ltd v Papierwerke Waldhof-Aschaffenburg AG [1975] 1 All ER 810, [1975] AC 591, [1975] 2 WLR 513, HL.

Bramelid v Sweden (1983) 5 EHRR 249, E Com HR.

Brind v Secretary of State for the Home Dept [1991] 1 All ER 720, [1991] 1 AC 696, [1991] 2 WLR 588, HL.

Chief Adjudication Officer v Maguire [1999] 2 All ER 859, [1999] 1 WLR 1778, CA.

Debtor, A, Re, ex p Debtor (No 490 of 1935) [1936] Ch 237, CA.

Dimond v Lovell [2000] 2 All ER 897, [2002] 1 AC 384, [2000] 2 WLR 1121, HL.

Fayed v UK (1994) 18 EHRR 393, [1994] ECHR 17101/90, ECt HR.

Golder v UK (1975) 1 EHRR 524, [1975] ECHR 4451/70, ECt HR.

Gustavson Drilling (1964) Ltd v Minister of National Revenue [1977] 1 SCR 271, Can SC.

H v Belgium (1987) 10 EHRR 339, [1987] ECHR 8950/80, ECt HR.

Hakansson v Sweden (1990) 13 EHRR 1, [1990] ECHR 11855/85, ECt HR.

Hedderwick v The Federal Comr of Land Tax (1913) 16 CLR 27, Aust HC.

Hudson (George) Ltd v Australian Timber Workers' Union (1923) 32 CLR 413, Aust HC.

International Transport Roth GmbH v Secretary of State for the Home Dept [2002] EWCA Civ 158, [2003] QB 728, [2002] 3 WLR 344.

James v UK (1986) 8 EHRR 123, [1986] ECHR 8793/79, ECt HR.
Knight v Lee [1893] 1 QB 41, DC.
L'Office Cherifien des Phosphates v Yamashita-Shinnihon Steamship Co Ltd, The Boucraa [1994] 1 All ER 20, [1994] 1 AC 486, [1994] 2 WLR 39, HL.
Marckx v Belgium (1979) 2 EHRR 330, [1979] ECHR 6833/74, ECt HR.
Matthews v Ministry of Defence [2003] UKHL 4, [2003] 1 All ER 689, [2003] ICR 247, [2003] 3 WLR 435.
Maxwell v Murphy (1957) 96 CLR 261, Aust HC.
Mellacher v Austria (1989) 12 EHRR 391, [1989] ECHR 10522/83, ECt HR.
Moon v Durden (1848) 2 Ex 22, 154 ER 389.
Orakpo v Manson Investments Ltd [1977] 3 All ER 1, [1978] AC 95, [1977] 3 WLR 229, HL.
Pepper (Inspector of Taxes) v Hart [1993] 1 All ER 42, [1993] AC 593, [1992] 3 WLR 1032, HL.
Poplar Housing and Regeneration Community Association Ltd v Donoghue [2001] EWCA Civ 595, [2001] 4 All ER 604, [2002] QB 48, [2001] 3 WLR 183.
Powell v UK (App No 45305/99) (4 May 2000, unreported), ECt HR.
Prebble v Television New Zealand Ltd [1994] 3 All ER 407, [1995] 1 AC 321, [1994] 3 WLR 970, PC.
R v DPP, ex p Kebeline, R v DPP, ex p Rechachi [1999] 4 All ER 801, [2000] 2 AC 326, [1999] 3 WLR 972, HL.
R v Field, R v Young [2002] EWCA Crim 2913, [2003] 3 All ER 769, [2003] 1 WLR 882.
R v Johnstone [2003] UKHL 28, [2003] 3 All ER 884, [2003] 1 WLR 1736.
R v Kansal (No 2) [2001] UKHL 62, [2002] 1 All ER 257, [2002] 2 AC 69, [2001] 3 WLR 1562.
R v Lambert [2001] UKHL 37, [2001] 3 All ER 577, [2002] 2 AC 545, [2001] 3 WLR 206.
R v Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions, ex p Spath Holme Ltd [2001] 1 All ER 195, [2001] 2 AC 349, [2001] 2 WLR 15, HL.
Reardon Smith Line Ltd v Hansen-Tangen, Hansen-Tangen v Sanko Steamship Co [1976] 3 All ER 570, [1976] 1 WLR 989, HL.
Republic of Costa Rica v Erlanger (1876) 3 Ch D 62, CA.
S (children: care plan), Re, Re W (children: care plan) [2002] UKHL 10, [2002] 2 All ER 192, [2002] 2 AC 291, [2002] 2 WLR 720.
Secretary of State for Social Security v Tunnicliffe [1991] 2 All ER 712, CA.
Spooner Oils Ltd v Turner Valley Gas Conservation Board [1933] SCR 629, Can SC.
Suche (Joseph) & Co Ltd, Re (1875) 1 Ch D 48.
Tinnelly & Sons Ltd v UK (1998) 4 BHRC 393, ECt HR.
Vogt v Germany (1995) 21 EHRR 205, [1995] ECHR 17851/91, ECt HR.
Wainwright v Home Office [2001] EWCA Civ 2081, [2003] 3 All ER 943, [2002] QB 1334, [2002] 3 WLR 405.
West v Gwynne [1911] 2 Ch 1, CA.
Westdeutsche Landesbank Girozentrale v Islington London BC, Kleinwort Benson Ltd v Sandwell BC [1994] 4 All ER 890, [1994] 1 WLR 938, CA; rvsd [1996] 2 All ER 961, [1996] AC 669, [1996] 2 WLR 802, HL.
Wright v Hale (1860) 6 H & N 227, 158 ER 94.
Yew Bon Tew v Kenderaan Bas Mara [1982] 3 All ER 833, [1983] 1 AC 553, [1982] 3 WLR 1026, PC.
Z v UK [2001] 2 FCR 246, ECt HR.

Zainal bin Hashim v Government of Malaysia [1979] 3 All ER 241, [1980] AC 734, [1980] 2 WLR 136, PC.

Cases referred to in list of authorities

A v Germany (1978) 14 DR 146, E Com HR.
Albert v Belgium (1983) 5 EHRR 533, [1983] ECHR 7299/75, ECt HR.
Allgemeine Gold-und Silverscheideanstalt v UK (1987) 9 EHRR 1, [1987] ECHR 9118/80, ECt HR.
Ashingdane v UK (1985) 7 EHRR 528, [1985] ECHR 8225/78, ECt HR.
Askinex Ltd v Green [1967] 1 All ER 65, [1969] 1 QB 272, [1967] 2 WLR 820, CA.
Association of General Practitioners v Denmark (1989) 62 DR 226, E Com HR.
Banque Financière de la Cité v Parc (Battersea) Ltd [1998] 1 All ER 737, [1999] 1 AC 221, [1998] 2 WLR 475, HL.
Barrett v Enfield LBC [1999] 3 All ER 193, [2001] 2 AC 550, [1999] 3 WLR 79, HL.
Batra v Ebrahim [1982] 2 Lloyd's Rep 11n, CA.
Belvoir Finance Co Ltd v Stapleton [1970] 3 All ER 664, [1971] 1 QB 210, [1970] 3 WLR 530, CA.
Bentinck Ltd v Cromwell Engineering Co [1971] 1 All ER 33, [1971] 1 QB 324, [1970] 3 WLR 1113, CA.
Beyeler v Italy (No 2) (2003) 36 EHRR 46, ECt HR.
Boissevain v Weil [1950] 1 All ER 728, [1950] AC 327, HL.
Burdis v Livsey, Clark v Ardington Electrical Services, Dennard v Plant, Sen v Steelform Engineering Co Ltd, Lagden v O'Connor [2002] EWCA Civ 510, [2003]QB 36, [2002] 3 WLR 762.
Cachia v Faluyi [2001] EWCA Civ 998, [2002] 1 All ER 192, [2001] 1 WLR 1966.
Carr v James Broderick & Co Ltd [1942] 2 All ER 441, [1942] 2 KB 275.
Chassagnou v France (2000) 7 BHRC 151, ECt HR.
Chetwynd's Estate, Re, Dunn Trust Ltd v Brown [1937] 3 All ER 530, [1938] Ch 13, CA.
De Freitas v Permanent Secretary of Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries, Lands and Housing [1999] 1 AC 69, [1998] 3 WLR 675, CA.
Directloans Ltd v Cracknell (1975) Times, 18 April.
Doody v Secretary of State for the Home Dept [1993] 1 All ER 92, [1994] 1 AC 531, [1993] 3 WLR 154, HL.
Dunn Trust Ltd v Freetham [1936] 1 KB 22, [1935] All ER Rep 280, CA.
Eastern Distributors Ltd v Goldring (Murphy, third party) [1957] 2 All ER 525, [1957] 2 QB 600, [1957] 3 WLR 237, CA.
Editions Periscope v France (1992) 14 EHRR 597, [1992] ECHR 11760/85, ECt HR.
Eldridge v Taylor [1931] 2 KB 416, [1931] All ER Rep 542, CA.
Equal Opportunities Commission v Secretary of State for Employment [1994] 1 All ER 910, [1995] 1 AC 1, [1994] 2 WLR 409, HL.
Fogarty v UK (2002) 34 EHRR 302, ECt HR.
Fredin v Sweden (No 1) (1991) 13 EHRR 784, [1991] ECHR 12033/86, ECt HR.
Gaskell Ltd v Askwith (1929) 45 TLR 566, CA.
Gibson v British Gas Energy Centres Ltd (19 February 2001, unreported), EAT.
Gudmundsson v Iceland (1996) 21 EHRR CD 89, E Com HR.
H v UK (1983) 33 DR 247, E Com HR.
Hamilton v Al Fayed [2000] 2 All ER 224, [2001] 1 AC 395, [2000] 2 WLR 609, HL.
Holland v Lampen-Wolfe [2000] 3 All ER 833, [2000] 1 WLR 1573, HL.
Holy Monasteries v Greece (1994) 20 EHRR 1, [1994] ECHR 13092/87, ECt HR.
Humberclyde Finance Ltd v Thompson [1999] GCCR 2141, CA.

Huntpast Ltd v Leadbetter [1999] GCCR 1631, CA.
Immobiliare Saffi v Italy (2000) 30 EHRR 756, ECt HR.
Jersild v Denmark (1994) 19 EHRR 1,[1994] ECHR 15890/89, ECt HR.
JS v Netherlands (1995) 20 EHRR CD 41, E Com HR.
Kasumu v Baba-Egbe [1956] 3 All ER 266, [1956] AC 539, [1956] 3 WLR 575, PC.
Kilbourn v UK (1986) 8 EHRR 81, ECt HR.
Kleinwort Benson Ltd v Lincoln City Council [1998] 4 All ER 513, [1999] 2 AC 349, [1998] 3 WLR 1095, HL.
Le Compte v Belgium (1982) 4 EHRR 1, [1981] ECHR 6878/75, ECt HR.
Leslie (R) Ltd v Sheill [1914] 3 KB 607, [1914–15] All ER Rep 511, CA.
Lithgow v UK (1986) 8 EHRR 329, [1986] ECHR 9006/80, ECt HR.
MacDonald v Ministry of Defence [2002] ICR 174, [2001] IRLR 431, Ct of Sess; affd [2003] UKHL 34, [2003] ICR 937, [2003] IRLR 512.
Matos E Silva L da v Portugal (1996) 24 EHRR 573, ECt HR.
Maunsell v Olins [1975] 1 All ER 16, [1975] AC 373, [1974] 3 WLR 835, HL.
McCarten v Turkington Breen (a firm) v Times Newspapers Ltd [2000] 4 All ER 913, [2001] 2 AC 277, [2000] 3 WLR 1670, HL.
McGinn v Grangewood Securities Ltd [2002] EWCA Civ 522, [2002] All ER (D) 184 (Apr).
Mercantile Credit Co Ltd v Cross [1965] 1 All ER 577, [1965] 2 QB 205, [1965] 2 WLR 687, CA.
National and Provincial Building Society v UK (1997) 25 EHRR 127, [1997] ECHR 21319/93, ECt HR.
North Central Wagon & Finance Co Ltd v Graham [1950] 1 All ER 780, [1950] 2 KB 7, CA.
Osman v UK (1998) 5 BHRC 293, ECt HR.
Papachelas v Greece (2000) 30 EHRR 923, ECt HR.
Pessos Compania Naviera SA v Belgium (1995) 21 EHRR 301, [1995] ECHR 17849/91, ECt HR.
Pickstone v Freemans plc [1988] 2 All ER 803, [1989] AC 66, [1988] 3 WLR 265, HL.
Porter v Magill, Weeks v Magill [2001] UKHL 67, [2002] 1 All ER 465, [2002] 2 AC 357, [2002] 2 WLR 37.
Powell v UK (1990) 12 EHRR 355, [1990] ECHR 9310/81, ECt HR.
Pye (JA) (Oxford) Ltd v Graham [2001] EWCA Civ 117, [2001] Ch 804, [2001] 2 WLR 1293, CA; rvsd [2002] UKHL 30, [2002] 3 All ER 865, [2003] 1 AC 419, [2002] 3 WLR 221.
R (on the application of Alconbury Developments Ltd) v Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions [2001] UKHL 23, [2001] 2 All ER 929, [2001] 2 WLR 1389.
R (on the application of Anderson) v Secretary of State for the Home Dept [2002] UKHL 46, [2002] 4 All ER 1089, [2003] 1 AC 837, [2002] 3 WLR 1800.
R v Benjafield [2002] UKHL 2, [2002] 1 All ER 815, [2003] 1 AC 1099, [2002] 2 WLR 235.
R v Ministry of Defence, ex p Smith [1996] 1 All ER 257, [1996] QB 517, [1996] 2 WLR 305, HL.
R v Modupe [1991] Crim LR 530, CA.
R v Morgentaler [1993] 3 SCR 463, Can SC.
R v Oakes [1986] 1 SCR 103, Can SC.
R v Rezvi [2002] UKHL 1, [2003] 1 AC 1099, [2002] 1 All ER 801, [2002] 2 WLR 235, HL.

R v Secretary of State for the Home Dept, ex p Daly [2001] UKHL 26, [2001] 3 All ER 433, [2001] 2 AC 532, [2001] 2 WLR 1622.
R v Secretary of State for the Home Dept, ex p Simms [1999] 3 All ER 400, [2000] 2 AC 115, [1999] 3 WLR 328, HL.
Robinson v Secretary of State for Northern Ireland [2002] UKHL 32, [2002] NI 390.
Robinson, Re, Clarkson v Robinson [1911] 1 Ch 230, CA.
S v UK (1986) 47 DR 274, E Com HR.
Shanshal v Al-Kishtaini [2001] EWCA Civ 264, [2001] 2 All ER (Comm) 601.
Smith and Grady v UK (2000) 29 EHRR 493, [1999] ECHR 33985/96, ECt HR.
Sporrong v Sweden (1982) 5 EHRR 35, [1982] ECHR 7151/75, ECt HR.
Stran Greek Refineries and Stratis Andreadis v Greece (1994) 19 EHRR 293, [1994] ECHR 13427/87, ECt HR.
Stubbings v UK [1997] 3 FCR 157, ECt HR.
Stubbings v Webb [1993] 1 All ER 322, [1993] AC 498, [1993] 2 WLR 120, HL.
Three Rivers DC v Bank of England (No 2) [1996] 2 All ER 363.
Tolstoy v Miloslavsky v UK (1995) 20 EHRR 442, [1995] ECHR 18139/91, ECt HR.
TP v UK [2001] 2 FCR 289, ECt HR.
U v W (A-G intervening) (No 1) [1997] Eu LR 342.
Union Transport Finance Ltd v British Car Auctions Ltd [1978] 2 All ER 385, CA.
Van der Mussele v Belgium (1983) 6 EHRR 163, [1983] ECHR 8919/80, ECt HR.
Waite v Germany (2000) 30 EHRR 261, ECt HR.
Watchtower Investments Ltd v Payne [2001] EWCA Civ 1159.
Wood v Secretary of State for Work and Pensions [2003] EWCA Civ 53, [2003] All ER (D) 330 (Jan).
X and ors (minors) v Bedfordshire CC, M (a minor) v Newham LBC, E (a minor) v Dorset CC [1995] 3 All ER 353, [1995] 2 AC 633, [1995] 3 WLR 152, HL.
Zacher v Germany (1996) 22 EHRR CD 136, E Com HR.

Appeal

The Secretary of State for Trade and Industry appealed with permission of the Appeal Committee of the House of Lords given on 13 November 2001 from the declaration of the Court of Appeal (Sir Andrew Morritt V-C, Chadwick and Rix LJJ) on 2 May 2001 ([2001] EWCA Civ 633, [2001] 3 All ER 229, [2002] QB 74) that the provisions of s 127(3) of the Consumer Credit Act 1974, in so far as they prevented the court from making an enforcement order under s 65(1) of the 1974 Act unless a document containing all the prescribed terms of the agreement had been signed by the debtor, were incompatible with rights guaranteed to the creditor or the hirer by art 6(1) of, and art 1 of the First Protocol to, the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms 1950 (as set out in Sch 1 to the Human Rights Act 1998). The Secretary of State had been joined as a party to the proceedings in the Court of Appeal following the decision of that court on 23 November 2000 ([2001] QB 407, [2001] 2 WLR 302) allowing an appeal by the claimant, Penelope Wilson, from the decision of Judge Hull QC in the Kingston-upon-Thames County Court sitting at Epsom on 24 September 1999 dismissing her proceedings for a declaration that a credit agreement entered into between her and the defendant, First County Trust Ltd, on 22 January 1999 was void and unenforceable. Neither the claimant nor the defendant took part in the proceedings in the House of Lords, but the following parties intervened in the Secretary of State's appeal: (1) the Finance and Leasing Association, (2) Aviva plc, (3) Royal & Sun Alliance plc, (4) Axa Insurance UK plc, (5) Churchill Insurance Co Ltd and (6) the Attorney General on behalf of the Speaker of the House of Commons and the Clerk of the Parliaments (the House Authorities). The facts are set out in the opinion of Lord Nicholls of Birkenhead.

Lord Goldsmith QC and Jonathan Crow (instructed by the Treasury Solicitor) for the Secretary of State.

William Hibbert and Robert Weir (instructed by Gregory Rowcliffe Milners) for the Finance and Leasing Association.

Richard Gordon QC and Jonathan Hough (instructed by Sharpe Pritchard) for the second to fifth interveners.

Jonathan Sumption QC and Mark Hoskins (instructed by the Treasury Solicitor) for the Attorney General on behalf of the House Authorities.

Monica Carss-Frisk QC and Jane Mulcahy (instructed by the Treasury Solicitor) as amicus curiae.

Their Lordships took time for consideration.

10 July 2003. The following opinions were delivered.

LORD NICHOLLS OF BIRKENHEAD.

[1] My Lords, in January 1999 Penelope Wilson borrowed £5,000 from a pawnbroker for a period of six months. The pawned property was her car, a BMW 318 Convertible. She did not repay the loan. The pawnbroker sought repayment, failing which the car would be sold. Mrs Wilson's response was to commence proceedings in the Kingston-upon-Thames County Court. She claimed the agreement was unenforceable because it did not contain all the prescribed terms. She sought an order for the return of her car. Alternatively she sought to reopen the agreement as grossly exorbitant. At the trial Mrs Wilson appeared in person. The pawnbroker was a two-man company, First County Trust Ltd. The company was represented in court by its finance director.

[2] From these modest beginnings the county court proceedings burgeoned into a case with wide-ranging implications. Neither Mrs Wilson nor First County Trust appeared before the House. But the Attorney General appeared on behalf of the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry. The Speaker of the House of Commons and the Clerk of the Parliaments intervened. They were represented by leading and junior counsel. The Finance and Leasing Association also intervened, as did four insurance companies which are among the largest providers of motor insurance in this country. And leading and junior counsel also appeared as amicus curiæ.

THE £250 FEE: WAS IT 'CREDIT'?

[3] When Mrs Wilson signed her agreement and pawn receipt she was charged a 'document fee' of £250. This was added to the amount of her loan. In the agreement the amount of the loan was stated as £5,250. The amount payable on redemption was £7,327, made up of £5,250 and interest of £1,827. The annual percentage rate of interest was stated to be 94.78%.

[4] The agreement was a regulated agreement for the purposes of s 8 of the Consumer Credit Act 1974. A regulated agreement is not properly executed unless the document signed contains all the prescribed terms (s 61(1)(a)). One of the prescribed terms is the 'amount of the credit' (see reg 6 of and para 2 of Sch 6 to the Consumer Credit (Agreements) Regulations 1983, SI 1983/1553). The consequence of failure to state all the prescribed terms of the agreement is that the court is precluded, by s 127(3), from enforcing the agreement. In the absence of enforcement by the court the agreement is altogether unenforceable (s 65(1)).

[5] On 24 September 1999 Judge Hull QC, in a carefully reasoned judgment, held that the fee of £250 was part of the amount of the credit. So the agreement was enforceable. He reopened the agreement as an extortionate credit bargain and reduced the amount of interest payable by one half. Mrs Wilson appealed to the Court of Appeal ([2001] QB 407, [2001] 2 WLR 302). Pending the hearing of her appeal she paid First County Trust £6,900 to redeem her car. That was in December 1999.

[6] The appeal was heard in November 2000, shortly after the Human Rights Act 1998 came into force. The Court of Appeal, comprising Sir Andrew Morritt V-C, and Chadwick and Rix LJJ, allowed Mrs Wilson's appeal. Sir Andrew Morritt V-C recognised there was considerable force in First County Trust's submissions in support of the judge's view. But having analysed the statutory provisions, the court held that the £250 added to the loan to enable Mrs Wilson to pay the document fee was not 'credit' for the purposes of the 1974 Act. So one of the prescribed terms was not correctly stated. In consequence the agreement was unenforceable. So also was the security. First County Trust was ordered to repay the amount of £6,900 Mrs Wilson had paid the company after Judge Hull's judgment together with interest amounting to £662. The overall result was that Mrs Wilson was entitled to keep the amount of her loan, pay no interest and recover her car.

THE ADJOURNED HEARING

[7] Sir Andrew Morritt V-C expressed concern at this outcome. He considered it might be arguable that s 127(3) of the 1974 Act infringes art 6(1) of the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms 1950 (as set out in Sch 1 to the 1998 Act) art 1 of the First Protocol to the convention. The court adjourned the further hearing of the appeal for notice to be given to the Crown, pursuant to s 5 of the 1998 Act, that the court was considering whether to make a declaration of incompatibility. The Secretary of State for Trade and Industry was then added as a party to the proceedings.

[8] On 2 May 2001 the court gave judgment at the adjourned hearing (see [2001] EWCA Civ 633, [2001] 3 All ER 229, [2002] QB 74). The court held that the inflexible exclusion of a judicial remedy by s 127(3), preventing the court from doing what is just in the circumstances of the case, is disproportionate to the legitimate policy objective of ensuring that particular attention is paid to the inclusion of certain terms in the document signed by the borrower. It is not possible to read and give effect to s 113 or s 127(3) in a way compatible with First County Trust's convention rights. The court made a declaration, pursuant to s 4 of the 1998 Act, that s 127(3), in so far as it prevents the court from making an enforcement order under s 65 of the 1974 Act unless a document containing all the prescribed terms of the agreement has been signed by the debtor, is incompatible with the rights guaranteed to the creditor by art 6(1) of the convention and art 1 of the First Protocol to the convention.

[9] The Secretary of State appealed to your Lordships' House. First County Trust did not. The Secretary of State accepted that Mrs Wilson's agreement was not 'properly executed' within the meaning of s 61 of the 1974 Act. She accepted that, in consequence, no enforcement order could be made under s 65 and that the security over the car was unenforceable. The Secretary of State also accepted it is not possible to 'read down' the relevant provisions of the 1974 Act and thereby save them from any convention rights incompatibility otherwise existing. But she challenged the decision of the Court of Appeal on several grounds. Her primary submission was that the court has no jurisdiction to make a declaration of incompatibility in relation to events occurring before the 1998 Act came fully into force on 2 October 2000. Here, the agreement was made in January 1999 for a period of six months. Additionally, the parties' rights were determined before the 1998 Act came into force. The county court decision was in September 1999.

RETROSPECTIVITY AND SECTION 4 OF THE 1998 ACT

[10] As everyone knows, the purpose of the 1998 Act was to make the human rights and fundamental freedoms set out in the convention directly enforceable in this country as part of its domestic law. The question raised by the Secretary of State's submission is how the Act was intended to operate regarding events occurring before the Act came into force, that is to say, events taking place at a time when these human rights were not as such part of the domestic law of this country.

[11] Section 1 of the Act defines 'Convention rights' and states how the relevant articles of the convention and its Protocols are to have effect for the purposes of the Act. Section 2 provides that when determining a question arising in connection with a convention right courts must take into account, among other matters, decisions of the European Court of Human Rights and the European Commission of Human Rights. I can put these two introductory sections on one side. Contrary to the submissions of the Secretary of State, I do not think they assist either way on the point now under consideration. They are neutral.

[12] The Act prescribes two principal means whereby it 'brings human rights home' from Strasbourg: first, by making provision for the interpretation and amendment of legislation and, secondly, by making it unlawful for a public authority to act in a way incompatible with a convention right. Sections 3–5 and 10 are concerned with the former of these objectives, ss 6–9 with the latter. I shall consider the latter group of sections first. Sections 6–9 are forward looking in their reach. Section 6(1) provides that it 'is unlawful for a public authority to act in a way which is incompatible with a Convention right'. On a natural reading this provision is directed at post-Act conduct. The context powerfully supports this interpretation. One would not expect a statute promoting human rights values to render unlawful acts which were lawful when done. That would be to impose liability where none existed at the time the act was done. Sections 7–9 are concerned with conduct outlawed by s 6(1). They prescribe remedial consequences which ensue when a public authority has acted, or proposes to act, in a way 'which is made unlawful by s 6(1)': s 7(1). It follows therefore that, like s 6(1), ss 7–9 are concerned with post-Act events.

[13] Section 22(4) is an exception to this scheme. It is a curious provision. Commentators and judges have spilled much ink in discussing it. Its effect is that in response to proceedings brought by a public authority a victim of an unlawful act may rely on a convention right 'whenever the act in question took place'. So this provision enables a victim to assert and rely on a convention right in respect of conduct which was not unlawful when it took place. In circumstances where s 22(4) applies the 1998 Act gives a remedy in respect of pre-Act conduct. What is not apparent is why, in respect of pre-Act violations of human rights, victims are given a domestic remedy in this one respect but not more widely. What is special about this one particular situation is not clear. But there it is.

[14] With these provisions in mind I turn to ss 3 and 4. It can be noted at once that s 4 rides in harness with s 3. Section 4 contains two prerequisites to the court's jurisdiction to make a declaration of incompatibility. First, sub-s (2) and (4) of s 4 apply to proceedings in which the court 'determines' whether a legislative provision is compatible with a convention right. So s 4 does not apply unless the court, in the proceedings in question, actually decides whether the relevant legislation is convention-compliant. The second prerequisite is that the court must be satisfied the relevant legislative provision is incompatible with a convention right (s 4(2) and (4)). This presupposes that, despite application of the principle of interpretation stated in s 3, the legislation is non-compliant. In other words, interpretation of the legislation in accordance with s 3 is an essential preliminary step to making a declaration of incompatibility. It is an essential preliminary step because the court cannot be satisfied the legislation is incompatible until effect has been given to the interpretative obligation set out in s 3.

[15] This interpretation of s 4 accords with the consequence flowing from a declaration of incompatibility. A declaration of incompatibility triggers the 'fast track' legislative procedures set out in s 10. It would make no sense for these procedures to be set in motion if it remains uncertain whether it is possible to interpret the legislation in a convention-compliant way.

[16] In the ordinary course this sequential approach goes without saying. Courts will interpret legislation, as they are required to do, in accordance with s 3. Only when they have done this will any question of a declaration of incompatibility arise. But the present case is exceptional because of its transitional nature: the agreement was made pre-Act, and the Court of Appeal was interpreting the legislation post-Act. Hence the all-important question: is s 3 applicable in such a case?

[17] On its face s 3 is of general application. So far as possible legislation must be read and given effect in a way compatible with the convention rights. Section 3 is retrospective in the sense that, expressly, it applies to legislation whenever enacted. Thus s 3 may have the effect of changing the interpretation and effect of legislation already in force. An interpretation appropriate before the Act came into force may have to be reconsidered and revised in post-Act proceedings. This effect of s 3(1) is implicit in s 3(2)(a). So much is clear.

[18] Considerable difficulties, however, might arise if the new interpretation of legislation, consequent on an application of s 3, were always to apply to pre-Act events. It would mean that parties' rights under existing legislation in respect of a transaction completed before the Act came into force could be changed overnight, to the benefit of one party and the prejudice of the other. This change, moreover, would operate capriciously, with the outcome depending on whether the parties' rights were determined by a court before or after 2 October 2000. The outcome in one case involving pre-Act happenings could differ from the outcome in another comparable case depending solely on when the cases were heard by a court. Parliament cannot have intended s 3(1) should operate in this unfair and arbitrary fashion.

[19] The answer to this difficulty lies in the principle underlying the presumption against retrospective operation and the similar but rather narrower presumption against interference with vested interests. These are established presumptions but they are vague and imprecise. As Lord Mustill pointed out in L'Office Cherifien des Phosphates v Yamashita-Shinnihon Steamship Co Ltd, The Boucraa [1994] 1 All ER 20 at 29–30, [1994] 1 AC 486 at 524–525, the subject matter of statutes is so varied that these generalised maxims are not a reliable guide. As always, therefore, the underlying rationale should be sought. This was well identified by Staughton LJ in Secretary of State for Social Security v Tunnicliffe [1991] 2 All ER 712 at 724:

> '... the true principle is that Parliament is presumed not to have intended to alter the law applicable to past events and transactions in a manner which is unfair to those concerned in them, unless a contrary intention appears. It is not simply a question of classifying an enactment as retrospective or not retrospective. Rather it may well be a matter of degree—the greater the unfairness, the more it is to be expected that Parliament will make it clear if that is intended.'

Thus the appropriate approach is to identify the intention of Parliament in respect of the relevant statutory provision in accordance with this statement of principle.

[20] Applying this approach to the 1998 Act, I agree with Mummery LJ in Wainwright v Home Office [2001] EWCA Civ 2081 at [61], [2003] 3 All ER 943 at [61], [2002] QB 1334, that in general the principle of interpretation set out in s 3(1) does not apply to causes of action accruing before the section came into force. The principle does not apply because to apply it in such cases, and thereby change the interpretation and effect of existing legislation, might well produce an unfair result for one party or the other. The 1998 Act was not intended to have this effect.

[21] I emphasise that this conclusion does not mean that s 3 never applies to pre-Act events. Whether s 3 applies to pre-Act events depends upon the application of the principle identified by Staughton LJ in the context of the particular issue before the court. To give one important instance: different considerations apply to post-Act criminal trials in respect of pre-Act happenings. The prosecution does not have an accrued or vested right in any relevant sense.

[22] In the present case Parliament cannot have intended that application of s 3(1) should have the effect of altering parties' existing rights and obligations under the 1974 Act. For the purpose of identifying the rights of Mrs Wilson and First County Trust under their January 1999 agreement the 1974 Act is to be interpreted without reference to s 3(1).

[23] It follows that, in this transitional type of case concerning the 1974 Act, no question can arise of the court making a declaration of incompatibility. For the reasons already considered, it is only when a court is called upon to interpret legislation in accordance with s 3(1) that the court may proceed, where appropriate, to make a declaration of incompatibility. The court can make a declaration of incompatibility only where s 3 is available as an interpretative tool. That is not this case.

THE COURT AS A PUBLIC AUTHORITY

[24] The Court of Appeal reached a contrary conclusion on the applicability of convention rights by a different route. The court held that the relevant event is not the making of the January 1999 agreement. The relevant event is the Court of Appeal's order. The court is a public authority. The court, required by s 6(1) to act in a way compatible with convention rights, must have regard to the facts as they are at the time when it makes its order ([2001] 3 All ER 229 at [17], [18] and [22]). The decision of the Court of Appeal, I should note, was given before the decisions of this House in R v Lambert [2001] UKHL 37, [2001] 3 All ER 577, [2002] 2 AC 545, and R v Kansal (No 2) [2001] UKHL 62, [2002] 1 All ER 257, [2002] 2 AC 69.

[25] As is well known, the application of s 6(1) to judicial decisions on matters of substantive law is a highly controversial topic. It is not necessary to venture onto this quicksand in the present case. One insuperable difficulty with the Court of Appeal's analysis, as it respectfully seems to me, is that it fails to take into account the mandatory nature of the relevant provisions of the 1974 Act. Let it be assumed, but without deciding, that the court's order in these proceedings is an 'act' by a public authority within the meaning of s 6(1). Even so, there can be no question of the court acting unlawfully. The court's decision in these proceeding gives effect to the mandatory provisions of the 1974 Act. An order giving effect to these provisions of primary legislation is excluded from the scope of s 6(1) by s 6(2)(a). Thus, reference to s 6(1) takes the matter no further forward. The question which remains to be answered is whether, in interpreting and giving effect to the provisions of the 1974 Act in this case, s 3(1) of the 1998 Act applies. That is the crucial question. That is the question I have already considered.

[26] For these reasons the appeal by the Secretary of State must succeed. In this transitional type of case s 3(1) is inapplicable to the interpretation of the 1974 Act. Consequently, the court has no jurisdiction to make a declaration of incompatibility. The declaration made by the Court of Appeal should be set aside.

[27] This conclusion makes it strictly unnecessary for the House to consider the further issues arising out of the judgment of the Court of Appeal. But it would not be satisfactory to leave these other issues unresolved. They have been fully argued by experienced counsel, the House has the benefit of the views of the Court of Appeal, and the issues are of importance to innumerable transactions being entered into every day. I turn, therefore, to consider what the position would be in this case had the 1998 Act applied.

WHETHER ART 6 OF THE CONVENTION OR ART 1 OF THE FIRST PROTOCOL APPLIES

[28] The first of the further issues is whether art 6 of the convention or art 1 of the First Protocol applies in the present case. Before turning to these articles I should outline the salient provisions of the 1974 Act. Subject to exemptions, a regulated agreement is an agreement between an individual debtor and another person by which the latter provides the former with a cash loan or other financial accommodation not exceeding a specified amount. Currently the amount is £25,000. Section 61(1) sets out conditions which must be satisfied if a regulated agreement is to be treated as properly executed. One of these conditions, in para (a), is that the agreement must be in a prescribed form containing all the prescribed terms. The prescribed terms are the amount of the credit or the credit limit, rate of interest (in some cases), how the borrower is to discharge his obligations, and any power the creditor may have to vary what is payable (see Sch 6 to the Consumer Credit (Agreements) Regulations 1983, SI 1983/1553). The consequence of improper execution is that the agreement is not enforceable against the debtor save by an order of the court (s 65(1)). Section 127(1) provides what is to happen on an application for an enforcement order under s 65. The court 'shall dismiss' the application if, but only if, the court considers it just to do so having regard to the prejudice caused to any person by the contravention in question and the degree of culpability for it. The court may reduce the amount payable by the debtor so as to compensate him for prejudice suffered as a result of the contravention, or impose conditions, or suspend the operation of any term of the order or make consequential changes in the agreement or security.

[29] The court's powers under s 127(1) are subject to significant qualification in two types of cases. The first type is where s 61(1)(a), regarding signing of agreements, is not complied with. In such cases the court 'shall not make' an enforcement order unless a document, whether or not in the prescribed form, containing all the prescribed terms, was signed by the debtor (s 127(3)). Thus, signature of a document containing all the prescribed terms is an essential prerequisite to the court's power to make an enforcement order. The second type of case concerns failure to comply with the duty to supply a copy of an executed or unexecuted agreement pursuant to ss 62 and 63, or failure to comply with the duty to give notice of cancellation rights in accordance with s 64(1). Here again, subject to one exception regarding ss 62 and 63, s 127(4) precludes the court from making an enforcement order.

[30] These restrictions on enforcement of a regulated agreement cannot be side-stepped by recourse to a pledge or other form of security furnished in support of the debtor's obligations under the agreement. The security is not enforceable to a greater extent than the loan (s 113). Where an application for an enforcement order is dismissed, except on technical grounds only, or the court makes a declaration under s 142 that the agreement is not enforceable, any security provided in relation to a regulated agreement 'shall be treated as never having effect' (s 106(a)). Property lodged with the creditor by way of security has to be returned by him 'forthwith'.

[31] These restrictions on enforcement of a regulated agreement are for the protection of borrowers. They do not deprive a regulated agreement of all legal effect. They do not render a regulated agreement void. A regulated agreement is enforceable by the debtor against the creditor. It seems, for instance, that a borrower may insist on making further drawdowns under a regulated agreement even though the agreement is unenforceable against him. Further, s 173(3) expressly permits consensual enforcement against a borrower. A borrower may consent to the sale of a security or to judgment. Moreover, the creditor is entitled to retain any security lodged until either an application for an enforcement order is dismissed or the court makes a declaration under s 142 that the agreement is not enforceable. That is the effect of ss 113(3) and 106.

[32] Against this background I turn to the relevant convention rights. Article 6(1) of the convention guarantees everyone a fair, expeditious and public trial of disputes about his civil rights. This guarantee includes an implied right of access to a court (see Golder v UK (1975) 1 EHRR 524 at 536 (para 36)). The scope of this guarantee has been considered on many occasions by the European Court of Human Rights. The relevant principles were explored recently by your Lordships' House in Matthews v Ministry of Defence [2003] UKHL 4, [2003] 1 All ER 689, [2003] ICR 247 (see, for instance, the pithy introductory summary by Lord Bingham of Cornhill at [3]).

[33] For present purposes it is sufficient to note that the established case law of the European Court of Human Rights is to the effect that art 6(1) does not itself guarantee any particular content for civil rights and obligations in the substantive law of the contracting states. Section 6(1) applies only to disputes over what, at least arguably, are recognised under domestic law to be 'rights and obligations'

(see Z v UK [2001] 2 FCR 246 at 268 (para 87)). Article 6(1) may not be used as a means of creating a substantive civil right having no basis in national law. The content of substantive national law may call for scrutiny under other articles of the convention or its protocols, but that is not the target of art 6(1).

[34] The basic principle underlying art 6(1) is that 'civil claims must be capable of being submitted to a judge for adjudication' (see Fayed v UK (1994) 18 EHRR 393 at 429 (para 65)). Thus a typical case within art 6(1) is where a person enjoys under national law what is arguably a civil right but the only forum for deciding a dispute over the existence or enforcement of the right is a tribunal which is not independent and impartial. So procedural bars on bringing claims to court may fall within art 6(1). So also may procedural bars having the effect of preventing claims being decided on their merits. Tinnelly & Sons Ltd v UK (1998) 4 BHRC 393 at 415–418 (paras 72–79), is an example of the latter. The issue of a 'national security' certificate had the effect of preventing complaints of religious discrimination being considered on their merits by a Fair Employment Tribunal. That was a violation of art 6(1).

[35] The distinction between the substantive content of a right and an unacceptable procedural bar to its enforcement by a court can give rise to difficulty in distinguishing the one from the other in a particular case. As a matter of drafting, a restriction on the scope of a right may be framed in several different ways. But the drafting technique chosen by the draftsman cannot be determinative of this issue. Human rights conventions are concerned with substance, not form, with practicalities and realities, not linguistic niceties. The crucial question in the present context is whether, as a matter of substance, the relevant provision of national law has the effect of preventing an issue which ought to be decided by a court from being so decided. The touchstone in this regard is the proper role of courts in a democratic society. A right of access to a court is one of the checks on the danger of arbitrary power. In Matthews v Ministry of Defence [2003] 1 All ER 689 at [142], Lord Walker of Gestingthorpe noted that art 6 is in principle concerned with the procedural fairness and integrity of a state's judicial system. Lord Hoffmann observed (at [29]), that it should not matter how the law is framed, provided one holds onto the underlying principle, which is to maintain the rule of law and the separation of powers.

[36] In the present case the essence of the complaint is that s 127(3) of the 1974 Act has the effect that a regulated agreement is not enforceable unless a document containing all the prescribed terms is signed by the debtor. In my view, thus framed, the complaint does not bring art 6(1) into play. In terms of labels, that is a restriction on the scope of the rights a creditor acquires under a regulated agreement. It does not bar access to court to decide whether the case is caught by the restriction. It does bar a court from exercising any discretion over whether to make an enforcement order. But in taking that power away from a court the legislature was not encroaching on territory which ought properly to be the province of the courts in a democratic society.

[37] In reaching the opposite conclusion the Court of Appeal focused on the exclusion of any meaningful consideration by the court of the creditor's rights under the agreement in a case where the document signed by the debtor does not include all the prescribed terms. The court held ([2001] 3 All ER 229 at [31], [32], [2002] QB 74 at [31], [32]) that the exclusion of any judicial remedy in such a case engages art 6(1). I am unable to agree. The inability of the court to make an enforcement order in such a case, whatever the circumstances, is a limitation on the substantive scope of a creditor's rights. It no more offends the rule of law and the separation of powers than would be the case if Parliament had said that such an agreement is void.

[38] In contrast to art 6(1), art 1 of the First Protocol is concerned with the content of substantive national law. Art 1 provides:

> 'Every natural and legal person is entitled to the peaceful enjoyment of his possessions. No one shall be deprived of his possessions except in the public interest and subject to the conditions provided for by law ...
>
> The preceding provisions shall not, however, in any way impair the right of a State to enforce such laws as it deems necessary to control the use of property in accordance with the general interest ...'

[39] On its face art 1 is engaged in this case, most obviously with regard to the BMW car delivered by Mrs Wilson to First County Trust as security. On delivery First County Trust as pawnee acquired a proprietary interest in the car. That was in January 1999. The company's proprietary interest ceased eight months later, in September 1999, when the court refused to make an enforcement order. In addition, both parties acquired contractual rights under the agreement. 'Possessions' in art 1 is apt to embrace contractual rights as much as personal rights. Contractual rights may be more valuable and enduring than proprietary rights. But, by virtue of the statute, the contractual rights acquired by First County Trust were enforceable only with the consent of the borrower pursuant to s 173(3).

[40] The response of the Secretary of State and others is that all the rights acquired by First County Trust under the agreement were from their inception subject to the limitations prescribed by the 1974 Act. A restriction on the scope of the rights acquired by a lender under a transaction is not within art 1 of the First Protocol. A person who acquires property subject to limitations under national law which subsequently bite according to their tenor cannot complain that his rights under art 1 of the First Protocol have been infringed.

[41] I do not agree. This proposition is stated too widely and too loosely to be acceptable. Clearly, the expiry of a limited interest such as a licence in accordance with its terms does not engage art 1. That is not this case. Here the transaction between the parties provided for repayment of the loan and for the car to be held as security. What is in issue is the 'lawfulness' of overriding legislation. The proposition advanced by the Secretary of State would mean that however arbitrary or discriminatory such legislation might be, if it was in existence when the transaction took place a court enforcing human rights values would be impotent. A convention right guaranteeing a right of property would have nothing to say. That is not an attractive conclusion.

[42] There are of course many circumstances where statutes empower the Executive or the courts to make orders depriving a person of some of his possessions. Compulsory acquisition, and property adjustment orders on divorce, are instances. The exercise of powers such as these prima facie engages art 1. This is so irrespective of whether the enabling statute was enacted before or after the property affected by the order was acquired. Hakansson v Sweden (1990) 13 EHRR 1 is an example where the law was in place before the property in question was acquired. The law providing for the compulsory resale of the applicants' land within two years existed when they bought the land. Thus a provision in the 1974 Act empowering a court to refuse to enforce a regulated agreement may engage art 1 even though the Act was in force before the agreement was entered into.

[43] In the present case the relevant statutory provisions are framed differently. They do not empower the court to refuse to enforce the agreement now in question. They go further. The court is compelled to refuse to make an enforcement order. Is this difference material? I think not. It would be passing strange if art 1 were engaged in the former case but not the latter. A law regulating the effect of a transaction between the parties in the public interest does not always escape review under art 1 of the First Protocol. Such a law may infringe art 1 if it creates an 'imbalance' between the parties which would result in one party being arbitrarily or unjustly deprived of his possessions for the benefit of the other (see Bramelid v Sweden (1983) 5 EHRR 249 at 256).

[44] Thus the question in the present case is one of characterisation of the nature and effect of the relevant provisions of the 1974 Act, considered as a matter of substance rather than form. In my view, consistently with the underlying objective of art 1 of the First Protocol, the relevant provisions in the 1974 Act are more readily and appropriately characterised as a statutory deprivation of the lender's rights of property in the broadest sense of that expression than as a mere delimitation of the extent of the rights granted by a transaction. The rigid ban on enforcement of security and contractual rights prescribed by s 127(3) alone and in conjunction with ss 106 and 113 engages art 1 of the First Protocol. The lender's rights were extinguished in favour of the borrower by legislation for which the state is responsible. This was a deprivation of possessions within the meaning of art 1 (see James v UK (1986) 8 EHRR 123 at 140 (para 38)). Whether this statutory interference with First County Trust's peaceful enjoyment of its possessions was justified, and therefore not a breach of art 1, is a separate issue.

[45] I do not think there is any inconsistency between this conclusion and the conclusion stated above regarding art 6(1). A statutory provision may be characterised at one and the same time as a limitation on the scope of a creditor's rights for the purposes of art 6(1) and as a law depriving a person of his possessions for the (different) purposes of art 1 of the First Protocol.

RESTITUTION

[46] Before considering whether s 127(3) is compatible with art 1 of the First Protocol I must digress to deal with two preliminary matters. The first concerns the legal consequences of s 127(3). When a regulated agreement is rendered irredeemably unenforceable by s 127(3), the lender is unable to enforce the agreement. But does he, quite apart from his (unenforceable) rights under the agreement, have a restitution claim against the borrower in respect of the money lent? The parties to the agreement intended the money would be repayable in accordance with the terms of the agreement. Inability to enforce the terms of the agreement does not inevitably carry with it the consequence that the borrower may simply keep the money. Retention of the money, it is said, would be unjust enrichment, for which the appropriate remedy would be an order that the borrower repay what was never intended to be other than a loan. Reliance was placed, by way of analogy, on the decision of the Court of Appeal in Westdeutsche Landesbank Girozentrale v Islington London BC, Kleinwort Benson Ltd v Sandwell BC [1994] 4 All ER 890, [1994] 1 WLR 938. There a bank paid money to a local authority under an interest rate swap agreement, which was held later to be outside the local authority's powers. The local authority had been unjustly enriched and the bank was entitled to a restitutionary remedy.

[47] A secondary question also arises: if the lender does have a restitutionary claim, is that a matter to be taken into account when considering whether s 127(3) is compatible with art 1 of the First Protocol?

[48] I can deal with these two questions quite shortly, starting with the latter. I am in no doubt that a lender's restitutionary remedy, if he has one, is a matter to be taken into account when considering whether s 127(3) is compatible with art 1 of the First Protocol. The adverse consequences of an alleged infringement of a convention right cannot sensibly be assessed other than in the round. The real position of the claimant is what matters. If in practice a lender can ameliorate the immediate and directly adverse consequence of s 127(3) by resort to some other right or remedy readily available to him, that is a matter to which the court must have regard. I cannot accept the contrary arguments addressed to the House.

[49] I consider, however, that there is no relevant restitutionary remedy generally available to a lender in the circumstances now under consideration. The message to be gleaned from ss 65, 106, 113 and 127 of the 1974 Act is that where a court dismisses an application for an enforcement order under s 65 the lender is intended by Parliament to be left without recourse against the borrower in respect of the loan. That being the consequence intended by Parliament, the lender cannot assert at common law that the borrower has been unjustly enriched. That would be inconsistent with the Parliamentary intention in rendering the entire agreement unenforceable. True, the 1974 Act does not expressly negative any other remedy available to the lender, nor does it render an improperly executed agreement unlawful. But when legislation renders the entire agreement inoperative, to use a neutral word, for failure to comply with prescribed formalities the legislation itself is the primary source of guidance on what are the legal consequences. Here the intention of Parliament is clear.

[50] This interpretation of the 1974 Act accords with the approach adopted by the House in Orakpo v Manson Investments Ltd [1977] 3 All ER 1, [1978] AC 95, regarding s 6 of the Moneylenders Act 1927 and, more recently, in Dimond v Lovell [2000] 2 All ER 897, [2002] 1 AC 384, another case where s 127(3) precluded the making of an enforcement order. In Dimond's case the restitutionary remedy sought was payment of the hire charge for a replacement car used by Mrs Dimond. The House rejected a claim advanced on the basis of unjust enrichment. Lord Hoffmann observed that Parliament contemplated that a debtor might be enriched consequential upon non-enforcement of an agreement pursuant to the statutory provisions. It was not open to the court to say this consequence is unjust and should be reversed by a remedy at common law (see [2000] 2 All ER 897 at 906, [2002] 1 AC 384 at 397–398).

USE OF HANSARD IN COMPATIBILITY CASES

[51] The second preliminary matter concerns the Court of Appeal's use of Hansard in the present case. When considering whether this was a case where the courts should be ready to defer to the considered opinion of elected representatives, the Court of Appeal ([2001] 3 All ER 229 at [33]) pointed to the need for the court to identify the social policy issue which the legislature or the Executive thought it necessary to address and 'the thinking which led to that issue being dealt with in the way that it was':

> 'It is one thing to accept the need to defer to an opinion which can be seen to be the product of reasoned consideration based on policy; it is quite another thing to be required to accept, without question, an opinion for which no reason of policy is advanced.'

[52] In this connection the Court of Appeal considered the 'lengthy gestation' of the 1974 Act. The court referred to parliamentary debates on the Bill, not as an aid to interpretation, but on the reason which led Parliament to enact s 127(3). The Court of Appeal concluded (at [36]) that the debates provide no answer to this issue: such references as there are 'tend to confuse rather than to illuminate'. The court added (at [37]):

> 'In the present case, therefore, we are left without the assistance which examination of reports, preparatory material and debates in Parliament might have been expected to provide on the question "why was it thought necessary to deny to the courts the power to do what was just in those cases in which there was no document signed by the debtor which contained terms which would or might, at some future date, be prescribed by the Secretary of State?' ... We have been shown no material which helps us to understand why the executive thought it necessary to propose, or why Parliament thought it necessary to enact, s 127(3) of the 1974 Act in the form which it takes.'

[53] Although the references to Hansard in the present case were inconclusive, Mr Sumption QC expressed to your Lordships' House the concern of the Speaker of the House of Commons and of the Clerk of the Parliaments at the 'wider significance' of the exercise undertaken by the Court of Appeal. This exercise, he submitted, involved measuring against standards derived from the convention the acceptability of Parliament's reasons for legislating in a particular way, and doing so by reference to the 'thinking' apparent from the record of debates. Further, it involved treating the absence of expressed reasons, acceptable or otherwise, as a factor making it more difficult to justify the enactment in convention terms. The courts should not treat speeches made in Parliament, whether by ministers or others, as evidence of the policy considerations which led to legislation taking a particular form. The exercise on which the Court of Appeal engaged is not an appropriate exercise for a court. There are no circumstances in which it is appropriate for a court to refer to the record of parliamentary debates in order to decide whether an enactment is compatible with the convention. The policy and objects of a statute must be determined by interpreting its language, which alone represents Parliament's intention. Reference to debates for the purpose of determining whether the policy considerations put forward by those participating in debates in either House were justifiable in convention terms and proportionate to the remedy proposed would involve 'questioning' what is said in Parliament contrary to art 9 of the Bill of Rights 1689. That is a different exercise from the one undertaken in Pepper (Inspector of Taxes) v Hart [1993] 1 All ER 42, [1993] AC 593, and it is an exercise essentially adverse to Parliament's intention, not supportive of it.

[54] These submissions raise a point of constitutional importance. This House sitting in its judicial capacity is keenly aware, as indeed are all courts, of the importance of the legislature and the judiciary discharging their own constitutional roles and not trespassing inadvertently into the other's province. Thus, in resolving any question which may arise on the practical application of this principle in a particular case, the courts welcome the participation of the Speaker of the House of Commons and the Clerk of the Parliaments in the proceedings. The House has been much assisted by the submissions made on their behalf by Mr Sumption. The present case is in fact the first time the authorities of Parliament have sought to be heard on the use of Hansard by the courts.

[55] The starting point for any consideration of the matters raised by these submissions is, indeed, the respective roles of Parliament and the courts. Parliament enacts legislation, the courts interpret and apply it. The enactment of legislation, and the process by which legislation is enacted, are matters for Parliament, not the courts. Thus, art 9 of the Bill of Rights 1689 provides, in modern spelling, that 'the freedom of speech and debates or proceedings in Parliament ought not to be impeached or questioned in any court or place out of Parliament'. This provision is part of the wider principle that the courts and Parliament are both astute to recognise their constitutional roles (see Lord Browne-Wilkinson in Prebble v Television New Zealand Ltd [1994] 3 All ER 407 at 413, [1995] 1 AC 321 at 332). These distinct roles reflect one aspect of the separation of powers under this country's constitution.

[56] The decision in Pepper v Hart removed from the law an irrational exception. When a court is carrying out its constitutional task of interpreting legislation it is seeking to identify the intention of Parliament expressed in the language used. This is an objective concept. In this context the intention of Parliament is the intention the court reasonably imputes to Parliament in respect of the language used. In seeking this intention the courts have recourse to recognised principles of interpretation and also a variety of aids, some internal, found within the statute itself, some external, found outside the statute. External aids include the background to the legislation, because no legislation is enacted in a vacuum. It has long been established that the courts may look outside a statute in order to identify the 'mischief' Parliament was seeking to remedy. Lord Simon of Glaisdale noted it is 'rare indeed' that a statute can be properly interpreted without knowing the legislative object (see Black-Clawson International Ltd v Papierwerke Waldhof-Aschaffenburg AG [1975] 1 All ER 810 at 846, [1975] AC 591 at 647). Reports of the Law Commission or advisory committees, and government White Papers, are everyday examples of background material which may assist in understanding the purpose and scope of legislation.

[57] Before the decision in Pepper v Hart [1993] 1 All ER 42, [1993] AC 593 a self-imposed judicial rule excluded use of parliamentary materials as an external aid. The courts drew a veil around everything said in Parliament. This had the consequence that a statement made in a government White Paper, issued by the relevant government department before legislation was introduced, could be used as an external aid. But if the same statement were made by a minister of the department in Parliament when promoting the Bill in one or other House, the courts were strictly unable to take cognisance of the minister's statement.

[58] In relaxing this self-imposed rule the House enunciated some practical safeguards in Pepper v Hart. These were intended to keep references to Hansard within reasonable bounds. One of these safeguards is that the parliamentary statement must be made by the minister or other promoter of the Bill. In imposing this cautionary limitation the House was not, I believe, intending to attribute to ministerial statements some special status, thereby encroaching upon the court's constitutional task of determining objectively what was the intention of Parliament in using the language in question. A clear and unambiguous ministerial statement is part of the background to the legislation. In the words of Lord Browne-Wilkinson in Pepper v Hart [1993] 1 All ER 42 at 65 [1993] AC 593 at 635, such statements 'are as much the background to the enactment of legislation as white papers and parliamentary reports'. But they are no more than part of the background. As I emphasised in R v Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions, ex p Spath Holme Ltd [2001] 1 All ER 195 at 218, [2001] 2 AC 349 at 399, however such statements are made and however explicit they may be, they cannot control the meaning of an Act of Parliament.

[59] Suggestions have been made that unequivocal ministerial statements made in Parliament regarding an ambiguous provision in a Bill may have a more exalted role. In his influential article 'Pepper v Hart; A Re-examination' (2001) 21 OJLS 59, Lord Steyn noted it may be unobjectionable for a judge to use Hansard to identify the mischief at which a statute is aimed. But he rightly drew attention to the conceptual and constitutional difficulties in treating the intentions of the government revealed in debates as reflecting the will of Parliament, as distinct from the possibility that they may give rise to an estoppel or the like against the government.

[60] In the present case Mr Sumption did not submit that Pepper v Hart was wrongly decided. Nor is it necessary to decide whether Pepper v Hart does more than permit courts, when ascertaining the intention of Parliament, to have regard to ministerial statements made in Parliament in the same way as they may have regard to ministerial statements made outside Parliament. What is important is to recognise there are occasions when courts may properly have regard to ministerial and other statements made in Parliament without in any way 'questioning' what has been said in Parliament, without giving rise to difficulties inherent in treating such statements as indicative of the will of Parliament, and without in any other way encroaching upon parliamentary privilege by interfering in matters properly for consideration and regulation by Parliament alone. The use by courts of ministerial and other promoters' statements as part of the background of legislation, pursuant to Pepper v Hart case, is one instance. Another instance is the established practice by which courts, when adjudicating upon an application for judicial review of a ministerial decision, may have regard to a ministerial statement made in Parliament. The decision of your Lordships' House in Brind v Secretary of State for the Home Dept [1991] 1 All ER 720, [1991] 1 AC 696 is an example of this. I now turn to consider whether a challenge to the compatibility of legislation with convention rights may be a further instance of the innocuous use by courts of statements made in Parliament.

[61] The Human Rights Act 1998 requires the court to exercise a new role in respect of primary legislation. This new role is fundamentally different from interpreting and applying legislation. The courts are now required to evaluate the effect of primary legislation in terms of convention rights and, where appropriate, make a formal declaration of incompatibility. In carrying out this evaluation the court has to compare the effect of the legislation with the convention right. If the legislation impinges upon a convention right the court must then compare the policy objective of the legislation with the policy objective which under the convention may justify a prima facie infringement of the convention right. When making these two comparisons the court will look primarily at the legislation, but not exclusively so. Convention rights are concerned with practicalities. When identifying the practical effect of an impugned statutory provision the court may need to look outside the statute in order to see the complete picture, as already instanced in the present case regarding the possible availability of a restitutionary remedy. As to the objective of the statute, at one level this will be coincident with its effect. At this level, the object of s 127(3) is to prevent an enforcement order being made when the circumstances specified in that provision apply. But that is not the relevant level for convention purposes. What is relevant is the underlying social purpose sought to be achieved by the statutory provision. Frequently that purpose will be self-evident, but this will not always be so.

[62] The legislation must not only have a legitimate policy objective. It must also satisfy a 'proportionality' test. The court must decide whether the means employed by the statute to achieve the policy objective is appropriate and not disproportionate in its adverse effect. This involves a 'value judgment' by the court, made by reference to the circumstances prevailing when the issue has to be decided. It is the current effect and impact of the legislation which matter, not the position when the legislation was enacted or came into force. (I interpose that in the present case no suggestion was made that there has been any relevant change of circumstances since the 1974 Act was enacted.)

[63] When a court makes this value judgment the facts will often speak for themselves. But sometimes the court may need additional background information tending to show, for instance, the likely practical impact of the statutory measure and why the course adopted by the legislature is or is not appropriate. Moreover, as when interpreting a statute, so when identifying the policy objective of a statutory provision or assessing the 'proportionality' of a statutory provision, the court may need enlightenment on the nature and extent of the social problem (the 'mischief') at which the legislation is aimed. This may throw light on the rationale underlying the legislation.

[64] This additional background material may be found in published documents, such as a government white paper. If relevant information is provided by a minister or, indeed, any other member of either House in the course of a debate on a Bill, the courts must also be able to take this into account. The courts, similarly, must be able to have regard to information contained in explanatory notes prepared by the relevant government department and published with a Bill. The courts would be failing in the due discharge of the new role assigned to them by Parliament if they were to exclude from consideration relevant background information whose only source was a ministerial statement in Parliament or an explanatory note prepared by his department while the Bill was proceeding through Parliament. By having regard to such material the court would not be 'questioning' proceedings in Parliament or intruding improperly into the legislative process or ascribing to Parliament the views expressed by a minister. The court would merely be placing itself in a better position to understand the legislation.

[65] To that limited extent there may be occasion for the courts, when conducting the statutory 'compatibility' exercise, to have regard to matters stated in Parliament. It is a consequence flowing from the 1998 Act. The constitutionally unexceptionable nature of this consequence receives some confirmation from the view expressed in the unanimous report of the Parliamentary Joint Committee on Parliamentary Privilege (1999) (HL Paper 43-I, HC 214-I) p 28 (para 86)), that it is difficult to see how there could be any objection to the court taking account of something said in Parliament when there is no suggestion the statement was inspired by improper motives or was untrue or misleading and there is no question of legal liability.

[66] I expect that occasions when resort to Hansard is necessary as part of the statutory 'compatibility' exercise will seldom arise. The present case is not such an occasion. Should such an occasion arise the courts must be careful not to treat the ministerial or other statement as indicative of the objective intention of Parliament. Nor should the courts give a ministerial statement, whether made inside or outside Parliament, determinative weight. It should not be supposed that members necessarily agreed with the minister's reasoning or his conclusions.

[67] Beyond this use of Hansard as a source of background information, the content of parliamentary debates has no direct relevance to the issues the court is called upon to decide in compatibility cases and, hence, these debates are not a proper matter for investigation or consideration by the courts. In particular, it is a cardinal constitutional principle that the will of Parliament is expressed in the language used by it in its enactments. The proportionality of legislation is to be judged on that basis. The courts are to have due regard to the legislation as an expression of the will of Parliament. The proportionality of a statutory measure is not to be judged by the quality of the reasons advanced in support of it in the course of parliamentary debate, or by the subjective state of mind of individual ministers or other members. Different members may well have different reasons, not expressed in debates, for approving particular statutory provisions. They may have different perceptions of the desirability or likely effect of the legislation. Ministerial statements, especially if made ex tempore in response to questions, may sometimes lack clarity or be misdirected. Lack of cogent justification in the course of parliamentary debate is not a matter which 'counts against' the legislation on issues of proportionality. The court is called upon to evaluate the proportionality of the legislation, not the adequacy of the minister's exploration of the policy options or of his explanations to Parliament. The latter would contravene art 9 of the Bill of Rights. The court would then be presuming to evaluate the sufficiency of the legislative process leading up to the enactment of the statute. I agree with Laws LJ's observations on this in International Transport Roth GmbH v Secretary of State for the Home Dept [2002] EWCA Civ 158 at [113], [114], [2003] QB 728 at [113], [114], [2002] 3 WLR 344.

ART 1 OF THE FIRST PROTOCOL AND PROPORTIONALITY

[68] I turn now to consider whether s 127(3) of the 1974 Act is compatible with the rights guaranteed by art 1 of the First Protocol. Inherent in art 1 is the need to hold a fair balance between the public interest and the protection of the fundamental rights of creditors such as First County Trust. It is common ground that s 127(3) pursues a legitimate aim. The fairness of a system of law governing the contractual or property rights of private persons is a matter of public concern. Legislative provisions intended to bring about such fairness are capable of being in the public interest, even if they involve the compulsory transfer of property from one person to another (see the leasehold enfranchisement case of James v UK (1986) 8 EHRR 123 at 141 (para 41)). More specifically, persons wishing to borrow money are often vulnerable. There is a public interest in protecting such persons from exploitation.

[69] There must also be a reasonable relationship of proportionality between the means employed and the aim sought to be achieved. The means chosen to cure the social mischief must be appropriate and not disproportionate in its adverse impact. Whether that relationship exists in the case of s 127(3) is the key issue.

[70] In approaching this issue, as noted in R v Johnstone [2003] UKHL 28 at [51], [2003] 3 All ER 884 at [51], courts should have in mind that theirs is a reviewing role. Parliament is charged with the primary responsibility for deciding whether the means chosen to deal with a social problem are both necessary and appropriate. Assessment of the advantages and disadvantages of the various legislative alternatives is primarily a matter for Parliament. The possible existence of alternative solutions does not in itself render the contested legislation unjustified (see the Rent Act case of Mellacher v Austria (1989) 12 EHRR 391 at 411 (para 53)). The court will reach a different conclusion from the legislature only when it is apparent that the legislature has attached insufficient importance to a person's convention right. The readiness of a court to depart from the views of the legislature depends upon the circumstances, one of which is the subject matter of the legislation. The more the legislation concerns matters of broad social policy, the less ready will be a court to intervene.

[71] I turn to the statutory setting of s 127(3). The 1974 Act contains many requirements about the form and contents of regulated agreements. Parliament has singled out some obligations as having such importance that non-compliance leads automatically and inflexibly to a ban on the making of an enforcement order whatever the circumstances. These obligations are specified in s 127(3) and (4). In these two subsections Parliament has chosen, deliberately, to exclude consideration of what is just and equitable in the particular case. The latter approach, enabling the court to consider the circumstances of the particular case, was adopted as the general rule in s 127(1). Section 127(3) and (4) are, expressly, exceptions to the general rule. In prescribing these two exceptions Parliament must be taken to have considered that the sanction generally attaching to non-compliance with the statutory requirements was not sufficient to achieve compliance with the duty to include all the prescribed terms in the agreement (s 61(1)(a)) or the duties to provide copies and notice of cancellation rights (ss 62–64). Something more drastic was needed in order to focus attention on the need for lenders to comply strictly with these particular obligations.

[72] Undoubtedly, as illustrated by the facts of the present case, s 127(3) may be drastic, even harsh, in its adverse consequences for a lender. He loses all his rights under the agreement, including his rights to any security which has been lodged. Conversely, the borrower acquires what can only be described as a windfall. He keeps the money and recovers his security. These consequences apply just as much where the lender was acting in good faith throughout and the error was due to a mistaken reading of the complex statutory requirements as in cases of deliberate non-compliance. These consequences also apply where, as in the present case, the borrower suffered no prejudice as a result of the non-compliance as they do where the borrower was misled. Parliament was painting here with a broad brush.

[73] The unattractive feature of this approach is that it will sometimes involve punishing the blameless pour encourager les autres. On its face, considered in the context of one particular case, a sanction having this effect is difficult to justify. The Moneylenders Act 1927 adopted a similarly severe approach. Infringement of statutory requirements rendered the loan and any security unenforceable. So did the Hire-Purchase Act 1965, although to a lesser extent. This approach was roundly condemned in the Crowther report (Report of the Committee on Consumer Credit, under the presidency of Lord Crowther, March 1971) (Cmnd 4596), vol 1, p 311 (para 6.11.4):

> 'It offends every notion of justice or fairness that because of some technical slip which in no way prejudices him, a borrower, having received a substantial sum of money, should be entitled to retain or spend it without any obligation to repay a single penny.'

[74] Despite this criticism I have no difficulty in accepting that in suitable instances it is open to Parliament, when Parliament considers the public interest so requires, to decide that compliance with certain formalities is an essential prerequisite to enforcement of certain types of agreements. This course is open to Parliament even though this will sometimes yield a seemingly unreasonable result in a particular case. Considered overall, this course may well be a proportionate response in practice to a perceived social problem. Parliament may consider the response should be a uniform solution across the board. A tailor-made response, fitting the facts of each case as decided in an application to the court, may not be appropriate. This may be considered an insufficient incentive and insufficient deterrent. And it may fail to protect consumers adequately. Persons most in need of protection are perhaps the least likely to participate in court proceedings. They may well let proceedings go by default (see, in relation to moneylending agreements, the Crowther Report, p 236 (para 6.1.19)).

[75] Nor do I have any difficulty in accepting that moneylending transactions as a class give rise to significant social problems. Bargaining power lies with the lender, and the social evils flowing from this are notorious. The activities of some lenders have long given the business of moneylending a bad reputation. Nor, becoming more specific, do I have any difficulty in accepting, in principle, that Parliament may properly make compliance with the formalities required by the 1974 Act regarding 'prescribed terms' an essential prerequisite to enforcement. In principle that course must be open to Parliament. It must be open to Parliament to decide that, severe though this sanction may be, it is an appropriate way of protecting consumers as a matter of social policy. In making its decision in the present case Parliament had the benefit of experience gained over many years in the working of the 1927 Act and the hire-purchase legislation, and also the views of the Crowther Committee. Further, it must be open to Parliament so to decide even though the lender's inability to enforce an agreement will not assist a borrower who consents to the enforcement of the agreement in ignorance of the true legal position.

[76] The one point which has caused me difficulty is whether the requirement to state the amount of 'credit' is sufficiently clear and certain. The more severe the sanction, the more important it is that the law should be unambiguous. In the present case the confusion over the treatment of the document fee of £250 as 'credit' may have been due to a widespread misunderstanding within the trade. Certainly it was shared by an experienced trial judge. Mr Hibbert on behalf of the Finance and Leasing Association submitted it is sometimes far from easy to apply the complex provisions of the 1974 Act and the ancillary regulations. He gave examples of types of cases where, he said, identifying the amount of 'credit' is fraught with difficulty.

[77] That there was genuine confusion in the present case is admitted. But I am not persuaded the degree of uncertainty involved in identifying the amount of 'credit' is unacceptably high. The consumer credit legislation has to cope with a wide range of types of transactions. It is not surprising that now and again problems of definition will arise. With the assistance of court decisions, points of uncertainty, when they occur, can be clarified. The mere fact that a legal provision is capable of more than one interpretation does not mean that it fails to meet the requirement implied in the convention concept of 'prescribed by law' (see Vogt v Germany (1995) 21 EHRR 205 at 233 (para 48)). Moreover, I have in mind that the statutory provisions apply only to loans up to a prescribed financial limit, currently £25,000. So the exposure of a creditor in any one case is confined. The burden imposed on him is not excessive. a [78] Accordingly, in my view s 127(3) is compatible with art 1 of the First Protocol.

[79] The Court of Appeal reached the opposite conclusion. In doing so the court approached the matter from a slightly different angle. The effect of the court's judgment was to treat s 127(1) as the touchstone for proportionality and b then require positive justification for any more draconian provision (see [2001] 3 All ER 229 at [38], [39], [2002] QB 74 at [38], [39]). I respectfully consider this is an erroneous approach. Section 127(3) is one provision in an overall package of measures, some more severe than others, approved by the legislature in response to a perennial social problem. In this type of case the court should approach the c relevant statutory provision without any preconceptions of the requirements of proportionality based on other provisions of the statute. The court should simply have regard to the relevant statutory provision and its policy objective and consider whether the provision bears so unfairly on the applicant that it was not open to Parliament to adopt this provision, even as part of an overall package, in response to the social problem in question. In other words, is it apparent that d Parliament must have attached insufficient importance to the applicant's convention right? As I have indicated, I would answer 'No' to this question in the present case.

[80] As a footnote I should add that in stating this conclusion I am not to be taken as expressing a view on what would be the position if, as is now under consideration, the current limit of £25,000 were removed and the 1974 Act were e to apply to loans regardless of their amount. An adverse consequence, acceptable for a loan of £25,000, may not be acceptable when applied to a loan of £250,000.

LORD HOPE OF CRAIGHEAD.

[81] My Lords, it is a mark of the importance of the issues which have been f raised by the case that neither of the parties to the dispute which have given rise to it have taken any part in the appeal to this House. It has been brought by the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, who was joined as a party to the proceedings in the Court of Appeal ([2001] EWCA Civ 633, [2001] 3 All ER 229, [2002] QB 74) in response to a notice which was served on her under s 5(1) of the g Human Rights Act 1998. It has been responded to by four providers of motor insurance to the general public in the United Kingdom, by the Speaker of the House of Commons and the Clerk of the Parliaments (the House authorities) and by the Finance and Leasing Association which is the leading trade association representing the consumer finance industry. Your Lordships have also had the h benefit of helpful submissions by an amicus curiae appointed by the Attorney General. In this situation the facts of the case may seem to be of little importance. But they cannot be overlooked entirely, as they provide the context for an examination of the wider issues that need to be dealt with.

[82] My noble and learned friend, Lord Nicholls of Birkenhead, has set out the underlying facts. I am happy to adopt what he has said about them and confine j myself to what I see as the essential details. The first point is that the transaction between Mrs Wilson and First County Trust (FCT) was entered into, was acted upon by both sides and was the subject of proceedings in the county court all before the relevant provisions of the 1998 Act were brought into force on 2 October 2000 by the Human Rights Act 1998 (Commencement No 2) Order 2000, SI 2000/1851.

[83] The loan agreement was signed on 22 January 1999. The loan was for a period of six months. It was due to be repaid, together with interest, on 21 July 1999. Mrs Wilson did not repay the loan on that date. On 23 July 1999 FCT sought payment of the amount due under the agreement. Mrs Wilson then instituted proceedings against FCT in the county court. She sought a declaration under the Consumer Credit Act 1974 that the agreement was unenforceable, its reopening on the ground that the rate of interest at 94·78% was grossly excessive and an injunction forbidding FCT from disposing of the motor car which it had taken from Mrs Wilson in pawn as security for the loan. An interim injunction was granted on 12 August 1999. On 24 September 1999 the judge refused Mrs Wilson's application for a declaration that the agreement was void and unenforceable. But he granted a declaration that the credit agreement was extortionate, substituted a monthly interest charge at an agreed rate and permitted Mrs Wilson to redeem the motor car on payment of the loan with interest on or before 1 October 1999. On 18 October 1999 she gave notice of an appeal against the rejection of her claim that the agreement was unenforceable. But on 17 December 1999 she redeemed her car by paying the whole of the sum that was then due to FCT.

[84] Mrs Wilson's appeal against FCT came before the Court of Appeal for hearing on 9 November 2000. By that date the 1998 Act had come into force. As Sir Andrew Morritt V-C observed when judgment was given on 23 November, neither party relied on it ([2001] QB 407 at 417, [2001] 2 WLR 302 at 312 (para 25)). But he said that that did not absolve the court from considering its application. So it was that the court, having concluded that it was barred by s 127(3) of the 1974 Act from enforcing the agreement and that Mrs Wilson was entitled to repayment of the sum which she had paid to redeem her motor car, decided to adjourn the appeal to enable further consideration to be given to the question whether the bar on its enforcement infringed FCT's convention rights (European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms 1950 (as set out in Sch 1 to the 1998 Act) and, if so, whether it should make a declaration of incompatibility under s 4 of the 1998 Act.

[85] This brief history shows that the transaction which has given rise to this appeal was over and done with before the relevant provisions of the 1998 Act were brought into force, subject only to the question whether Mrs Wilson is entitled to repayment of the sum which she paid over to redeem her motor car. This raises a difficult and important question about the extent to which the 1998 Act can be relied upon so as to affect rights and obligations arising from previous transactions (the retrospectivity issue). Then there is the question whether, if the 1998 Act can be relied upon in these circumstances, the effect of s 127(3) of the 1974 Act in the events which have happened is to engage any of FCT's convention rights (the convention rights issue).

[86] The second point is that, in the course of its discussion in the judgment which was delivered on 2 May 2001 of the question whether the provisions of s 127(3) of the 1984 Act were incompatible with FCT's convention rights, the Court of Appeal examined the content of the debates on the Consumer Credit Bill in Parliament as reported in Hansard in order to identify the aims and issues of social policy which led to its enactment ([2001] EWCA Civ 633 at [35]–[37], [2001] 3 All ER 229 at [35]–[37], [2002] QB 74). In the Court of Appeal the Secretary of State submitted that an attempt to do this was illegitimate. Her position before your Lordships was, as the learned Attorney General put it on her behalf, more moderate. But he urged caution in the use of this material and criticised the way it had been used by the Court of Appeal. The argument that its use is illegitimate has not gone away, however. It was the subject of submissions made by Mr Sumption QC on behalf of the House authorities, and it is plain in view of its importance that we must deal with it: (the reference to Hansard issue).

[87] There is one other issue which has to be addressed. As has already been mentioned, the Court of Appeal held in its first judgment that the effect of s 127(3) of the 1974 Act was that the agreement between Mrs Wilson and FCT was unenforceable and that she was entitled to repayment of the sum which she paid over to redeem her motor car. Sir Andrew Morritt V-C ([2001] QB 407 at 416, [2001] 2 WLR 302 at 311 (para 20)) said that he would not wish to arrive at a conclusion which permitted Mrs Wilson both to retain her car and to recover the money which she paid to redeem it unless the statutory provisions left no alternative. Having considered the decision of your Lordships' House in Dimond v Lovell [2000] 2 All ER 897, [2002] 1 AC 384 however he concluded that prima facie she was entitled to the orders which she sought ([2001] QB 407 at 417, [2001] 2 WLR 302 at 312 (para 25)). FCT have not sought to appeal against this decision, and it will not be disturbed. But the Secretary of State submits that the decision in Dimond's case is distinguishable and that, if the agreement is unenforceable, FCT is entitled to a restitutionary remedy against Mrs Wilson (the Dimond v Lovell issue).

THE RETROSPECTIVITY ISSUE

[88] The Court of Appeal decided ([2001] 3 All ER 229 at [50], [2002] QB 74 at [50]) that it would be appropriate to declare that, having regard to the terms prescribed by reg 6(1) of and Sch 6 to the Consumer Credit (Agreements) Regulations 1983, SI 1983/1553, the provisions of s 127(3) of the 1974 Act, in so far as they prevent the court from making an enforcement order under s 65(1) of that Act unless a document containing all the prescribed forms of the agreement has been signed by the debtor or hirer are incompatible with the rights guaranteed to the creditor or hirer by art 6(1) of the convention and art 1 of the First Protocol. The issue is whether it was open to the Court of Appeal to make this declaration.

[89] The Secretary of State submits that it was not open to the Court of Appeal to do so, as ss 1 and 4 of the 1998 Act came into force after the agreement was made, after the due date for payment under that agreement and after judgment had been pronounced in the county court on Mrs Wilson's application for a declaration that the agreement was void and unenforceable. Her argument is that FCT had at the relevant times no convention rights under the 1998 Act that were capable of being infringed by the operation of s 127(3) of the 1974 Act. In short, as the declaration was made in relation to events which occurred before the 1998 Act fully came into force, it offends against the general principle that legislation does not have effect retrospectively (see Bennion Statutory Interpretation (4th edn, 2002) pp 265–269 and 689–690).

[90] The only provision in the 1998 Act which gives retrospective effect to any of its provisions is s 22(4). It directs attention exclusively to that part of the Act which deals with the acts of public authorities (see ss 6–9). What it says is that s 7(1)(b) applies to proceedings brought by or at the instigation of a public authority whenever the act in question took place. I do not think that there is any mystery as to why this provision was included in the 1998 Act, although the consequences that flow from it are much less certain. The explanation lies in the fact that the purpose of ss 6–9 of the Act is to provide a remedial structure in domestic law for the rights guaranteed by the convention. As art 13 of the convention makes clear, it is the obligation of states which have ratified the convention to provide everyone within their jurisdiction with an effective remedy if the rights or freedoms which it protects are violated. The scheme of the Act is to give effect in domestic law to the obligation which is set out in art 13. If that scheme was to be followed through, victims had to be given an effective remedy in domestic law for a violation by the state of their convention rights. The principle upon which the Act proceeds is that actions by public authorities are unlawful if they are in breach of convention rights (s 6(1)). Effect is given to that principle in s 7. But it was appreciated that victims of a violation by the state of their convention rights were already entitled to obtain a remedy in the European Court of Human Rights under art 41 of the convention. In that context it made sense for the provisions of s 6(1) to be made available for use defensively where proceedings are brought against the victim by or at the instigation of a public authority, whenever the violation took place. That is what s 22(4) achieves by enabling s 7(1)(b) to be given effect retrospectively.

[91] But we are not concerned with the acts of public authorities in this case or with proceedings brought by or at the instigation of a public authority. There is no claim by a victim that a public authority has acted in a way that is made unlawful by s 6(1) of the Act.

[92] It has been held that acts of courts or tribunals which took place before 2 October 2000 which they were required to do by primary legislation and were done according to the meaning which was to be given to the legislation at that time are not affected by s 22(4) (see R v Kansal (No 2) [2001] UKHL 62 at [84], [2002] 1 All ER 257 at [84], [2002] 2 AC 69; Wainwright v Home Office [2001] EWCA Civ 2081 at [29]–[36], [2003] 3 All ER 943 at [29]–[36], [2002] QB 1334). It has also been held that the Act cannot be relied upon retrospectively to make unlawful conduct which was lawful at the time when it took place (see Wainwright's case (at [40])). The effect of these decisions is that the 1998 Act cannot be applied retroactively so as to deem the law to have been different from what it was when these acts were done. But we are not concerned in this case with the lawfulness of acts done or the lawfulness of conduct which took place before the Act was brought fully into force. The question in this case is whether the rights and obligations of parties to an agreement made before 2 October 2000 are, as a result of the coming into force of the relevant provisions of the 1998 Act, different now from what they were when the agreement was entered into.

[93] The approach which the Court of Appeal took to this problem was to apply s 6(1) of the 1998 Act to the facts of this case, as the court was required by that subsection to act in a way which was compatible with convention rights, and then to ask itself whether the order which it was about to make was or was not compatible with convention rights. Its conclusion was that, approached in this way, the relevant event was not the making of the agreement on 22 January 1999 but the making of its order on the appeal. Section 22(4) had no relevance, as the court had had to have regard to the facts as they were at the time when it made its order (see [2001] 3 All ER 229 at [22]).

[94] While it is true that the court is required by s 6(1) of the 1998 Act to act in a way that is compatible with convention rights, the issue in this case relates to the meaning and effect of legislation. The first task which confronts the court in a case of this kind is to construe the provisions of the statute which it is being asked to apply. The question which the Court of Appeal posed for itself in November 2000 was whether it was possible to read and give effect to s 127(3) of the 1974 Act in a way that was compatible with FCT's rights under art 6(1) of the convention and art 1 of the First Protocol. a

[95] But one does not need to go to s 6(1) of the 1998 Act to discover the obligation which the court had to fulfil in these circumstances. Its obligation is to be found in s 3(1). That subsection provides that, so far as it is possible to do so, primary and subordinate legislation must be read and given effect in a way that is compatible with convention rights. A person who claims that a court or tribunal b has acted in a way that is made unlawful by s 6(1) may bring proceedings under s 7(1)(a) in the manner provided for by s 9(1) and, if compensation is required under art 5(5), may be awarded damages under s 9(3). But a person who claims that a court or tribunal has failed to fulfil the interpretative obligation laid down by s 3(1) has no need to go to s 7(1)(a) for his remedy. The meaning and effect of legislation is a question of law, so if an error is made about this the ordinary c avenues of appeal are available.

[96] In my opinion the issue about retrospectivity in this case resolves itself into a question as to whether s 3(1) permits the court, when it is determining after 2 October 2000 whether s 127(3) of the 1974 Act is compatible with FCT's convention rights, to hold that the rights and obligations of parties to the d agreement are, as a result of the coming into force of the relevant provisions of the 1998 Act on that date, different now from what they were at the time when the agreement was entered into in January 1999.

[97] The first thing to notice about s 3(1) of the 1998 Act is that, as to its temporal effect, it is entirely general and unqualified. But some guidance can be found in s 3(2)(a), which says that s 3 applies to primary and secondary legislation e 'whenever enacted'. So at least it can be said that it was plainly not the intention that legislation which was enacted before 2 October 2000 should be immune from the interpretative obligation which s 3(1) lays down. It would have been surprising if the Act had that effect. It would have greatly emasculated the underlying concept of bringing human rights home. f

[98] Then there is the general presumption that legislation is not intended to operate retrospectively. That presumption is based on concepts of fairness and legal certainty. These concepts require that accrued rights and the legal effect of past acts should not be altered by subsequent legislation. But the mere fact that a statute depends for its application in the future on events that have happened in g the past does not offend against the presumption. For a recent example of this point reference may be made to R v Field, R v Young [2002] EWCA Crim 2913, [2003] 3 All ER 769, [2003] 1 WLR 882. In that case it was held that the making of a disqualification order under s 28 of the Criminal Justice and Court Services Act 2000 against a defendant from working with children in the future did not offend against the presumption where the offending behaviour had occurred h before that Act came into force. It illustrates the point that there is an important distinction to be made between legislation which affects transactions that have created rights and obligations which the parties seek to enforce against each other and legislation which affects transactions that have resulted in the bringing of proceedings in the public interest by a public authority. The concepts of fairness j and legal certainty carry much greater weight when it is being suggested that rights or obligations which were acquired or entered into before 2 October 2000 should be altered retrospectively.

[99] Account may also be taken of the purpose of the 1998 Act. Its long title states that it was intended to give further effect to rights and freedoms guaranteed under the convention. The rights to which the Act gives effect are rights guaranteed by the convention which the United Kingdom has already signed and ratified. In R v Field [2003] 3 All ER 769 at [61] the Court of Appeal accepted a submission by the Secretary of State for the Home Department that the court should take a more relaxed approach to a potentially retroactive element in legislation where its intended purpose was, as it clearly was in the case of s 28 of the 2000 Act, to protect children. I would apply the same reasoning to s 3 of the 1998 Act. Its purpose is to ensure that legislation is read and given effect in a way that is compatible with convention rights, so far as it is possible to do so, whenever the legislation was enacted. To restrict the application of the interpretative obligation, without exception, to 'events' that happened or 'transactions' entered into on or after 2 October 2000 would be to introduce a restriction which is not stated expressly anywhere in the 1998 Act. A restriction in such absolute and all-embracing terms would seem to be contrary to the intention of the legislation and incapable of being read into it by necessary implication.

[100] But the consequence of reading s 127(3) of the 1974 Act in a way that is compatible with FCT's convention rights cannot be looked at without taking account of the effects of doing so on the other party to the transaction, Mrs Wilson. She too acquired rights as a result of the transaction, as well as FCT. The set of provisions of which it forms part, and on which she relies, were enacted for the protection of consumers. Section 61(1) provides that a regulated agreement is not properly executed unless it satisfies certain requirements. It must include a statement of all the prescribed terms, which include a term stating the amount of the credit (see para 2 of Sch 6 to the 1983 regulations). Section 65(1) provides that an improperly-executed agreement is enforceable against the debtor or the hirer on an order of the court only. The amount of the credit in this agreement was incorrectly stated, so Mrs Wilson became entitled to the protection of s 65(1) as soon as it was entered into. What this right meant in her case was spelled out in s 127(3), which provides:

> 'The court shall not make an enforcement order under section 65(1) if section 61(1)(a) (signing of agreements) was not complied with unless a document (whether or not in the prescribed form and complying with regulations under section 60(1)) itself containing all the prescribed terms of the agreement was signed by the debtor or hirer (whether or not in the prescribed manner).'

[101] Let it be assumed, then, that the effect of s 127(3) is to engage FCT's convention rights and that it is possible to read and give effect to the subsection in a way that is compatible with them. This will, inevitably, have the consequence of removing from Mrs Wilson the protection which ss 61(1)(a), 65(1) and 127(3) were designed to give her when the agreement was entered into. It seems to me that the presumption against the retrospective effect of legislation ought to be given its full weight in these circumstances. The case may be regarded as a typical example of the situation where legislation in question affects transactions that have created rights and obligations which the parties to it seek to enforce against each other. I recognise that there may be cases (and I have referred to R v Field [2003] 3 All ER 769 as an example) where a more relaxed approach will be appropriate. There is an obvious attraction in a solution to the application of the presumption to the obligation in s 3(1) which depends on clear, bright line rules which do not admit of any exceptions. But rules of that kind would be bound to lead to unfairness in some cases or to have consequences that could not have been intended for other reasons. So I would prefer to base my decision in this case on the particular facts and circumstances. I would hold that the presumption would be violated in this case if s 127(3) were to be construed in FCT's favour in a way that deprived Mrs Wilson of the protection which it was designed to give her when she entered into the agreement on 22 January 1999.

[102] It follows that, as a determination of the question whether s 127(3) of the 1974 Act could be read and given effect in a way that was compatible with FCT's convention rights would offend against the principle that legislation does not have effect retrospectively, it was not open to the Court of Appeal in these proceedings to make a declaration of incompatibility.

THE CONVENTION RIGHTS ISSUE

[103] The question is whether the effect of s 127(3) of the 1974 Act in the events which have happened is to engage any of FCT's convention rights. If I am right on the retrospectivity issue this question does not arise. But the Court of Appeal dealt with the question, so I should like to make these brief observations about it. The convention rights that are in issue are those which are set out in art 6(1) of the convention and art 1 of the First Protocol. The Court of Appeal asked itself whether the exclusion of what it described as 'any meaningful consideration by the court' of the creditor's rights under an improperly executed agreement was legitimate, having regard to the fundamental nature of the right guaranteed by art 6(1), and it held that the exclusion of any judicial remedy engaged that article and also art 1 of the First Protocol (see [2001] 3 All ER 229 at [31], [32]).

[104] Article 6(1) of the convention provides a guarantee to everyone of access to the court for the determination of his or her civil rights and obligations. As the European Court of Human Rights has explained, this provision must be read in the light of the rule of law referred to in the preamble to the convention of which an integral part is the principle that a civil claim must be capable of being submitted to a judge (see Golder v UK (1975) 1 EHRR 524 at 535–536 (paras 35, 36)). A provision which operated as a procedural bar to access to the court for the enforcement of a civil right would be engaged by this article. But it is for domestic law to determine the extent and content of a person's civil rights (see H v Belgium (1987) 10 EHRR 339 at 346–347 (para 40)). The rights which art 6(1) guarantees are rights of procedural fairness. They do not guarantee that a person's substantive civil rights are of any particular character.

[105] As the European Court said in Powell v UK (App No 45305/99) (4 May 2000, unreported):

> 'For the court, it still remains the case that an applicant must be able to demonstrate an arguable claim under domestic law that there has been a breach of a civil right actionable in law. It is still impermissible for the court to arrogate to itself the task of creating in favour of an individual a substantive right where none is recognised under domestic law.'

What art 6(1) seeks to do, then, is to protect the individual against anything which restricts or impairs his access to the courts for the determination of a civil right whose existence is at least arguable. But the precise scope and content of the individual's civil rights is a matter for each state party to determine (see also Matthews v Ministry of Defence [2003] UKHL 4 at [49]–[53], [2003] 1 All ER 689 at [49]–[53], [2003] ICR 247).

[106] Article 1 of the First Protocol has a similar character. It does not confer a right of property as such nor does it guarantee the content of any rights in property. What it does instead is to guarantee the peaceful enjoyment of the possessions that a person already owns, of which a person cannot be deprived except in the public interest and subject to the conditions provided for by law (see Marckx v Belgium (1979) 2 EHRR 330 at 350 (para 50)). Here too it is a matter for domestic law to define the nature and extent of any rights which a party acquires from time to time as a result of the transactions which he or she enters into. One must, of course, distinguish carefully between cases where the effect of the relevant law is to deprive a person of something that he already owns and those where its effect is to subject his right from the outset to the reservation or qualification which is now being enforced against him. The making of a compulsory order or of an order for the division of property on divorce are examples of the former category. In those cases it is the making of the order, not the existence of the law under which the order is made, that interrupts the peaceful enjoyment by the owner of his property. The fact that the relevant law was already in force when the right of property was acquired is immaterial, if it did not have the effect of qualifying the right from the moment when it was acquired.

[107] The rights of property which are in issue in this case are those set in an agreement which is regulated by the 1974 Act. The Act subjects the rights of the creditor to restrictions in some circumstances. Section 65 declares that a regulated agreement which is improperly executed cannot be enforced by the creditor except by means of an order of the court, and s 127(3) declares that it is not to be enforceable at all except upon the condition which it lays down. The agreement which was entered into in this case was from the outset an agreement which was improperly executed. So it was always subject to the restrictions on its execution which ss 65(1) and 127(3) of the 1974 Act set out. I would hold that FCT's convention rights under art 1 of the First Protocol are not engaged in these circumstances.

[108] The Court of Appeal ([2001] 3 All ER 229 at [32]) said that the effect of ss 65(1) and 127(3) was to deprive the pawnbroker of its ability to enjoy benefit from the contractual rights arising from the agreement or from the rights arising from the delivery of the pawn. But the fact is that FCT never had an absolute and unqualified right to enforce this agreement or to enforce the rights arising from the delivery of the motor car. Article 6(1) of the convention and art 1 of the First Protocol cannot be used to confer absolute and unqualified rights on FCT which, having regard to the terms of the statute by which agreements of this kind are regulated, it never had at any time under the improperly executed agreement which it entered into.

[109] As I would hold that art 1 of the First Protocol is not engaged in this case, I do not need to examine the question whether s 127(3) is compatible with the rights guaranteed by that article. Had it been necessary for me to do so, I would have reached the same conclusion as Lord Nicholls of Birkenhead has done for the reasons he gives.

THE REFERENCE TO HANSARD ISSUE

[110] One of the happy characteristics of the Human Rights Act 1998 is that it did not attempt to solve all the problems that were bound to arise as a result of giving effect in domestic law to convention rights. Among these problems was the effect which its provisions would be likely to have on the relationship between the courts and Parliament. This was left to be worked out in accordance with familiar constitutional principles.

[111] One of these principles, which has repeatedly been emphasised, is that legislation is the exclusive responsibility of Parliament. The judges' task is to interpret, not to legislate (see Poplar Housing and Regeneration Community Association Ltd v Donoghue [2001] EWCA Civ 595 at [75], [2001] 4 All ER 604 at [75], [2002] QB 48 per Lord Woolf CJ; R v Lambert [2001] UKHL 37 at [79], [2001] 3 All ER 577 at [79], [2002] 2 AC 545; Re S (children: care plan), Re W (children: care plan) [2002] UKHL 10 at [39], [2002] 2 All ER 192 at [39], [2002] 2 AC 291 per Lord Nicholls of Birkenhead). Another is that it is the intention of Parliament that defines the policy and objects of its enactments, not the purpose or intention of the Executive. The courts for their part must respect this principle, which means that the legislative function belongs to Parliament not to the Executive. Then there is the rule which art 9 of the Bill of Rights 1689 lays down that proceedings in Parliament ought not to be impeached or questioned in any court or place outside Parliament. For their part both Houses of Parliament abstain from discussing the merits of disputes that are about to be tried and adjudicated on by the courts (Erskine May, Treatise on the Law, Privileges, Proceedings and Usage of Parliament (22nd edn, 1997) pp 383–384 and 452–453). As Lord Nicholls has said, all courts are keenly aware of the importance of the legislature and the judiciary each discharging their own constitutional roles and not trespassing into functions that belong to the other.

[112] The question which the House authorities have raised is therefore an important one, and the position needs to be clarified. It has been prompted by the use which the Court of Appeal made of Hansard in its examination of the question whether this was a case where it should defer, on democratic grounds, to the considered opinion of the legislature (see [2001] 3 All ER 229 at [34]–[36]). The Court of Appeal rejected (at [34]) the Secretary of State's submission that, because the legislation had been enacted, it must be taken to represent the considered opinion of the elected body and that it was not for the courts to question the basis upon which that opinion was reached. Having done so, it embarked upon an examination of the parliamentary debates on the Bill. It did this (at [35]–[36]) not as an aid to construction of the legislation as its meaning was not in doubt, but to discover the reason which led Parliament to think that it was necessary to enact s 127(3) and thus to deny to the courts the power to do what was just in the cases to which it refers.

[113] Mr Sumption QC for the House authorities did not seek to question the use of Hansard for the limited purpose described in Pepper (Inspector of Taxes) v Hart [1993] 1 All ER 42, [1993] AC 593, although he drew attention to some of the conceptual difficulties. As I understand that decision, it recognised a limited exception to the general rule that resort to Hansard was inadmissible. Its purpose is to prevent the Executive seeking to place a meaning on words used in legislation which is different from that which ministers attributed to those words when promoting the legislation in Parliament (see R v Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions, ex p Spath Holme Ltd [2001] 1 All ER 195 at 226–227, [2001] 2 AC 349 at 407–408). Mr Sumption recognised that the exception thus stated has commanded broad acceptance where it has operated as a kind of quasi-estoppel against the Executive. He also recognised that Hansard might be referred to where a statement made by a minister in Parliament was relevant to a challenge by way of judicial review to what he had done (see, for example, Brind v Secretary of State for the Home Dept [1991] 1 All ER 720, [1991] 1 AC 696). This was because what the minister said in Parliament was evidence of why he acted as he did. The position was no different from what it would have been if his statement had been recorded in a letter. But Mr Sumption stressed that any such exceptions should be clearly defined and that they should be based on principle.

[114] The concern which he expressed was directed to the use of Hansard in this case for the purpose of seeking to discover from debates in Parliament the reasons which Parliament had for making the enactment. He said that this was quite different from seeking to discover what words mean. It was one thing to refer to Hansard to ensure that legislation was not misconstrued in favour of the Executive. That use could be said to be in support of the principle of parliamentary sovereignty. It was another to refer to it in order to form a view as to whether Parliament had given sufficient reasons for doing what it did and, if not, whether the legislation was incompatible with convention rights. To use Hansard in this way was to use it for a purpose which was adverse to the intention of Parliament.

[115] Mr Sumption put forward two objections to this use of Hansard on grounds of principle. The first was that it involved examining the nature and quality of Parliament's reasoning in a case where there was no doubt about what Parliament had enacted. Where it was used for the purpose explained in Pepper v Hart there was a threshold that had to be satisfied—the test of ambiguity. Here there was no such threshold, as the suggestion was that Hansard could be resorted to however clear were the provisions set out in the enactment. The second was that its object was not to give effect to the will of Parliament but to measure the sufficiency of reasons given for the legislation against standards derived from the convention. He said that this was contrary to art 9 of the Bill of Rights 1689. It was not for the courts to consider whether speeches made during debates in Parliament had put forward convention-compliant reasons for supporting it.

[116] I think that there is much force in these criticisms of the approach which the Court of Appeal took to this issue. But it would be going too far to say, as Mr Sumption did, that there are no circumstances where use may be made of Hansard where the purpose of doing so is to answer the question whether legislation is compatible with convention rights. The boundaries between the respective powers and functions of the courts and of Parliament must, of course, be respected. It is no part of the court's function to determine whether sufficient reasons were given by Parliament for passing the enactment. On the other hand it has to perform the tasks which have been given to it by Parliament. Among those tasks is that to which s 4(1) refers. It has the task of determining, if the issue is raised, whether a provision of primary legislation is compatible with a convention right. It does not follow from recognition that there is an area of judgment within which the judiciary will defer to the elected body on democratic grounds that the court is absolutely disabled from forming its own view in these cases as to whether or not the legislation is compatible. That question is ultimately for the court not for Parliament, as Parliament itself has enacted. The harder that question is to answer, the more important it is that the court is equipped with the information that it needs to perform its task.

[117] This, then, is the justification for resorting to Hansard in cases where the question at issue is not one of interpretation but whether the legislation is compatible. A cautious approach is needed, and particular care must be taken not to stray beyond the search for material that will simply inform the court into the forbidden territory of questioning the proceedings in Parliament. To suggest, as the Court of Appeal did ([2001] 3 All ER 229 at [36]), that what was said in debate tends to confuse rather than illuminate would be to cross that boundary. It is for Parliament alone to decide what reasons, if any, need to be given for the legislation that it enacts. The quality or sufficiency of reasons given by the promoter of the legislation is a matter for Parliament to determine, not the court.

[118] But proceedings in Parliament are replete with information from a whole variety of sources. It appears in a variety of forms also, all of which are made public. Ministers make statements, members ask questions or propose amendments based on information which they have obtained from their constituencies, answers are given to written questions, issues are explored by select committees by examining witnesses and explanatory notes are provided with Bills to assist members in their consideration of it. Resort to information of this kind may cast light on what Parliament's aim was when it passed the provision which is in question or it may not. If it does not this cannot, and must not, be a ground for criticism. But if it does, the court would be unduly inhibited if it were to be disabled from obtaining and using this information for the strictly limited purpose of considering whether legislation is compatible with convention rights. This is an exercise which the European Court may wish to perform in order to determine, for example, whether the aim of the contested legislation was a legitimate one or whether an interference with the peaceful enjoyment of possession was justified (see James v UK (1986) 8 EHRR 123 at 143 (para 48); Mellacher v Austria (1989) 12 EHRR 391 at 409 (para 47); Ambruosi v Italy (2002) 35 EHRR 125 at 131 (para 28)). It is an exercise which the domestic court too may perform when it is carrying out the task under s 4(1) of the 1998 Act which has been entrusted to it by Parliament.

THE DIMOND v LOVELL ISSUE

[119] The Court of Appeal made it clear in its first judgment that it did not wish to arrive at a conclusion which permitted Mrs Wilson both to retain the car and to recover the £6,900 unless the statutory provisions left no alternative ([2001] QB 407 at 416, [2001] 2 WLR 302 at 311 (para 20) per Sir Andrew Morritt V-C). But it held, following Lord Hoffmann's observations in Dimond v Lovell [2000] 2 All ER 897 at 906, [2002] 1 AC 384 at 397–398, that the effect of s 127(3) of the 1974 Act was to render the agreement irredeemably unenforceable and that a claim for unjust enrichment must fail because this was precisely the consequence prescribed by Parliament.

[120] Mr Crow for the Secretary of State submitted that Dimond v Lovell was distinguishable and that it should not be applied in this case. He pointed out that the transaction in that case was different from that which Mrs Wilson had entered into with FCT. In Dimond v Lovell the payments which were in issue were the cost of hiring the replacement car. It was held that those payments were not recoverable as a matter of contract, and there was no basis for implying an obligation to pay which was contrary to the provisions of the statute. In this case Mrs Wilson's enrichment was not limited to the cost of the loan. It was not just that she was being relieved of the obligation of paying interest on it. Her enrichment extended to the principal of the loan itself, because the effect of s 127(3) was that she kept the sum of £5,000 as well as the motor car. He submitted that, while exoneration of the obligation to pay interest was plainly within the contemplation of the statute, retention of the principal sum which had been lent to her under the agreement was not.

[121] At first sight there is, to say the least, something odd about the result that Mrs Wilson has achieved in this case. But the effect of the failure to comply with the requirements of the 1983 regulations was that the entire agreement under which FCT provided the loan to Mrs Wilson, having taken possession of her car in pawn, was unenforceable. The statutory bar on its enforcement extended to FCT's right to recover the total sum payable on redemption, which included the principal as well as interest. That is what the statute provides. I do not think that it is open to us to say that Parliament did not contemplate that the effect of this provision, which was to disable the creditor from recovering the principal of the sum lent as well as the interest on it, might be to enrich the borrower. Once that position is reached, the position is clear. The court cannot override the statutory provision by substituting a common law remedy.

[122] As Lord Hoffmann pointed out in Dimond v Lovell [2000] 2 All ER 897 at 907, [2002] 1 AC 384 at 398, the conclusion which he reached in that case was consistent with previous authority. In Orakpo v Manson Investments Ltd [1977] 3 All ER 1, [1978] AC 95 the transaction entered into under which loans were made to enable the borrower to acquire and develop certain properties were held to be unenforceable under ss 6 and 13(1) of the Moneylenders Act 1927. The effect was to enrich the borrower, who had fallen into arrears of payments of interest and moneys due but was successful in his defence that all the transactions including those which provided security rights to the creditor were unenforceable. Lord Diplock observed that, while the Moneylenders Acts were designed to protect unsophisticated borrowers from being overreached by unscrupulous moneylenders, they were capable of being used by unscrupulous borrowers to avoid paying their just debts to moneylenders. He considered whether a remedy in subrogation to redress the unjust enrichment might be available. But he concluded that, much as he should have liked to have done so, it was not open to him to mitigate the harshness to the moneylender and the undeserved enrichment of the borrower which had resulted from the technical failure to observe the provisions of the Act.

[123] In my opinion the same result must follow in this case. I would be reluctant to say that the enrichment of Mrs Wilson was an unjustified enrichment. There is no doubt that she has received a benefit which cannot be justified on legal grounds at the expense of the creditor. But s 127(3) of the 1974 Act too, like ss 6 and 13(1) of the 1927 Act, was designed to protect unsophisticated borrowers. There is no doubt that they would be exposed to the risk of harassment by unscrupulous creditors if creditors could override the statute by appealing to the common law. I would prefer to say that it would be inconsistent with the statute to provide FCT with a common law remedy to redress the enrichment which Mrs Wilson has received at its expense.

CONCLUSION

[124] I would allow the appeal and set aside the declaration of incompatibility.

LORD HOBHOUSE OF WOODBOROUGH.

[125] My Lords, this exceptional appeal raises important questions under two distinct heads, the first relating to the proper construction of the Human Rights Act 1998 and the second regarding the use of parliamentary materials, specifically Hansard, in relation to questions arising under the provisions contained in Sch 1 to the Act defining the convention rights (European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms 1950 (as set out in Sch 1 to the 1998 Act)). The facts which gave rise to the original litigation have been set out in the opinion of my noble and learned friend Lord Nicholls of Birkenhead as have the relevant dates and the unusual procedural history leading to this appeal which has been argued not by either of the original parties but by other interests. The House has also had the valuable assistance of counsel acting as amici curiæ.

THE 1998 ACT

[126] Although the main question of construction is to decide to what extent (if at all) the Act has retrospective effect, the first task is to examine the structure of the Act. The Act does not simply say, as do some comparable Acts (eg s 1(2) of the Carriage of Goods by Sea Act 1971), that the provisions of the convention 'shall have the force of law'. Its approach is more subtle. It has a limited definition of 'Convention rights' (s 1). It requires courts in determining a question in connection with a convention right to 'take into account' judgments of the European Court of Human Rights and other cognate material (s 2). It thus, at the outset, draws a distinction between the international obligations of the United Kingdom under the convention and what are to be the municipal law obligations of the three organs of the state, the Executive, the legislature and the judiciary. So far as the convention is concerned such distinctions are in principle irrelevant. If the provisions of the convention have been broken, the relevant state is in breach and no further analysis is required. The Act, on the other hand, follows a scheme which recognises that the role of the judiciary is to apply and enforce the 'Convention rights' municipally, treats the Executive branch of government, in the form of any public authority, as being civilly liable for any breach of the 'Convention rights' on its part and makes their offending conduct unlawful, and recognises that laws passed by the legislature may be incompatible with a 'Convention right'. Each of the three aspects of government are treated differently in the Act (though not in the convention). But there is one complicating factor to which I must return later—the inclusion of courts in the definition of 'public authority' (s 6(3)(a)).

THE LEGISLATURE, SECTION 4

[127] In order to preserve the traditional supremacy of Parliament in the constitution of the United Kingdom, legislation cannot be invalidated by the Act even if it is incompatible with the convention. This involves a recognition that the United Kingdom can, by reason of legislation on the statute book, be in breach of the convention if Parliament should so choose and it is the statute which must be upheld and applied by the judiciary. This situation is further confirmed by ss 4(6) and 6(2). A declaration of incompatibility under s 4 is thus unique. It has no effect in law except to provide a minister with the opportunity, by way of delegated legislation, to use the powers conferred by s 10 and Sch 2. Section 4 is different in character from any of the other provisions of the Act. It does not have as its subject matter the rights or obligations of any person in municipal law. It does not even affect the rights of the parties before the court at the time (s 4(6)). It merely contains a provision enabling—the word used is 'may'—the court, should it think fit, to make a declaration about the current state of the statute law of this country. The declaration applies only to the present (s 4(2) and (4)). If the legislation in question has been amended or repealed no question of a declaration under s 4 can arise. Section 4 involves no retrospectivity and there is therefore always jurisdiction to make a declaration. But it is unlikely that a court will make a declaration when it would be wholly gratuitous and, in such a case, the point probably would not have been argued and s 4(1) probably would not be satisfied. The course adopted by the Court of Appeal in the present case ([2001] EWCA Civ 633, [2001] 3 All ER 229, [2002] QB 74), raising the question of incompatibility of its own motion when the parties had not, was in my view a work of supererogation and improper.

THE LEGISLATURE, S 3

[128] Section 3 has a different character although it again deals with legislation. It does change the law. It does change the parties' rights and obligations. Before the 1998 Act came into force, legislation had to be construed applying the ordinary canons of construction: the legislation would therefore have the legal effect 'x'. After the 1998 Act came into force, the same legislation may, because of the requirement that 'so far as it is possible' the legislation 'must be read and given effect in a way which is compatible with the Convention rights', have legal effect 'y'. Conduct that was lawful before may become unlawful and unlawful conduct may become lawful. A right or liberty that someone did not have before may be granted to them by the operation of s 3(1) when it came into force. Section 3 therefore has raised a question of retrospectivity answered in R v Lambert [2001] UKHL 37, [2001] 3 All ER 577, [2002] 2 AC 545 and R v Kansal (No 2) [2001] UKHL 62 at [83], [84], [2002] 1 All ER 257 at [83], [84], [2002] 2 AC 69 per Lord Hope of Craighead.

[129] But confusion has been created by the dual relevance of s 3. As well as the effect which I have explained in the preceding paragraph, it has a relevance to s 4. Sections 3 and 4 are both sections which came into effect on the same day, appointed under s 22(3). Therefore no question of incompatibility can arise under s 4 without the relevant legislation being construed in accordance with s 3. If s 3 provides the answer there is no incompatibility. But this is not to give a retrospective effect to s 3 any more than it is to give a retrospective effect to s 4.

THE EXECUTIVE, SECTIONS 6 AND 7

[130] Subject to certain qualifications, s 6(1) makes it unlawful for the Executive to act in a way that is incompatible with a 'Convention right' and s 7(1) empowers any victim of such unlawful conduct (or the threat of it) to take civil proceedings against the relevant authority or rely upon the 'Convention right' in legal proceedings. This, as regards the emanations of the Executive, ie public authorities, creates legal liabilities and, for the citizen, legal rights. These provisions therefore do raise a potential question of retrospectivity. Section 22(4) makes express provision answering this question: as regards the victim defending himself against the authority in proceedings brought by the authority, the victim can rely upon his 'Convention rights' whenever the act in question took place, but otherwise s 7(1) only applies to acts occurring after s 7 came into force. Two consequences flow from this express provision. First it expressly provides a limited retrospective effect to part of s 7(1). Secondly, it carries with it the clear implication that the Act in general does not have retrospective effect. Thus, far from permitting a view that the Act should in general be construed so as to have a retrospective effect, the conclusion is confirmed that the Act should not (save for the limited exception in s 22(4)) be construed so as to have any retrospective effect.

THE JUDICIARY, THE BASIC PRINCIPLE

[131] The judiciary is the part of government which has the responsibility for applying the law. The convention and the decisions of the European Court of Human Rights recognise this, affirming the principles of certainty and 'legality'. There is nothing in the convention which requires the judiciary to do anything else. But, if, in complying with and applying the municipal law, the judiciary do not provide an outcome which is compliant with the rights of victims under the convention, for example, by failing to recognise a right or grant an adequate remedy, the state is in breach of its convention obligations and should change its municipal law. For a court, its duty in the determination of any dispute is to determine it in accordance with the municipal law applicable to the issue. This may include the duty to consider whether a particular statute or statutory provision has retrospective effect or not. If it does have retrospective effect, then that effect must be recognised but, if it does not, it must not be treated as determinative of the legality or legal result of earlier events or conduct, earlier, that is, than the date upon which the relevant change in the law came into effect. The duty I have described is the same for both the original trial court and any appeal court. Just as in a case with a foreign element, it may be necessary to apply the choice of laws rules of private international law, so, in another case when there has been a change in the municipal law between the time of the relevant events or conduct and the time of trial, it may be necessary to decide whether that change had retrospective effect or not. If the answer is that it did not then the change is irrelevant to the rights and liabilities of the parties (save possibly as relevant factual evidence on, say, a question of assessment of damages or causation of loss) and the position in an appellate court is the same. Article 7(1) of the convention provides an illustration of the need to apply the municipal law as it stood at the time of the relevant conduct and the objection to later making illegal conduct which was legal at the time.

THE JUDICIARY, ART 6

[132] Most of the other articles are substantive and, in so far as they affect remedies or procedures, are dependent upon the engagement of the substantive provision. But art 6 comes into a different category: it provides a right to a fair trial. This is a freestanding right and applies directly to the legal process and therefore (inter alia) directly to the conduct of the judiciary. But the article is drafted so as expressly to require that the proceedings be conducted in accordance with the law, that is to say the municipal law, in force at the relevant time—'an independent and impartial tribunal established by law'—'innocent until proved guilty according to law'. These phrases correspond to those used in other articles—'prescribed by law'—'in accordance with the law'. Thus, once the 1998 Act had been brought into effect, the litigant could call upon the tribunal before whom he is appearing to grant him the rights stated in art 6. But it does not follow from this that he can claim a right under the Act in respect of earlier events or conduct or hearings. It is a question of the construction of the Act and whether it is to be given a retrospective effect. It certainly does not follow that merely because he is before a court on a later occasion, he can claim art 6 rights in respect of some earlier hearing which took place before the Act came into force or require that the court apply s 3 of the Act in relation to something which occurred before it came into effect. In any event, in the present case there has been no denial to either party of their 'Convention rights' under art 6.

THE JUDICIARY, SECTIONS 6–8

[133] The inclusion of provisions relating to the Executive and to the judiciary all under the heading 'Public authorities' and the unqualified inclusion of courts in the definition of the term 'public authority' do not assist the reader in making the necessary distinction between the Executive and the judiciary and their different constitutional functions. However, for present purposes and the consideration of what substantive rights were available to the original parties under the Act, the position is tolerably clear. The retrospective effect of ss 6 and 7 are dictated by s 22(4): no retrospective effect is available in the present case. Section 8 makes provision governing the remedies that a court may grant for a breach of a 'Convention right'. One can conceive of exceptional circumstances where art 6 might apply and might therefore give rise to a liability without more under s 8 such as the summary committal of a person for contempt in the face of the court without a fair hearing. But, where a 'judicial act' is concerned, s 9 provides that the remedy is to be by way of appeal. In other words any substantive breach or any failure to provide a fair hearing or to provide an adequate remedy within the confines of s 8, must be challenged by appealing the decision complained about. On the appeal, the substantive question will remain as it was in the lower court applying, in accordance with the basic principle I have identified earlier, the municipal law in force at the time of the events or conduct complained of or to be applied to it by reason of some later statutory provision having retrospective effect. The time at which the appeal is heard is irrelevant; equally irrelevant is which of the parties it is that has appealed.

[134] On this point as well the Court of Appeal was mistaken. The fact that the appeal was being heard after the Act had come into force did not alter what they had to decide or the municipal law which governed the dispute between the parties.

[135] Under these circumstances I will take the remaining points argued on the appeal relatively shortly.

INCOMPATIBILITY

[136] The relevant article is art 1 of the First Protocol. The complaint of those arguing for incompatibility is that the provisions of the Consumer Credit Act 1974 denied the lender its 'Convention rights' under this article. I agree with your Lordships that they did not but my reasoning is not wholly the same. The evidence of what really happened in the material transaction is exiguous and I recognise that the article may have been engaged. The transaction purported to be a transaction of pledge, that is to say, a transaction where the possession of a chattel of the borrower is given to and retained by the lender as security for the repayment of the money lent together with agreed interest. So long as the loan has not been repaid the pledgee has a special title in the chattel which is in his possession, by virtue of that possession. At common law the pledgee can thus sue if his possession is wrongfully interfered with, even by the owner. Dishonestly to deprive the pledgee of the possession of the chattel is theft (formerly larceny). Therefore, s 65 of the 1974 Act has the potential to deprive the pledgee of his special property in the pledged chattel. It follows that s 65 may deprive the pledgee of one of its possessions.

[137] Whether or not this is what actually occurred in the instant case is, for me at least, still not clear but I will proceed on the assumption that there was a true pledge involving a transfer of the possession of the motor car from the borrower to the lenders. The documentation purported to evidence a contract of pledge. On this basis, the lenders were seeking to exercise the rights of a person in possession of a chattel and were being prevented from doing so by s 65 so as, in effect, to deprive them of their possession of the motor car and there would be the basis for an art 1 complaint. If, on the other hand, she actually remained in possession of the motor car throughout, the complaint of the lenders would be that they should have been allowed to seize the motor car from her after she defaulted and sell it to reduce or discharge her indebtedness to them. This would have been merely the purported enforcement of a claimed contractual right which the lenders had never in truth validly acquired, art 1 would never have been engaged and that would be the short answer to the complaint.

[138] On the basis that art 1 was engaged, does the 1974 Act go beyond what is justifiable under that article? For the reasons already given by your Lordships, I consider that it did not. The relevant provisions of the Act are a legitimate exercise in consumer protection. Borrowers are vulnerable and not on an equal footing with lenders. The Act legitimately regulates the transparency and recording of the terms of the loan transaction and makes provision for the clear obtaining of the borrower's informed consent to those terms. Any such Act would have to provide effective sanctions against the lender for any failure to comply with the requirements of the Act otherwise they will be liable to be flouted, as occurred in the instant case. The values to which the legislative provisions were applied were appropriate to consumer legislation, indeed arguably low, and the rates of interest chargeable, so far as your Lordships were told, unlimited. (In the instant case—a secured loan of some £5,000—the rate of interest claimed worked out at 99.66% pa.) The Act, as a matter of policy, places a strong emphasis on the clarity and transparency of the actual transaction and, although in respect of other infringements a degree of latitude is allowed and the sanctions are discretionary, for the infringement involved in the instant case the sanction is automatic, as the statute makes plain. It is argued that the legislature could have made the sanction discretionary. Maybe. But it does not follow that the view that the sanction should here be automatic was not a permissible view. There was no breach of art 1. The Court of Appeal was wrong to hold the contrary.

THE 'HANSARD' POINT:

[139] In Pepper (Inspector of Taxes) v Hart [1993] 1 All ER 42, [1993] AC 593, the House of Lords permitted the reference to parliamentary material, specifically Hansard, as an aid to the construction of an ambiguous, obscure or absurd statutory provision, if it would provide an authoritative and clear guide to the intended meaning. Even the majority accepted that the liberty so permitted needed to be specifically confined and recognised the potential adverse consequences if it were not strictly limited. Lord Mackay of Clashfern LC in his dissent ([1993] 1 All ER 42 at 47–48, [1993] AC 593 at 614–615) was primarily influenced by the practical considerations and the cost and waste of resources that the proposed liberty would entail. In this he followed the view adopted 25 years earlier by Lord Reid in Beswick v Beswick [1967] 2 All ER 1197 at 1203, [1968] AC 58 at 74. But, as is recognised by the passages quoted by Lord Browne-Wilkinson in Pepper v Hart [1993] 1 All ER 42 at 62, [1993] AC 593 at 632, there are further objections to the liberty. One is that the constitutional means by which laws are made is by the entry of a statute in the statute book. The source of the new law is the document itself not what anyone may have said about it or some earlier form of it. Still less is it what the executive says about it or some individual member of a House of Parliament may have said about it in the course of its passage through Parliament. As Mr Sumption QC pointed out in his submissions, it is a fundamental error of principle to confuse what a minister or a parliamentarian may have said (or said he intended) with the will and intention of Parliament itself. Likewise, it is another fundamental principle that the verbal expression of the law be certain, whatever difficulties in interpretation the words used may cause. Once one departs from the text of the statute construed as a whole and looks for expressions of intention to be found elsewhere, one is not looking for the intention of the legislature but that of some other source with no constitutional power to make law. The process of statutory construction/interpretation is objective not subjective. These points are clearly made in the citations made by Lord-Browne-Wilkinson (vs) from Lord Wilberforce, Lord Diplock and Lord Scarman. The principles are also fully familiar (mutatis mutandis) to commercial lawyers in deciding what was the bargain struck between two commercial parties by a written agreement (see, for example, Lord Wilberforce in Reardon Smith Line Ltd v Hansen-Tangen, Hansen-Tangen v Sanko Steamship Co [1976] 3 All ER 570, [1976] 1 WLR 989).

[140] Mr Sumption did not seek to challenge the authority of the Pepper v Hart decision nor did he found upon any argument of breach of parliamentary privilege. He founded upon two criticisms of the Court of Appeal's approach to the parliamentary material and the use they made of it. He criticised the confusion of the intention of individual members of Parliament with the intention of Parliament. He was quite right to do so and I need add nothing to what I have already said. He also criticised what he submitted was an extension of the application of the Pepper v Hart decision from a narrowly defined matter of statutory construction to an investigation of the justification for the inclusion of a particular provision in an Act. He submitted that Pepper v Hart should be confined to its actual subject matter, a taxation statute where, as he put it, the Executive had made statements about what use they would make of the relevant provisions and so gave rise to a quasi-estoppel (sic) by which they would be bound. Perhaps a better way of making the point would be to say that the Executive had created a legitimate expectation which they must honour. In so far as Mr Sumption argues against making any extension to the Pepper v Hart decision or relaxing the strict observation of the safeguards which it included, I need no persuasion. Judicial experience has taught me, particularly since I was appointed a member of this House, that the attempt by advocates to use parliamentary material from Hansard as an aid to statutory construction has not proved helpful and the fears of those pessimists who saw it as simply a cause of additional expense in the conduct of litigation have been proved correct.

[141] But on the directly pertinent question of what material it is proper for a court to be referred to when it has to decide a question of proportionality or justification in relation the 'Convention rights' scheduled to the Human Rights Act 1998, it is necessary to consider what his argument really amounts to. On this I agree wholly with your Lordships and will take the point more shortly than would otherwise be the case. Whether a particular statutory provision offends against any of the 'Convention rights' is an objective question to be answered having regard to all relevant evidence. It is a task which Parliament itself has by the 1998 Act required the courts to perform. It involves no breach of parliamentary privilege or protocol even if it leads to a declaration that the legislation is incompatible under s 4. The argument that the courts when they apply and give effect to the 1998 Act are frustrating the will of Parliament is a travesty of the true position: they are giving effect to the will of Parliament expressed in the 1998 Act.

[142] The questions of justification and proportionality involve a sociological assessment—an assessment of what are the needs of society. This in part involves a legal examination of the content and legal effect of the relevant provision. But it also involves consideration of what is the mischief, social evil, danger etc which it is designed to deal with. Often these matters may already be within the knowledge of the court. But equally there will almost always be other evidentially valuable material which can be placed before the court which is relevant, such as reports that have been made, statistics that have been collected, and so on. Oral witnesses may have important evidence to give. To exclude such evidential material from the case merely because it is to be found in some statement made in Parliament is clearly wrong, particularly if ministerial statements made outside Parliament were already being relied on. This has nothing to do with investigating or questioning the will of Parliament. Parliament has spoken by passing the relevant Act. The evidence is admitted because it relates to making the required sociological assessment. It has long been the case that ministerial statements made in the House may be referred to when they are relevant to a question to be determined by a court. An example which immediately comes to mind is the ministerial statements concerning immigration policy which used to be made at the time when immigration law was largely extra-statutory. So the broader submission of Mr Sumption which would exclude access to any such material must be rejected.

[143] But it is easy to understand why it was that Mr Sumption's clients thought it necessary to intervene. The Court of Appeal, having decided that they must consider s 4 and that art 1 was engaged, then entered upon a process of scrutinising what had been said in Parliament as reported in Hansard to see whether it disclosed any justification they were prepare to accept for the relevant provisions of the 1974 Act at the time they were enacted. This was an unacceptable approach and likely to give rise to abuse. It is not part of the duty of any member of Parliament to provide or state definitively in Parliament the justification for legislation which the legislature is content to pass. Still less was it the duty of anyone in 1974 to anticipate the passing of the 1998 Act 24 years later. I agree that that use of Hansard for that purpose has been rightly objected to.

[144] There is a further important error in the Court of Appeal's approach which may be of greater significance in other cases. The question of justification and proportionality has to be answered by reference to the time the events took place to which the statutory provision is being applied. The person claiming to be a victim has to show how he has been affected by the provision he complains about. Those who are seeking to justify the use of the statutory provision have to do so as at the time of that use. If they cannot justify it at that time, their use of it is a breach of the victim's 'Convention rights'. That is how the European Court would decide the question and it is also how the municipal court is require to look at it. In most cases the difference will probably be academic and it no doubt was so regarded in the present case. But as circumstances change so the justification or the absence of it may change. Merely to examine the situation at the time the Act in question was passed and treat that as decisive is wrong in principle. The same point can be seen equally clearly in relation to a question of compatibility arising under s 4. As I have explained earlier, the decision under s 4 has to be made as at the time of the decision; just as the current state of the legislation at that time is what has to be the subject matter of the decision so also the circumstances and social needs existing at that time are what is relevant, not those existing at some earlier or different time. To look for justification only in the parliamentary debates at the time the statute was originally passed invites error.

[145] For these reasons and, subject to what I have said, the substance of those given by my noble and learned friends Lord Nicholls of Birkenhead and Lord Hope of Craighead, I too would make the orders proposed. I should also add that I agree with and gratefully adopt what my noble and learned friend Lord Rodger of Earlsferry is to say about the various usages of the word 'retrospective'.

LORD SCOTT OF FOSCOTE.

INTRODUCTION

[146] My Lords, this appeal is brought by the Secretary of State. She appeals against the declaration of incompatibility contained in the order of the Court of Appeal dated 2 May 2001 (as amended on 12 June 2001). Neither the claimant in the litigation, Mrs Penelope Wilson, nor the defendant, First County Trust Ltd (FCT) has taken any part in this appeal. None the less an array of counsel have appeared before your Lordships representing the Secretary of State, the Finance and Leasing Association, three leading insurance companies, the Speaker of the House of Commons and the Clerk of the Parliaments and, in addition, an amicus curiæ. The circumstances in which this has come about are set out in the opinions of my noble and learned friends, Lord Nicholls of Birkenhead and Lord Hope of Craighead, and I need not repeat them. The issues which have necessitated this appeal and have led to the representation to which I have referred include issues of commercial and of constitutional importance.

[147] The issues have arisen out of a simple moneylending transaction. Under an agreement made in January 1999 FCT lent Mrs Wilson £5,000 for six months on the security of her motor car. The agreement was a 'regulated agreement' within the meaning of s 8 of the Consumer Credit Act 1974. Section 61 of the Act requires a document containing all the 'prescribed terms' of a regulated agreement to be signed by the debtor. One of the prescribed terms is 'the amount of the credit'. FCT charged Mrs Wilson, inter alia, a £250 fee but, by agreement between them, the £250 was not paid by Mrs Wilson but instead was added to the £5,000 to be repaid by her. In the document presented by FCT to Mrs Wilson for signing, and signed by her accordingly, 'the amount of the credit' was stated to be £5,250. But the £250 was 'an item entering into the total charge for credit' (see s 9(4) of the Act) and, accordingly, was not part of 'the amount of the credit' (see Sch 6 to the Consumer Credit (Agreements) Regulations 1983, SI 1983/1553). In short, the document signed by Mrs Wilson did not, in the respect I have mentioned, contain the prescribed terms.

[148] Mrs Wilson did not repay the loan, or pay the £250 fee, and claimed back her car which she had deposited with FCT as security. She contended that the loan agreement was unenforceable against her and that under s 113 of the Act she was entitled to have her car back. The case was heard in the county court and on 14 September 1999 judgment was given in favour of FCT. Mrs Wilson then appealed to the Court of Appeal ([2001] QB 407, [2001] 2 WLR 302).

[149] The events to which I have referred took place after the Human Rights Act 1998 had been enacted but before the Act had come into force. The Act came into force on 2 October 2000. Mrs Wilson's appeal was heard in November 2000 and was successful. She obtained a declaration that the loan agreement with FCT under which she had received £5,000 was unenforceable by FCT and an order for repayment by FCT, with interest, of the sum of £6,900 that she had paid to redeem her car. But the Court of Appeal took the view that this result of the application of the relevant provisions of the 1974 Act might arguably be incompatible with the rights of FCT under art 6 of the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms 1950 (as set out in Sch 1 to the Human Rights Act 1998) or under art 1 of the First Protocol to the convention. So they directed the requisite notice to be given to the Secretary of State (see s 5 of the 1998 Act) and adjourned the appeal in order for the point to be argued. An amicus curiæ was appointed.

[150] The renewed hearing of the appeal took place in March 2001 and in a judgment given on 2 May 2001 ([2001] EWCA Civ 633, [2001] 3 All ER 229, [2002] QB 74) the Court of Appeal concluded that s 127(3) of the 1974 Act, which prevented the court from enforcing a loan agreement unless a document containing all the prescribed terms had been signed by the debtor, was incompatible with FCT's rights under art 6 of the convention and art 1 of the First Protocol to the convention. In reaching this conclusion the Court of Appeal examined and commented upon the contents of the Hansard reports of the deliberations in Parliament during the progress of the Bill.

[151] On this appeal the following broad issues arise (1) Can the court make a declaration of incompatibility under s 4 of the 1998 Act in relation to events which predated 2 October 2000, the date on which the Act came into force? (2) If it can, were FCT's convention rights under art 6 or under art 1 of the First Protocol infringed by the relevant provisions of the 1974 Act? (3) Was the use made by the Court of Appeal of the Hansard reports permissible?

RETROSPECTIVITY

[152] The Attorney General, Lord Goldsmith QC, appearing on behalf of the Secretary of State, based his submissions on this issue on a simple, and plainly correct, proposition, namely, that prior to 2 October 2000 FCT had had no convention rights. The 1998 Act, under which convention rights became rights enforceable under domestic law, was not yet in force. The loan transaction between FCT and Mrs Wilson had taken place in 1999. So, at the time the loan was made and at the time Mrs Wilson's claim for a declaration that the loan was unenforceable against her and for the return of her car (or repayment of the sum she had had to pay FCT to get it back) was tried in the county court, the 1998 Act and convention rights were irrelevant. They could not affect the rights and liabilities of FCT and Mrs Wilson respectively under the loan agreement. There can be no dispute but that this was the position prior to 2 October 2000.

[153] It is, of course, open to Parliament, if it chooses to do so, to enact legislation which alters the mutual rights and obligations of citizens arising out of events which predate the enactment. But in general Parliament does not choose to do so for the reason that to legislate so as to alter the legal consequences of events that have already taken place is likely to produce unfair or unjust results. Unfairness or injustice may be produced if persons who have acquired rights in consequence of past events are deprived of those rights by subsequent legislation; or it may be produced if persons are subjected on account of those past events to liabilities that they were not previously subject to. There is, therefore, a common law presumption that a statute is not intended to have a retrospective effect. This presumption is part of a broader presumption that Parliament does not intend a statute to have an unfair or unjust effect (see Maxwell on Interpretation of Statutes (12th edn, 1969) p 215 and Bennion Statutory Interpretation (4th edn, 2002) pp 265–266 and 689–690). The presumption can be rebutted if it sufficiently clearly appears that it was indeed the intention of Parliament to produce the result in question. The presumption is no more than a starting point.

[154] The question, therefore, is whether Parliament intended the 1998 Act and the convention rights thereby incorporated into domestic law to be applied to transactions and events predating the coming into force of the Act and so as to alter the legal consequences of those transactions and events?

[155] Sections 3 and 4 of the 1998 Act are, in my opinion, neutral. Section 3(1) requires: 'So far as it is possible to do so, primary legislation and subordinate legislation must be read and given effect in a way which is compatible with the Convention rights.' The 1974 Act must be so read. Section 4(2) says: 'If the court is satisfied that the provision [of primary legislation] is incompatible with a Convention right, it may make a declaration of that incompatibility.' These statutory provisions do not, in my opinion, assist one way or the other in answering the question whether Parliament intended the Act to be applicable to past transactions and events. At the least it may be said that they contain nothing to displace the presumption that Parliament did not so intend.

[156] Section 6(1) of the Act says: 'It is unlawful for a public authority to act in a way which is incompatible with a Convention right.' And sub-s (3) says that a 'public authority' includes 'a court or tribunal'. It is plain that s 6 is looking to the future. It is not purporting to make unlawful a pre-2 October 2000 act of a public authority. It was s 6(1) on which the Court of Appeal relied in the present case. The reasoning proceeded like this: (i) the Court of Appeal is a public authority (see sub-s (3)); (ii) it is unlawful for a public authority, and therefore for the Court of Appeal, to act in a way incompatible with a convention right; (iii) if the relevant provisions of the 1974 Act are incompatible with a convention right it is therefore unlawful for the Court of Appeal to give effect to them; (iv) the Court of Appeal is bound, by s 3, to try to read down the relevant provisions of the 1974 Act so as to render them compatible with the convention; and (v) if that reading down is not possible, the Court of Appeal may make a declaration of incompatibility (see s 4). This reasoning does not confront the issue of retrospectivity. It avoids it by concluding that if the trial, or, as in the present case, the appeal, takes place after 2 October 2000, the court is bound by s 6(1) to apply the 1998 Act without regard to whether the transactions or events in question predate or postdate the coming into force of the Act.

[157] My Lords, in my opinion, this conclusion cannot be accepted. The function of the court in civil litigation between private citizens is to adjudicate on their rights and obligations in issue in the case and to grant the relief, if any, requisite to reflect those rights and obligations. If the rights and obligations of the parties require a particular result to be reached, whether by dismissal of the action, an award of damages, the making of a declaration, the grant of an injunction, or otherwise, it is the duty of the court to deal with the case accordingly. For the court to do so cannot be an unlawful act under s 6(1).

[158] The retrospectivity issue in this case is whether the coming into force of the 1998 Act on 2 October 2000 has altered the rights and obligations inter se of FCT and Mrs Wilson arising out of their loan transaction in 1999. Let it be supposed that the relevant provisions of the 1974 Act are, prima facie, inconsistent with the convention rights of moneylenders; but let it be supposed also that the inconsistent provisions can be read down so as to give the court a discretion to enforce a loan agreement notwithstanding that a document containing the prescribed terms had not been signed by the borrower. On that footing, a loan agreement post-dating 2 October 2000 would, subject to the court's discretion under s 127(1), be enforceable. But would a loan agreement pre-dating 2 October 2000 be similarly enforceable? Only if the Act were to be given a retrospective effect would that be so. If the Act is not to be given a retrospective effect, if the pre-2 October 2000 rights and liabilities of lender and borrower are not altered by the coming into effect of the Act, then it would be the duty of the court, post 2 October 2000 as before, to hold the loan agreement to be unenforceable. In so holding the court would not be committing an unlawful act under s 6(1) for in relation to the pre-2 October 2000 transaction the parties would have no convention rights.

[159] Section 7(1)(a) of the 1998 Act says that a person who claims that a public authority has acted in a way which is made unlawful by s 6(1) may bring proceedings against the authority. Section 9 says that proceedings under s 7(1)(a) in respect of a judicial act may be brought only by exercising a right of appeal. But every appeal court, including your Lordship's House, must, in dealing with an appeal, give effect to the rights and obligations of the parties in issue on the appeal. If these rights and obligations arise out of pre-2 October 2000 events, the appeal court is no more entitled than the court below to alter the parties' rights and obligations in order to give effect to a reading down of some relevant statutory provision unless the conclusion is justified that the 1998 Act was intended to have that retrospective effect.

[160] The only positive indication as to whether or not the 1998 Act was intended to have retrospective effect is to be found in s 22(4) of the Act. Section 22(4) says that s 7(1)(b) applies to proceedings brought by or at the instigation of a public authority whenever the act in question took place but that otherwise sub-s (1) does not apply to acts taking place before 2 October 2000. This express indication of a specific retrospective effect that the Act was to have in relation to proceedings brought by a public authority is, in my opinion, a fair indication that in no other respect was the Act intended to have a retrospective effect.

[161] The arguments against allowing the Act to have a general retrospective effect seem to me very powerful. The legal consequences under the civil law of a transaction or of events ought to be established by reference to the law at the time they take place. When events apt to create rights or obligations take place citizens affected by the events need to be able to ascertain the extent of their rights or obligations. They cannot do so if subsequent legislation may add to or diminish those rights or obligations. Where transactions calculated to continue for some considerable period are entered into, intervening legislation may in some respect or other affect the rights and obligations that accrue under the transaction after the legislation has come into force. Landlord and tenant legislation is a good example. If a lease is granted for, say, 99 years, there might well be intervening legislation capable of affecting the ability of the landlord to forfeit the lease, to operate a rent review clause, to claim damages for dilapidations or to recover possession on the expiry of the term. But it would be unusual for the legislation to alter the rights and obligations of the parties resulting from events that had already taken place, such as a forfeiture notice already served, a damages claim already instituted, rent review machinery already in train, and so on. However, whatever may be the position where there is an on-going transaction and intervening legislation, the present case involves a simple six-month loan transaction. All the relevant events, bar the completion of the appeal process, pre-dated the coming into effect of the 1998 Act. There is nothing to rebut the presumption that Parliament did not intend the Act to operate retrospectively so as to alter accrued rights or to impose obligations where none previously existed.

[162] In my opinion, therefore, the Court of Appeal were in error in endeavouring to apply the 1998 Act to the loan transaction between FCT and Mrs Wilson. There was no occasion to attempt to read down the 1974 Act under s 3 and no occasion to make a s 4 declaration of incompatibility. I would accordingly allow the Secretary of State's appeal on this ground. My reasons are, I believe, substantially the same as those expressed by my noble and learned friends, Lord Nicholls of Birkenhead, Lord Hope of Craighead and Lord Rodger of Earlsferry, with which I respectfully agree.

IS SECTION 127(3) OF THE 1974 ACT COMPATIBLE WITH THE CONVENTION?

[163] The loan agreement between FCT and Mrs Wilson was an 'improperly executed regulated agreement' because the document signed by Mrs Wilson misstated the amount of the credit and so did not contain all the prescribed terms. That is common ground.

[164] Section 65(1) of the 1974 Act says that an 'improperly-executed regulated agreement is enforceable against the debtor ... on an order of the court only'. It is to be noted that the agreement is not void or unlawful. It is merely unenforceable except on an order of the court. Section 127(1) of the Act says, inter alia, that in the case of an application for an enforcement order under s 65(1) the court 'shall dismiss the application if, but (subject to subsections (3) and (4)) only if, it considers it just to do so'. Subsection (3) bars the court from making an enforcement order under s 65(1) in a case where there is no document containing all the prescribed terms that has been signed by the debtor. So, in the present case, the court was barred by s 127(3) from making an enforcement order in favour of FCT. Its discretionary power to make an enforcement order which otherwise would have been conferred by sub-s (1) had been excluded by sub-s (3).

[165] It was contended before your Lordships that s 127(3) infringed art 6 of the convention in that FCT was denied recourse to the court for the determination of the question whether the loan agreement should be enforced. This, in my opinion, is an impossible contention. Article 6, as each of my noble and learned friends has observed, provides a procedural guarantee of the right to have issues judicially determined. Article 6 is not concerned with the substantive law. True it is that the loan agreement between FCT and Mrs Wilson was a valid, lawful agreement. But the 1974 Act declared it to be unenforceable. Whatever the divide between substantive law and procedural law, and I respectfully agree that the line is sometimes difficult to draw, there is no doubt at all but that s 127(3) is a provision of substantive law denying the loan agreement the quality of enforceability.

[166] Mr Hibbert counsel for the Finance and Leasing Association submitted that any statutory provision that rendered a valid agreement unenforceable infringed art 6 of the convention. The extravagance of this submission became apparent when he extended it to contracts for the sale of land. If his submission were right it would follow that the familiar statutory provisions rendering contracts for the sale of land unenforceable unless in writing would be incompatible with art 6 convention rights. In agreement with all of your Lordships I would reject the art 6 submissions.

[167] Reliance was placed, in the alternative, on art 1 of the First Protocol. Section 127(3), it was submitted, deprived FCT of its right to enforce repayment of the £5,000 loan and thereby deprived it of its 'possessions'. The deprivation was, it was argued, disproportionate. I would, for my part, reject the art 1 of the First Protocol point on two grounds.

[168] First, art 1 of the First Protocol is directed to interference with existing possessions or property rights. FCT never had, at any stage in the history of the loan agreement, the right to enforce against Mrs Wilson the repayment of the £5,000. Neither the 1974 Act as a whole nor s 127(3) in particular constituted an interference with a pre-existing right of FCT to enforce repayment by Mrs Wilson of the £5,000. The Act, and s 127(3) prevented FCT from ever possessing that right. No authority has been cited to your Lordships for the proposition that a statutory provision which prevents a transaction from having the quality of legal enforceability can be regarded as an interference for art 1 purposes with the possessions of the party who would have benefited if the transaction had had that quality. In my opinion, the proposition should be rejected.

[169] Second, the purpose or policy underlying the statutory bar on enforceability of a regulated loan agreement where no document containing all the prescribed terms has been signed by the debtor cannot, in my opinion, be categorised as disproportionate. The need to control moneylending transactions is as old as our civilisation and I know of no legal system that has not imposed such controls. Indeed in some legal systems any lending of money on interest terms is barred. In this country there were strict statutory controls under the Moneylenders Acts 1900 to 1927. The 1974 Act represented a relaxation of the rigidity of the controls. The discretion allowed to the courts by s 127(1) of the Act was not to be found in its predecessors (see s 6 of the 1927 Act). These controls recognise the vulnerability of those members of the public who resort to pawnbrokers and moneylenders when in dire need of funds to make ends meet. They are open to exploitation; their bargaining power is minimal; their understanding of legal procedures and remedies is likely to be sparse. They need protection and part of the protection is the insistence by the Act that the 'prescribed terms', representing the important terms of the loan transaction, must be set out in a document to be signed by the debtor if the repayment of the loan is to be enforceable. I do not accept that this protection, harshly though it may in some cases bear upon lenders, is disproportionate.

[170] In my opinion, even if the 1998 Act were applicable to the loan transaction between FCT and Mrs Wilson there would have been no infringement of FCT's convention rights.

[171] One of the sub-issues argued before your Lordships was whether, when considering whether the provisions of the 1974 Act infringed FCT's convention rights, the court should take into account other legal remedies which might be available to FCT. It was argued that under the general law a restitutionary remedy was available to FCT enabling recovery of at least the £5,000. I am not clear whether the proposed remedy would be a common law remedy for money had and received or an equitable remedy based on Mrs Wilson's unjust enrichment, but identifying the correct description of the remedy is not for present purposes important.

[172] My Lords there can, in my opinion, be no doubt at all but that in considering whether s 127(3), in rendering the £5,000 loan unenforceable, constitutes an infringement of FCT's convention rights, FCT's remedies in the round must be taken into account. If FCT is able under the general law to recover the £5,000 by some means other than suing on the debt, the 1974 Act provisions preventing FCT from suing on the debt could not on any argument constitute an infringement of FCT's art 1 rights. But it is, in my opinion, equally clear that no such alternative means of recovery are available to FCT. The decisions of this House in Orakpo v Manson Investments Ltd [1977] 3 All ER 1, [1978] AC 95 and, more recently, Dimond v Lovell [2000] 2 All ER 897, [2002] 1 AC 384 stand in the way. Parliament's intention in enacting s 127(3) of the 1974 Act was to make a loan, made under a regulated agreement, unenforceable in certain events. The courts cannot defeat that intention by allowing some alternative means of recovery.

USE OF HANSARD

[173] On this issue I am in complete agreement with, and cannot usefully add anything to, what has been said by my noble and learned friend, Lord Nicholls of Birkenhead.

LORD RODGER OF EARLSFERRY.

[174] My Lords, on 9 November 1998 the Human Rights Act 1998 received the Royal Assent and, some 23 months later, on 2 October 2000 it came into force. The Act was intended to 'bring home' rights under the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms 1950 (as set out in Sch 1 to the 1998 Act). In terms of s 1(2), the convention rights listed in the Schedule have effect for the purposes of the Act. The main effect is to give people remedies in the domestic law of the United Kingdom if public authorities infringe their convention rights—the so-called 'vertical effect'. The extent to which the Act also operates between private individuals—the so-called 'horizontal effect'—is controversial. But it is recognised that, since courts are public authorities for purposes of the Act, a court order pronounced against one private party at the instigation of another may potentially infringe the first party's convention rights. If giving effect to a convention right under the Act means that the order has to be refused or modified, then that affects the rights of the party who sought it.

THE FACTS

[175] The present is said to be an example of that kind of case. Since my noble and learned friend Lord Nicholls of Birkenhead has given a full account of the facts, I need mention only the most important. In 1999 Mrs Wilson entered into a loan agreement with First County Trust Ltd (First County). The agreement was regulated by the Consumer Credit Act 1974. Mrs Wilson pawned her BMW car as security. Under s 61(1)(a), if the debtor has not signed a document in the prescribed form containing all the prescribed terms, the agreement is 'not properly executed', with the result that it 'is enforceable against the debtor or hirer on an order of the court only' (s 65(1)). More particularly, in terms of s 127(3), if an agreement does not contain all the prescribed terms, the court is not to make an enforcement order unless the debtor has signed a document which does contain all the prescribed terms. Mrs Wilson's position was that the document in the prescribed form which she signed did not show the correct 'amount of the credit', one of the prescribed terms. Moreover, she had signed no other document containing the prescribed terms. As a result, by reason of s 127(3) the court would not be able to make an enforcement order.

[176] Section 142(1)(b) provides that, where a thing can be done by a creditor on an enforcement order only and the creditor has not made an application for such an order, an interested party may apply to the court for a declaration and—

'the court may if it thinks just make a declaration that the creditor or owner is not entitled to do that thing, and thereafter no application for an enforcement order in respect of it shall be entertained.'

Where the court makes such a declaration, by s 113(3)(d), s 106 is to apply to any security provided in relation to the agreement. As a result, inter alia, the security is to be treated as never having effect and any property lodged with the creditor solely for the purposes of the security is to be returned forthwith. Mrs Wilson sought a declaration which would have these effects.

[177] The county court judge held that the loan agreement contained all the prescribed terms and he therefore refused to make the declaration which Mrs Wilson sought. She appealed, but in the meantime paid the necessary sum to recover her car. Mrs Wilson's appeal was heard after the 1998 Act had come into force. Reversing the county court judge, the Court of Appeal held that the agreement did not contain the prescribed term in question, the 'amount of the credit'. The agreement was therefore unenforceable by reason of s 127(3) (see [2001] QB 407, [2001] 2 WLR 302). The Court of Appeal eventually went on to hold, however, that s 127(3) infringed First County's rights under art 6(1) of the convention and art 1 of the First Protocol. Since it was not possible to 'read down' s 127(3) under s 3 of the 1998 Act so as to make it compatible with First County's convention rights, the Court of Appeal gave effect to it by ordering First County to pay back the sum which Mrs Wilson had earlier paid to them to get her car back. But the Court of Appeal ([2001] EWCA Civ 633, [2001] 3 All ER 229, [2002] QB 74) also made a declaration under s 4 of the 1998 Act that s 127(3) of the 1974 Act is incompatible with the rights guaranteed to the creditor by art 6(1) and art 1 of the First Protocol.

[178] First County did not appeal, but the Secretary of State appealed, on a number of grounds, against the Court of Appeal's order making the declaration of incompatibility. I respectfully agree with Lord Nicholls of Birkenhead as to the disposal of all these grounds of appeal and, in particular, with what my noble and learned friend, Lord Hobhouse of Woodborough, has said on the use of Hansard. I confine my observations accordingly to the one matter, 'retrospectivity'. At the outset, it may be useful to recall some general features of the 1998 Act.

GENERAL FEATURES OF THE 1998 ACT

[179] The 1998 Act is beautifully drafted. Its structure is tight and elegant, being marred only by the obvious interpolation of ss 12 and 13 as a result of amendments made while the Bill was passing through Parliament. The presence or absence of particular features in the Act is therefore unlikely to be due to oversight.

[180] Although the Act is not entrenched, the convention rights that it confers have a peculiar potency. Enforcing them may require a court to modify the common law. So far as possible, a court must read and give effect to statutory provisions in a way that is compatible with them. Rights that can produce such results are clearly of a higher order than the rights which people enjoy at common law or under most other statutes.

[181] It is well recognised, however, that convention rights are to be seen as an expression of fundamental principles rather than as a set of mere rules. In applying the principles the courts must balance competing interests. So much was made clear, for example, by my noble and learned friend, Lord Hope of Craighead, in R v DPP, ex p Kebeline, R v DPP, ex p Rechachi [1999] 4 All ER 801 at 847, [2000] 2 AC 326 at 384. Therefore, when deciding whether the order sought by one private party would infringe a convention right of the other, a court must balance the interests of both parties. If the court finds that the order would infringe the convention right of the party against whom it would be made, this can only be because the court has concluded that his interests are to be preferred to any competing interests of the party seeking the order. In particular, the court must have concluded that the convention right of the party resisting the order is to be preferred to the other party's common law or statutory right to obtain it.

[182] The 1998 Act is unusual—perhaps unique—in its range. While most statutes apply to one particular topic or area of law, the 1998 Act works as a catalyst across the board, wherever a convention right is engaged. It may affect matters of substance in such areas as the law of property, the law of marriage and the law of torts. Or else it may affect civil and criminal procedure, or the procedure of administrative tribunals.

[183] Unlike some statutes, the 1998 Act did not arrive on the scene unheralded. The Bill embodied a flagship policy of the government and the date for the commencement of the Act was announced well in advance. During the long period between Royal Assent and commencement, not only the legal profession but public authorities also could prepare for the day when people would enjoy convention rights within the three domestic legal systems and when public authorities would have to respond to that new situation.

[184] When the 1998 Act did eventually come into force, inevitably it was in a world where events and transactions had been taking place and legal proceedings of various kinds were in progress. Naturally, questions arose as to how the new Act fitted into this world. For all but two of these questions, the draftsman has, deliberately, left it to the courts to supply the answers. Although counsel confined their argument to ss 3 and 4, for reasons which will become apparent, I consider that the issues relating to the application of these sections are best considered in the context of the 1998 Act as a whole.

[185] In dealing with the more general aspects of the difficult topic of 'retrospectivity', I have derived particular benefit from studying Côté The Interpretation of Legislation in Canada (3rd edn, 2000) Ch 2, section 1, and the literature cited there.

THE PRESUMPTION AGAINST THE RETROACTIVE OPERATION OF LEGISLATION

[186] At common law there is a presumption that a statute does not have 'retrospective' effect. The statement in Maxwell on Interpretation of Statutes (12th edn, 1969) p 215 is frequently quoted:

> 'Upon the presumption that the legislature does not intend what is unjust rests the leaning against giving certain statutes a retrospective operation. They are construed as operating only in cases or on facts which come into existence after the statutes were passed unless a retrospective effect is clearly intended. It is a fundamental rule of English law that no statute shall be construed to have a retrospective operation unless such a construction appears very clearly in the terms of the Act, or arises by necessary and distinct implication.'

The very generality of this statement rather obscures the fact that it uses the term 'retrospective' to describe a range of different effects, some more and some less extreme. It is therefore important to identify what it is about any particular provision that is said to be 'retrospective'.

[187] So far as matters of substance are concerned, the essence of the core common law rule is conveniently stated by Sir Owen Dixon CJ in Maxwell v Murphy (1957) 96 CLR 261 at 267:

> 'The general rule of the common law is that a statute changing the law ought not, unless the intention appears with reasonable certainty, to be understood as applying to facts or events that have already occurred in such a way as to confer or impose or otherwise affect rights or liabilities which the law had defined by reference to the past events.'

In Wainwright v Home Office [2001] EWCA Civ 2081 at [27], [2003] 3 All ER 943 at [27], [2002] QB 1334, Lord Woolf CJ referred succinctly to—

> 'the general presumption that legislation should not be treated as changing the substantive law in relation to events taking place prior to legislation coming into force.'

Since statutes which change the substantive law in relation to events in the past can obviously cause serious injustice, the presumption against a statute being intended to have such an effect is powerful—so powerful indeed that any statutory provision, such as s 1 of the War Damage Act 1965, which is intended to apply in this way can be expected to say so expressly. Because such provisions do actually affect the position before the legislation came into force, they can conveniently be described as 'retroactive'.

STATUTES MAKING PROSPECTIVE CHANGES TO EXISTING RIGHTS

[188] Retroactive provisions alter the existing rights and duties of those whom they affect. But not all provisions which alter existing rights and duties are retroactive. The statute book contains many statutes which are not retroactive but alter existing rights and duties—only prospectively, with effect from the date of commencement. Although such provisions are often referred to as 'retrospective', Viscount Simonds rightly cast doubt on that description in A-G v Vernazza [1960] 3 All ER 97 at 99, [1960] AC 965 at 975.

[189] The distinction between the two kinds of provision, and the need to have regard to that distinction, were spelled out by the Court of Appeal long ago in West v Gwynne [1911] 2 Ch 1. In that case the plaintiffs were assignees of a lease dating from 1874. The lease contained a covenant by the lessees against underletting the premises or any part thereof without the consent in writing of the landlord. Section 3 of the Conveyancing and Law of Property Act 1892 provided:

> 'In all leases containing a covenant ... against ... underletting ... the land or property leased without licence or consent, such covenant ... shall, unless the lease contains an expressed provision to the contrary, be deemed to be subject to a proviso to the effect that no fine or sum of money in the nature of a fine shall be payable for or in respect of such licence or consent ...'

In 1909 the plaintiffs applied to the defendant landlord for his consent to a proposed underlease of part of the premises but he replied that he was prepared to grant a licence only on condition that he should receive for himself half of the sum by which the rent of the underlease exceeded the rent payable under the lease. The plaintiffs sought a declaration that the defendant was not entitled to impose the condition. The question was whether s 3 of the 1892 Act applied to a lease executed before the commencement of the Act. The Court of Appeal held that it did.

[190] Cozens-Hardy MR said ([1911] 2 Ch 1 at 11):

> 'It was forcibly argued by [counsel for the defendant] that a statute is presumed not to have a retrospective operation unless the contrary appears by express language or by necessary implication. I assent to this general proposition, but I fail to appreciate its application to the present case. "Retrospective operation" is an inaccurate term. Almost every statute affects rights which would have been in existence but for the statute. Sect. 46 of the Settled Estates Act 1877 ... is a good example of this. Sect. 3 does not annul or make void any existing contract; it only provides that in the future, unless there is found an express provision authorizing it, there shall be no right to exact a fine. I doubt whether the power to refuse consent to an assignment except upon the terms of paying a fine can fairly be called a vested right or interest. Upon the whole I think s. 3 is a general enactment based on grounds of public policy, and I decline to construe it in such a way as to render it inoperative for many years wherever leases for 99 years, or it may be for 999 years, are in existence.'

Buckley LJ observed (at 11–12):

> 'During the argument the words "retrospective" and "retroactive" have been repeatedly used, and the question has been stated to be whether s. 3 of the Conveyancing Act, 1892, is retrospective. To my mind the word "retrospective" is inappropriate, and the question is not whether the section is retrospective. Retrospective operation is one matter. Interference with existing rights is another. If an Act provides that as at a past date the law shall be taken to have been that which it was not, that Act I understand to be retrospective. That is not this case. The question here is whether a certain provision as to the contents of leases is addressed to the case of all leases or only of some, namely, leases executed after the passing of the Act. The question is as to the ambit and scope of the Act, and not as to the date as from which the new law, as enacted by the Act, is to be taken to have been the law. Numerous authorities have been cited to us. I shall not travel through them. To my mind they have but little bearing upon this case. Suppose that by contract between A. and B. there is in an event to arise a debt from B. to A., and suppose that an Act is passed which provides that in respect of such a contract no debt shall arise. As an illustration take the case of a contract to pay money upon the event of a wager, or the case of an insurance against a risk which an Act subsequently declares to be one in respect of which the assured shall not have an insurable interest. In such a case, if the event has happened before the Act is passed, so that at the moment when the Act comes into operation a debt exists, an investigation whether the transaction is struck at by the Act involves an investigation whether the Act is retrospective. Such was the point which arose in Moon v. Durden (Moon v Durden (1848) 2 Ex 22, 154 ER 389) and in Knight v. Lee ([1893] 1 QB 41). But if at the date of the passing of the Act the event has not happened, then the operation of the Act in forbidding the subsequent coming into existence of a debt is not a retrospective operation, but is an interference with existing rights in that it destroys A.'s right in an event to become a creditor of B. As matter of principle an Act of Parliament is not without sufficient reason taken to be retrospective. There is, so to speak, a presumption that it speaks only as to the future. But there is no like presumption that an Act is not intended to interfere with existing rights. Most Acts of Parliament, in fact, do interfere with existing rights. To construe this section I have simply to read it, and, looking at the Act in which it is contained, to say what is its fair meaning.'

[191] Similarly—simplifying the complexities—in Gustavson Drilling (1964) Ltd v Minister of National Revenue [1977] 1 SCR 271 an oil exploration company was entitled to deduct certain drilling and exploration expenses when computing its income for tax purposes, but it did not do so. In 1962 the legislation was changed to disallow such deductions. Subsequently, a successor company none the less sought to deduct those accumulated expenses and invoked the presumption against legislation having retrospective effect. The majority of the Supreme Court of Canada rejected the argument. Dickson J said (at 279–280):

'The general rule is that statutes are not to be construed as having retrospective operation unless such a construction is expressly or by necessary implication required by the language of the Act. An amending enactment may provide that it shall be deemed to have come into force on a date prior to its enactment or it may provide that it is to be operative with respect to transactions occurring prior to its enactment. In those instances the statute operates retrospectively. Superficially the present case may seem akin to the second instance but I think the true view to be that the repealing enactment in the present case, although undoubtedly affecting past transactions, does not operate retrospectively in the sense that it alters rights as of a past time. The section as amended by the repeal does not purport to deal with taxation years prior to the date of the amendment; it does not reach into the past and declare that the law or the rights of parties as of an earlier date shall be taken to be something other than they were as of that earlier date. The effect, so far as [the] appellant is concerned, is to deny for the future a right to deduct enjoyed in the past but the right is not affected as of a time prior to enactment of the amending statute.'

[192] Since provisions which affect existing rights prospectively are not retroactive, the presumption against retroactivity does not apply. Nor is there any general presumption that legislation does not alter the existing legal situation or existing rights: the very purpose of Acts of Parliament is to alter the existing legal situation and this will often involve altering existing rights for the future. So, as Dickson J went on to point out in the Gustavson Drilling case [1977] 1 SCR 271 at 282–283, with special reference to tax legislation:

'No one has a vested right to continuance of the law as it stood in the past; in tax law it is imperative that legislation conform to changing social needs and governmental policy. A taxpayer may plan his financial affairs in reliance on the tax laws remaining the same; he takes the risk that the legislation may be changed.'

As the sparks fly upward, individuals and businesses run the risk that Parliament may change the law governing their affairs.

PRESUMPTION AGAINST INTERFERENCE WITH VESTED RIGHTS

[193] Often, however, a sudden change in existing rights would be so unfair to certain individuals or businesses in their particular predicament that it is to be presumed that Parliament did not intend the new legislation to affect them in that respect. If undue weight is not given to his use of the term 'retrospective', Wright J gives a strong statement of the presumption in Re Athlumney, Ex p Wilson [1898] 2 QB 547 at 551–552, [1895–9] All ER Rep 329 at 331–332:

> 'Perhaps no rule of construction is more firmly established than this—that a retrospective operation is not to be given to a statute so as to impair an existing right or obligation, otherwise than as regards matter of procedure, unless that effect cannot be avoided without doing violence to the language of the enactment.'

Another statement of the presumption is to be found in the judgment of Dickson J in the Gustavson Drilling case [1977] 1 SCR 271 at 282:

> 'The rule is that a statute should not be given a construction that would impair existing rights as regards person or property unless the language in which it is couched requires such a construction: Spooner Oils Ltd. v. Turner Valley Gas Conservation Board ([1933] SCR 629 at 638). The presumption that vested rights are not affected unless the intention of the legislature is clear applies whether the legislation is retrospective or prospective in operation. A prospective enactment may be bad if it affects vested rights and does not do so in unambiguous terms. This presumption, however, only applies where the legislation is in some way ambiguous and reasonably susceptible of two constructions.'

[194] Dickson J here makes the important point that this presumption applies to all legislation which affects vested rights, whether the legislation affects them retroactively or only prospectively. The decision of the Privy Council in Zainal bin Hashim v Government of Malaysia [1979] 3 All ER 241, [1980] AC 734 is an example of the presumption being considered in relation to a retroactive statute.

[195] More often, the presumption falls to be considered in relation to legislation which alters rights only for the future. Since it is more likely that Parliament intended to alter vested rights in this way than that it intended to make a retroactive change, in practice the presumption against legislation altering vested rights is regarded as weaker than the presumption against legislation having retroactive effect.

[196] The presumption is against legislation impairing rights that are described as 'vested'. The courts have tried, without conspicuous success, to define what is meant by 'vested rights' for this purpose. Although it concerned a statutory rule resembling s 16(1)(c) of the Interpretation Act 1978, the decision of the Privy Council in Abbott v Minister for Lands [1895] AC 425 is often regarded as a starting-point for considering this point. There Lord Herschell LC indicated (at 431), that, to convert a mere right existing in the members of the community or any class of them into an accrued or vested right to which the presumption applies, the particular beneficiary of the right must have done something to avail himself of it before the law is changed. The courts have grappled with this idea in a series of cases which Simon Brown LJ surveyed in Chief Adjudication Officer v Maguire [1999] 2 All ER 859, [1999] 1 WLR 1778. It is not easy to reconcile all the decisions. This lends weight to the criticism that the reasoning in them is essentially circular: the courts have tended to attach the somewhat woolly label 'vested' to those rights which they conclude should be protected from the effect of the new legislation. If that is indeed so, then it is perhaps only to be expected since, as Lord Mustill observed in L'Office Cherifien des Phosphates v

Yamashita-Shinnihon Steamship Co Ltd, The Boucraa [1994] 1 All ER 20 at 29, [1994] 1 AC 486 at 525, the basis of any presumption in this area of the law 'is no more than simple fairness, which ought to be the basis of every general rule'.

[197] A caveat should be entered. In Hedderwick v The Federal Comr of Land Tax (1913) 16 CLR 27 at 37 Griffith CJ said: 'It is hardly necessary to remark that the Crown's vested rights are to be respected as much as are the rights of private persons.' There is no suggestion in the present case that the application of the 1998 Act would affect any vested rights of the Crown or of any other public authority. It is not therefore necessary to decide whether the observation of the Chief Justice is sound as a general proposition or whether, if it is, the presumption would prevail in the case of the 1998 Act, given its objectives.

PRESUMPTION THAT LEGISLATION DOES NOT AFFECT PENDING PROCEEDINGS

[198] The authorities refer to a further presumption, that legislation does not apply to actions which are pending at the time when it comes into force unless the language of the legislation compels the conclusion that Parliament intended that it should. A well-known statement of this rule of construction is to be found in the judgment of Sir George Jessel MR in Joseph Suche & Co Ltd, Re (1875) 1 Ch D 48 at 50 where he referred to—

> 'a general rule that when the Legislature alters the rights of parties by taking away or conferring any right of action, its enactments, unless in express terms they apply to pending actions, do not affect them.'

In Zainal bin Hashim v Government of Malaysia [1979] 3 All ER 241 at 245, [1980] AC 734 at 742 the Board deliberately modified this rule and slightly reduced its force:

> '... for pending actions to be affected by retrospective legislation, the language of the enactment must be such that no other conclusion is possible than that that was the intention of the legislature.'

The rule applies, of course, to all legislation, not just to legislation with retroactive effect. Indeed this particular presumption is a more limited version of the general presumption that legislation is not intended to affect vested rights. Since the potential injustice of interfering with the rights of parties to actual proceedings is particularly obvious, this narrower presumption will be that much harder to displace. In Zainal bin Hashim's case, however, the Privy Council held that the language of the provision in question compelled the conclusion that it was intended to apply even to pending proceedings.

STATUTES ALTERING MATTERS OF PURE PROCEDURE

[199] So far I have been dealing with changes in substantive law. As can be seen from the statement of Wright J in Re Athlumney [1898] 2 QB 547 at 552, [1895–9] All ER Rep 329 at 331–332 which I quoted above, changes in matters of pure procedure have been treated differently. Wilde B stated the position most starkly in Wright v Hale (1860) 6 H & N 227 at 232, 158 ER 94 at 96:

> 'where the enactment deals with procedure only, unless the contrary is expressed, the enactment applies to all actions, whether commenced before or after the passing of the Act.'

The justification for treating matters of pure procedure differently was stated by Mellish LJ in Republic of Costa Rica v Erlanger (1876) 3 Ch D 62 at 69:

> 'No suitor has any vested interest in the course of procedure, nor any right to complain, if during the litigation the procedure is changed, provided, of course, that no injustice is done.'

[200] Although, at a general level, the distinction between matters of substance and matters of pure procedure is readily understandable, in practice it has not always proved easy to apply, especially in relation to legislation on limitation or prescription. For that reason, in Yew Bon Tew v Kenderaan Bas Mara [1982] 3 All ER 833 at 836, [1983] 1 AC 553 at 558–559 Lord Brightman cautioned against the potential dangers lurking in the description of a measure as 'procedural'. In the L'Office Cherifien case [1994] 1 All ER 20 at 32–33, [1994] 1 AC 486 at 527–528 Lord Mustill went further and suggested that a single criterion of fairness should be applied to all provisions. He added ([1994] 1 All ER 20 at 30, [1994] 1 AC 486 at 525):

> 'Precisely how the single question of fairness will be answered in respect of a particular statute will depend on the interaction of several factors, each of them capable of varying from case to case. Thus, the degree to which the statute has retrospective effect is not a constant. Nor is the value of the rights which the statute affects, or the extent to which that value is diminished or extinguished by the retrospective effect of the statute. Again, the unfairness of adversely affecting the rights, and hence the degree of unlikelihood that this is what Parliament intended, will vary from case to case. So also will the clarity of the language used by Parliament, and the light shed on it by consideration of the circumstances in which the legislation was enacted. All these factors must be weighed together to provide a direct answer to the question whether the consequences of reading the statute with the suggested degree of retrospectivity are so unfair that the words used by Parliament cannot have been intended to mean what they might appear to say.'

This is an application of the 'true principle' identified by Staughton LJ in Secretary of State for Social Security v Tunnicliffe [1991] 2 All ER 712 at 724—

> 'that Parliament is presumed not to have intended to alter the law applicable to past events and transactions in a manner which is unfair to those concerned in them, unless a contrary intention appears. It is not simply a question of classifying an enactment as retrospective or not retrospective. Rather it may well be a matter of degree—the greater the unfairness, the more it is to be expected that Parliament will make it clear if that is intended.'

[201] On Lord Mustill's approach an appropriate test might be formulated along these lines: Would the consequences of applying the statutory provision retroactively, or so as to affect vested rights or pending proceedings, be 'so unfair' that Parliament could not have intended it to be applied in these ways? In answering that question, a court would rightly have regard to the way the courts have applied the criterion of fairness when embodied in the various presumptions.

[202] In these proceedings your Lordships are called on to consider the application of the 1998 Act in civil proceedings. The language of 'vested rights' does not translate altogether easily into the language of the criminal law. For that reason any views that I express are confined to civil proceedings.

THE OPERATIVE PROVISIONS OF THE 1998 ACT TO BE CONSIDERED TOGETHER

[203] The argument at the hearing concentrated on ss 3 and 4 of the 1998 Act and, more particularly, on whether s 3 had 'retrospective' effect. In the light of the foregoing discussion even that argument requires to be broken down into two parts. The first is whether s 3 is retroactive. The second is whether s 3 applies generally or only in such a way as not to affect rights that were vested, or proceedings that were pending, on 2 October 2000. Those issues relating to s 3 cannot be resolved in isolation, however, but only by looking at the 1998 Act as a whole.

[204] A single statute may contain some provisions which are retroactive and some which affect existing rights only for the future. Similarly, some provisions may apply generally on commencement and others only without prejudice to vested rights or without affecting pending proceedings. But, having regard to the purpose and structure of the 1998 Act, and subject to any express provisions to the contrary, Parliament must have intended all the operative provisions of this particular statute to take effect in the same way in respect of any given convention right.

[205] Section 1(1) defines the expression 'the Convention rights' as the rights and fundamental freedoms set out in certain specific articles of the convention. The Act then goes on to provide the two mechanisms by which they are to have effect in the domestic law of the United Kingdom. First, under the appropriate cross-heading, in ss 3 to 5—later complemented by s 10—the Act provides a mechanism for giving effect to convention rights in relation to legislation. Secondly, again under an appropriate cross-heading, in ss 6–9 it contains a mechanism for giving effect to convention rights in relation to the acts of public authorities.

[206] These are the operative sections of the Act for present purposes and they all came into force on 2 October 2000. Subject to the specific regime in s 22(4), there is nothing to suggest that Parliament intended that there should be any difference in the way that they were to be applied on commencement. And, indeed, it would be surprising if there had been a difference, precisely because the two groups of sections constitute different, but complementary, mechanisms for giving effect to the same underlying convention rights. It is a matter of chance whether the relevant act of a public authority occurs in an area covered by the common law or by statute, or by a mixture of both. In that sense, it is equally a matter of chance whether ss 6 and 7 only, or ss 3–5 also, are in play. For instance, a party enjoying a right to equality of arms under art 6(1) can rely on that right, if appropriate, to challenge the way court proceedings are conducted (s 7(1)(b)). If the relevant aspect of the proceedings is regulated, in whole or in part, by a statutory provision, he must be equally able to deal with it by invoking the court's obligation under s 3 to read and give effect to the statutory provision compatibly with art 6(1). If appropriate, s 4 also comes into play. So far as any given convention right is concerned, it would make no sense for some of these sections to apply retroactively or to apply generally to the situation on commencement and for others not to apply in these ways. They must all apply in the same way or else the 1998 Act would not work smoothly.

[207] The Court of Appeal rightly saw that the various operative provisions of the 1998 Act are interlinked and based part of their argument for applying ss 3 and 4 on s 6(1) which makes it unlawful for a public authority, including a court, to act incompatibly with convention rights (see [2001] 3 All ER 229 at [10]–[12], [2002] QB 74 at [10]–[12]). Since the issue was not raised before the Court of Appeal, that passage in their judgment naturally proceeds on the assumption that s 6(1) itself applies in all cases from the date of commencement of the Act. That is not, however, something that can simply be assumed.

[208] The issue which the House has to decide transcends ss 3 and 4. It relates to the intention of Parliament when incorporating the convention rights and enacting the operative provisions to give effect to them. Were those rights and provisions to apply retroactively? Or generally from the date of commencement? Or only so as not to affect vested rights or pending proceedings? In terms of the test as formulated in L'Office Cherifien des Phosphates v Yamashita-Shinnihon Steamship Co Ltd, The Boucraa [1994] 1 All ER 20 at 30, [1994] 1 AC 486 at 525, the answer is to be found by considering whether the consequences of applying the operative provisions retroactively or so as to affect vested rights or pending proceedings would be 'so unfair' that Parliament could not have intended them to be applied in these ways. In fact, the question does not admit of a single answer.

APPLICATION OF THE 1998 ACT IN RELATION TO DIFFERENT ARTICLES OF THE CONVENTION

[209] The operative provisions of the 1998 Act must all apply in the same way when used to give effect to the same convention right. But they may apply differently when used to give effect to different convention rights. Article 6 embodies rights in relation to matters of procedure. When the 1998 Act is used to give effect to those art 6 rights in our domestic law, it provides remedies for defects in procedure. There is no presumption against purely procedural statutory provisions applying generally on commencement since no one has a vested right to any particular form of procedure. It follows that, given its unqualified language, the 1998 Act applies generally from the date of commencement in so far as it gives effect to art 6 rights. That is only what one would expect. Suppose, for instance, that during the hearing of the appeal in this case the Court of Appeal had done something—such as refusing to listen to submissions on behalf of First County—which was incompatible with their rights under art 6(1). There can be no doubt that s 6(1) would have applied and that the Court of Appeal would have acted unlawfully in terms of it. Similarly, s 7(1)(b) would have applied and under it First County could have relied on their art 6(1) rights. Sections 3–5 would also have applied to the appeal for this purpose. So, if the alleged infringement of First County's art 6(1) rights had arisen out of a statutory provision regulating the procedure in the appeal, s 3 would have bound the Court of Appeal. Depending on how the statutory provision could be read under s 3, the Court of Appeal could also have used the mechanism in ss 4 and 5 to make a declaration of the incompatibility of the provision with art 6(1) rights.

[210] In so far as articles of the convention contain substantive rather than procedural rights, the presumption would be that Parliament did not intend that, when used to give effect to them, the operative provisions should interfere with vested rights or pending actions. It is, however, unnecessary, and would be unwise, to go through the various articles with a view to identifying those convention rights in respect of which Parliament would or would not have intended the 1998 Act to apply generally on commencement. For example, I reserve my opinion on whether, because of the overwhelming importance and the absolute nature of arts 2, 3 and 4, Parliament would have intended that on commencement the Act would apply generally for the purpose of giving effect to them.

THE 1998 ACT, INCLUDING SECTION 3, NOT RETROACTIVE

[211] It is convenient first to consider whether the 1998 Act, including s 3, is retroactive.

[212] Subject to one exception, there is nothing in the language of any of the sections in the Act to suggest that they are meant to be retroactive. The exception is s 22(4) which, expressly, gives retroactive effect to s (7)(1)(b) in one particular situation. The proper inference is that none of the other provisions is intended to apply retroactively. This inference is corroborated by the obvious, and potentially far-reaching, unfairness of unsettling the law relating to past events and transactions in different areas of the law. In these circumstances, applying the powerful presumption against retroactivity, I readily conclude that, subject to s 22(4), none of the operative provisions of the Act, including s 3, is retroactive.

[213] In the particular context of criminal proceedings this conclusion is fortified by the observations of Lord Clyde on s 3 in R v Lambert [2001] UKHL 37 at [142], [2001] 3 All ER 577 at [142], [2002] 2 AC 545:

> 'The usual understanding of the appeal process is that the correctness of the decision appealed against should be determined in accordance with the law as it stood when the case was decided by the lower court. But on the appellant's approach it would seem that any case either of a civil or a criminal nature, decided according to the law as construed in the ordinary way prior to 2 October 2000, if an appeal was brought so as to be heard on or after 2 October 2000, would require to be decided by the application of a rule of construction, namely s 3 of the 1998 Act, which was not obligatory on the lower court. But that involves giving an undue extension to the effect of s 3. In my view s 3 only became obligatory on courts on 2 October 2000. The rule of construction which it expresses applies to all legislation whenever enacted. But there is nothing to show that it was intended by s 3 that the meaning given to a statutory provision by a court prior to 2 October 2000 should be changed in the event of an appeal against that decision being heard on or after that date.'

The same thinking is to be found in the comment of Lord Hope of Craighead in R v Kansal (No 2) [2001] UKHL 62 at [83], [2002] 1 All ER 257 at [83], [2002] 2 AC 69:

> '... the interpretative obligation in s3(1) cannot be applied so as to change retrospectively the meaning which was previously given to a provision in primary legislation. It does not make unlawful acts of courts or tribunals or other public authorities which, as a result of provisions in primary legislation, could not at the time when the acts were done have been done differently: see s 6(2)(a).'

In a very different civil context Lord Wright MR had said much the same in Re a Debtor, ex p Debtor (No 490 of 1935) [1936] Ch 237 at 243:

> 'Thus while an Appellate Court is able, and bound, to give effect to new remedies which have been introduced by enactments passed after the order appealed from was made by the Court of First Instance, yet with regard to substantive rights it is well established that the Appellate Court must give effect to the same law as that which was in force at the date of the earlier proceeding ... A matter of substantive right which has become res judicata cannot be upset by a subsequent general change of the law, in the absence of precise intention to make the change so retrospective being evidenced in the Act.'

[214] Although counsel referred to the passages from R v Lambert and R v Kansal during argument, in the present case that particular kind of problem does not arise. Because of his decision on the prior point of interpretation, the county court judge did not consider or apply s 127(3). The first court to consider and apply it was the Court of Appeal. Accordingly, the danger of an appeal court using s 3 to make a retroactive change in the law applied by a lower court, which was identified in R v Lambert and R v Kansal, simply did not present itself in this case. None the less, the remarks of Lord Wright MR in Re a Debtor suggest that this is merely one aspect of a wider question about the application of new statutory provisions to pending proceedings.

THE APPLICATION OF THE OPERATIVE PROVISIONS OF THE 1998 ACT WHEN USED TO GIVE EFFECT TO ART 1

[215] For the reasons given by Lord Nicholls of Birkenhead, art 6(1) is not engaged in this case. The only live question relates to the application of the operative provisions when used to give effect to the right in art 1. It is crucially important to bear in mind that this is not a question about the application of s 127(3) of the 1974 Act, as potentially modified by s 3 of the 1998 Act, so as to affect vested rights or pending actions. Rather, it is a general question about the application of the operative provisions of the 1998 Act, when used to give effect to the art 1 right, so as to affect vested rights or pending proceedings. That question admits of only a single answer in regard to vested rights and pending proceedings respectively. And that answer cannot be found by examining the circumstances of particular cases and then applying a more or less flexible test in the light of those circumstances. This is just an aspect of the point emphasised by Lord Mustill in The Boucraa [1994] 1 All ER 20 at 32, [1994] 1 AC 486 at 528, when he said that a court which sets out to apply the test of fairness is concerned—

> 'not with the merits of the particular case, but with the generality of rights which Parliament must have contemplated would suffer if the section took effect retrospectively.'

Furthermore, in the words of Isaacs J in George Hudson Ltd v Australian Timber Workers' Union (1923) 32 CLR 413 at 434, the whole circumstances must be considered—

> 'that is to say, the whole of the circumstances which the Legislature may be assumed to have had before it. What may seem unjust when regarded from the standpoint of one person affected may be absolutely just when a broad view is taken of all who are affected. There is no remedial Act which does not affect some vested right, but, when contemplated in its total effect, justice may be overwhelmingly on the other side.'

So in this case the single answer to the broadly conceived question is to be found by considering how Parliament intended the operative provisions of the 1998 Act to apply in relation to the generality of vested rights or pending proceedings—not in relation to vested rights or pending proceedings under the 1974 Act, far less in relation to the individual plight of Mrs Wilson and First County. To descend to those levels of particularity would not only result in a myriad of single decisions but would be to attribute to Parliament the implausible intention that the meticulously drawn 1998 Act, embodying a landmark reform, was to apply in a piecemeal and haphazard fashion.

[216] Indeed, it is only by taking that broad general view of the application of the 1998 Act that a puzzle at the heart of this case can be solved. Depending on the particular legislative provision to be read through its prism, s 3 either results in the provision being modified and vested rights being affected, or else it leaves the provision unmodified and any vested rights intact. So, if the application of s 3 depended on the terms of the individual statutory provision to be read and given effect, it would be impossible to tell whether vested rights were affected, and so whether s 3 applied, without first applying it. That vicious circle is avoided if s 3 is regarded as part of a package of operative provisions whose application falls to be determined by judging the consequences of applying the provisions so as to affect the generality of vested rights and pending proceedings.

[217] In considering how the package of provisions in the 1998 Act is to be applied, it would be pointless to scour them in the hope of finding clues in the minutiae of the language. Section 3(2)(a), which says that the section applies to primary and subordinate legislation whenever enacted, is one of the two express indications which the Act contains as to its application. The other is in sub-s (4) of s 22, the minimalist application section, which makes s 7(1)(b) apply retroactively in certain defined circumstances. It is unnecessary to decide in this case whether s 22(4) applies to pending proceedings or so as to affect vested rights. For the rest, there is nothing in the operative provisions of the Act to show whether, in the case of substantive convention rights, they are to apply generally or only so as not to affect vested rights or pending proceedings. In that sense, they are ambiguous and so the presumption against them applying to pending proceedings, in particular, comes into play. But it is necessary to consider whether that presumption is displaced by other relevant considerations.

THE APPLICATION OF THE OPERATIVE PROVISIONS OF THE 1998 ACT IN THE PRESENT CASE

[218] In deciding how the operative sections of the 1998 Act should be applied when used to give effect to the substantive right in art 1, I would attach significance to the importance, in general terms, of the rights which the 1998 Act incorporates into our domestic law. It could be argued that, because of their importance, Parliament would have intended all of them to take immediate effect for all purposes. Since art 6 rights, for instance, would clearly take immediate effect for all purposes, in the interests of uniformity the other rights—including the right under art 1—should do so too. That argument could be reinforced by noticing the peculiar potency of the convention rights by comparison with other rights under domestic law, which could therefore be expected to give way to them. Moreover, it might be said that, since a court applying art 1 must always balance competing interests, there would be no risk of the rights of parties to pending proceedings being crushed willy-nilly by the new convention right. Parliament could therefore have been satisfied that, when giving effect to the art 1 right, the Act could apply generally on commencement without there being any unacceptable risk of injustice. Finally, and less importantly, it could be argued that the long interval between Royal Assent and commencement was an indication that, once the delay was over, the 1998 Act when used to give effect to art 1 was to have general effect (see Craies on Statute Law (7th edn, 1971) pp 393–395).

[219] The last line of argument has rarely been accepted and I would not accept it in this case. The other arguments carry more weight, but against them it can be said that the very importance and potency of the art 1 right make it all the less likely that Parliament would have intended that it should suddenly descend as a deus ex machina into pending proceedings. Moreover, not only is the unfairness of interfering with the rights of parties to pending proceedings very considerable but it is distinct and different in kind from the unfairness which may have to be balanced as one of the competing interests whenever art 1 is given effect. For these reasons I would conclude that there is no sufficient reason to hold that the presumption is displaced. Applying the relevant rule of construction, since the language of the operative provisions admits another conclusion, they must be taken not to affect pending proceedings. To put the matter another way, in the case of art 1, the consequences of applying the operative provisions of the 1998 Act to pending proceedings would be so unfair that Parliament could not have intended it to apply to them.

[220] The present action was in progress when the 1998 Act came into force on 2 October 2000. So, for the purposes of art 1, the operative provisions of the 1998 Act, including ss 3–5, do not apply to this action. I am content to rest my decision on that narrow ground. It follows that the Court of Appeal had no power to make the declaration of incompatibility that they did—and, indeed, that the Secretary of State had no right to be joined as a party under s 5(3). Despite this technical quirk, I would allow her appeal and make the order proposed by Lord Nicholls of Birkenhead.

Appeal allowed.

Dilys Tausz Barrister.

Moyna v Secretary of State for Work and Pensions

[2003] UKHL 44

HOUSE OF LORDS

LORD NICHOLLS OF BIRKENHEAD, LORD STEYN, LORD HOFFMANN, LORD RODGER OF EARLSFERRY AND LORD WALKER OF GESTINGTHORPE

10, 31 JULY 2003

Social security – Disability living allowance – Care component – 'Cooking test' – Social Security Contributions and Benefits Act 1992, s 72(1)(a)(ii), (2).

The claimant applied for the care component of disability living allowance under s 72(1)(a)(ii)[a] of the Social Security Contributions and Benefits Act 1992 which provided that a person was entitled to that allowance for any period throughout which he was so severely physically or mentally disabled that he could not prepare a cooked main meal for himself if he had the ingredients. A further requirement was that under s 72(2) a person was not entitled to the allowance unless he had satisfied the condition in, inter alia, s 72(1)(a)(ii) for the three preceding months and was likely to continue to do so for the next six months. The allowance application form read: 'You may never have planned or prepared a cooked main meal for yourself. But try to imagine how much help you would need if you tried to do this.' It then went on to ask on how many days a week help would be needed. The claimant stated in her application that she needed help using cooking utensils and taps, and coping with hot pans, for one to three days a week. She was then visited by an examining medical practitioner, whose opinion was that she was capable of preparing a cooked meal without help, and who recorded the claimant's description of herself as a person who could cook a meal. Her claim was disallowed, and she appealed to a disability appeal tribunal, which dismissed her appeal holding that she could, on most days, prepare a cooked main meal for herself, and that it was not unreasonable to expect her to do so. Her appeal to a social security commissioner was also dismissed. The commissioner held that the tribunal had been entitled to take a broad view; that the test was whether an applicant could cook a labour intensive reasonable main daily meal freshly cooked on a traditional cooker; and that the tribunal had made no error of law in construing the requirements of s 72(1)(a)(ii). The claimant appealed to the Court of Appeal, which allowed her appeal, holding (i) that the provision of a cooked main meal was something required regularly if someone were to enjoy a reasonable quality of life so that if the inability to cook were on no more than occasional days, the test would not be satisfied, but that it would if there were a clear pattern of a person not being able to provide for himself; and (ii) that in the claimant's case there was such a clear pattern in that there would sometimes be weeks in which for three days she would have to forgo her one cooked meal. The Secretary of State appealed.

Held – The purpose of the 'cooking test' in s 72(1)(a)(ii) of the 1992 Act was not to ascertain whether a claimant could survive, or enjoy a reasonable diet, without a Section 72, so far as material, is set out at [6] and [7], below

assistance. It was a notional test, a thought-experiment, to calibrate the severity of the disability. It did not matter whether the claimant actually needed to cook. A person who could not cook for himself was entitled to the allowance whether he solved the problem of eating by obtaining help, buying cooked food, or eating out. The Court of Appeal had therefore been wrong to lay such emphasis upon the fact that unless the claimant in the instant case could cook more or less every day she would not enjoy a reasonable quality of life. Moreover, the test said nothing about how often the person should be able to cook. Section 72(2) contemplated that one should be able to say of someone throughout a nine-month period that he was a person whose disability was such that he could not cook a main meal. The cooking test involved looking at the whole period and saying whether, in a general sense, the person could fairly be described as a person who was unable to cook a meal. It was an exercise in judgment rather than an arithmetical calculation of frequency. In the instant case the commissioner had therefore been right in considering that the question involved taking a broad view of the matter and making a judgment, and right to say that the decision of the tribunal disclosed no error of law. Accordingly, the appeal would be allowed (see [1], [2], [17]–[20], [29]–[31], below).

Decision of the Court of Appeal [2002] EWCA Civ 408, [2002] All ER (D) 425 (Mar) reversed.

Notes

For the care component and the special provisions relating to it, see 44(2) Halsbury's Laws (4th edn reissue) paras 104, 105.

For the Social Security Contributions and Benefits Act 1992, s 72(1)(a)(ii), (2) see 40 Halsbury's Statutes (4th edn) (2001 reissue) 376.

Cases referred to in opinions

Brutus v Cozens [1972] 2 All ER 1297, [1973] AC 854, [1972] 3 WR 521, HL.

Edwards (Inspector of Taxes) v Bairstow [1955] 3 All ER 48, [1956] AC 14, [1955] 3 WLR 410, HL.

Grayan Building Services Ltd (in liq), Re [1995] Ch 241, [1995] 3 WLR 1, CA.

Mallinson v Secretary of State for Social Security [1994] 2 All ER 295, [1994] 1 WLR 630, HL.

Mitchell (George) (Chesterhall) Ltd v Finney Lock Seeds Ltd [1983] 2 All ER 737, [1983] 2 AC 803, [1983] 3 WLR 163, HL.

O'Kelly v Trusthouse Forte plc [1983] 3 All ER 456, [1984] QB 90, CA.

R v Radio Authority, ex p Bull [1997] 2 All ER 561, [1998] QB 294, [1997] 3 WLR 1094, CA.

Woodling v Secretary of State for Social Services [1984] 1 All ER 593, sub nom Re Woodling [1984] 1 WLR 348, HL.

Cases referred to in list of authorities

Cockburn v Chief Adjudication Officer, Secretary of State for Social Security v Fairey [1997] 3 All ER 844, [1997] 1 WLR 799, HL.

Appeal

The Secretary of State for Work and Pensions, appealed, with leave of the Appeal Committee of the House of Lords given on 18 November 2002, from the order of the Court of Appeal (Dame Elizabeth Butler-Sloss P, Potter and Kay LJJ) on 27 March 2002 ([2002] EWCA Civ 408, [2002] All ER (D) 425 (Mar)) allowing the appeal of the claimant, Munira Moyna, from the decision of the Social Security Commissioner (H Levenson) dated 13 November 2000, dismissing the claimant's appeal from the decision of the Disability Appeal Tribunal (chairman, M Laschinger) on 27 January 1999, that she was not entitled to the care component of disability living allowance. The facts are set out in the opinion of Lord Hoffmann.

Nicholas Paines QC and Julie Anderson (instructed by the Office of the Solicitor to the Department of Work and Pensions) for the Secretary of State.

Richard Drabble QC and Daniel Kolinsky (instructed by Hodge Jones & Allen) for Mrs Moyna.

Their Lordships took time for consideration.

31 July 2003. The following opinions were delivered.

LORD NICHOLLS OF BIRKENHEAD.

[1] My Lords, I have had the advantage of reading in draft the speech of my noble and learned friend Lord Hoffmann. For the reasons he gives I would allow this appeal.

LORD STEYN.

[2] My Lords, for the reasons given in his opinion by my noble and learned friend Lord Hoffmann, I would also allow the appeal.

LORD HOFFMANN.

[3] My Lords, the issue in this appeal is whether the disability appeal tribunal made an error of law in deciding on 27 January 1999 that the appellant, Mrs Munira Moyna, did not qualify for disability living allowance under s 72(1)(a)(ii) of the Social Security Contributions and Benefits Act 1992. Mrs Moyna's condition subsequently deteriorated and she made a fresh claim which was allowed with effect from 14 June 2000. This appeal is concerned with whether it should have been paid before that date.

[4] The social security commissioner, to whom in the first instance an appeal from the tribunal lay under s 34(1) of the Social Security Administration Act 1992, decided that there had been no error of law but his decision was reversed by the Court of Appeal (Dame Elizabeth Butler-Sloss P, Potter and Kay LJJ) ([2002] EWCA Civ 408, [2002] All ER (D) 425 (Mar)). The functions of the disability appeal tribunal have since been transferred by s 4(1) of the Social Security Act 1998 to unified appeal tribunals constituted under that Act but the appeal to the commissioner (see s 14(1) of the 1998 Act) and thence to the Court of Appeal (see s 15(1) of the 1998 Act) is still only on points of law.

[5] Disability living allowance was introduced by the Disability Living Allowance and Disability Working Allowance Act 1991 to replace what had been called attendance allowance and mobility allowance. The qualifications for attendance allowance had required a severe degree of disablement: the applicant had to be so severely disabled physically or mentally that he required 'frequent attention throughout the day' or 'prolonged or repeated attention during the night' in connection with his 'bodily functions' or 'continual supervision' throughout the day or night in order to avoid substantial danger to himself or others. Although the courts were willing to give 'bodily functions' a fairly wide meaning (see for example Mallinson v Secretary of State for Social Security [1994] 2 All ER 295, [1994] 1 WLR 630) the House of Lords decided in Woodling v Secretary of State for Social Services [1984] 1 All ER 593, sub nom Re Woodling [1984] 1 WLR 348 that it did not include the performance of domestic tasks like cooking.

[6] One purpose of the new benefit introduced by the 1991 Act was to enable persons with lesser degrees of disability to qualify for allowances at lower rates. In provisions which are now consolidated in s 72 of the Social Security Contributions and Benefits Act 1992, it provided for payment of the 'care component' of the allowance at three different levels. The present case is concerned with the lowest level, to which a person is entitled under s 72(1)—

> '... for any period throughout which—(a) he is so severely disabled physically or mentally that—(ii) he cannot prepare a cooked main meal for himself if he has the ingredients ...'

[7] Paragraphs (b) and (c) of s 72(1) prescribe the conditions for payment of allowances at the two higher levels. In order to ensure that the allowance is paid only for more or less chronic disabilities, sub-s (2) provides:

> '... a person shall not be entitled to the care component of a disability living allowance unless—(a) throughout—(i) the period of 3 months immediately preceding the date on which the award of that component would begin ... he has satisfied or is likely to satisfy one or other of the conditions mentioned in subsection 1(a) to (c) above; and (b) he is likely to continue to satisfy one or other of those conditions throughout—(i) the period of 6 months beginning with that date ...'

[8] Mrs Moyna was for 21 years a civil servant in the (then) Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food who retired in 1997, aged 58, on grounds of ill health. She has a number of illnesses and disabilities, including a heart condition which prevents her from exerting herself for any length of time without bringing on pain and discomfort. On 20 December 1996 she applied for disability living allowance. There is (or was) a comprehensive form for such applications called DLA 1, which includes a section on 'Help that you need—during the day—Preparing a cooked main meal for yourself'. The form said:

> 'You may never have planned or prepared a cooked main meal for yourself. But try to imagine how much help you would need if you tried to do this. If you had everything you needed for the meal, roughly how many days a week would you need help > planning a cooked main meal?
>
> peeling and chopping vegetables?
> using cooking utensils?
> using taps?
> using a cooker?
> coping with hot pans?'

[9] The boxes to be ticked on the form offered the alternatives of 'No help needed', '1 to 3 days', '4 to 5 days' and '6 to 7 days'. Mrs Moyna ticked the

'1 to 3 days' boxes for help with cooking utensils, taps, and hot pans. By way of explanation, she added in the space provided:

> 'If pans are heavy, I need someone to carry them and put them on cooker or away. I cannot carry anything heavy as if I do, it brings on angina attacks.'

[10] Mrs Moyna was then visited by an examining medical practitioner, who had his own form to fill in. This starts with a statement of the 'disabled person's needs in their own words'. Under the heading 'Preparing a cooked meal', the doctor wrote 'Can prepare a cooked meal'. In the section for the doctor's own opinions, under the heading 'Need for attention: in your opinion can the disabled person safely ...', followed by a list of actions, he ticked 'Without someone's help' in respect of peeling and chopping vegetables, using taps, using a cooker and coping with hot pans.

[11] The application form and the medical report then went to an adjudication officer, Mrs Roberts, who on 4 February 1997 disallowed the claim. Mrs Moyna wrote on 13 February 1997 requesting a review. The case was reconsidered by another adjudication officer, who reaffirmed the decision:

> 'I accept the visiting doctor's opinion as it is based on the examination and observation of Mrs Moyna ... The cooked main meal is for one person only, therefore, I consider that she could manage the pans for cooking such a meal. I do not accept that she cannot prepare a cooked main meal for herself.'

[12] In her more detailed reasons, the adjudication officer said:

> 'In her claim pack, Mrs Moyna states that she needs help 1–3 days a week, to use cooking utensils and taps, and to cope with hot pans. She cannot carry anything heavy as it brings on angina attacks. In her statement to the visiting doctor, she states she can prepare a cooked meal. The visiting doctor's opinion is that she does not require help to prepare a cooked main meal.'

[13] Mrs Moyna then appealed to the disability appeal tribunal, which dismissed her appeal on 27 January 1999. She told the tribunal that she could cook, although 'nothing elaborate'. The tribunal concluded:

> 'Chopping and peeling is sometimes difficult—and always is with hard vegetables if they are large. She can manage a small saucepan for herself. The other difficulty is standing for a long time, and the appellant's tactic if she has to cook something for herself is to put it on the cooker then lie down. From this we concluded that, with some planning and careful arranging of cooking requisites and perhaps use of a high chair, appellant can, on most days, prepare a cooked main meal for herself, and that it is not unreasonable to expect her to do so. She therefore does not qualify for the care component on that basis.'

[14] Mrs Moyna then appealed to the commissioner, saying that the tribunal had misconstrued the requirements of s 72(1)(a)(ii). The commissioner found no error of law. The test, he said, is whether the claimant can cook a 'labour intensive reasonable main daily meal freshly cooked on a traditional cooker'. Not all tribunals might have reached the same conclusion but the tribunal was entitled on the evidence to reach the conclusion it did.

[15] In the Court of Appeal the leading judgment was given by Kay LJ and the other two members of the court agreed. He did not accept that one could have facts on which different tribunals could properly reach different conclusions about whether the 'cooking test' had been satisfied. The test was intended to be 'straightforward' and produce the same answer on the same facts.

[16] Kay LJ said ([2002] All ER (D) 425 (Mar) at [31]–[35]) that the provision of a cooked main meal was something required 'not on an occasional basis but on a regular basis if someone is to enjoy a reasonable quality of life'. If the inability to cook was on 'no more than occasional days', the test would not be satisfied. But if there was a 'clear pattern' of a person not being able to provide for himself, it would. In the present case, there was such a clear pattern, because on the basis of Mrs Moyna's answers on the claim form, there would sometimes be weeks in which for three days she would 'have to forgo her one cooked main meal'. This was a 'significant' disability because there was a regular pattern rather than something 'occasional or intermittent'.

[17] My Lords, there are two points to be made about the 'cooking test' in s 72(1)(a)(ii). The first is that its purpose is not to ascertain whether the applicant can survive, or enjoy a reasonable diet, without assistance. It is a notional test, a thought experiment, to calibrate the severity of the disability. It does not matter whether the applicant actually needs to cook. As the form DLA 1 said, 'try to imagine how much help you would need if you tried to do this'. No doubt some people (disabled or otherwise) do need to cook or prefer to do so, although home cooking seems to be fighting a losing battle against convenience foods and ready-cooked meals. Not for nothing is the notional meal contemplated by the cooking test described in the authorities as 'traditional'. It must be remembered that disability living allowance is a non-contributory, non-means tested benefit. A person who cannot cook for himself is entitled to the allowance, now £14·90 a week, whether he solves the eating problem by obtaining help, having a wife, buying television dinners or dining at the Savoy. On the other hand, even if a person needs to cook and has the motor skills to do so, he may still need assistance; to obtain the ingredients which the test assumes him to have, or because he is culinarily incompetent. So in my view the Court of Appeal was wrong to lay such emphasis upon the fact that unless the applicant could cook more or less every day, she would not enjoy a reasonable quality of life.

[18] That leads on to the second point, which is that the test says nothing about how often the person should be able to cook. It would have been easy for Parliament to say that a person should be able to cook daily or six times a week or whatever. Instead, the statute approaches the question of frequency in a different way. Section 72(2) contemplates that one should be able to say of someone throughout a nine-month period that he is a person whose disability is such that he cannot cook a main meal. What does this mean? One possible construction is that if there was a single occasion during the period when a remission in his disability would have allowed him to cook a meal, it cannot be said that throughout the period he was unable to do so. But the Secretary of State does not contend for this construction and I do not think that it would be right. That is not because one occasion is de minimis but because the test does not in my opinion function at that day-to-day level. It involves looking at the whole period and saying whether, in a more general sense, the person can fairly be described as a person who is unable to cook a meal. It is an exercise in judgment rather than an arithmetical calculation of frequency.

[19] I therefore agree with the commissioner that the question involves taking 'a broad view' of the matter and making a judgment. The standard of motor abilities required by the cooking test is not so precise as to allow calibration by arithmetical formula. In the present case, I think that the Court of Appeal attached too much weight to the fact that in her claim form Mrs Moyna had ticked the box '1 to 3 days' for the extent to which she needed help with heavy pans, cutting vegetables and so forth. In answering the generalised question of whether Mrs Moyna could fairly be described as a person unable to cook, it may be relevant to consider not only the number of occasions on which she says she would need assistance but also the reasons why it would be needed. The tribunal went into the matter in some detail. It observed that she could cook for herself using lighter pans and cutting up smaller vegetables. In addition, it had the opinion of the examining doctor and his record of Mrs Moyna's own description of herself as a person who could cook a meal—a description which is, as I have said, not inconsistent with her not being able to do so all the time. These are all items of evidence which go into the decision-making process.

[20] In any case in which a tribunal has to apply a standard with a greater or lesser degree of imprecision and to take a number of factors into account, there are bound to be cases in which it will be impossible for a reviewing court to say that the tribunal must have erred in law in deciding the case either way (see George Mitchell (Chesterhall) Ltd v Finney Lock Seeds Ltd [1983] 2 All ER 737 at 743, [1983] 2 AC 803 at 815–816). I respectfully think that it was unrealistic of Kay LJ to think that he was able to sharpen the test to produce only one right answer. In my opinion the commissioner was right to say that whether or not he would have arrived at the same conclusion, the decision of the tribunal disclosed no error of law.

[21] That is sufficient to dispose of the appeal, but I must say something about an alternative submission by Mr Paines QC, who appeared for the Secretary of State. He said the words 'period throughout which ... he is so severely disabled physically or mentally that ... he cannot prepare a cooked main meal for himself ...' (see s 72(1)) were ordinary English words and that their meaning was not a question of law. Consequently the short answer to the appeal was that the decision of the tribunal raised no point of law.

[22] This submission was based upon some well-known remarks of Lord Reid in Brutus v Cozens [1972] 2 All ER 1297 at 1299, [1973] AC 854 at 861, in which the question was whether the appellant had been guilty of 'insulting behaviour':

> 'The meaning of an ordinary word of the English language is not a question of law. The proper construction of a statute is a question of law. If the context shows that a word is used in an unusual sense the court will determine in other words what that unusual sense is. But here there is in my opinion no question of the word "insulting" being used in any unusual sense. It appears to me, for reasons which I shall give later, to be intended to have its ordinary meaning. It is for the tribunal which decides the case to consider, not as law but as fact, whether in the whole circumstances the words of the statute do or do not as a matter of ordinary usage of the English language cover or apply to the facts which have been proved.'

[23] I think that these observations have been given a much wider meaning than the author intended. Lord Reid was in my opinion making two very pertinent points. First, he was drawing attention to a feature of language; namely, that many words or phrases are linguistically irreducible in the sense that any attempt to elucidate a sentence by replacing them with synonyms will change rather than explain its meaning. Lord Kilbrandon made the same point in his reference to Dr Johnson ([1972] 2 All ER 1297 at 1303–1304, [1973] AC 854 at 867). On the other hand, Lord Reid insisted that, whether the statute used simple words or difficult ones, its construction was a question of law.

[24] Lord Reid was here making the well-known distinction between the meaning of a word, which depends upon conventions known to the ordinary speaker of English or ascertainable from a dictionary, and the meaning which the author of an utterance appears to have intended to convey by using that word in a sentence. The latter depends not only upon the conventional meanings of the words used but also upon syntax, context and background. The meaning of an English word is not a question of law because it does not in itself have any legal significance. It is the meaning to be ascribed to the intention of the notional legislator in using that word which is a statement of law. It is because of the nature of language that, in trying to ascertain the legislator's meaning, it is seldom helpful to make additions or substitutions in the actual language he has used.

[25] Lord Reid's second point is made in the last sentence of the passage I have quoted, when he says that the question of whether the facts found by the tribunal count as 'insulting' for the purposes of the statute is a question of fact. There is a good deal of high authority for saying that the question of whether the facts as found or admitted fall one side or the other of some conceptual line drawn by the law is a question of fact (see, for example, Edwards (Inspector of Taxes) v Bairstow [1955] 3 All ER 48, [1956] AC 14 and O'Kelly v Trusthouse Forte plc [1983] 3 All ER 456, [1984] QB 90). What this means in practice is that an appellate court with jurisdiction to entertain appeals only on questions of law will not hear an appeal against such a decision unless it falls outside the bounds of reasonable judgment.

[26] It may seem rather odd to say that something is a question of fact when there is no dispute whatever over the facts and the question is whether they fall within some legal category. In his classic work Trial by Jury, The Hamlyn Lectures (8th series, 1956) p 61 Lord Devlin said:

> 'The questions of law which are for the judge fall into two categories: first, there are questions which cannot be correctly answered except by someone who is skilled in the law; secondly, there are questions of fact which lawyers have decided that judges can answer better than juries.'

[27] Likewise it may be said that there are two kinds of questions of fact: there are questions of fact; and there are questions of law as to which lawyers have decided that it would be inexpedient for an appellate tribunal to have to form an independent judgment. But the usage is well established and causes no difficulty as long as it is understood that the degree to which an appellate court will be willing to substitute its own judgment for that of the tribunal will vary with the nature of the question (see Re Grayan Building Services Ltd (in liq) [1995] Ch 241 at 254–255, [1995] 3 WLR 1 at 12–13).

[28] Applying the first of these two points to the facts of the present case, I think that it was unhelpful for the Court of Appeal to construe the statutory language as if it included words like 'daily' or 'regularly'. Applying the second, I think that the decision of the tribunal was within the bounds of reasonable judgment. I therefore think that, properly understood, Lord Reid's remarks in Brutus v Cozens [1972] 2 All ER 1297 at 1299, [1973] AC 854 at 861 do not lay down some heterodox principle which provides a short cut to dismissing an appeal ('the last resort of counsel appearing on behalf of respondents' as Lord Woolf MR said in R v Radio Authority, ex p Bull [1997] 2 All ER 561 at 569, [1998] QB 294 at 304) but are in accordance with established principles and common sense.

[29] I would therefore allow the appeal and restore the decision of the tribunal. a

LORD RODGER OF EARLSFERRY.

[30] My Lords, I have had the privilege of considering the speech of my noble and learned friend Lord Hoffmann in draft. For the reasons that he gives I too would allow the appeal and restore the decision of the tribunal. b

LORD WALKER OF GESTINGTHORPE.

[31] My Lords, I have had the advantage of reading in draft the speech of my noble and learned friend Lord Hoffmann. For the reasons given in his speech I would allow this appeal. c

Appeal allowed.

Kate O'Hanlon Barrister.

Secretary of State for Work and Pensions v Nelligan

[2003] EWCA Civ 555

COURT OF APPEAL, CIVIL DIVISION

KENNEDY, SCOTT BAKER LJJ AND BLACKBURNE J

13 MARCH, 15 APRIL 2003

Social Security – Retirement pension – Entitlement – Social Security Contributions and Benefits Act 1992, s 45(3) – Social Security Administration Act 1992, s 1(1)(a).

The respondent was aged 60 on 14 August 1986. She claimed and received a category A pension, the amount of which was determined by the contributions she had made over the whole of her working life. Her husband was 65 on 20 October 1992 and he claimed and received a category A pension from that time. The respondent could then have made a claim for a category B pension, entitlement to which was based on marriage and the contributions made by the other party to the marriage, but she did not do so until 1 March 2000. Her category B pension was larger than her category A one. Section 43[a] of the Contributions and Benefits Act 1992 (the Benefits Act) dealt with persons entitled to more than one retirement pension. Subsection (1) provided that a person was not entitled to more than one pension for the same period and sub-s (2) provided that a person who would otherwise be entitled to both a category A and a category B pension might give notice to the Secretary of State specifying which of the two he wished to receive. Subsection (5) provided that if no such notice were given, the person was entitled to whichever of the pensions was from time to time the most favourable to him 'whether it is the pension which he claimed or not'. The respondent claimed that her category B pension should have been backdated to 1992. The appeal tribunal dismissed her appeal. She appealed to the Social Security Commissioner, submitting that s 43 of the Benefits Act applied, that her category B pension was more favourable to her, and that the words in parenthesis in sub-s (5) enabled her to have her claim backdated to 1992 when her entitlement first arose. The Commissioner allowed her appeal. The Secretary of State appealed. He submitted that because the respondent did not claim a category B pension until 1 March 2000, s 1(1)(a)[b] of the Social Security Administration Act 1992 (the Administration Act) prevented her entitlement being backdated to 1992. That section provided that no person should be entitled to any benefit unless he made a claim for it in the manner, and within the time prescribed in relation to that benefit by regulations. Under the Social Security (Claims and Payments) Regulations 1997 the maximum period for which the payment could be backdated was three months before the application for entitlement. The 1997 regulations also provided that where a person was entitled to, inter alia, category A and a Section 43, so far as material, is set out at [6], below

b Section 1, so far as material, is set out at [5], below

category B pensions, and had made a claim for one of them, the claim could be treated as a claim for either or both.

Held – Section 43(5) of the Benefits Act could only operate after the conditions of entitlement to a pension, including the precondition under s 1 of the Administration Act of a claim, had been met. Section 43 had nothing to do with establishing entitlement to a retirement pension, it simply provided a mechanism for choosing between different pensions to which there was entitlement. The words 'whether it is the pension which he claimed or not' in s 43(5) were to cover a specific situation, namely where regulations provided that a claim for one benefit could be treated as a claim for a different benefit. It was only once an entitlement was established under that s 1 of the Administration Act that one could choose between benefits under s 43(5), the beneficiary being entitled to the most favourable benefit irrespective of a claim to that particular benefit. Accordingly the respondent was not entitled to a category B retirement pension in respect of any period before 2 December 1999 and the appeal would therefore be allowed (see [22], [24]–[28] below).

Notes

For the rule that persons are not generally entitled to more than one retirement pension and for entitlement to Category A and B retirement pensions, see 44(2) Halsbury's Laws (4th edn reissue) paras 567–578.

For the Social Security Contributions and Benefits Act 1992, s 43 and the Social Security Administration Act, s 1, see 40 Halsbury's Statutes (4th edn) (2001 reissue), 338, 575.

Cases referred to in judgment

Insurance Officer v McCaffrey [1985] 1 All ER 5, [1984] 1 WLR 1353, HL.

Social Security Decision CP 3/2001, Tribunal of Comrs.

Cases also cited or referred to in skeleton arguments

Cooke v Secretary of State for Social Security [2001] EWCA Civ 734, [2002] 3 All ER 279.

Appeal

The Secretary of State for Work and Pensions appealed, with permission of Social Security Commissioner David Williams, given on 9 September 2002, from the Commissioner's decision on 22 April 2002 allowing an appeal by the respondent, Jessie Nelligan, from the decision of the Bexleyheath Appeal Tribunal on 5 January 2001 that not having made her claim for a Category B retirement pension until 1 March 2000, she was not entitled to that pension in respect of the period from 20 October 1992 to 1 December 1999. The facts are set out in the judgment of Scott Baker LJ.

David Forsdick (instructed by the Solicitor to the Department of Work and Pensions) for the Secretary of State.

The respondent did not appear.

Cur adv vult

15 April 2003. The following judgments were delivered.

SCOTT BAKER LJ (giving the first judgment at the invitation of Kennedy LJ).

[1] The state pays two different kinds of retirement pension. These are called Category A and Category B. Basically the amount of a Category A pension is determined by the contributions the recipient has made over the whole of his or her working life. In the case of a Category B pension, entitlement is based on marriage and the contributions of the other party to the marriage; the spouse must have reached retirement age and be entitled to a Category A pension. Sections 43–55 of the Social Security Contributions and Benefits Act 1992 (the Benefits Act) provide for payment of these pensions.

[2] The present appeal is by the Secretary of State against the decision of Dr David Williams, a social security commissioner, on 22 April 2002, allowing an appeal from the Bexleyheath Appeal Tribunal on 5 January 2001. It is made with the permission of Dr Williams, whose decision conflicts with an earlier decision of Wood (Social Security Decision CP 3/2001) by Mrs Deputy Commissioner Ramsay, and, we were told, the current practice. Its outcome is of general importance to the Department of Work and Pensions as well as of specific importance to the respondent.

[3] The respondent was 60 on 14 August 1986. She claimed and received a Category A pension on the basis of her own national insurance contributions. Because of the level of those contributions it was 34% of the maximum amount. Her husband, Mr Nelligan, was 65 on 20 October 1992. He claimed and received a Category A pension from that time. The fact that Mr Nelligan reached the age of 65 triggered the right for the respondent to claim what could be described as a parasitic pension under Category B. The respondent could have made such a claim in 1992 and the standard procedure is, and was in 1992, to send someone such as Mr Nelligan a standard pack about four months before he reaches state pension age. The pack should have contained a second claim form for his wife to make a Category B claim should she choose to do so. It was accepted that for some reason no such pack was sent in this case. However, the Secretary of State's position is that he was under no legal obligation to send a pack and that it would be administratively impossible to notify everyone entitled to a retirement pension, hence the provision to which I shall come in a moment that anyone entitled to a benefit must claim it. The respondent did not make her claim until 1 March 2000 and it was treated as securing entitlement to benefit from 2 December 1999 (three months before). This, according to reg 19 of the Social Security (Claims and Payments) Regulations 1987, SI 1987/1968 is the maximum period for which payment can be backdated.

[4] A person who qualifies for both a Category A and a Category B pension is entitled to receive the larger one but not both. The respondent's Category B pension was larger than her Category A pension. Her claim is that her Category B pension should have been backdated to 1992 (when her husband was 65) rather than to December 1999. The Bexleyheath Appeal Tribunal dismissed her appeal on the ground that it had no jurisdiction to do as she wished because she did not claim the pension until March 2000. However, she appealed to the social security commissioner who allowed her appeal.

[5] The relevant statutory scheme is to be found in ss 43–55 of the Benefits Act. Section 44 sets out the basic requirements for entitlement to a Category A pension. Section 48A sets out the basic requirements for entitlement to a Category B pension. However, these sections have also to be read in the context of s 1 of the Social Security Administration Act 1992 (the Administration Act) which provides:

> '(1) Except in such cases as may be prescribed, and subject to the following provisions of this section and to section 3 below, no person shall be entitled to any benefit unless, in addition to any other conditions relating to that benefit being satisfied—(a) he makes a claim for it in the manner, and within the time, prescribed in relation to that benefit by regulations under this Part of this Act; or (b) he is treated by virtue of such regulations as making a claim for it.'

[6] Section 43 of the Benefits Act deals with persons entitled to more than one retirement pension. It provides, so far as material, as follows:

> '(1) A person shall not be entitled for the same period to more than one retirement pension under this Part of this Act ...
>
> (3) A person who, apart from subsection (1) above, would be entitled—(a) to both a Category A and a Category B retirement pension under this Part for the same period ... may from time to time give notice in writing to the Secretary of State specifying which of the pensions referred to in paragraph (a) ... above he wishes to receive.
>
> (4) If a person gives such a notice, the pension so specified shall be the one to which he is entitled in respect of any week commencing after the date of the notice.
>
> (5) If no such notice is given, the person shall be entitled to whichever of the pensions is from time to time the most favourable to him (whether it is the pension which he claimed or not).'

[7] This appeal turns on the effect of the words in brackets in s 43(5) 'whether it is the pension which he claimed or not' and in particular whether they override or displace the general provision in s 1(1)(a) of the Administration Act that no one is entitled to any benefit unless he makes a claim for it within the prescribed time.

[8] The Secretary of State's submission is that because the respondent did not claim a Category B pension until 1 March 2000, s 1(1)(a) of the Administration Act prevents her entitlement being backdated to 1992. The respondent says that the Category B pension was more favourable to her and the words in brackets in s 43(5) of the Benefits Act enable her to have the claim backdated to 1992 when her husband was 65 and her entitlement first arose. The social security commissioner found in her favour. He said:

> '27. The proper context for the interpretation of s 43(5) is that of the section of which it forms part, noting the provisions that existed prior to the consolidation of those previous measures into the current section. As it is a section expressly designed to deal with conflicts between other sections, I do not find it of assistance to note those conflicts. Subsection (5) is a default provision that operates in cases where an individual has not given notice in writing of the kind which she is entitled to give from time to time under s 43(3). The effect of a notice is to choose which of the two pensions to which she is entitled the claimant wishes to receive. If notice is given, then sub-s (4) provides that it is to have effect. If it is not, then sub-s (5) operates.

28. Subsection (3) is itself an exception to the rule in sub-s (2) if the claimant chooses to use it. A claimant does not have to give a notice under sub-s (3). Subsection (2) allows an individual to receive both a Category A pension and a Category B pension at the same time, but makes provision (by reference to s 73 of the Administration Act) to remove any overlap caused by the double entitlement. Section 73 is brought into effect by the Social Security (Overlapping Benefits) Regulations 1979. The effect of sub-s (2), read with this regulation, is to stop an individual receiving more than the specified maximum amount of pension despite the double entitlement. Subsection (3) does not allow this capping to be side-stepped. It merely provides that the claimant could decide, say, to receive her Category B pension entitlement without reference to her Category A entitlement.

29. Subsection (5) is not drafted in limited terms. Nor was its predecessor in s 27(2). In my view, sub-s (5) means what it says. The respondent was entitled from the date of her husband's claim to both a Category A pension and a Category B pension. Subsection (2) stopped her being entitled to more than the higher of them. Subsection (3) allowed her to choose whether she received the Category A pension topped up by Category B entitlement or simply the Category B entitlement. As she did not make any option under sub-s (3) the Secretary of State, under sub-s (5), awarded her the Category B entitlement. Before that date, she also had given no notice and she had not made a claim. But she was entitled to the Category B pension if this was from time to time the most favourable to her whether she had claimed it or not.'

[9] He went on to conclude that any other interpretation of s 43(5) failed to take into account the 'unambiguous final words of that subsection' and its legislative history. He said:

> 'I read those final words as requiring, as a precondition of the operation of the rule in sub-s (5), that the individual concerned must have claimed one of the two relevant pensions but not both. It follows that sub-s (5) recognises an entitlement to a pension for which no claim has been made in the limited circumstances in which the subsection applies. It is an express statutory exception to the general rule in s 1 of the Administration Act.'

[10] In my judgment the social security commissioner misunderstood the effect of s 43(5) and was wrong in his conclusion that it was an express statutory exception to the general rule in s 1 of the Administration Act. He failed to appreciate the distinction between establishing entitlement and choosing between benefits. Far from the legislative history supporting the social security commissioner's conclusion in my view it strongly supports the opposite conclusion.

[11] The predecessors of ss 44 and 48A of the Benefits Act were ss 28 (Category A) and 29 (Category B) of the Social Security Act 1975 (the Social Security Act). The tests for eligibility were not precisely the same as under the Benefits Act but the general structure was essentially the same. Just like s 43(1) of the Benefits Act, so s 27(6) of the Social Security Act said there was no entitlement for the same period to more than one retirement pension. Section 27(6) of the Social Security Act (the predecessor of s 43(5) of the Benefits Act) provided:

> 'No person shall be entitled for the same period to more than one retirement pension; but where under the following sections in this Part (whether Chapter I or Chapter II) a person would otherwise be entitled to more than one such pension, he shall be entitled (whichever pension he may apply for) to whichever one is from time to time the most favourable to him.'

The words in my italics were repealed by the Social Security Pensions Act 1975 (the Pensions Act) (see s 65(3) and Sch 5), and replaced by s 25 of that Act in materially the same terms as s 43 of the Benefits Act which was passed as a consolidating statute. Section 25(1) of the Pensions Act provided:

> '(1) Where under Part II of the [Social Security Act] ... a person would, but for section 27(6) of that Act, be entitled to more than one retirement pension, he may give notice in writing to the Secretary of State from time to time stating which of the pensions he wishes to receive; and that pension shall then be the one to which he is entitled in respect of any week commencing after the date of the notice.
>
> (2) If no such notice is given, the person shall be entitled (whichever pension he may have claimed) to whichever one is from time to time the most favourable to him.'

[12] Subsection (1) subsequently became sub-ss (3) and (4) of s 43 of the Benefits Act and sub-s (2) subsequently became sub-s 43(5) of that Act. Significantly, when the Social Security Act became law there was no equivalent to s 1 of the Administration Act (the section that makes entitlement to a benefit dependent on a claim being made).

[13] The next step in the story is provided by the decision of the House of Lords in Insurance Officer v McCaffrey [1985] 1 All ER 5, [1984] 1 WLR 1353. That was a case under the Northern Ireland legislation which was, however, in substantially the same terms as the legislation that governed social security elsewhere in the United Kingdom. Margaret McCaffrey made a claim, after she had reached pensionable age, for a non-contributory invalidity pension. The relevant provision (s 36(1) of the Social Security (Northern Ireland) Act 1975) said that 'a person who has attained pensionable age shall not be entitled to a pension under this section unless he was so entitled ... immediately before attaining that age'. She met the necessary criteria but the insurance officer rejected her application because she had not made a claim before she reached pensionable age. The House of Lords rejected the insurance officer's appeal. The provision said nothing about making a claim being a condition precedent to entitlement. The insurance officer, however, relied on a later section in the same Act (s 79(1)) which said:

> 'Subject to the following provisions of this Chapter, and, in the case of retirement pensions, to section 27(6), it shall be a condition of a person's right to any benefit that he makes a claim for it in the prescribed manner and within the prescribed time.'

Lord Scarman rejected the insurance officer's argument that this modified the provision so that there was no entitlement until a claim was made, saying the section should not be construed so as to place any restriction on entitlement but rather as dealing with the administration of benefit and the right to be paid.

[14] In order to reverse the effect of this decision Parliament enacted s 17 of the Social Security Act 1985, which added s 165A into the Social Security Act. That section was, so far as material, in the same terms as are now to be found in s 1 of the Administration Act. Thus, by enacting what is now s 1 of the Administration Act after the statutory predecessor to s 43(5) of the Benefits Act Parliament was showing that making a claim for a benefit was necessary in addition to meeting any conditions of entitlement.

[15] Consolidating legislation was passed in 1992 in the form of the Benefits Act and the Administration Act. The position is now governed by s 1 of the Administration Act and ss 43, 44 and 48A of the Benefits Act, and s 1 of the Administration Act must be satisfied before any entitlement to benefit arises.

[16] There is no doubt that 'benefit' in s 1 of the Administration Act includes Category A and Category B retirement pensions. Section 191 of the Administration Act defines benefit as meaning benefit under the Benefits Act, and s 122 of the Benefits Act defines benefit as including benefit under Pt II of that Act which is where retirement pensions are to be found.

[17] Section 1(1) of the Administration Act states the general position that entitlement to any benefit is dependent on a claim being made for it. Everything flows from a claim and this is so whether there is an actual claim under s 1(1)(a) or an applicant is treated by regulations as making a claim under s 1(1)(b).

[18] The only relevant regulations relating to the Administration Act are the 1987 regulations. Regulation 3, so far as is material, provides as follows:

> 'It shall not be a condition of entitlement to benefit that a claim be made for it in the following cases ... (d) in the case of a Category A or B retirement pension—(i) where the beneficiary is a woman over the age of 65 and entitled to a widowed mother's allowance or widowed parent's allowance, on her ceasing to be so entitled; or (ii) where the beneficiary is a woman under the age of 65 and in receipt of widow's pension or bereavement allowance, on her attaining that age.'

The respondent in the present case falls into neither category. Regulation 9 of the 1987 regulations deals with interchange with claims for other benefits. Regulation 9(1) provides:

> 'Where it appears that a person who has made a claim for benefit specified in column (1) of Part I of Schedule 1 may be entitled to the benefit specified opposite to it in column (2) of that Part, any such claim may be treated by the Secretary of State or the Board as a claim alternatively, or in addition, to the benefit specified opposite to it in that column.'

[19] The way that reg 9 and Sch 1 operate is that where a person may be entitled to both benefits, the claim can be treated as a claim for either or both. However, these provisions do not apply in the present case because the person has to satisfy the conditions of entitlement to both benefits at the date of the claim. The words 'may be entitled' in reg 9 plainly refer to the date on which the claim is made. Where, as in this case, the respondent made a claim to a Category A pension at a time when she was not entitled to a Category B pension because her husband had not reached retirement age, she cannot later rely on that Category A pension claim as a Category B pension claim when her husband does later reach retirement age. As Mr Forsdick for the appellant pointed out, if it was not necessary to make a claim for benefit these provisions would be unnecessary.

[20] Mr Forsdick also referred us to s 8 of the Social Security Act 1998 which, so far as material, provides:

> '(1) Subject to the provisions of this Chapter, it shall be for the Secretary of State—(a) to decide any claim for a relevant benefit ...
>
> (2) Where at any time a claim for a relevant benefit is decided by the Secretary of State—(a) the claim shall not be regarded as subsisting after that time; and (b) accordingly, the claimant shall not (without making a further claim) be entitled to the benefit on the basis of circumstances not obtaining at that time.'

This simply translated into statutory form the law as it was previously understood to be.

[21] So, there cannot be two subsisting decisions in respect of the same claim. Also, there must be entitlement to each of two pensions, including a claim for each, before s 43 of the Benefits Act can bite on the situation.

[22] With what is s 43(5) of the Benefits Act concerned? The words in brackets are, in my judgment, to cover a specific situation. That is where regulations provide that a claim for one benefit can be treated as a claim for a different benefit. The beneficiary is entitled to the most favourable benefit irrespective of a claim to that particular benefit. A practical example is where a woman does not claim a Category A pension at retirement age, but subsequently claims a Category B pension when her husband retires. Because reg 9 and Sch 1 of the 1987 regulations apply, her claim for a Category B pension can be treated as a claim for a Category A pension if this is more favourable to her. Under s 43(5) of the Benefits Act the Secretary of State, in the absence of notification from her, can pay the Category A pension even though that is not the pension that she has claimed. What is critical, however, is that the s 43(5) interchange can only operate after the conditions of entitlement, including the precondition under s 1 of the Administration Act of a claim or a deemed claim, have been met.

[23] Section 43(5) of the Benefits Act is providing for a different application of the test in s 43(3). The contrary construction (ie that adopted by the social security commissioner) would mean that the words in brackets in s 43(5) overruled or supplanted the general rule of law spelt out in s 1 of the Administration Act. Section 1 of the Administration Act spells out the general position in very clear terms and it seems to me inconceivable that Parliament should have intended to achieve such a result by, as it were, a side wind.

CONCLUSION

[24] Section 43 of the Benefits Act has nothing to do with establishing entitlement to a retirement pension. It simply provides a mechanism for choosing between different pensions to which there is entitlement. One only reaches the s 43(5) analysis after one has determined to what pensions a person is entitled under other sections. The subsection is of limited and not general application.

a [25] The legislative history illustrates clearly why s 1 of the Administration Act, and more particularly its predecessor s 17 of the Social Security Act 1985, was enacted, namely to reverse the effect of the decision in Insurance Officer v McCaffrey [1985] 1 All ER 5, [1984] 1 WLR 1353 and make clear the fundamental position that entitlement to a benefit is ordinarily dependent on a claim being made for it.

b [26] I would therefore allow the appeal and direct that the respondent is not entitled to a Category B retirement pension in respect of any period before 2 December 1999.

BLACKBURNE J.

[27] I agree.

c

KENNEDY LJ.

[28] I also agree.

Appeal allowed.

Dilys Tausz Barrister.

Corbett and another v Halifax plc and others

[2002] EWCA Civ 1849

COURT OF APPEAL, CIVIL DIVISION

SCHIEMANN, SCOTT BAKER LJJ AND PUMFREY J

24 OCTOBER, 18 DECEMBER 2002

Mortgage – Sale – Exercise of power of sale by mortgagee – Setting aside – Deception by purchaser – Purchaser deceiving vendor mortgagee – Relevance of deception to mortgagor – Whether sale liable to be set aside – Law of Property Act 1925, s 104(2).

The claimants owned a house on which they secured a mortgage from the first defendant. The loan proposal was countersigned by the second defendant, then an employee of the first defendant. The claimants defaulted on the loan and an order for possession was made in the first defendant's favour. The first defendant instructed selling agents, including in its terms of engagement a standard provision of its in-house rules that 'under no circumstances may staff of the [first defendant] ... or their families purchase a property in possession'. The second and third defendants wished to purchase the property and the second defendant devised a plan to buy it in the name of M, his uncle. M purchased the property and, in a back-to-back transaction, sold it to the second defendant. The second and third defendants were then registered as first proprietors of the property. The claimants alleged that the sale should be set aside as having been fraudulent or at an undervalue. The judge held that the property had been sold below the best price attainable; that the second defendant had not been employed by the first defendant in any manner connected with the sale, but that he had acquired title by deceiving the first defendant into believing that M had been the true purchaser; that the second defendant had known the first defendant would not have sold to him had he disclosed the true facts; and that the second and third defendants were not purchasers in good faith and therefore could not take the benefit of s 104(2)[a] of the Law of Property Act 1925 which provided protection for a purchaser in good faith from a mortgagee exercising its statutory power of sale. In those circumstances, the judge held that the justice of the case required that the sale be set aside. On the second and third defendants' appeal, it fell to be determined whether the sale was liable to be set aside on the ground that they had deceived the first defendant into selling to them rather than to another purchaser.

Held – Equity would not intervene to set aside a conveyance of a legal estate made pursuant to the statutory power of sale unless there was some element of impropriety or bad faith on the part of the mortgagee in the exercise of that power. Moreover, a completed sale by a mortgagee was not liable to be set aside merely because it had taken place at an undervalue: impropriety was a prerequisite and it was made clear by s 104(2) of the 1925 Act that a purchaser was not protected if he or she had actual knowledge of the impropriety. It followed that a completed sale by a mortgagee pursuant to the statutory power of sale was vulnerable only if the purchaser had knowledge of or participated in an impropriety in the exercise of the power. In the instant case, the second defendant's deception of his employers did not confer upon the claimant mortgagors any right to set the sale aside which they would not have possessed against any other purchaser at an undervalue who had not known of the undervalue and was not involved in the exercise of the power of sale by the first defendant. There was therefore never any equity which could be asserted by the claimants to set aside the sale to the second and third defendants. Improper or irregular exercise of the statutory power of sale did not include circumstances of which the mortgagee had no knowledge and in which the claimants had no concern. The first defendant's in-house rules and their proper application were nothing to do with the claimants. The judge had therefore been wrong to set the sale aside on the basis that the second and third defendants could not take the benefit of s 104(2) of the 1925 Act. Accordingly, the appeal would be allowed (see [26], [30], [31], [35]–[39], [44], [46]–[48], [51], [52], below).

a Section 104 is set out at [22], below

Lord Waring v London and Manchester Assurance Co Ltd [1935] Ch 310 and Property and Bloodstock Ltd v Emerton [1967] 3 All ER 321 applied.

Notes

For the protection of purchasers from irregularity in sale, see 32 Halsbury's Laws (4th edn reissue) para 669.

For the Law of Property Act 1925, s 104, see 37 Halsbury's Statutes (4th edn) (2003 reissue) 254.

Cases referred to in judgments

Berwick & Co v Price [1905] 1 Ch 632.

China and South Sea Bank Ltd v Tan [1989] 3 All ER 839, [1990] 1 AC 536, [1990] 2 WLR 56, PC.

Cuckmere Brick Co Ltd v Mutual Finance Ltd, Mutual Finance Ltd v Cuckmere Brick Co Ltd [1971] 2 All ER 633, [1971] Ch 949, [1971] 2 WLR 1207, CA.

Downsview Nominees Ltd v First City Corp Ltd [1993] 3 All ER 626, [1993] AC 295, [1993] 2 WLR 86, PC.

Farrar v Farrars Ltd (1888) 40 Ch D 395, CA.

Hounslow London BC v Hare (1990) 24 HLR 9.

Kennedy v De Trafford [1897] AC 180, [1895–9] All ER Rep 408, HL.

Kingsalton Ltd v Thames Water Developments Ltd [2001] EWCA Civ 20, (2001) 1 P & CR 184.

Medforth v Blake [1999] 3 All ER 97, [2000] Ch 86, [1999] 3 WLR 922, CA.

Midland Bank Trust Co Ltd v Green [1981] 1 All ER 153, [1981] AC 513, [1981] 2 WLR 28, HL.

National Bank of Greece SA v Pinios Shipping Co No 1, The Maira [1990] 1 All ER 78, [1990] 1 AC 637, [1989] 3 WLR 1330, HL.

Oliver v Hinton [1899] 2 Ch 264, CA.

Pilcher v Rawlins (1872) LR 7 Ch App 259, LJJ.

Property and Bloodstock Ltd v Emerton, Bush v Property and Bloodstock Ltd [1967] 3 All ER 321, [1968] Ch 94, [1967] 3 WLR 973, CA.

Taylor v London and County Banking Co, London and County Banking Co v Nixon [1901] 2 Ch 231, CA.

Tse Kwong Lam v Wong Chit Sen [1983] 3 All ER 54, [1983] 1 WLR 1349, PC.

Waring (Lord) v London and Manchester Assurance Co Ltd [1935] Ch 310, [1934] All ER Rep 642.

Warner v Jacob (1882) 20 Ch D 220.
Yorkshire Bank plc v Hall, Hall v Yorkshire Bank plc [1999] 1 All ER 879, [1999] 1 WLR 1713, CA.

Cases referred to in skeleton arguments
Bailey v Barnes [1894] 1 Ch 25, CA.
Benedictus v Jalaram Ltd [1989] 1 EGLR 251, CA.
Blockbuster Entertainment Ltd v Leakcliff Properties Ltd [1997] 1 EGLR 28.
Dunbar Bank plc v Nadeem [1998] 3 All ER 876, CA.
Flannery v Halifax Estate Agencies Ltd [2000] 1 All ER 373, [2000] 1 WLR 377, CA.
Forsyth v Blundell, Associated Securities Ltd v Blundell (1973) 129 CLR 477, Aust HC.
Gafford v Graham [1999] 3 EGLR 75, CA.
Jaggard v Sawyer [1995] 2 All ER 189, [1995] 1 WLR 269, CA.
Ketteman v Hansel Properties Ltd [1988] 1 All ER 38, [1987] AC 189, [1987] 2 WLR 312, HL.
Martinson v Clowes (1882) 21 Ch D 857; affd (1885) 52 LT 706, CA.
Moody v Cox and Hatt [1917] 2 Ch 71, [1916–17] All ER Rep 548, CA.
Pasquarella v National Australia Finance Ltd [1987] 1 NZLR 312, NZ CA.
Sewell v Agricultural Mortgage Bank of Western Australia (1930) 44 CLR 104.
Sindall (William) plc v Cambridgeshire CC [1994] 3 All ER 932, [1994] 1 WLR 1016, CA.
South Australia Asset Management Corp v York Montague Ltd, United Bank of Kuwait plc v Prudential Property Services Ltd, Nykredit Mortgage Bank plc v Edward Erdman Group Ltd [1996] 3 All ER 365, [1997] AC 191, [1996] 3 WLR 87, HL.
Spence v Crawford [1939] 3 All ER 271, HL.
Three Rivers DC v Bank of England (No 3) [2001] UKHL/16, [2001] 2 All ER 513.
Wolff v Vanderzee (1869) 20 LT 353.

Appeal
The second and third defendants, Alan John Deakin and Jillian Deakin, appealed with permission of Judge Weeks QC sitting as a judge of the Chancery Division from his order on 17 October 2001 setting aside the sale by the Halifax Building Society, the predecessor of the first defendant, Halifax plc, as mortgagee in possession, of Yew Tree Farm, Sand, Wedmore, Somerset, to them. The claimants, Ian Dudley Corbett and Elaine June Corbett, had alleged that the sale was fraudulent or at an undervalue. Halifax appealed on a costs point. The facts are set out in the judgment of Pumfrey J.

Thomas Jefferies (instructed by Wards, Bristol) for the Deakins.
Philomena Harrison (instructed by Bevan Ashford, Bristol) for the Corbetts.
Neil Levy (instructed by Hammond Suddards Edge, Leeds) for the Halifax.

Cur adv vult

18 December 2002. The following judgments were delivered.

PUMFREY J (giving the first judgment at the invitation of Schiemann LJ).

INTRODUCTION

[1] The appellants, to whom I shall refer as 'the Deakins', appeal with the permission of Judge Weeks QC sitting as a judge of the Chancery Division against his judgment delivered on 17 October 2001 setting aside the sale by the third respondent (the Halifax) as mortgagee in possession of Yew Tree Farm, Sand, Wedmore, Somerset, to them. The claimants, to whom I shall refer as 'the Corbetts', allege that the sale was fraudulent or at an undervalue. Judge Weeks ordered the register to be rectified to reflect his order, and made an order for possession of Yew Tree Farm in favour of the Halifax and for immediate sale.

[2] Although Judge Weeks' finding that the sale to the Corbetts was at an undervalue was challenged in the grounds of appeal and in the appellants' skeleton argument, Mr Jefferies, recognising the difficulties confronting him in pursuing a challenge to the judge's finding of fact, did not pursue the point with any enthusiasm, and it is now accepted that the judge's finding that the sale took place at an undervalue must stand.

[3] With that introduction, I turn to the facts of the case. Judge Weeks sets out the events fully and with great care, and I will only set out so much of the facts here as make this judgment comprehensible.

[4] The Corbetts purchased Yew Tree Farm in 1983. It then consisted of a site of about 1·5 acres fronting a quiet country lane, with (1) a 250-year-old farmhouse abutting the lane; (2) a barn and outbuildings behind the farmhouse, later converted by the Corbetts to a house called Little Sneyd; and (3) a paddock of about 1 acre, which the Corbetts still own. Yew Tree Farm, Little Sneyd and an adjoining property share access over a single shared drive from the lane. Until 1992, the Corbetts lived in Yew Tree Farm and ran a bed and breakfast business. Mr Corbett also ran a printing business from a caravan parked on the property.

[5] In 1987, the greater part of the property excluding the outbuildings was mortgaged to Western Trust and Savings Ltd to secure a loan of £75,125, which was used to finance the conversion of Little Sneyd. Mr and Mrs Corbett appear to have run into difficulties almost immediately, since in February 1989 they put the whole property, except the paddock and another strip providing access to the paddock from the lane on the market. They found no takers, and ultimately they raised the funds to discharge the loan by remortgaging the farmhouse and a small garden to the Halifax. The loan proposal was countersigned by Mr Deakin, then an employee of the Halifax at its branch in Weston-super-Mare and the transaction was completed on 23 March 1990. The loan secured was £160,000, of which £82,163 went to redeem the existing mortgage. The interest rate was 13·5% p a over the first two years, and the monthly repayment rate was £1,995. The rest of the money was used for Little Sneyd, and a further advance of £25,000 on the same security was obtained on 20 August 1990, raising the total indebtedness to £185,000 less the capital element of the repayments which the Corbetts made from March 1990. The repayment rate was then set at £2,286 per month, which the Corbetts knew they could not meet out of income. In January 1991 they borrowed a further £18,000 from Consumer Loans Co (Consumer Loans), and executed a further mortgage over 'Yew Tree Farm, Sand, Wedmore' on 13 February 1991 in favour of Consumer Loans. They applied £4,564 of the loan obtained from Consumer Loans in paying the December 1990 and January 1991 instalments of the principal loan, and then defaulted. By the following January the total indebtedness was £210,025·13.

[6] The Halifax's mortgage conditions then current were the 1988 edition, and the express power of sale is contained in cll 12 and 13:

> '12. The Redemption Money shall become immediately payable to the Society

(a) if there is a default in the payment of any two Monthly Payments or for two months in the payment of any moneys payable under the Mortgage these Conditions or the Rules ...

13. At any time after the Redemption Money has become immediately payable the Society may without any previous notice to or concurrence on the part of the Borrower:

(a) take possession of the Property

(b) exercise all the powers conferred on mortgagees by the Law of Property Act 1925 with all the incidences of such powers but so that the power of sale may be exercised whether the Society shall be in possession or not and without the restrictions imposed by s 103 of that Act ...

18. The Society's powers contained in the Mortgage or these Conditions are in addition and without prejudice to and not in substitution for all other powers and remedies of the Society under the Rules or by statute.'

[7] By 6 September 1991 it was clear to the Corbetts that possession proceedings were imminent, and their solicitor secured the agreement of the Halifax to postpone action for six months to enable the Corbetts to try to sell the property themselves. They failed to obtain a sale and ultimately the order for possession was made in the Weston-super-Mare County Court on 23 June 1992, possession to be given by 21 July. Their agents, Borough Mall, had by then reduced the asking price to £195,000. The Halifax did not take steps to execute the order until late in the year, by which time a single tentative offer of £150,000 had been obtained. The warrant for possession was obtained and was enforceable on 19 January 1993. Possession was obtained on 19 January 1993, and the Halifax formally instructed another firm of agents, Michael Gillett, as selling agents, having informally approached them some days earlier. The Halifax's standard terms of engagement included a provision that 'under no circumstances may staff of the Halifax group of companies or agent's staff or their families purchase a property in possession'.

[8] Two valuations of the property were obtained at this stage. The first, from Mr Dunscombe, a partner in Michael Gillett, was for a value after necessary repairs of £133,000 and an asking price in present condition of £137,000. The second, from Mr Hawthorne (an in-house valuer employed by the Halifax), valued the property at £142,000 with an asking price of £149,950. The Halifax's South East Property Unit (referred to as SEPU) considered the valuations and decided that the asking price should be £145,000 and the minimum price £135,000. On 9 February 1993 the Halifax gave instructions to Michael Gillett to start marketing the property. Particulars were prepared by Mrs Balson, the Wedmore manager of Michael Gillett. The amount outstanding was now about £236,000.

[9] During this period, the Corbetts decided to put Little Sneyd, which appears to have been unencumbered apart from the mortgage to Consumer Loans, on the market with a view to paying off the Halifax loan with the proceeds and retaining Yew Tree Farm. They found a potential purchaser, but the matter proceeded slowly because of uncertainty over the boundaries of Little Sneyd and the extent of the Halifax's charge.

[10] The Deakins had been on Michael Gillett's books since 1992. I take the account of what then happened from the judgment:

'Michael Gillett had kept a file on Mr Deakin with his address and telephone number in Wedmore and a work number, which was stated on the file to be a Halifax number. He had viewed several properties and made an offer on one called The Coach House, which did not proceed, in the previous year. On 2 February 1992 he was recorded as still looking, and on 8 February he went to view a house in Theale. His limit was recorded as £160,000 on the file. On 11 February 1992 Mrs Balson took Mr Deakin and his wife and mother to see Yew Tree Farm. Mr Deakin has given different versions of the subsequent events on different occasions and I am not able to accept his evidence except where independently verified. Where it conflicts with that of Mrs Balson or Mr Gillett I prefer the latter. There is, however, no particular reason why Mr Deakin should have remembered Mr and Mrs Corbett's mortgage application in 1990 or been aware at this stage that the property was a Halifax repossession. It was immediately apparent to Mrs Balson that the Deakins liked the property very much. She says they "fell in love with it", although that is not the phrase they say they would have used. Mr Deakin said he made an immediate offer for £140,000 in writing. Mrs Balson cannot recall seeing such an offer and no copy of the document has been produced. She agrees, however, that the Deakins offered £140,000 straight away. She did not realise that Mr Deakin worked for the Halifax ... I find that Stephanie Balson told Michael Gillett that Mr Deakin had offered £140,000 for Yew Tree Farm. Mr Gillett was on nodding terms with Mr Deakin and knew that he worked for the Halifax. He told Stephanie Balson that Mr Deakin, as a Halifax employee, should not be purchasing a property repossessed by the Halifax. They agreed that one of them should speak to him. Either Mr Gillett or Mrs Balson did so, and Mr Deakin withdrew his offer. He was, however, quite determined to buy the property and over the weekend he devised a plan to buy it in his uncle's name. His uncle, Mr Marples, lived in Sheffield ... on 15 February 1993, Mr Deakin, or someone at his instigation, rang Stephanie Balson and made an offer for the property. Her note of 15 February says that "Mr A Marples offered £140,000", and gives his address and phone number in Sheffield. Mrs Balson was not stupid and knew that Mr Marples had not seen the property. She suspected, or realised, that Mr Deakin was using Mr Marples' name to circumvent the Halifax rules.'

[11] Judge Weeks found that the matter was raised with Mr Deakin again by Michael Gillett, who was told by Mr Deakin that the latter had his line manager's approval for the purchase.

[12] There were further complications in the sale of Little Sneyd, which did not have the benefit of any easement permitting access over the land which appeared to form part of the Halifax's security and whose boundary was in any case uncertain. The SEPU (which is located in Southampton) recommended a sale to Mr Deakin at the offer price having regard to the uncertainty in boundaries, and at the same time appears to have taken steps to make the sale of Little Sneyd difficult, so that the problems of boundaries and access could be overcome while it remained the Corbetts' property. A rival purchaser for Yew Tree Farm, Mr Shell, had also appeared on the scene, who consistently offered £145,000 but whose offer was never accepted, largely it would seem in consequence of Mrs Balson's failure to recommend it. The Halifax had a rule that an offer had to be 5% better to displace an existing firm offer, and the Shells were never told that if they wished their offer to be considered it would have to be £147,000 or above.

[13] By 20 July 1993, when contracts were exchanged in respect of Yew Tree Farm, the Shells had walked away because their offer of £145,000 had not been accepted. The intending purchaser of Little Sneyd had also abandoned the transaction, and the question of boundaries had finally been resolved. The price was £140,000 and the purchaser was Mr Marples. In a back-to-back transaction that took place on the same day, Mr Marples sold to Mr Deakin. Mr Deakin paid two lots of stamp duty on the transaction. On 12 November 1993, the Deakins were registered as first proprietors of Yew Tree Farm subject to a first charge in favour of the Abbey National under title no ST103445.

[14] The Deakins did not go into occupation immediately, preferring to stay at their old home in Wedmore until certain works were done. The Corbetts stayed in Little Sneyd. Mrs Corbett got hold of a MIRAS form sent to Mr Deakin at Yew Tree Farm, and showed it to her mortgage broker, who complained to the Halifax. The allegation, as advanced by the Corbetts' adviser, a licensed conveyancer called Mr Stait, was as follows, as reported by the Halifax:

> '... we have sold the ... property as mortgagee at an under-value to an employee of the Society. There is also an allegation that the Society frustrated the sale of an adjoining property (not in the mortgage) thereby preventing the borrowers from clearing off the arrears and avoiding a sale of our mortgaged property. Mr Stait says that the property was sold to a Mr Alan John Deakin who works at one of our Bristol offices. He has in his possession a copy of an Abbey National completion letter addressed to the property and a copy of Mr Deakin's MIRAS form. He also says that local workmen confirmed that they were carrying out work at the property for Mr Deakin. Mr Stait does not have a copy of the statutory post-mortgagee in possession notice which we will have served on the borrowers. We have been in correspondence with Dibb Lupton, who acted in the sale, who say that the buyer was Mr Alan Marples. The property was sold by some local agents, Gilletts of Wedmore, who he knows refused a higher offer for the property after the sale by the Society at £140,000 had been agreed. The sale was completed, apparently on 10 August.'

[15] Thus the battle lines between the Deakins and the Corbetts, now close neighbours, were drawn. After an investigation, Mr Deakin was punished by the Halifax for his actions, but was not dismissed. The Halifax took no steps to set the sale to him aside.

[16] In 1993 and 1994 the Deakins carried out certain works on Yew Tree Farm. They were unsuccessful in selling their old house in Wedmore, and contemplated selling Yew Tree Farm. On 13 October 1994 a letter before action was sent to the Halifax by the Corbetts' then solicitors. The Halifax's response was found by Judge Weeks not to be frank, but it seems to me that this is immaterial. A writ was eventually issued on 29 May 1996, followed by a statement of claim on 13 March 1997. The defence was served by the Deakins and a defence and counterclaim served by the Halifax in November. Neither the Corbetts nor the Deakins have sold their respective properties, with the consequence that over the whole period of this dispute they have remained neighbours.

THE JUDGMENT BELOW

[17] Before Judge Weeks, the Corbetts did not pursue their claim against the Halifax in respect of Little Sneyd (the sale of which was alleged to have been impeded by the Halifax) and advanced their claim against the Deakins and the Halifax on two bases, fraud and sale at an undervalue. The material findings of Judge Weeks may be summarised as follows. (i) Mr Deakin, an employee of the Halifax, deceived the Halifax into selling to him, by interposing Mr Marples as a nominee purchaser. If the Halifax had known of Mr Deakin's involvement, it would not have sold to him. (ii) Mr Deakin was not employed by the Halifax in any manner connected with the sale, and thus the sale could not be set aside on the basis of Farrar v Farrars Ltd (1888) 40 Ch D 395. (iii) The decision to accept the offer made by Mr Deakin acting through Mr Marples was made by the employees of the Halifax in total ignorance of Mr Deakin's involvement. (iv) The Halifax's local agents (Michael Gillett and Stephanie Balson) were aware that Deakin was involved and that he would not be entitled to purchase according to the Halifax's own rules but they accepted his story that he had cleared the purchase with his management. They acted without dishonesty or improper motive. (v) The best price reasonably attainable for Yew Tree Farm was its open market value, which was £160,000 at the relevant time. (vi) If the Halifax had sold to the disappointed would-be purchasers (the Shells) for £145,000 there would have been no undervalue since the margin on the valuation was plus or minus 10%. (vii) The Deakins were not purchasers 'in good faith' within the meaning of the definition of 'purchaser' in s 205(1)(xxi) of the Law of Property Act 1925, and could not, therefore, take the benefit of s 104 of the 1925 Act.

[18] Judge Weeks rejected a submission that he was bound by the decision of the Court of Appeal in Property and Bloodstock Ltd v Emerton [1967] 3 All ER 321, [1968] Ch 94 to hold that damages was the only remedy for a mortgagor in the Corbetts' position, but that 'the remedies should be adjusted to fit the circumstances of the case'. He therefore set aside the sale to the Deakins. His reasoning was as follows:

> 'In the present case, the mortgagee sold at an undervalue in breach of its duty. It does not, I think, make any difference whether the duty was statutory or equitable. The undervalue was small, but the size of the undervalue is significant only as an indicator of the presence or absence of bad faith on the part of the vendor. There was therefore a breach, on any view, and the power was wrongly exercised.'

Having quoted a passage from the then current edition of Emmet on Title (19th edn, 1986) (a passage which no longer appears) the judge assimilated the rights of a purchaser from a mortgagee in possession selling pursuant to his statutory power under s 101 of the Law of Property Act 1925 to that of a mortgagee in possession selling pursuant to an express power contained in the mortgage:

> 'In principle, a purchaser from any vendor who wrongly exercises a power of sale will get a good title if he is a bona fide purchaser for value without notice of the breach. The sale to Mr Marples was made under an extension of the statutory power. Whether or not that qualifies as an exercise of an express or a statutory power, the rights of Mr Marples and Mr Deakin cannot, I think, be any greater than those conferred by s 104 of the Law of Property Act ...'

[19] The judge referred to the protection conferred on purchasers by s 104, and turned to the statutory definition of 'purchaser' contained in s 205(1)(xxi) of the Law of Property Act 1925. Having considered the well-known observations of Lord Wilberforce in Midland Bank Trust Co Ltd v Green [1981] 1 All ER 153,

[1981] AC 513 on the meaning of the words 'bona fide' or 'good faith' in this context, he continued:

> 'Mr Deakin was a purchaser for valuable consideration. In my judgment, he was not a purchaser in good faith. He acquired title by deceiving the vendor into believing that another person was the true purchaser and he knew the vendor would not have sold to him if he had disclosed the true facts. It is true that the Corbetts will gain more from setting aside than they have lost by the undervalue. But this arises from the increase in house prices since 1990. As between the Deakins and the Corbetts, I think it is fair that this increase should accrue to those who bought the house legitimately in 1983 rather than those who bought it dishonestly in 1993. In those circumstances, in my view, the justice of the case requires that the sale be set aside on terms.'

[20] The principal question which arises on this appeal is thus whether the sale to the Deakins was liable to be set aside, not because the Deakins or the Halifax knew or should have known of the undervalue, but because the Deakins had deceived the Halifax into selling to them rather than to somebody else. I shall consider Judge Weeks' reasons summarised above in more detail in considering this question.

THE POWERS AND DUTIES OF THE MORTGAGEE

[21] It is convenient to start with the statutory power of sale and the provisions contained in s 104 for the protection of the purchaser, as the express powers of sale in this case are drafted by reference to them. By s 101 of the Law of Property Act 1925:

> 'Powers incident to estate or interest of mortgage.—(1) A mortgagee, where the mortgage is made by deed, shall, by virtue of this Act, have the following powers, to the like extent as if they had been in terms conferred by the mortgage deed, but not further (namely):—(i) A power, when the mortgage money has become due, to sell, or to concur with any other person in selling, the mortgaged property, or any part thereof, either subject to prior charges or not, and either together or in lots, by public auction or by private contract, subject to such conditions respecting title, or evidence of title, or other matter, as the mortgagee thinks fit, with power to vary any contract for sale, and to buy in at an auction, or to rescind any contract for sale, and to re-sell, without being answerable for any loss occasioned thereby ...'

[22] Section 104 provides protection for a purchaser from a mortgagee:

> '(1) A mortgagee exercising the power of sale conferred by this Act shall have power, by deed, to convey the property sold, for such estate and interest therein as he is by this Act authorised to sell or convey or may be the subject of the mortgage, freed from all estates, interest, and rights to which the mortgage has priority, but subject to all estates, interests, and rights which have priority to the mortgage.
>
> (2) Where a conveyance is made in exercise of the power of sale conferred by this Act, or any enactment replaced by this Act, the title of the purchaser shall not be impeachable on the ground—(a) that no case had arisen to authorise the sale; or (b) that due notice was not given; or (c) where the mortgage is made after the commencement of this Act, that leave of the court, when so required, was not obtained; or (d) whether the mortgage was made before or after such commencement, that the power was otherwise improperly or irregularly exercised; and a purchaser is not, either before or on conveyance, concerned to see or inquire whether a case has arisen to authorise the sale, or due notice has been given, or the power is otherwise properly and regularly exercised; but any person damnified by an unauthorised, or improper, or irregular exercise of the power shall have his remedy in damages against the person exercising the power.

(3) A conveyance on sale by a mortgagee, made after the commencement of this Act, shall be deemed to have been made in exercise of the power of sale conferred by this Act unless a contrary intention appears.'

[23] The mortgagee is not a trustee of his power of sale (see Kennedy v De Trafford [1897] AC 180, [1895–9] All ER Rep 408). The purpose of the power of sale is to enable the mortgagee to realise his security in the event of a default by the borrower. The scope of the power was described (as the judge rightly said) by Robert Walker LJ in Yorkshire Bank plc v Hall [1999] 1 All ER 879 at 893, [1999] 1 WLR 1713 at 1728:

'... the bank relied on principles stated by the Privy Council in the well-known cases of China and South Sea Bank Ltd v Tan [1989] 3 All ER 839, [1990] 1 AC 536 and Downsview Nominees Ltd v First City Corp Ltd [1993] 3 All ER 626, [1993] AC 295 and by the House of Lords in National Bank of Greece SA v Pinios Shipping Co No 1, The Maira [1990] 1 All ER 78, [1990] 1 AC 637. Those cases together establish or reaffirm that a mortgagee's duty to the mortgagor or to a surety depend partly on the express terms on which the transaction was agreed and partly on duties (some general and some particular) which equity imposes for the protection of the mortgagor and the surety. The mortgagee's duty is not a duty imposed under the tort of negligence, nor are contractual duties to be implied. The general duty (owed both to subsequent incumbrancers and to the mortgagor) is for the mortgagee to use his powers only for proper purposes, and to act in good faith (the Downsview Nominees Ltd case [1993] 3 All ER 626 at 639, [1993] AC 295 at 317). The specific duties arise if the mortgagee exercises his express or statutory powers (the Downsview Nominees Ltd case at [1993] 3 All ER 626 at 637, [1993] AC 295 at 315). If he exercises his power to take possession, he becomes liable to account on a strict basis (which is why mortgagees and debenture holders operate by appointing receivers whenever they can). If he exercises his power of sale, he must take reasonable care to obtain a proper price.'

[24] At the time the sale to Mr Marples and to the Deakins took place, an express duty was placed on building societies by the Building Societies Act 1986 by virtue of s 13(7) and Sch 4:

'1.—(1) Where any land has been mortgaged to a building society as security for an advance and a person sells the land in the exercise of a power (whether statutory or express) exercisable by virtue of the mortgage, it shall be his duty—(a) in exercising that power, to take reasonable care to ensure that the price at which the land is sold is the best price that can reasonably be obtained ...'

This provision has now been repealed but it is not suggested that the scope of the duty has changed.

[25] Between contract and completion, the position is described in Lord Waring v London and Manchester Assurance Co Ltd [1935] Ch 310 at 318–319, [1934] All ER Rep 642 at 644–645, where in a passage subsequently approved by the Court of Appeal in Property and Bloodstock Ltd v Emerton [1967] 3 All ER 321, [1968] Ch 94, Crossman J said this:

> 'The only effect of the conveyance is to put the legal estate entirely in the purchaser: that follows from s. 104, sub-s. 1, of the Law of Property Act, 1925, which provides that a mortgagee shall have power to convey the legal estate; and the whole legal estate can be conveyed free from all estates, interests, and rights to which the mortgage has priority. Sect. 104, sub-s. 2, upon which also counsel for the plaintiff relied, does not seem to me to affect the question at all. Its purpose is simply to protect the purchaser and to make it unnecessary for him, pending completion and during investigation of title, to ascertain whether the power of sale has become exercisable. Of course, if the purchaser becomes aware, during that period, of any facts showing that the power of sale is not exercisable, or that there is some impropriety in the sale, then, in my judgment, he gets no good title on taking the conveyance. The result in the present case is, in my judgment, that the sale effected by the contract, assuming, for the moment, that there is no objection to it on any other ground, binds the plaintiff, and that it is too late after the sale for him to tender the mortgage money and become entitled to have the property reconveyed to him. A second point taken by counsel for the plaintiff is that the sale, considered as a pending sale, cannot be allowed to stand because it was made at a gross under-value, an under-value which would entitle the plaintiff, as mortgagor, to have it set aside. I do not want to go through all the evidence again. After having gone through the evidence of the four years between the date of the mortgage and the date of the contract, I can find no evidence showing anything like lack of good faith in the company's conduct with regard to the sale. The law, as stated by Kay J. in Warner v. Jacob ((1882) 20 Ch D 220 at 224), is perfectly clear. The learned judge there says: "... a mortgagee is strictly speaking not a trustee of the power of sale. It is a power given to him for his own benefit, to enable him the better to realize his debt. If he exercises it bona fide for that purpose, without corruption or collusion with the purchaser, the Court will not interfere even though the sale be very disadvantageous, unless indeed the price is so low as in itself to be evidence of fraud."'

[26] It would seem to follow from this that a completed sale by a mortgagee is not liable to be set aside merely because it takes place at an undervalue. Impropriety is a prerequisite, and s 104(2) makes it clear that the purchaser is not protected if he has actual knowledge of the impropriety. But if the purchaser has no notice of the impropriety, then on the face of it he takes free. Thus, the completed sale by a mortgagee pursuant to his statutory power is vulnerable only if the purchaser has knowledge of, or participates in, an impropriety in the exercise of the power.

[27] In the Property and Bloodstock case (see [18] and [25], above) Danckwerts LJ summarised the position as follows ([1967] 3 All ER 321 at 326, [1968] Ch 94 at 114):

> 'The actual decision of CROSSMAN, J., in Lord Waring's case was: (i) that a mortgagee's exercise of his power under s. 101(1)(i) of the Law of Property Act, 1925, to sell the mortgaged property by public auction or private contract is binding on the mortgagor before completion unless it is proved that he exercised it in bad faith; and (ii) that the fact that a contract for sale was entered into at an under-value is not by itself enough to prove bad faith.'

[28] Moving on to the position of Mr Deakin himself, one starts with the proposition that a sale by the mortgagee to his employee is not necessarily improper, but the burden is on the mortgagee to satisfy the court of the propriety of the transaction. In Farrar v Farrars Ltd (1888) 40 Ch D 395 at 409–411, Lindley LJ said, in a passage quoted by Judge Weeks, that—

'The other ground relied upon was of a much more serious character. It was alleged by the Plaintiffs in their statement of claim that the sale was fraudulent and collusive and at an undervalue. Mr. Justice Chitty decided that this allegation was not proved, and he gave judgment for the Defendants. The Plaintiffs on appeal did not question the view of the Judge that there was no fraudulent sale at an undervalue, but they contended that fraud or no fraud, undervalue or no undervalue, the sale could not stand, inasmuch as it was in substance a sale by a mortgagee to himself and others under the guise of a sale to a limited company. If this proposition were true the sale could not stand as against the mortgagor. It is perfectly well settled that a mortgagee with a power of sale cannot sell to himself either alone or with others, nor to a trustee for himself ... nor to any one employed by him to conduct the sale ... A sale by a person to himself is no sale at all, and a power of sale does not authorize the donee of the power to take the property subject to it at a price fixed by himself, even although such price be the full value of the property. Such a transaction is not an exercise of the power, and the interposition of a trustee, although it gets over the difficulty so far as form is concerned, does not affect the substance of the transaction. A sale by a person to a corporation of which he is a member is not, either in form or in substance, a sale by a person to himself. To hold that it is, would be to ignore the principle which lies at the root of the legal idea of a corporate body, and that idea is that the corporate body is distinct from the persons composing it. A sale by a member of a corporation to the corporation itself is in every sense a sale valid in equity as well as at law. There is no authority for saying that such a sale is not warranted by an ordinary power of sale, and in our opinion, such a sale is warranted by such a power, and does not fall within the rule to which we have at present referred. But although this is true, it is obvious that a sale by a person to an incorporated company of which he is a member may be invalid upon various grounds, although it may not be reached by the rule which prevents a man from selling to himself or to a trustee for himself. Such a sale may, for example, be fraudulent and at an undervalue or it may be made under circumstances which throw upon the purchasing company the burden of proving the validity of the transaction, and the company may be unable to prove it. Fraud in the present case is not now alleged; it was alleged in the Court below, and was then clearly disproved. But, for reasons which will appear presently, the circumstances attending the sale were such as, in our opinion, throw upon the company the burden of sustaining the transaction. The circumstances alluded to are shortly as follows:—Mr. John Riley Farrar was a solicitor, he was one of three mortgagees with a power of sale, he acted for his mortgagees. He sold to a company, more or less promoted by himself, in which he had a substantial interest as a shareholder, and whose solicitor he was. Such a transaction has a suspicious appearance, and at the time of the sale there was apparently such a conflict of interest and duty on the part of Mr. Farrar, and such notice to the company of that conflict, as to throw upon the company the burden of upholding the sale. But the sale cannot be set aside on the simple ground that Mr. Farrar was a trustee for sale, and was a promoter of and shareholder in the company which purchased from him. It is necessary to see what his duties to his mortgagors were, and what he really did. A mortgagee with a power of sale, though often called a trustee, is in a very different position from a trustee for sale. A mortgagee is under obligations to the mortgagor, but he has rights of his own which he is entitled to exercise adversely to the mortgagor. A trustee for sale has no business to place himself in such a position as to give rise to a conflict of interest and duty. But every mortgage confers upon the mortgagee the right to realize his security and to find a purchaser if he can, and if in exercise of his power he acts bonâ fide and takes reasonable precautions to obtain a proper price, the mortgagor has no redress, even although more might have been obtained for the property if the sale had been postponed ...'

[29] Farrar's case was a case in which the sale was to a company in which the mortgagee had an interest. The rule is based upon the duty of all persons concerned with the sale to avoid the conflict of interest that will arise if they seek to purchase from the mortgagee. They must not place themselves in a position where their duties and interests conflict, but if there is in fact no such conflict the sale will not be set aside. In the present case, the Halifax discharged the onus of demonstrating that Mr Deakin was not in any way involved in the sale, save as purchaser, as Judge Weeks recognised.

[30] It having been established before Judge Weeks (1) that the sale was at an undervalue and that (2) the sale was to an employee, Mr Deakin, but that (3) Mr Deakin was not involved in the sale and was unaware of that undervalue, the question is whether the sale should be set aside. The judge recognised that on the face of it damages were the proper remedy, but he relied on two matters in particular for rejecting that conclusion. The first is the deception worked by Mr Deakin on his employers. Mr Deakin acquired Yew Tree Farm not merely in breach of the terms of his contract of employment, but having deceived the Halifax. This goes to the propriety of the exercise of the power of sale. The second is that Judge Weeks concluded that in consequence of his deception, Mr Deakin could not take advantage of s 104(2) of the Law of Property Act 1925.

[31] In my judgment, Mr Deakin's deception of his employers does not confer upon the mortgagors, the Corbetts, any right to set the sale aside which they would not have possessed against any other purchaser at an undervalue who did not know of the undervalue and who was not involved in the exercise of the power of sale by the Halifax. No doubt it rendered the sale voidable at the instance of the Halifax, but that is not relevant to the position of the Corbetts.

[32] Judge Weeks did not accept that the position of a completed sale is really a fortiori the position between contract and completion, which is described by Crossman J and Danckwerts LJ in the passages I have quoted at [25], [27], above. The judge said this of Danckwerts LJ's remarks:

'It is, I think, important not to read too much into that statement of the law. If it is read as meaning that the mortgagee's only obligation is one of good faith then it is plainly inconsistent with later authorities. It must, I think, be limited to the circumstances governing the grant of an injunction between contract and completion and not to the rights and remedies available after completion.'

[33] I do not think that this is a sustainable basis upon which to distinguish these cases. It is absolutely correct that the mortgagee's duty is not limited to a duty of good faith, as the decision of the Court of Appeal in Cuckmere Brick Co Ltd v Mutual Finance Ltd [1971] 2 All ER 633, [1971] Ch 949 makes clear, but it does not follow that the underlying rationale of the cases is affected. The rationale is that the sale must be tainted by some kind of impropriety, not merely an innocent undervalue.

[34] The second ground of distinction suggested by Judge Weeks is, I think, unsound. Of course, if the purchaser discovers the impropriety or other defect before completion, then he will take subject to the rights of the mortgagor. But it is not easy to see why the mortgagor's position should be stronger after completion of the sale than it was before. It is right that in Tse Kwong Lam v Wong Chit Sen [1983] 3 All ER 54 at 63, [1983] 1 WLR 1349 at 1359–1360 Lord Templeman said that—

'Where a mortgagee fails to satisfy the court that he took all reasonable steps to obtain the best price reasonably obtainable and that his company bought at the best price, the court will, as a general rule, set aside the sale and restore to the borrower the equity of redemption of which he has been unjustly deprived. But the borrower will be left to his remedy in damages against the mortgagee for the failure of the mortgagee to secure the best price if it will be inequitable as between the borrower and the purchaser for the sale to be set aside.'

This statement is made in the context of a case of a sale to a company associated with the mortgagee: and it was held to be inequitable to set the sale aside having regard to the time which had elapsed. This case is analysed by Sir Richard Scott V-C in Medforth v Blake [1999] 3 All ER 97, [2000] Ch 86 as exemplifying the nature of the duty placed by equity on the mortgagee to ensure that he deals fairly and equitably with the mortgagor and the others interested in the mortgaged property. Sir Richard Scott V-C said ([1999] 3 All ER 97 at 111, [2000] Ch 86 at 102):

'These duties are not inflexible. What a mortgagee or a receiver must do to discharge them depends upon the particular facts of the particular case. A want of good faith or the exercise of powers for an improper motive will always suffice to establish a breach of duty. What else may suffice will depend upon the facts. Tse Kwong Lam v Wong Chit Sen [1983] 3 All ER 54, [1983] 1 WLR 1349 is a very good example. The fact that the mortgagee had an interest in the purchasing company placed the mortgagee under an obligation to show that a proper price had been obtained. This was an obligation more onerous than would otherwise have been required. It is true that Lord Herschell in Kennedy v De Trafford ([1897] AC 180, [1895–9] All ER Rep 408) expressed the duty on the mortgagee in terms much less onerous than the terms in which Salmon LJ expressed the duty in the Cuckmere Brick case. That does not make the two cases inconsistent with one another. The facts that constituted the mortgagors' complaints were different. And the duty in equity appropriate to have been owed by a mortgagee selling in 1888 is not necessarily of the same weight as the duty appropriate to have been owed by a mortgagee selling in 1967. Equity is at least as flexible as the common law in adjusting the duties owed so as to make them fit the requirements of the time.' a

[35] Judge Weeks relied on the last section of this passage as justifying an adjustment of the remedies 'to fit the circumstances of the case'. In my judgment, equity will not intervene unless there is some element of impropriety or bad faith on the part of the mortgagee in the exercise of its power of sale. It is not simply a matter of shaping the remedy to fit the circumstances, but of setting aside a conveyance of the legal estate. It is my view that there never was any equity which could be asserted by the Corbetts to set aside the sale to the Deakins. b

[36] Section 104(2) of the Law of Property Act 1925 is on this view irrelevant. It merely provides that between contract and completion the purchaser is not obliged to investigate the manner of the exercise of the power. Judge Weeks considered the question of the protection conferred on the Deakins by s 104(2). He quotes parts of the provision (cf the full version at [22], above): c

'Where a conveyance is made in exercise of the statutory power the title of the purchaser shall not be impeachable on the ground that the power was improperly or irregularly exercised and any person damnified by an improper or irregular exercise of the power shall have his remedy in damages against the person exercising the power.' d

This quotation omits the words releasing the purchaser from any concern to make inquiries before or on conveyance and is inaccurate in other respects. But the judge found that Mr Deakin did not have actual knowledge of the fact that the sale was at an undervalue. It was not suggested before the judge, and he does not find, that Mr Deakin had constructive knowledge of the undervalue, whatever the scope of the phrase 'constructive knowledge' is. Nor did the judge find that Mr Deakin's lack of knowledge of the undervalue was not genuine and honest. This is unsurprising, since Mr Deakin's offer price differed only slightly from the internal Halifax valuations. e f

[37] Nevertheless the judge set the sale to Mr Marples and to the Deakins aside. The judge held that because Mr Deakin was not a purchaser in good faith from the Halifax he could not avail himself of s 104(2). He took the definition of 'purchaser' in s 205(1)(xxi) of the Law of Property Act 1925, and held that Mr Deakin did not satisfy the definition. Recognising that the dishonesty of Mr Deakin did not relate to any aspect of the exercise of the power of sale other than the identity of the purchaser, he took the view that Mr Deakin's dishonesty vis-à-vis the Halifax was relevant to the question of good faith for the purpose of the statutory definition. He based himself on the well-known passage in the speech of Lord Wilberforce in Midland Bank Trust Co Ltd v Green [1981] 1 All ER 153 at 157, [1981] AC 513 at 528: g h

'My Lords, the character in the law known as the bona fide (good faith) purchaser for value without notice was the creation of equity. In order to affect a purchaser for value of a legal estate with some equity or equitable interest, equity fastened on his conscience and the composite expression was used to epitomise the circumstances in which equity would, or rather would not, do so. I think that it would generally be true to say that the words "in good faith" related to the existence of notice. Equity, in other words, required not only absence of notice, but genuine and honest absence of notice. As the law developed, this requirement became crystallised in the doctrine of constructive notice which assumed a statutory form in the j

Conveyancing Act 1882, s 3. But, and so far I would be willing to accompany the respondents, it would be a mistake to suppose that the requirement of good faith extended only to the matter of notice, or that when notice came to be regulated by statute the requirement of good faith became obsolete. Equity still retained its interest in, and power over, the purchaser's conscience. The classic judgment of James LJ in Pilcher v Rawlins (1872) LR 7 Ch App 259 at 269 is clear authority that it did: good faith there is stated as a separate test which may have to be passed even though absence of notice is proved. And there are references in cases subsequent to 1882 which confirm the proposition that honesty or bona fides remained something which might be inquired into (see Berwick & Co v Price [1905] 1 Ch 632 at 639, Taylor v London and County Banking Co, (London and County Banking Co v Nixon) [1901] 2 Ch 231 at 256 and Oliver v Hinton [1899] 2 Ch 264 at 273). But did this requirement, or test, pass into the property legislation of 1925?'

[38] There is no doubt that Lord Wilberforce contemplated that the investigation of the question of 'good faith' in its context in the definition of 'purchaser' in s 205(1)(xxi) of the Law of Property Act 1925 might involve an investigation of motive. In the Midland Bank case there was no doubt that the purchaser had knowledge of the interest the defeating of which was the whole purpose of the transaction, and the passage in Lord Wilberforce's speech is intended to point up the difference between the definition of 'purchaser' in the Land Charges Act 1925 (where the crucial words do not appear) and that in the Law of Property Act 1925. There are no cases where such an investigation has been carried out, and the natural meaning of the words certainly suggests that the principal matter affecting 'good faith' is notice, as it was in Pilcher v Rawlins (1872) LR 7 Ch App 259 (see [37], above) itself. But in any event, it seems to me that it is relevant to ask, good faith vis-à-vis whom? What makes this case unusual is that the lack of good faith has nothing to do with the Corbetts, but has only to do with the Halifax, whose internal rules were dishonestly broken by Mr Deakin. The lack of good faith is thus immaterial to the Corbett's interests, and did not affect those interests. I do not consider that Lord Wilberforce meant that a purchaser for value who has neither actual nor constructive notice of an impropriety connected with the exercise of the power of sale is none the less affected by that impropriety merely because of a lack of good faith that has no connection with the impropriety.

[39] Accordingly I consider that Judge Weeks was wrong to set the sale aside on the basis that the Deakins could not take the benefit of s 104(2) of the Law of Property Act 1925.

[40] If that is wrong, however, I consider that he was wrong in principle in the manner in which he exercised his discretion to set the sale to the Deakins aside. There is no doubt that there is such a discretion, as the passage I have quoted from Lord Templeman's opinion on behalf of the board in Tse Kwong Lam v Wong Chit Sen [1983] 3 All ER 54, [1983] 1 WLR 1349 (see [34], above) demonstrates. In that case, relief other than damages was refused on the grounds of delay. The judge said this:

'It is true that the Corbetts will gain more from setting aside than they have lost by the undervalue. But this arises from the increase in house values since 1990. As between the Deakins and the Corbetts, I think it is fair that this increase should accrue to those who bought the house legitimately in 1983 rather than those who bought it dishonestly in 1993. In those circumstances, in my view, the justice of the case requires that the sale be set aside on terms.' a Judge Weeks then considered a matter relating to the Corbetts' own behaviour, raised by the Halifax, which he rejected and which was not advanced before this court. He continued:

'I do not think that their conduct is really comparable to Mr Deakin's. Mrs Deakin was, I find, fully aware of what here husband was doing at the time. It has also been submitted that I should refuse equitable relief on the ground of delay. The Corbetts' solicitors have not pursued the action with great vigour, but I do not think that the delay has caused the Deakins to suppose that the claim was abandoned. It was not easy for the Corbetts to discover the truth of the transaction until Mr Marples provided them with a statement. In my judgment, notwithstanding the lapse of time, it is equitable as between the Corbetts and the Deakins to set the sale aside.' b c

[41] The Deakins' lender, the Abbey National, preserved its charge, which ranked before that of the Halifax, which was restored. The £20,000 advanced by the Deakins from their own funds was secured by a second charge, as were their capital payments to the Abbey National, and they were ordered to be paid any increase in the value of Yew Tree Farm attributable to works they had carried out, less any further advances received from the Abbey National. Judgment was given against the Corbetts for £204,415. Since the farm was worth some £320,000 at the date of judgment, the effect of the order is to enable the Corbetts to discharge a substantial part of their indebtedness to the Halifax on sale. Inquiries were ordered as to the capital repayments, the increase in value of the property attributable to the Deakins' works and any further advances by the Abbey National, with provision for disclosure, evidence of fact and expert evidence. d e

[42] In my view, Judge Weeks failed to take account of relevant factors. These are: (1) the prejudice caused by the delay between sale and writ, and the slowness in the prosecution of the claim; (2) the fact that Yew Tree Farm was the Deakins' family home for the period of nine years; (3) the fact that the Deakins had children who had not attained their majority; (4) the disruption that the order for sale would cause them. His concentration on the dishonesty of Mr Deakin obscured the fact that the Halifax, who did have the right to avoid the sale, did not do so and the fact that Mr Deakin had been punished for the lies he told his employer. f g

[43] The delay was in my view far too great. Exchange of contracts with Mr Marples took place on 20 July 1993. The Deakins were registered as proprietors on 12 November 1994, and by 19 January 1994 the Corbetts knew that Yew Tree Farm had been purchased by an employee of the Halifax. Obviously they knew the price. The Halifax had disciplined Mr Deakin by the end of May 1994. The letter before action was sent on 13 October 1994, but the writ is not issued until 29 May 1996, the statement of claim following on 13 March 1997. Where a market is rising, it seems to me that the claimant has a particular duty to press on with the action, so that the defendant is not prejudiced in the housing market more than necessary. In the result the benefit of Judge Weeks' order to the Corbetts was out of proportion to the actual undervalue or to the Deakins' loss. h j

[44] In my judgment, Judge Weeks should in any event have declined to set the sale aside but should have left the Corbetts to their remedy in damages.

[45] Finally, I should mention that Mr Jefferies for the Deakins addressed a separate argument to the effect that even had the judge been right in his order, he was still wrong to order the register to be rectified, basing himself on Kingsalton Ltd v Thames Water Developments [2001] EWCA Civ 20, (2002) 1 P & CR 15 and Hounslow London BC v Hare (1992) 24 HLR 9. This argument raises difficult questions which do not need to be decided in this appeal, and I should prefer to consider them when it is necessary to do so.

[46] I consider that the appeal should be allowed to the extent that I have indicated. There will be judgment for the Corbetts for £20,000 and interest against the Halifax. I would invite submissions in writing as to the remainder of the order.

SCOTT BAKER LJ.

[47] I agree that this appeal should be allowed for the reasons given by Pumfrey J. The Deakins were only able to purchase Yew Tree Farm because Mr Deakin tricked the Halifax into believing that he was somebody else. The reason for Mr Deakin's dishonesty was that the Halifax's in-house rules prohibited a sale to an employee or his family. His dishonesty was neither here nor there as far as the Corbetts were concerned. Their only legitimate concern was that their house should be sold at a fair market value.

[48] The Deakins were unaware that the sale was at an undervalue and the dishonesty or lack of good faith on the Deakins' part should, in my judgment, be viewed as quite independent of the fact that the sale was at less than market value. Accordingly I agree that there never was any equity upon which the Corbetts could rely to seek to set aside the sale. Improper or irregular exercise of the power of sale in s 104(2) of the Law of Property Act 1925 does not include circumstances of which the mortgagee has no knowledge and in which the Corbetts had no legitimate concern. In short, the Halifax's in-house rules and whether they were properly applied was nothing to do with the Corbetts.

[49] I also agree that if, contrary to my view, the judge had a discretion to set the sale aside he exercised it wrongly. There were compelling reasons why the sale should stand and the Corbetts be left to their remedy in damages.

[50] These included: (1) that Yew Tree Farm was a family home housing minor children; (2) the delay; (3) the work that had been done to the property and; (4) the recent rise in property values.

[51] Accordingly, I agree with the order proposed by Pumfrey J.

SCHIEMANN LJ.

[52] I agree with both judgments.

Appeal allowed.

James Brooks Barrister.

Nathan v Leonard and others

[2002] EWHC 1701 (Ch)

CHANCERY DIVISION

JOHN MARTIN QC (SITTING AS A DEPUTY JUDGE OF THE HIGH COURT)

28 FEBRUARY, 28 MAY 2002

Will – Forfeiture clause – Clause leaving entire estate to two beneficiaries in event any other beneficiary contested will – Whether condition valid.

A testator had a professionally drawn will which included substantial gifts to the first and second defendants, friends of long standing, as well as gifts to her family, including a discretionary trust in favour of her son, the claimant, and to charity. She then executed a homemade codicil which included the words: 'As a safeguard to my wishes and to protect them from any parties be they family members or the charities, should they wish to contest or disagree with my will. Then, I want the following clause to over ride everything previously stated in my will. The following will become my will in its entirety. This I hope will prevent anyone from taking this case of action.' There followed a clause giving her whole estate to the first and second defendants and then: 'This clause cannot be superseded, and will only come into being if at anytime during the life of the Trust or up to 80 years has elapsed.' The claimant commenced proceedings under the Inheritance (Provision for Family and Dependants) Act 1975 for further provision to be made for him out of the estate and the question arose whether his claim itself amounted to a contest or disagreement with the will. A trial of preliminary issues, including, inter alia, whether the condition imposed by the codicil was valid in law, was ordered. The third defendant, one of the charitable beneficiaries, contended inter alia (i) that the condition, which if effective would deprive not only the person contesting the will but all the beneficiaries other than the first and second defendants, was void for repugnancy; (ii) that the condition was void as contrary to public policy as a deterrent to claims under the 1975 Act and (iii) that the condition was too uncertain to be enforced.

Held – A testamentary condition would be struck down if it were truly repugnant to, or inconsistent with, the nature of the gifts made by the will. Such inconsistency existed only if the condition purported to limit or remove the incidents of ownership which necessarily attached to the gift. However, a condition which attached to the whole gift, as in the instant case, rather than merely the incidents, did not have that inconsistency. It made no difference that other gifts under the will might be divested too. Nor did the condition in the instant case prevent an applicant making a claim under the 1975 Act; he had his statutory rights whether or not the condition operated. That such conditions might present applicants with difficult choices was not an adequate ground for holding them void as contrary to public policy. However, in the instant case, the condition was insufficiently certain to be enforced and accordingly was not a condition valid in law (see [10], [13], [16], [20], [21], below).

Notes

For testamentary conditions attached to gifts, and for uncertain and inconsistent conditions, see 50 Halsbury's Laws (4th edn reissue) paras 367, 377 and 381.

Cases referred to in judgment

Adams v Adams [1892] 1 Ch 369, CA.
Blathwayt v Lord Cawley [1975] 3 All ER 625, [1976] AC 397, [1975] 3 WLR 684, HL.
Clarke v Parker (1812) 19 Ves 1, 34 ER 419, [1803–13] All ER Rep 301, LC.
Clavering v Ellison (1859) 7 HL Cas 707, 11 ER 282, HL.
Clayton v Ramsden [1943] 1 All ER 16, [1943] AC 320, HL.
Cooke v Turner (1846) 15 M & W 727.
Evanturel v Evanturel (1874) LR 6 PC 1, PC.
Gaynor, In the Will of [1960] VR 640, Vic SC.
Kent, Re (1982) 139 DLR (3d) 318, BC SC.
Machu, Re (1882) 21 Ch D 838.
Powell v Morgan (1688) 2 Vern 90, 23 ER 668.
Rhodes v Muswell Hill Land Co (1861) 29 Beav 560, 54 ER 745.
Sandbrook, Re, Noel v Sandbrook [1912] 2 Ch 471, [1911–13] All ER Rep 559.
Simpson v Vickers (1807) 14 Ves 341, 33 ER 552, Rolls Ct.
Smith, Re, Smith v Smith [1916] 1 Ch 369.
Williams, Re, Williams v Williams [1912] 1 Ch 399.

Preliminary issues

By order of Master Price made on 13 November 2001, the court was required to determine certain preliminary issues, summarised at [4] below, in proceedings under the Inheritance (Provision for Family and Dependants) Act 1975 between the claimant, Andrew William Nathan and the first and second defendants, Sally Ann Leonard and Paul Leo Leonard, all being beneficiaries under the will with two codicils of Diana Margaret Gamon Nathan (deceased). The third defendant, the National Association for Mental Health (Mind) was joined into the proceedings. The facts are set out in the judgment.

James Pickering (instructed by Singh Karran & Co, Hounslow) for Andrew Nathan.
Penelope Reed (instructed by Banky & Burger, Reading) for the Leonards.
Michael King (instructed by Campbell Hooper) for MIND.

Cur adv vult

28 May 2002. The following judgment was delivered.

JOHN MARTIN QC.

[1] Mrs Diana Nathan died on 13 November 1998. She was then living at a property called Oakwood Farm, Clay Lane, Beenham, Berkshire, in which she had a beneficial half-share. The other half share belonged to the first and second defendants, Sally and Paul Leonard, who also lived at the property. By her last will dated 30 April 1997 (as varied by a first codicil dated 17 July 1998) Mrs Nathan appointed Sally Leonard as her executor; directed that the Leonards be entitled to occupy the property for as long as they wished, subject to their maintaining it and paying the outgoings; made various specific and pecuniary bequests; and directed that her residuary estate (including her interest in the property, subject to the Leonards' right to occupy) be divided into three, two-thirds going to the Leonards and the other third being held on discretionary trusts for the claimant Andrew Nathan (who is a son of the deceased), Andrew's children and remoter issue, and two named charities—of which the third defendant, MIND, is one.

[2] The will and two codicils (the second of which gives rise to the matters I have to determine, and is referred to below) were proved by Sally Leonard on 18 January 2001. On 13 July 2001 Andrew Nathan started these proceedings, which are a claim under the Inheritance (Provision for Family and Dependants) Act 1975 for further provision to be made for him out of the estate. On 13 November 2001 an order was made for determination of preliminary issues relating to the second codicil; and these preliminary issues (which I identify below) were heard by me on 28 February 2002.

[3] The second codicil was made on 29 July 1998. Unlike the will and the first codicil, both of which were professionally drawn up, the second codicil was prepared by Mrs Nathan herself. It runs to four pages of typescript, and 'is written in letter form and not entirely to current legal standards'. A copy of it is annexed to this judgment [not reproduced]. The passage that is most relevant for present purposes appears at the bottom of the third page and the top of the fourth, and is in the following terms:

> 'As a safeguard to my wishes and to protect them from any parties be they family members or the charities, should they wish to contest or disagree with my will. Then, I want the following clause to over ride everything previously stated in my will. The following will become my will in its entirety. This I hope will prevent anyone from taking this case of action.
>
> I GIVE DEVISE AND BEQUEATH My beneficial share in the Property known as Oakwood farm, to my beneficiaries to SALLY LEONARD and PAUL LEONARD. Free of any taxes, which will be covered by my estate. I also give to the above named persons all my real and personal property. This clause cannot be superseded, and will only come into being if at anytime during the life of the Trust or up to 80 years has elapsed.'

[4] The possibility that Andrew Nathan's claim under the 1975 Act amounted to a contest to or disagreement with the will led to the direction that preliminary issues be tried. The issues (paraphrased from the order directing them) are as follows. (i) Is the first paragraph I have quoted ('As a safeguard ... this case of action') a valid condition in law? (ii) If so, has there been a breach of it? (iii) If so, what is the effect of the gift over in the second paragraph ('I GIVE ... 80 years has elapsed')?

[5] In relation to these issues, Andrew Nathan's position is largely neutral: his claim under the 1975 Act is unlikely to be substantially affected by whether the governing dispositions are those made by the will and first codicil or those substituted by the second codicil. It is in the Leonards' interests to argue that the second codicil is valid and has been triggered, and that the consequence is that the whole of the estate is vested in them. It is in the interests of the two charities to argue that the will dispositions stand; and MIND has been joined into the proceedings to make that argument. Counsel for all parties (including Andrew Nathan) have made submissions on the meaning and effect of the second codicil, and I have been greatly assisted by their observations.

VALID CONDITION?

[6] A condition to the effect that a beneficiary who challenges a will loses the benefits given to him by the will is in principle valid, at least where there is a gift over (see Cooke v Turner (1846) 15 M & W 727, approved by the Privy Council in Evanturel v Evanturel (1874) LR 6 PC 1).

[7] In the present case, however, the condition does not just deprive the person who challenges the will of the benefits he would otherwise have received: if effective, it deprives all beneficiaries other than the Leonards of their interests. Thus, if the condition is effective and has been triggered by Andrew Nathan's proceedings under the 1975 Act, the discretionary trusts of residue are revoked and MIND—which has not itself mounted any challenge to the will—loses any possibility of benefit from the estate. Such a condition goes further than those which have been the subject of decision in any case reported in the United Kingdom or any Commonwealth jurisdiction.

[8] This wide effect of the condition was said on behalf of MIND to verge on the capricious, and to make the condition void for repugnancy. A condition is void if it is inconsistent with, or repugnant to, the nature of an interest given to the donee—such as a condition that purports to impose restrictions on the alienation of property given absolutely, or—as in Re Machu (1882) 21 Ch D 838—that purports to forfeit property in the event of the donee's bankruptcy. An example closer to the type of condition in issue in this case is to be found in Rhodes v Muswell Hill Land Co (1861) 29 Beav 560, 54 ER 745. In that case, a testator directed that any dispute between the will beneficiaries relating to his estate or effects should be referred to arbitration; and he declared that if any beneficiary should commence proceedings 'touching or concerning or in anywise relating' to his estate and effects the gift to that beneficiary should become void. Sir John Romilly MR ((1861) 29 Beav 560 at 563, 54 ER 745 at 746) construed the condition as having the effect—

> 'that if the devisees commenced or instituted any proceedings at law or in equity in relation to the property devised to them, the devise to them would become void ...'

And after giving examples of the way in which the condition would operate (eg 'no devisee could take any proceedings to compel the payment to him of the rent') he held ((1861) 29 Beav 560 at 564, 54 ER 745 at 746) the condition void as 'absurd, inconsistent and repugnant'. It is possible to have doubts about the correctness of construing the condition as operating if a beneficiary took any step to protect the interest he had been given, rather than as taking effect if a beneficiary litigated disputes about the will instead of submitting them to arbitration; but once the condition is construed in that way, the decision represents a conventional application of the principles relating to repugnancy. It is inconsistent with the nature of an absolute gift that the donee should be deprived of it if he exercises one of the incidents of ownership—as by suing for the rent.

[9] In support of his argument that the condition in the present case was void for repugnancy, counsel for MIND pointed to its effect on the pecuniary legacies given by the will. These legacies are given immediately and absolutely, but if the condition is valid they may be defeated at any time by the commencement by someone else of proceedings wholly unconnected with the legacies themselves. The decision in Rhodes' case demonstrated the court's reluctance to allow a condition to lead to such an absurdity, and a condition having that effect was inconsistent with the nature of the gift. In consequence, he suggested, the condition was void as regards the legatees; and, since a condition fails for all gifts if it fails for any (see Re Smith [1916] 1 Ch 369), the condition was wholly ineffective.

[10] I cannot accept this argument. If the condition is to be struck down, it must be because it is truly repugnant to, or inconsistent with, the nature of the gifts made by the will. But Cooke v Turner shows that a condition divesting a gift if the donee disputes the will is valid, so such a condition is clearly not repugnant to the gift. That is because the law sees no inconsistency between the gift and the condition divesting it. There is only such inconsistency if the condition purports to limit or remove the incidents of ownership which necessarily attach to the gift, as where the condition operates if the donee wishes to sell the property given to him. Having given the property absolutely, the testator cannot control what the donee does with it. But a condition which attacks the whole gift, rather than merely the incidents of the gift, does not have the same inconsistency. If the matter is viewed in that way, it makes no difference that other gifts may be divested too. And although the condition may well have an arbitrary effect, that is not of itself enough to render it invalid: a testator may dispose of his property as he wishes, however capriciously.

[11] That last statement also disposes of the first of two arguments against the validity of the condition based on public policy. The argument is that the state has an interest in the prompt and orderly administration of a deceased's estate, and a condition that may disrupt that administration so fundamentally and divest interests without any action by or volition of those whose interests are divested is contrary to public policy. It does not seem to me necessarily correct to say that the state has the interest claimed, since the disposition of a deceased's estate is essentially a matter of private property; but in any event it is the policy of the law to uphold testamentary freedom (see Blathwayt v Lord Cawley [1975] 3 All ER 625 at 636, 650, [1976] AC 397 at 426, 442).

[12] That policy is reflected in the fact that English law has no concept of forced heirship, under which a testator is obliged to leave a proportion of his estate to his spouse or children. The nearest it has come to such a concept, and the most significant inroad that has been made into testamentary freedom, is the 1975 Act (and its predecessor, the Inheritance (Family Provision) Act 1938), under which provision may be made for an applicant within defined classes of relationship to the testator for whom reasonable provision has not been made. The second public policy argument against the validity of the condition is based on the policy of the 1975 Act that reasonable provision should be made for those dependent on a deceased, it being said that the condition cannot stand because its effect is to deter an applicant from making a claim under the Act for fear of losing the benefits given to him by the will.

[13] Two matters must be stated before this argument can be considered. First, it is necessary to assume that a claim under the 1975 Act is a contest to or disagreement with the will, so that the condition operates. Whether or not the assumption is actually correct is for determination under the second preliminary issue, if it arises. Secondly, it is not the case that the condition prevents an applicant from making a claim under the Act: he has his statutory right whether the condition operates or not. Moreover, in considering the application the court will have regard to any benefits the applicant derives from the estate; so if the condition has a confiscatory effect that will be taken into account. Indeed, it is so that the court can know in the present case what the effect of the condition is that the preliminary issues were ordered to be determined; and, as I have already remarked, it is because his claim can go ahead regardless of the effect of the condition that Andrew Nathan is largely neutral about its validity.

[14] The argument that the deterrent effect of the condition is enough to make the condition void as contrary to public policy does not seem to have been considered in any English case. It does, however, derive strong support from two Commonwealth decisions, one from Australia and one from Canada. The Australian case is In the Will of Gaynor [1960] VR 640, a decision of the Supreme Court of Victoria. After holding that a claim under Part IV of the Administration and Probate Act 1958 that adequate provision had not been made for the testator's daughter would fall within a provision in the will forfeiting her interest in the estate, O'Bryan J said the following (at 642–644):

> 'If it is correct to say that this part of the Act now in question is designed to serve a public purpose as well as to benefit individuals, and that the authority conferred upon the court was so conferred not merely in the interests of the widow, widower or child as the case may be, but of the public, because it is a matter of public concern that they should not be left without adequate provision for their proper maintenance and support, surely a condition whose object and purpose appears from its very language to be to deter such a beneficiary under a will from making such an application is one that is opposed to public policy ... The vice in this sort of condition is that a testator may leave a beneficiary a legacy or other provision by will which may or may not be adequate for his proper maintenance and support—and if he attaches a condition of forfeiture to that gift should the beneficiary make an application under Part IV, the condition is opposed to public policy because the object and effect of it is to deter the beneficiary from having recourse to the courts in a matter in which it is in the public interest that he should be free to have recourse. For these reasons, I am of the opinion that this condition of forfeiture is void because it is against public policy.'

In the Canadian case, Re Kent (1982) 139 DLR (3d) 318, the Supreme Court of British Columbia followed Gaynor's case, quoting much of the passage I have set out above.

[15] I do not doubt that a condition such as the one in the present case and those considered in the two Commonwealth cases is capable of having a strong deterrent effect. It is not difficult to think of circumstances in which a potential applicant would be unwilling to give up the certainty of benefits under a will for the uncertainty of the court's decision. Nor do I doubt that the public policy embodied in the 1975 Act is in substance that identified by O'Bryan J in the passage I have quoted from Gaynor's case. But, with respect to the judges in the two Commonwealth cases, I do not myself think that mere deterrence is enough to make the condition void as contrary to public policy. As I have already said, the condition does not prevent an applicant making his claim; and if he does so, and forfeits his interest under the will, that can be taken into account by the court. The court will determine whether reasonable provision has been made; and in doing so one of the circumstances it will take into account is that, because of the condition, the applicant has received nothing at all from the estate. The object of the 1975 Act is to ensure that certain dependants of a deceased should not be left without provision that is reasonable in all the circumstances; and the fact that the claim remains and will be determined in the light of the effect of the condition means that the object is attained regardless of the condition. I can see no reason why policy considerations which can be attained in that way should require the condition itself to be invalidated.

[16] Indirect support for the view I have taken is to be found in Blathwayt v Lord Cawley [1975] 3 All ER 625, [1976] AC 397. In that case, one issue concerned the validity of a condition forfeiting the interest of any beneficiary who was or became a Roman Catholic; and the House of Lords held that it was not void as contrary to public policy. In reaching that decision, the House considered Re Sandbrook [1912] 2 Ch 471, [1911–13] All ER Rep 559, in which the court held invalid a clause forfeiting an interest given to grandchildren if they should 'live with ... or continue under the custody, guardianship or control of their father' on the ground that it would operate to restrain the father from carrying out his parental duties. Declining to adopt similar reasoning, Lord Fraser of Tullybelton (who was in the majority on this aspect of the case) said the following ([1975] 3 All ER 625 at 650, [1976] AC 397 at 442):

> 'If a parent has strong convictions he may well regard the religious upbringing of his child as of overriding importance not to be set against purely material considerations; if, on the other hand, his religious convictions are weak or non-existent, he can weigh a testamentary benefit with a religious condition attached as one among the many factors affecting the welfare of his child. In neither case does the existence of the religious condition seem to me to offend against public policy merely because it might affect the parent's action. One must remember also the public policy that a testator should be free,. subject to the rights of his surviving spouse and children, to dispose of his property as he pleases.'

I read this passage both as containing a warning against taking too narrow a view of public policy and as casting doubt on the idea that mere deterrence will be enough to make a condition void as contrary to public policy. As in that case, the condition in the present case will do no more than add an additional factor to those to be considered by an applicant before he decides to launch a claim under the 1975 Act. In some cases, that factor will be of great importance, and in others of little or none; but, it can hardly be the case that whether the condition is to be upheld or avoided depends on identifying how much of a deterrent it is in any given case. If a condition of the present type is contrary to public policy, it is because of its capacity to deter; and that means that—except perhaps in cases where there is no potential applicant under the 1975 Act at all—all conditions of the same type must be treated in the same way. I do not think the fact that such conditions may present applicants with difficult choices is an adequate ground for holding them void on public policy grounds, and I decline to do so.

[17] I come, therefore, to the last of the grounds on which MIND challenges the condition, namely that it is too uncertain to be enforced. The starting point is the following passage from the speech of Lord Russell of Killowen in Clayton v Ramsden [1943] 1 All ER 16 at 18, [1943] AC 320 at 326:

> 'The courts have always insisted that conditions of defeasance, in order to be valid, should be so framed that the persons affected (or the court if they seek its guidance) can from the outset know with certainty the exact event upon the happening of which their interests are to be divested. The principle was enunciated many years ago by LORD CRANWORTH in Clavering v. Ellison ((1859) 7 HL Cas 707 at 725, 11 ER 282 at 289) in the following words: "... where a vested estate is to be defeated by a condition on a contingency that is to happen afterwards, that condition must be such that the court can see from the beginning, precisely and distinctly, upon the happening of what event it was that the preceding vested estate was to determine." In all such cases that is the test which has to be applied to the particular condition which the testator has chosen to impose.'

MIND says that that test is not satisfied in relation to four areas of the passage from the second codicil set out at [3], above.

[18] First, it is not clear who it is who may trigger a forfeiture by contesting or disagreeing with the will. Do the words 'be they family members or the charities' qualify the words 'any parties', and does the hope that the condition will prevent 'anyone' challenging the will broaden the class? Despite the fact that different views were expressed in argument about the meaning of these provisions, and in particular about whether a challenge by the Leonards would trigger a forfeiture, I do not think there is real difficulty about this part of the codicil. The overwhelming impression given by the codicil when read as a whole is that Mrs Nathan was concerned to justify her decision to leave the Leonards, who were friends not family, undisturbed in their occupation of Oakwood Farm, and was determined to ensure that her wishes on that score were observed one way or another. Read in that light, her expectation was that a challenge, if it came at all, would come from Andrew Nathan, or from her other sons Martin and Robert, or perhaps from the charities who had an interest in her residuary estate, but not from the Leonards themselves. Accordingly, I construe the reference to 'family members or the charities' as defining exclusively the persons whose challenge would operate the condition, and the word 'anyone' as referring back to them. The claim of uncertainty on this ground is not made out.

[19] The second and third complaints of uncertainty relate to the words 'should they wish to contest or disagree with my will'. Is it enough that someone should want to contest the will, without actually doing anything about it? Is it enough that someone should disagree with the way in which Mrs Nathan dealt with her estate, again without doing anything about it? What if the disagreement is taken to the extent of a letter before action, but no further? Again, it seems to me that these apparent difficulties lack reality. It cannot be supposed that Mrs Nathan intended to forfeit the interest of anyone who harboured, however secretly, the view that she had dealt with her estate unfairly: her objective was to deter anyone from taking steps to alter the dispositions she had made. Construed in that light, the words 'wish to' add nothing to the words 'contest or disagree'; and the latter words encompass any proceedings which might result in an alteration of the dispositions made by the will and first codicil. Threats would not be enough, but proceedings challenging the will on the ground of lack of capacity, want of knowledge and approval or undue influence would be. So also (to deal prematurely with the second preliminary issue) would a claim under the 1975 Act, since it would have the potential to bring about a redistribution of the estate. This ground of objection accordingly fails, too.

[20] The fourth complaint of uncertainty concerns the concluding words of the passage quoted in [3], above, namely: 'This clause cannot be superseded, and will only come into being if at anytime during the life of the Trust or up to 80 years has elapsed.' Whilst it is immediately obvious that some words have been mistakenly omitted from this provision, it is very difficult to guess what they might have been. The difficulty is compounded by the fact that 'the Trust' is undefined, and might refer to any one of four different trusts: the residuary trust created by the will, the trust created by Mrs Nathan's husband (referred to on the first page of the second codicil), a separate trust which Mrs Nathan was intending to establish for Andrew (referred to in a letter of wishes made by her on the same day as she made the second codicil), and a trust relating to Oakwood Farm (created by a deed of trust dated 2 October 1995 made between Mrs Nathan and the Leonards). Counsel for the Leonards argued that these difficulties were of no consequence, since the concluding words were not designed to introduce any additional requirement and were merely a statement of the obvious. If one could be certain of that, it would indeed answer the objections; but the words 'and will only come into being if ...' seem to me equally capable of merely explaining something that is anyway obvious—rather as if the whole provision had been preceded by the words 'Of course'—and of indicating that the clause will only operate if something else happens. I am unfortunately quite unable to tell which was intended. In consequence I find it simply impossible to know whether or not Mrs Nathan intended by these words to impose a new requirement, and if so what it was. Moreover, the uncertainty this produces is not confined to the gift over: it is quite possible that by 'this clause' Mrs Nathan meant the whole of the condition and the substituted provisions that would come into effect if it operated. It therefore seems to me that the test set out in [17], above is not satisfied. I reach this conclusion with great reluctance, since Mrs Nathan took such trouble to make her wishes known; but I am afraid that in the end she has failed to do so with sufficient certainty.

[21] Accordingly, I answer the first preliminary issue by holding that the passage quoted in [3], above is too uncertain to be enforced and is not a valid condition in law.

[22] That means that the second and third preliminary issues strictly do not arise. However, because I have heard argument about them, and in case the matter should go further, I will briefly express my views on them.

BREACH OF CONDITION?

[23] I have already indicated (at [19], above) my view that a claim under the 1975 Act amounts to a contest to or disagreement with the will. On the face of it, that means that by commencing proceedings Andrew Nathan would—if the condition had been valid—have brought about a forfeiture of all the dispositions made by the will and the first codicil.

[24] However, it is suggested on behalf of MIND that there will be a forfeiture only if Andrew Nathan's claim is unsuccessful. There is some support for this argument in the authorities. In Powell v Morgan (1688) 2 Vern 90, 23 ER 668 it was held in relation to a condition that a legatee should not 'disturb or interrupt' the will that there was no forfeiture if there were 'probabilis causa litigandi'. In Evanturel v Evanturel (1874) LR 6 PC 1, where again the condition related to contesting the will, it was said (at 26): 'Upon principle, it is to be observed that the prohibition cannot be absolute, and can be invoked only where the validity of a will has been unsuccessfully contested.' In Adams v Adams [1892] 1 Ch 369, where the condition was that the beneficiary should not intermeddle with or interfere in the management of the estate, the Court of Appeal agreed with the trial judge that there would have been no forfeiture if an action had been brought bona fide in defence of the plaintiff's rights. In Re Williams [1912] 1 Ch 399, which concerned a provision that if any beneficiary should initiate an action for the administration of the estate the costs of all parties should be met out of that beneficiary's share of the estate, it was held that the provision did not apply to an action based on wilful default, but that if it had applied it would have been void for repugnancy.

[25] It is not altogether easy to identify the underlying rationale of these cases. In Adams' case and Williams' case, each of which concerned a condition designed to discourage interference in the administration of the estate, it is probable that the courts were construing the conditions as applying only to unjustified interference on the basis that it cannot have been the testator's intention that a beneficiary should be unable to enforce proper administration. The only alternative will often (as in Williams' case) be to avoid the condition as repugnant to the gift, since its effect would be to prevent the beneficiary suing to obtain what has been given to him. However, the other two cases—where the condition relates to any challenge to the will—do not seem to turn on construction, as the following passage from Evanturel v Evanturel ((1874) LR 6 PC 1 at 26–27) shows:

> 'If there be a clear and patent defect in the formalities attending the execution of the instrument, or if the incapacity of the alleged testator be clear and notorious, the heirs or other parties interested will, of course, contest the will, and, contesting it successfully, will set it aside with the clause of forfeiture. On the other hand, it is not easy to see why a testator may not protect his estate and representatives against unsuccessful attempts to litigate his will, by saying to a legatee, "I, being master of my own bounty, and free to give or to withhold, give you this legacy subject to the condition that you do not dispute the general disposition of my estate. You may contest the validity of my will if you please; but you will do so at the peril of losing, if it be established, what it gives you."'

The basis on which a successful challenge escapes the condition accordingly seems to be that the challenge has the effect of setting aside both will and condition. But that will not always be so: for example, where only certain gifts are challenged on the ground of want of knowledge and approval, or where—as here—the challenge takes the form of a claim under the 1975 Act, which leaves the will (but not its dispositions) intact.

[26] In such cases, it seems to me that the correct approach must be to construe the condition. It may be possible to construe it as applying only to unsuccessful challenges; but if not, then (assuming it does not fail for repugnancy) the condition must take effect whether the challenge succeeds or fails. Nothing in the authorities mentioned at [24], above supports any suggestion that there is a rule of law that forfeiture conditions only apply to unsuccessful challenges. In the present case, there can be no doubt that Mrs Nathan intended to deter any challenge to the way in which she had decided to dispose of her estate, and I think it impossible to construe the condition in the second codicil as confined to unsuccessful challenges. Accordingly, the effect of the condition is not dependent on the success or failure of Andrew Nathan's claim, and the bringing of the claim would have operated the condition had it been valid.

[27] If the second issue had arisen, therefore, I would have held that there had been a breach of the condition.

EFFECT OF GIFT OVER

[28] The third preliminary issue is directed to ascertaining what would be the consequence of breach of a valid condition. Subject to the point discussed in the next two paragraphs, the answer clearly would be that the entirety of Mrs Nathan's estate would pass to the Leonards: the second codicil is unambiguous that this is to be the case both as regards her interest in Oakwood Farm and as regards all her other property.

[29] It is, however, suggested on behalf of MIND that relief from forfeiture is available and should be granted to those beneficiaries whose interests would be forfeit through no fault of their own. There seems little doubt that there is jurisdiction to relieve from forfeitures of the type in issue: see Williams on Wills (8th edn, 2002) para 34.25; and Clarke v Parker (1812) 19 Ves 1 at 17–18, 34 ER 419 at 425, where Lord Eldon LC speaks of—

> 'the Doctrine upon Conditions; which have been held not violated, where the Breach was not occasioned by the Fault of that Person; and a Court of Equity has upon that Ground said, the Party should stand in the same Situation as if the Condition had been observed.'

The jurisdiction is said, by reference to Simpson v Vickers (1807) 14 Ves 341, 33 ER 552, not to be exercisable where there is a gift over to any person other than the one who would take by operation of law. But Simpson v Vickers was a case of a condition precedent, whereas the condition in the present case is a condition subsequent; and that seems to me to give rise to a genuine distinction. In the case of a condition precedent, relief would involve divesting the existing owner and creating a new estate in the person who would have taken if the condition had been satisfied; whereas in the case of a condition subsequent the estate is already vested, and all that is required is relief from the divesting consequences of the condition.

[30] But even assuming relief from forfeiture is available, it is far from clear that it could be granted in the present case. To do so would involve doing real damage to Mrs Nathan's intentions: she intended that, if anyone challenged the dispositions of her estate, all beneficiaries except the Leonards should be dispossessed. Moreover, major rewriting of the will and codicils would be required: some parts of the will and first codicil would be preserved, so as to ensure that all beneficiaries save Andrew Nathan were unscathed; and some parts of the second codicil would be introduced, so that the Leonards took whatever was left. Although I see the force of the point that some of the beneficiaries, such as the pecuniary legatees and the two charities, would have lost their interests through no fault of their own, that point has less impact in the present case than it will often have. In a typical case, the forfeiture will have been the consequence of accident, or interference by some other interested party; and it will be easy to say that the testator could not have intended the beneficiary to lose his interest for such a reason. Here, however, it is absolutely clear that Mrs Nathan did contemplate that some beneficiaries would lose their interests as a direct result of someone else's action over which they had no control; and because of that, and because of the substantial rewriting that would be required, I would not have granted relief from forfeiture.

[31] Accordingly, if the third issue had arisen I would have answered it by saying that the gift over took effect according to its terms.

Order accordingly.

Gareth Williams Barrister.

R (on the application of Edison First Power Ltd) v Central Valuation Officer and another

[2003] UKHL 20

HOUSE OF LORDS

LORD BINGHAM OF CORNHILL, LORD STEYN, LORD HOFFMANN, LORD MILLETT AND LORD SCOTT OF FOSCOTE

17, 18 FEBRUARY, 10 APRIL 2003

Rates – Valuation – Electricity undertaking – Aggregate rateable value of hereditaments occupied for the purpose of generating electricity – Order containing annual formula calculating value based on generating capacity – Whether order ultra vires – Local Government Finance Act 1988, Sch 6, para 3(2) – Electricity Supply Industry (Rateable Values) Order 1994, SI 1994/3282.

PowerGen's business included generating electricity and it was liable for non-domestic rates on the hereditaments it occupied for that purpose. Schedule 6 to the Local Government Finance Act 1988 determined the rateable value of non-domestic hereditaments and laid down a general valuation formula based on annual letting value. Paragraph 3(2)[a] empowered the Secretary of State, inter alia, to provide, in the case of certain non-domestic hereditaments, that the general valuation formula should not apply and that their rateable value should be such as was specified by order. Pursuant to that power the Secretary of State made the Electricity Supply Industry (Rateable Values) Order 1994, which applied to PowerGen, and which prescribed the aggregate rateable value of the hereditaments which it occupied for generating electricity. The 1994 order prescribed a fixed yearly sum, with an annual recalculation according to a formula based on changes in PowerGen's declared net capacity in respect of electricity generation. The provisions of the 1994 order were similar in principle to the rating provisions which had applied to electricity generating businesses since 1958. In July 1999 PowerGen sold two electricity power stations to the claimant, which was rated for the purposes of non-domestic rating by reference to its occupation of rateable hereditaments. The claimant therefore became liable to pay, and paid, non-domestic rates, assessed on the annual letting value of the power stations, for the period from July 1999 until the end of the 1999–2000 rating year. PowerGen's liability for rates in that rating year was unaffected by the sale of the power stations as, under the 1994 order, changes in the actual hereditaments which it occupied had no effect on the aggregate valuation until the end of the rating year and then only if they resulted in a change in declared net generating capacity. Under the sale agreement the claimant had agreed to pay PowerGen an apportionment of the rates payable by PowerGen in relation to the power stations and it duly made that payment. The claimant considered that rates had been paid twice over on the same hereditaments for the same period and sought judicial review, contending that the assessment on PowerGen under the 1994 order was ultra vires, as a valuation regime which took no account of the disposal of hereditaments to a rateable occupier in a rating year was so unreasonable that Parliament could not be supposed to have intended para 3(2) of Sch 6 to the 1988 Act to authorise it; or alternatively, that the assessment infringed the presumption against double taxation or double recovery. The judge dismissed that application and his decision was upheld by a majority in the Court of Appeal. The claimant appealed.

a Paragraph 3, so far as material, is set out at [50], below

Held – (Lord Bingham and Lord Steyn dissenting) The 1994 order was not ultra vires the 1988 Act. The system of rating prescribed by the Secretary of State in the 1994 order, which carried the inevitable consequence that the aggregate rateable value of hereditaments occupied by PowerGen would not be affected by changes during the rating year, was not so unreasonable that Parliament could not have intended to authorise it by the general words of para 3(2) of Sch 6 to the 1988 Act. The system was one which, in its essential principles, Parliament had thought appropriate for the electricity generating industry for the previous 30 years. The purpose of para 3(2) was to allow that system to be retained, with whatever formulae the government thought appropriate and as long as it thought it expedient to do so. Although it would be generally regarded as oppressive for the same person to be taxed twice over in respect of the same matter, the instant appeal was not such a case. The payment by the claimant of an apportioned part of the rates payable by PowerGen which were treated as attributable to the declared net generating capacity of the two power stations was part of the price which the claimant was willing to pay for the power stations. It was not, from the claimant's point of view, a payment of rates. Accordingly, the appeal would be dismissed (see [55]–[57], [60], [103], [111], [114], [118], [127], [147]–[150], below).

Decision of the Court of Appeal [2001] All ER (D) 146 (Jul) affirmed.

Notes

For rateable property, rateable occupation, and hereditaments entered in central non-domestic rating lists, see 39(1) Halsbury's Laws (4th edn reissue) paras 608, 613 and 669.

For the Local Government Finance Act 1988, Sch 6, para 3(2), see 36 Halsbury's Statutes (4th edn) (2002 reissue) 1467.

Cases referred to in opinions

Brook (Valuation Officer) v National Coal Board [1975] RA 367, CA.

Furniss (Inspector of Taxes) v Dawson [1984] 1 All ER 530, [1984] AC 474, [1984] 2 WLR 226, HL.

IRC v Clifforia Investments Ltd [1963] 1 All ER 159, [1963] 1 WLR 396.

IRC v FS Securities Ltd [1964] 2 All ER 691, [1965] AC 631, [1964] 1 WLR 742, HL.

IRC v Hinchy [1960] 1 All ER 505, [1960] AC 748, [1960] 2 WLR 448, HL.

Kingston Union Assessment Committee v Metropolitan Water Board [1926] AC 331, [1926] All ER Rep 1, HL.

Milford Haven Conservancy Board v IRC [1976] 3 All ER 263, [1976] 1 WLR 817, CA.

R (on the application of Morgan Grenfell & Co Ltd) v Special Comr of Income Tax [2002] UKHL 21, [2002] 3 All ER 1, [2002] 2 WLR 1299.

R v Dimsey (No 2) [2001] UKHL 46, [2001] 4 All ER 786, [2002] 1 AC 509, [2001] 3 WLR 843.

R v Secretary of State for the Home Dept, ex p Simms [1999] 3 All ER 400, [2000] 2 AC 115, [1999] 3 WLR 328, HL.

Schuler (L) AG v Wickman Machine Tool Sales Ltd [1973] 2 All ER 39, [1974] AC 235, [1973] 2 WLR 683, HL.

Smith & Son v Lambeth Assessment Committee (1882) 9 QBD 585; affd (1882) 10 QBD 327, CA.

Stradling v Morgan (1560) 1 Plowd 199, 75 ER 305.

Vestey v IRC (Nos 1 and 2) [1979] 3 All ER 976, [1980] AC 1148, [1979] 3 WLR 915, HL.

Westminster City Council v Southern Rly Co [1936] 2 All ER 322, [1936] AC 511, HL.

Woolwich Equitable Building Society v IRC [1991] 4 All ER 92, [1990] 1 WLR 1400, HL.

Cases referred to in list of authorities

Aston Cantlow and Wilmcote with Billesley PCC v Wallbank [2001] EWCA Civ 713, [2001] 3 All ER 393, [2002] Ch 51, [2001] 3 WLR 1323; rvsd [2003] UKHL 37, [2003] 3 All ER 1213, [2003] 3 WLR 283.

Darby v Sweden (1991) 13 EHRR 774, [1990] ECHR 11581/85, ECt HR.

Gasus Dosier- und Fördertechnik GmbH v Netherlands (1995) 20 EHRR 403, [1995] ECHR 15375/89, ECt HR.

Hammersmith and Fulham London BC v Secretary of State for the Environment [1990] 3 All ER 589, sub nom R v Secretary of State for the Environment, ex p Hammersmith and Fulham London BC [1991] 1 AC 521, [1990] 3 WLR 898, HL.

McCarthy & Stone (Developments) Ltd v Richmond upon Thames London BC [1991] 4 All ER 897, [1992] 2 AC 48, [1991] 3 WLR 941, HL.

National & Provincial Building Society v UK [1997] STC 1466, ECt HR.

Nottinghamshire CC v Secretary of State for the Environment [1986] 1 All ER 199, [1986] AC 240, [1986] 2 WLR 1, HL.

R (Asif Javed) v Secretary of State for the Home Dept, R (Zulfiqar Ali) v Secretary of State for the Home Dept, R (Abid Ali) v Secretary of State for the Home Dept [2001] EWCA Civ 789, [2002] QB 129, [2001] 3 WLR 323.

R (on the application of Alconbury Developments Ltd) v Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions [2001] UKHL 23, [2001] 2 All ER 929, [2001] 2 WLR 1389.

R v A (No 2) [2001] UKHL 25, [2001] 3 All ER 1, [2002] 1 AC 45, [2001] 2 WLR 1546.

R v Criminal Injuries Compensation Board, ex p A [1997] 3 All ER 745, [1998] QB 659, [1997] 3 WLR 776, CA; rvsd [1999] 2 AC 330, [1999] 2 WLR 974, HL.

R v Monopolies and Mergers Commission, ex p Argyll Group plc [1986] 2 All ER 257, [1986] 1 WLR 763, CA.

R v Secretary of State for Social Services, ex p Association of Metropolitan Authorities [1986] 1 All ER 164, [1986] 1 WLR 1.

R v Secretary of State for the Environment and Secretary of State for Wales, ex p British Telecommunications plc [1991] RA 307.

R v Secretary of State for the Home Dept, ex p Daly [2001] UKHL 26, [2001] 3 All ER 433, [2001] 2 AC 532, [2001] 2 WLR 1622.

R v Somerset CC and ARC Southern Ltd, ex p Dixon [1997] COD 323.

Wainwright v Home Office [2001] EWCA Civ 2081, [2003] 3 All ER 943, [2002] QB 1334, [2002] 3 WLR 405.

Westminster Bank Ltd v Minister of Housing and Local Government [1970] 1 All ER 734, [1971] AC 508, [1970] 2 WLR 645, HL.

Williams (Valuation Officer) v Scottish and Newcastle Retail Ltd [2001] EWCA Civ 185, [2001] RA 41; affg sub nom Scottish and Newcastle Retail Ltd v Williams (Valuation Officer) [2000] RA 119, LT. a

Woolwich Building Society v IRC (No 2) [1992] 3 All ER 737, [1993] AC 70, [1992] 3 WLR 366, HL.

Appeal b

The claimant, Edison First Power Ltd, appealed, with permission of the Appeal Committee given on 13 February 2002, from the judgment of the Court of Appeal (Simon Brown, May and Dyson LJJ) on 12 July 2001 ([2001] EWCA Civ 1096, [2001] RA 229) dismissing its appeal from the order of Carnwath J made on 27 November 2000 and amended on 5 December 2000 ([2001] RA 1) dismissing its application for judicial review of the decisions of the central valuation officer and the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions relating to the charge to non-domestic rates in the rating year 1999–2000 on certain hereditaments owned and occupied before 19 July 1999 by PowerGen (UK) plc and owned and occupied after that date by the claimant. PowerGen, with permission granted by an order made on 29 April 2002, filed written submissions as intervenor. The facts are set out in the opinion of Lord Hoffmann. c d

Michael Beloff QC, Nigel Pleming QC and Christopher Lewsley (instructed by Jones Day Gordons) for Edison.

Richard Drabble QC and Timothy Mould (instructed by the Treasury Solicitor) for the central valuation officer and the Secretary of State. e

Their Lordships took time for consideration.

10 April 2003. The following opinions were delivered. f

LORD BINGHAM OF CORNHILL.

[1] My Lords, I have the misfortune to differ from the majority of the House, and would for my part allow the appeal. Since my opinion cannot affect the outcome, I shall state the reasons for it briefly, adopting the helpful accounts of the facts and the relevant legislative provisions given by Carnwath J at first instance ([2001] RA 1), by the Court of Appeal (Simon Brown, May and Dyson LJJ) ([2001] EWCA Civ 1096, [2001] RA 229) and by my noble and learned friend Lord Millett. g

[2] I take as my starting point what is, I think, a trite proposition of law, that rates are a form of tax imposed on the occupier of a hereditament. In some circumstances rates may also be imposed on an owner, but the potential liability of a non-occupying owner plays no part in this case and can for present purposes be ignored. Unless there are joint occupiers, there can be only one occupier of a hereditament at any one time, and accordingly there can ordinarily be only one party liable to pay rates on that hereditament in relation to a given period. As a general rule of construction it will be presumed that a statute does not intend to tax or rate, or authorise the imposition of a tax or rate, on more than one occupier in relation to occupation of a hereditament during a given period. The juridical basis of this presumption may be open to argument. It may rest, in this context, on the legal nature of rates. But I do not think the existence of the presumption can be doubted. The cases cited by Simon Brown LJ ([2001] RA 229 at [30]–[32]) h j are good authority for it (see Smith & Son v Lambeth Assessment Committee (1882) 9 QBD 585 at 593; Westminster City Council v Southern Rly Co [1936] 2 All ER 322 at 352, [1936] AC 511 at 565; Brook (Valuation Officer) v National Coal Board [1975] RA 367 at 371). The general presumption against rating two parties in relation to the same hereditament was described by Simon Brown LJ ([2001] RA 229 at [30]) as 'well established', and I did not understand the existence of the presumption to be challenged.

[3] But it is of course no more than a presumption. It is not conclusive or irrefutable. Parliament is sovereign. Since, however, the presumption exists (like the presumption against double taxation) for the protection of the citizen and operates to curb the power of the state to exact payment from the citizen, the presumption will be displaced only if 'sufficiently clear express words are used' or there are 'circumstances surrounding the enactment of the particular legislation which lead to an inevitable inference that Parliament intended, in using the words that it did' that the presumption should be displaced. I did not understand either party to question the correctness of the approach indicated in these quotations from the opinion of Lord Oliver of Aylmerton in Woolwich Equitable Building Society v IRC [1991] 4 All ER 92 at 103–104, [1990] 1 WLR 1400 at 1412–1413.

[4] In the judgments below, and in argument before the House, somewhat differing views were expressed on whether the facts of this case were such as to engage the presumption at all: whether (in other words) it is a case of double recovery. I would for my part adopt both the analysis and the conclusion of Dyson LJ ([2001] RA 229 at [70]–[74]). It is not in doubt that Edison First Power Ltd (Edison) paid non-domestic local list rates to the two relevant billing authorities in respect of occupation of the two transferred power stations for the period 19 July 1999–31 March 2000. During the same period PowerGen (UK) plc (PowerGen) continued to be liable to pay rates on a basis calculated so as to take account of their occupation of the two power stations. The transfer of the power stations did not reduce their liability in any way. Thus in effect the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions received payment twice, once from PowerGen and once from Edison. It was therefore a case of double recovery. The presumption was engaged.

[5] Neither party suggested that the presumption was displaced by sufficiently clear express statutory words. Thus the question is whether the circumstances surrounding the enactment of the particular legislation were such as to raise an inevitable inference (not just a reasonable or a not unlikely inference, but an inevitable inference) that Parliament intended, in using the words that it did, to displace the presumption. But here again the task of interpretation is made easier by the common approach of the parties. The Secretary of State did not contend that the Local Government Finance Act 1988 raised an inevitable inference that Parliament intended there to be double recovery in a situation where a hereditament formerly part of a class of hereditaments included in the central list was transferred mid-year to a non-designated person and so was included in a local list from the date of transfer, obliging that person to pay local list rates. Rather he contended that the 1988 Act raised an inevitable inference that Parliament intended to authorise the Secretary of State to introduce a scheme for central rating which would have that effect. It is this contention which Edison challenges. The answer must be found in the statute, read of course as a whole and in context.

[6] Sections 41–51 inclusive of the 1988 Act made provision for the local rating of non-domestic hereditaments not included in a central non-domestic rating list. The fine detail of the scheme is not important for present purposes. It is however clear from ss 43 and 44 that the amount chargeable in rates for each chargeable day was to be reached by multiplying the rateable value shown for the day (calculated in accordance with s 56(1) and Sch 6) by the non-domestic rating multiplier for the financial year (calculated in accordance with s 56(2) and Sch 7) and dividing the result by the number of days in the financial year. The product of that calculation, multiplied by the number of days during which the ratepayer has occupied the hereditament during the financial year, will represent the ratepayer's liability: the sum per day times the number of chargeable days.

[7] The central rating list scheme established by ss 52–54 of the 1988 Act was clearly intended to provide a simple and efficient means of imposing rates on and collecting rates from ubiquitous utilities with hereditaments in numerous local authority areas. So specified hereditaments occupied by designated persons were to be centrally rated en bloc, and instead of specific rateable values applied to individual hereditaments the rateable value of these centrally rated hereditaments was to be shown in the list as a whole (see s 53(1)–(3)). By s 54 the chargeable amount for each chargeable day was to be reached by multiplying the rateable value shown for the day in the central list against the ratepayer's name (calculated in accordance with s 56(1) and Sch 6) by the non-domestic rating multiplier for the financial year (calculated in accordance with s 56(2) and Sch 7) and dividing the result by the number of days in the financial year. Allowance being made for the aggregation of hereditaments inherent in the scheme of central list valuation, the formula was very similar to the local list formula. It was clearly contemplated that there was some purpose to be served by finding the chargeable amount of rates for each chargeable day. So far, one finds no indication that a designated person was to remain liable to pay the full amount of rates even though a hereditament or hereditaments whose value was included in the aggregated central list value of hereditaments occupied by that person had ceased to be owned or occupied by that person but had become subject to local list rates as a result of its occupation by a person subject to such rates. It is not, as it seems to me, inherent in a scheme for centralised rating en bloc of hereditaments in a certain class that rates should continue to be paid in the same amount even though the hereditaments comprised in the class have significantly changed.

[8] Counsel for the Secretary of State placed considerable reliance on s 67(9) of the 1988 Act:

> 'A hereditament shall be treated as shown in a central non-domestic rating list for a day if on the day it falls within a class of hereditament shown for the day in the list; and for this purpose a hereditament falls within a class on a particular day if (and only if) it falls within the class immediately before the day ends.'

This provision, read on its own, might be thought to warrant the imposition of rates on a designated person in respect of a broadly defined class of hereditaments whether or not the person ceased to occupy or own them at any stage in the financial year. But this reading is undermined by sub-s (9A), which reads:

> 'In subsection (9) above "class" means a class expressed by reference to whether hereditaments—(a) are occupied or owned by a person designated under section 53(1) above, and (b) fall within any description prescribed in relation to him under section 53(1).'

This would suggest to me that a designated person does not remain liable to pay rates calculated by reference to a valuation in so far as it is based on the valuation of hereditaments he no longer owns or occupies, the more so (given the presumption) where the hereditaments are owned or occupied by another party liable to pay local list rates.

[9] The crux of the argument between the parties turned on the proper construction of Sch 6, entitled 'Non-Domestic Rating: Valuation'. Its effect, as stated in para 1, was to determine the rateable value of non-domestic hereditaments for the purposes of Pt III of the Act. Paragraph 2, equally applicable to central list and local list hereditaments, laid down a valuation formula based on annual letting value. Paragraph 2A applied to the valuation of buildings used for the breeding and rearing of horses when the buildings were occupied together with agricultural land. Paragraph 2B made special provision for valuing caravan sites. The Secretary of State's argument rests on para 3(2), but I should quote the whole paragraph:

> '3.—(1) The Secretary of State may by order provide that in the case of a non-domestic hereditament of such class as may be prescribed—(a) paragraphs 2 to 2B above shall not apply, and (b) its rateable value shall be such as is determined in accordance with prescribed rules.
>
> (2) The Secretary of State may by order provide that in the case of non-domestic hereditaments to be shown in a central non-domestic rating list by virtue of regulations under section 53(2) above—(a) paragraphs 2 to 2B above shall not apply, and (b) their rateable value shall be such as is specified in the order or determined in accordance with prescribed rules.
>
> (3) For the purposes of sub-paragraph (1) above a class may be prescribed by reference to such factors as the Secretary of State sees fit.
>
> (4) Without prejudice to the generality of sub-paragraph (3) above, a class may be prescribed by reference to one or more of the following factors—(a) the physical characteristics of hereditaments; (b) the fact that hereditaments are unoccupied or are occupied for prescribed purposes or by persons of prescribed descriptions.

Paragraph 3(2) makes quite plain that the Secretary of State may make regulations to disapply paras 2 to 2B, so as to depart from the annual letting basis of valuation, and either to specify a rateable value for central list hereditaments or to lay down rules governing the valuation of such hereditaments. What it does not do, as I read it, is authorise the Secretary of State to specify a value or prescribe rules which will permit double recovery of rates. But it is enough to say that no inevitable inference is to be drawn that Parliament intended to authorise the Secretary of State to introduce a scheme which would have that effect.

[10] If that conclusion is correct, it is unnecessary to go further. The Secretary of State cannot draw support from the Electricity Supply Industry (Rateable Values) Order 1994, SI 1994/3282, since it is the power of the Secretary of State to make that order which raises the issue before the House. Little assistance is gained from the Court of Appeal decision in Milford Haven Conservancy Board v IRC [1976] 3 All ER 263, [1976] 1 WLR 817, since in that case the court held that the Secretary of State had had express statutory authority to make the relevant orders. If that conclusion was correct, it necessarily followed that the presumption had been overridden.

[11] Edison's standing to raise this challenge has not been challenged. It seems to me irrelevant that Edison would have been liable for local list rates only had it not agreed to indemnify PowerGen against PowerGen's liability for central list rates attributable to the two power stations from 19 July 1999 until the end of the financial year: but for that agreement, Edison itself would only have paid once, but there would still in effect have been double recovery. I do not think that consultation, particularly consultation at a time when divestment of hereditaments by designated persons at the behest of the Crown was not in the minds of those consulted, throws any light on the problem of statutory construction before the House.

[12] In agreement with Dyson LJ and for very much the same reasons, I would accede to Edison's argument.

LORD STEYN.

[13] My Lords, the Secretary of State received payment of rates twice in respect of the same hereditament. He received payment once from PowerGen (UK) Ltd (PowerGen) and once from Edison First Power Ltd (Edison). As Dyson LJ explained in his dissenting judgment in the Court of Appeal ([2001] EWCA Civ 1096, [2001] RA 229) it was a case of double recovery. Undoubtedly there is a presumption against rating two parties in relation to the same hereditament. The presumption was applicable. So I am tolerably satisfied that the basic approach of Dyson LJ was correct.

[14] On the other hand, at the end of oral argument, I felt somewhat reluctantly driven to the conclusion that under the 'swings and roundabouts scheme' the presumption was displaced (see [2001] RA 229 at [45] per Simon Brown LJ and [67] per May LJ).

[15] On further consideration of the matter, particularly in the light of the arguments presented by counsel for the appellant, the judgment of Dyson LJ and the speech of my noble and learned friend Lord Bingham of Cornhill, I now consider that this was not a satisfactory and principled basis for concluding that the statutory scheme demonstrates clearly that Parliament wished to displace the presumption. The question whether overall the scheme devised by the Secretary of State works fairly is logically distinct from the question whether the Secretary of State was empowered by the enabling legislation to devise a scheme involving double recovery in the first place. On balance it seems to me that the statutory language is susceptible of different interpretations and does not sufficiently clearly authorise a scheme involving double recovery.

[16] In the end the problem before the House is one of vires. The text of the statute must be the starting point. The question is how far, on a contextual reading of the statute, the language is capable of stretching. While I accept that all relevant contextual material must be taken into account, not all the material deployed by the Secretary of State can affect the point of statutory construction. Thus while I accept that the consultation process in this case is admissible, it ultimately does not warrant an interpretation which attributes to the language used by Parliament a meaning which displaces the presumption. The objective setting of the statute does not in logic and common sense reveal a Parliamentary intent to override the presumption.

[17] I must go back to what I regard as a strong presumption against double recovery. In my view the executive has not shown a displacement of this principle by a clear Parliamentary intent.

[18] For the reasons given by Lord Bingham of Cornhill, as well as my brief reasons, I would allow the appeal.

LORD HOFFMANN.

[19] My Lords, PowerGen (UK) plc (PowerGen) carries on the business of generating electricity. By an agreement dated 30 April 1999 (the sale agreement) it agreed to sell two power stations, Fiddlers Ferry and Ferrybridge C, to Edison First Power Ltd (Edison). The purchase was completed on 19 July 1999, when Edison went into occupation.

[20] PowerGen was rated under a special statutory regime by which the aggregate rateable value of the hereditaments which it occupied and used for generating electrical power was prescribed by the Electricity Supply Industry (Rateable Values) Order 1994, SI 1994/3282 made pursuant to para 3(2) of Sch 6 to the Local Government Finance Act 1988. This prescribed a fixed sum (£178,882,300) for the first year (1995–96) of the quinquennial valuation list subject to annual recalculation according to a formula based on changes in PowerGen's declared net capacity (DNC) in respect of electricity generation. Changes in the actual hereditaments which it occupied, such as the sale of a power station, had no effect upon the aggregate valuation until the end of the rating year and then only if they resulted in a change in DNC. The result was that PowerGen's liability for rates in the year 1999–2000 was unaffected by the sale.

[21] Edison, on the other hand, was rated in the ordinary way by reference to its occupation of the power stations. It was charged rates assessed on the annual value of the power stations for the period from 19 July 1999 until the end of the 1999–2000 rating year on 31 March 2000.

[22] By cl 9.3 of the sale agreement, Edison agreed that 'accrued charges ... payable' in respect of the power stations should be apportioned at the completion date. The clause said that 'for the avoidance of doubt' the apportionment should include an apportionment of rates payable by PowerGen in relation to the power stations 'which shall be in addition to any ... rates ... levied on the Buyer as a result of its occupation ... from the Completion Date'.

[23] Pursuant to this clause Edison paid PowerGen £13,517,937. But when it came to its own assessment for rates, Edison protested. It said that it was being made to pay rates twice over in respect of the same hereditaments. But Edison's own liability was hard to challenge. The hereditaments had properly been entered in the local rating lists from 19 July 1999 and it had been the occupier. Liability was clearly imposed by the 1988 Act. So it decided to attack the legality of the PowerGen rating regime. It said that the 1994 order was ultra vires and void so far as it imposed a liability upon PowerGen in respect of the power stations as from 19 July 1999.

[24] Paragraph 3(2)(b) of Sch 6 to the 1988 Act gave the Secretary of State power to provide by order that the rateable value of PowerGen's hereditaments should be 'such as is specified in the order or determined in accordance with prescribed rules'. These are very wide words. But Edison says that they do not allow him to prescribe a method of valuation which permits the same hereditaments to be taken into account for the purpose of rating both PowerGen and Edison. In the absence of express words or necessary implication, a statute should not be construed as imposing or allowing double taxation. Edison brought proceedings for judicial review to have the 1994 order and associated statutory instruments quashed so far as necessary as ultra vires. If that application is successful, PowerGen will owe no rates in respect of the power stations as from 19 July 1999 and there will be nothing to apportion to Edison. It will be entitled to ask PowerGen for its money back. But Carnwath J dismissed the application ([2001] RA 1) and his decision was upheld by the Court of Appeal (Simon Brown and May LJJ, Dyson LJ dissenting) ([2001] EWCA Civ 1096, [2001] RA 229).

[25] My Lords, the presumption against double taxation is one facet of a wider commonsense principle of the construction of statutes by which courts will often imply qualifications into the literal meaning of wide and general words in order to prevent them from having some unreasonable consequence which it is considered that Parliament could not have intended (see Stradling v Morgan (1560) 1 Plowd 199, 75 ER 305 and, for a more recent example, R (on the application of Morgan Grenfell & Co Ltd) v Special Comr of Income Tax [2002] UKHL 21, [2002] 3 All ER 1, [2002] 2 WLR 1299). The strength of the presumption depends upon the degree to which the consequences are unreasonable, the general scheme of the legislation and the background against which it was enacted.

[26] The specific presumption against double taxation was considered by the House of Lords in Woolwich Equitable Building Society v IRC [1991] 4 All ER 92, [1990] 1 WLR 1400. That case also concerned a power in general terms to make regulations; in that case, for the taxation of building society interest. The society complained that the effect of the regulations was to make it subject to tax in respect of payments of interest which had already been taxed in a previous year and that the statute should not be construed as permitting such double taxation. But the House of Lords held that the background to the enactment of the statute made it clear that this was exactly what Parliament had in mind. Lord Oliver of Aylmerton said ([1991] 4 All ER 92 at 103–104, [1990] 1 WLR 1400 at 1412–1413):

> 'The suggested inhibition against such cumulative taxation lies not in the words which Parliament has chosen to use but in certain well-established presumptions or principles—a presumption against double taxation, a presumption that income tax, being an annual tax, is payable only on income of a particular year and so on. But these are only presumptions. They are clearly rebuttable if sufficiently clear express words are used. But they can also be rebutted, as it seems to me, by circumstances surrounding the enactment of the particular legislation which lead to an inevitable inference that Parliament intended, in using the words that it did, that these presumptions or principles should not apply.'

[27] In the present case, there was a division of opinion in the Court of Appeal about whether it really was an example of double taxation. The majority said that upon the true construction of the 1994 order and the 1988 Act, PowerGen was not rated in respect of the power stations as from 19 July 1999. It was rated only in respect of the hereditaments that it actually occupied. But the total rateable value of those hereditaments was treated as being the same as it had been when they included the power stations. Dyson LJ said ([2001] RA 229 at [72]) that this was merely a matter of form. In reality, PowerGen continued to pay rates which had been calculated by reference to the DNC of the two power stations.

[28] I do not think that it advances the argument to debate whether this is really a case of double taxation or not. The question is whether the 1988 Act authorised what actually happened, whatever you choose to call it. The inevitable consequence of the valuation regime created by the 1994 order was to make the sale of the power stations irrelevant to PowerGen's rate liability in the 1999–2000 rating year but to allow the rating authority to claim rates from Edison for the period of its occupation. As the latter is conceded to be lawful, the question is whether a valuation regime which takes no account of the disposal of hereditaments to a rateable occupier in a rating year is so unreasonable, viewed against the scheme of the 1988 Act and the background to its enactment, that Parliament cannot be supposed to have intended para 3(2) of Sch 6 to authorise it.

[29] My Lords, the background is very important and I must therefore spend some time on the methods which had been used to value the hereditaments of public utilities like electricity generating companies before the 1988 Act.

[30] Rates are traditionally a local tax assessed upon occupiers of hereditaments in accordance with their annual value. Each local authority makes a rate according to its needs. There are however certain kinds of ratepayers whom it is not very practical to rate by reference to the individual hereditaments which they occupy in each local authority area. They may carry on activities for the purpose of which they occupy hereditaments which are situated in many local authority areas and which are extremely difficult to value separately. The problem emerged in consequence of the creation of canal, harbour, railway, gas, electricity, water and telegraph companies in the nineteenth century. The law insisted that such companies should pay the poor rate and other rates assessed upon them by reference to the annual value of the hereditaments which they occupied within each parish. But how were such values to be determined? The principle, as set out in s 1 of the Parochial Assessments Act 1836, was to estimate 'the Rent at which the [hereditaments] might reasonably be expected to let from Year to Year'. But, as Viscount Cave LC said in Kingston Union Assessment Committee v Metropolitan Water Board [1926] AC 331 at 338, [1926] All ER Rep 1 at 6:

> '[I]n applying that principle, so simple in appearance, to certain classes of hereditaments, great difficulties were encountered, and it was found necessary for rating experts and the Courts to have recourse to hypotheses of a more or less violent character.'

[31] The first difficulty, as explained by Viscount Cave ([1926] AC 331 at 338–339, [1926] All ER Rep 1 at 6–7), was that piecemeal valuations of the hereditaments in each parish would not necessarily add up to the value of the undertaking as a whole:

> 'The mains and other works in any particular parish, taken by themselves, might conceivably produce no rent at all, for it is almost impossible to suppose that any person would wish to become the tenant of them; but the same hereditaments, if looked upon as part of a great undertaking extending over a large and populous area, might be quite indispensable to the undertakers (who must be regarded as possible tenants) and so might command an extortionate rent. In these circumstances it was desirable, in order that a fair assessment might be arrived at, to devise some formula which ... would not compel the undertakers to pay rates on an aggregate sum exceeding the whole yearly value of their undertaking; and accordingly rating surveyors, soon after the passing of the Act of 1836, began to assess waterworks and other like concerns, such as railways, canals, gasworks, etc., upon the basis of the profits earned by the whole undertaking.' a

[32] I shall call this problem, which in the nineteenth century was solved by using the 'profits method' (later called the 'receipts and expenditure method') of valuation, the 'global valuation problem'. But then, having arrived at a global valuation, the next problem was to allocate that value fairly between the parishes in which the ratepaying company occupied hereditaments. I shall call this 'the distribution problem'. In the nineteenth century it was solved by an elaborate formula devised by experts and approved by the courts, which divided hereditaments into 'indirectly productive assets' like reservoirs and 'directly productive assets' like pipes carrying the water to properties in the parish, and giving each parish a proportion of the total valuation by reference to the cost of construction of the first class of assets and the revenue arising from the second class. b c

[33] These methods of rating public utility companies continued until after the 1939–45 war but for various reasons were not found altogether satisfactory. For one thing, a number of public utilities ran at a loss in the inter-war years. Assessment of rates by reference to the excess of receipts over expenditure was not very realistic. The rules were also very complicated because, once one had calculated the total value of the undertaking, it was necessary not only to apportion the total value among the rating areas in which the utility occupied hereditaments but also to make adjustments for cases in which it was not the occupier for the whole rating year. d e

[34] After the nationalisation of most public utilities after the war, resort was had to even more violent departures from traditional rating. So violent, indeed, that for ten years the sums payable by the nationalised electricity corporations were described not as rates but as payments in lieu of rates. One difficulty about continuing with the old method of global valuation was that the concept of profit seemed inapplicable to nationalised industries. I shall briefly outline how the payments in lieu were calculated, because they are relevant to the methods of rating adopted later when the industry was brought back into the rating system. f

[35] Payments in lieu of rates were introduced by s 85(1) of the Local Government Act 1948. It provided that hereditaments occupied by, among others, the statutory corporations in which the assets of the industry had been vested by the Electricity Act 1947 should not be liable to be rated or to be included in any valuation list. Instead, the nationalised corporations were to pay, for the year 1948–49 and all subsequent years, 'payments for the benefit of local authorities' in lieu of the rates which would otherwise have been payable. The amount payable for 1948–49 was to be 'the standard amount' (see s 96(2)(a) of the 1948 Act). This was defined in s 96(3) as meaning, in relation to the payment for the benefit local authorities in England and Wales, £11,250,000. In succeeding years the amount was to be adjusted for changes in the average rates levied in England and Wales and changes in the amount of electricity supplied. g h

[36] The new system therefore dealt with the global valuation problem in the same way as before; by making the industry's liability referable to the whole of its undertaking. But the method of calculation was greatly simplified; instead of valuing the undertaking, attributing proportions of that value to the various rating areas in which it occupied hereditaments and then applying the various local rates to those values, it used a single annual figure prescribed by Parliament, subject to adjustment in following years in accordance with a formula. It did not j matter whether a corporation ceased to occupy hereditaments or occupied new ones. If a corporation sold a hereditament to a rateable occupier, it would pass out of the immunity to rates conferred by s 85(1) of the 1948 Act but the sum for which the corporation was liable to make payments in lieu would be unaffected.

[37] The distribution problem was dealt with equally simply: the payment was distributed to rating authorities in proportion to the rateable values of their respective areas in the year in question (see s 100(2)(a) of the 1948 Act). This method paid no regard to where any hereditament happened to be.

[38] This egalitarianism was no doubt in accordance with the spirit of the age but resulted in complaints from local authorities which had to sustain greater burdens on account of the industry's activities than others; in particular, those in which generating stations were situated. Equity between rating authorities was thought to require recognition of these differences. So the system was recast by the Local Government Act 1958. This abolished 'Payments for the benefit of local authorities in lieu of rates' (see s 12(1)). Instead, it brought the nationalised corporations (then consisting of the Central Electricity Generating Board (the CEGB) and 12 area boards) back into the rating system.

[39] Section 12(1) of the 1958 Act provided that after 31 March 1959 the 13 electricity boards were to be treated, for the purposes of any rate period, as occupying in each rating area 'a hereditament of a rateable value' calculated in accordance with provisions contained in Sch 2.

[40] The method of calculation, an example of what was known as 'formula rating', was briefly as follows. The Minister of Housing and Local Government certified 'the basic electricity rateable value' (see para 4(3) of Sch 2), which was his estimate (subject to certain adjustments) of the annual payment in lieu of rates falling due for 1958–59, the last year of the old system. Half of this amount was to be attributed to the CEGB and the other half to area boards in specified percentages. These sums were to be adjusted in subsequent years by reference to changes in the outputs of the boards. In calculating the rateable value of the hereditament which a board was deemed to occupy in each rating area during any given year, a distinction was made between the values of distribution activities and generating activities. There was a formula for deciding what proportion of the total value allocated to a board should be treated as attributable to each kind of activity: in the case of the CEGB it was half and half; in the case of the area boards it was more complicated. Value attributable to distribution activities was apportioned among rating authorities within the areas of each board in proportion to the aggregate net annual value of their rating areas. Value attributable to generating activities was apportioned only to the rating authorities in whose areas the board had generating stations in commission. Apportionment was made according to the proportion of the generating capacity in the rating area to the board's total generating capacity.

[41] The important point to notice about this system is that the hereditament which a board was treated as occupying in the year in question was entirely notional. It did not matter whether the board actually occupied hereditaments in that rating area for all or any of the year in question. The immunity from rating conferred by s 85(1) of the 1948 Act in respect of hereditaments actually occupied by the boards was preserved and there was substituted its liability in respect of the notional hereditaments created by the 1958 Act. So once again, the actual hereditaments occupied by the boards during the rating year were irrelevant to its overall liability. Occupation of hereditaments on which it had a generating station in commission would affect the distribution of the rates which it paid but only by way of revision from year to year. The disposal of a hereditament to a rateable occupier in the course of a year would leave the board's liability to rates unaffected.

[42] Similar codes of formula rating were applied to other public utilities and they were all consolidated in the General Rate Act 1967, where the provisions relating to electricity boards will be found in s 34 and Sch 7.

[43] This system of formula rating lasted until the 1988 Act came into force on 1 April 1990. The revolutionary change made by the 1988 Act was to convert non-domestic rates from a local into a central tax. The rate is now set by the Secretary of State, paid over to him and then redistributed to local authorities according to the population living in their areas. This change solved at a stroke the distribution problem which had given so much trouble over the previous 150 years. It is no longer necessary for each local authority to be able to collect the rates on the hereditaments or notional hereditaments which the ratepayer occupies or is deemed to occupy in its rating area. They all go into the same pot for redistribution.

[44] Nevertheless, in the case of the great majority of hereditaments subject to the non-domestic rate, local valuation, assessment and collection were continued. It was obviously more convenient that valuation of individual hereditaments should be in the hands of local valuation officers. Local authorities maintain lists called 'local non-domestic rating lists' of non-domestic hereditaments within the authority's area, showing for each day in the year the rateable value of each hereditament as determined by the local valuation officer. The occupier of the hereditament is liable to the rate for each day on which it is shown in the list and he is in occupation. The local authority collects the rate and passes it on to the Secretary of State.

[45] For some cases, however, the 1988 Act provided for central assessment. Section 52 established a central non-domestic rating list. Section 53(1) provides that 'with a view to securing the central rating en bloc of certain hereditaments' the Secretary of State may by regulations designate a person to be included in the central list and prescribe the hereditaments in respect of which he is to be centrally rated. Regulation 6(1) of the Central Rating Lists Regulations 1994, SI 1994/3121 (the Central Rating Regulations), echoing s 53(2) of the 1988 Act, provides that the central list must show, for each day for which the list is in force, the name of the designated person and, against each name, each hereditament in England which on the day concerned is occupied or (if unoccupied) owned by that person and falls within the description of hereditaments for which the Secretary of State has prescribed that he is to be centrally rated. This might suggest that each hereditament must be separately identified on the list, but s 67(9) and (9A) provide that the requirement may be satisfied by specifying a class of hereditaments by reference to occupation by the designated person and the prescribed description. Thus PowerGen is designated by the Central Rating Regulations in respect of all its hereditaments 'wholly or mainly used for the purposes of the generation of electrical power' (see the Schedule to the regulations, Pt 2, para I) without specifying them individually. This means that if the designated person ceases to occupy a hereditament, it ceases to be a member of the class and it is no longer rated in respect of that hereditament.

[46] Section 54 deals with the liability of centrally rated persons. Such a person is liable in respect of a chargeable financial year 'if for any day in the year' his name appears on the list. The amount for which he is liable is the aggregate of the chargeable amounts for each chargeable day. A chargeable day means a day for which the ratepayer's name is shown on the list and the chargeable amount for each such day is determined by multiplying the rateable value shown on the list for that day by the 'non-domestic rating multiplier'—the equivalent of the old poundage fixed by the local authority—and dividing it by the number of days in the financial year.

[47] Thus the statutory framework for central rating contemplates that although the designated ratepayers' centrally rated hereditaments will be valued en bloc, the method of valuation will, in the absence of contrary provision, be the traditional method of estimating the rent at which those hereditaments could reasonably be expected to let from year to year.

[48] An example of designation for central rating without the use of a formula is British Telecom, which was designated only in respect of its 'posts, wires, underground cables and ducts, telephone kiosks, towers, masts, switching equipment, or other equipment, or easements or wayleaves', which were to be treated as one hereditament (see reg 5 and Pt 5, para II of the Schedule to the Central Rating Regulations and reg 4(1) of the Non-Domestic Rating (Railways, Telecommunications and Canals) Regulations 1994, SI 1994/3123). Thus all other hereditaments occupied by British Telecom are rated on local lists in the ordinary way and even in respect of those centrally rated en bloc, valuation is according to the conventional method specified in paras 2–2B of Sch 6 to the 1988 Act: an estimate of the rent at which the hereditament might reasonably be expected to let from year to year.

[49] The 1988 Act therefore contains what may be regarded as a prima facie assumption that valuation, even of centrally rated hereditaments rated en bloc, will be according to the conventional method. For present purposes, the important feature of the conventional method is that each hereditament (or class of hereditaments deemed to be a single hereditament) is separately valued, so that disposal of a hereditament results in a cessation of liability in respect of the value of that hereditament.

[50] But para 3 of Sch 6 gives the Secretary of State power to disapply the conventional method, in respect of both hereditaments on local lists (see sub-para (1)) and hereditaments on the central list (see sub-para (2)):

> '(2) The Secretary of State may by order provide that in the case of non-domestic hereditaments to be shown in a central non-domestic rating list by virtue of regulations under section 53(2) above—(a) paragraphs 2 to 2B above shall not apply; and (b) their rateable value shall be such as is specified in the order or determined in accordance with prescribed rules.'

[51] It is the purpose and scope of this provision which is in issue in this appeal. The 1988 Act was a long time in gestation and the purpose of para 3 can be clearly understood only by reference to the rating law as it was before the Act and the admissible evidence of what were perceived to be the matters needing to be reformed. The proposal to introduce a central non-domestic rate was made in the 1986 Green Paper, Paying for Local Government (Cmnd 9714) which set out the results of more than a year of studies undertaken by ministers and officials in the Department of the Environment and 'special advisers' (of whom I was briefly one). Chapter 2 argued the case for central non-domestic rating; para 2.40 noted that the last revaluation had been in 1973 and that values had become 'badly out of line with up-to-date rental values'. It proposed the preparation of a new list in time for introduction on 1 April 1990 and said (in para 2.42) that the government would issue a separate consultation paper on revaluation. This was issued in July 1987, entitled Paying for Local Government: Non-domestic Rates. Paragraph 7 dealt with formula rating:

> '7.1 The large majority of statutory undertakers, and some other activities, are now rated by statutory formula. The Government will be reviewing the various formulae, in consultation with representatives of the industries concerned, with the intention of bringing them all up to date at the same time as the general non-domestic revaluation in 1990.
>
> 7.2 At present, the provisions enabling formula rating to be applied, and the formulae themselves, are set out at great length in Schedules 4–7 to the General Rate Act and in various other Acts ...
>
> 7.3 The existing provisions would in any case require extensive recasting, not only because of the current review of the individual formulae, but also because, with the introduction of the national non-domestic rate, in the case of those industries where the formula is calculated at national level and then apportioned by a further formula to local authority areas, such apportionment will no longer be necessary. The review of the formulae could not in any case be completed in time to be included in the forthcoming main legislation.
>
> 7.4 The Government therefore has it in mind to replace all of the existing statutory provisions relating to formula rating with a simple enabling power. This would empower the Secretary of State to provide by order that hereditaments used for a specified activity, or occupied by a specified activity, or occupied by a specified occupier or class of occupier, should be formula-rated; to provide for the determination of the rateable value to be attributed to them in 1990 and at subsequent revaluations either as a specified sum or to be calculated in a specified manner; and to provide for the value to be adjusted for changes in the occupation of property by the industry.
>
> 7.5 The object would remain to replicate, in very broad terms, the rate burden a hereditament or industry might have borne had it been capable of being conventionally rated. The Secretary of State would consult representatives of the industry before varying the formula, or applying formula rating for the first time or ceasing to apply it. There is in practice no intention of substantially extending the scope of formula rating, though there may be some activities, for example private electricity generators, where it is appropriate; in other cases it may be possible to revert to conventional valuation.'

[52] As foreshadowed, the government made the Electricity Supply Industry (Rateable Values) Order 1989, SI 1989/2475 which continued formula rating for the industry for the 1990–95 quinquennium. By the time the 1988 Act had been passed, it appeared that the government had a further reason for not including the formulae in the Act itself. It regarded the whole idea of formula rating as a relic of outdated political theory. Public utilities should function in a market economy and there was no reason why their assets should not be valued in the same way as those of any other enterprise. And a point forcibly made by the public utility industries during consultation was that conventional valuation by the valuation officer allowed them a right of appeal, whereas a statutory formula, even if devised after a process of consultation, was immovable.

[53] In a further consultation paper published after the 1988 Act had been passed, the government therefore made it clear that it would like to return the industry to conventional rating as soon as possible:

> 'While the Government believes that its proposals for prescribed rateable values are fair and reasonable, and are in line with what the 1990 revaluation is expected to show for other industries, it acknowledges that this is not an ideal method of rating assessment, particularly since the ratepayers' right of appeal is severely limited. The 1988 Act opens the way to returning these undertakings to conventional assessment; it removes the need to apportion rateable values to individual authorities, and it contains the power to set aside the restrictive case law associated with the profits method of valuing public utilities. Consequently, the Government intends, so far as it is practical, to return all hereditaments whose values are currently prescribed to conventional assessment for the next revaluation.'

[54] In the event it appears that it was not found practical to return the industry to conventional assessment in time for the start of the next quinquennium, so the government, after further consultation, made the 1994 order. But the industry's power station hereditaments were eventually transferred to local lists in 2000.

[55] The question, as I have said, is whether the system of formula rating prescribed by the Secretary of State by the 1994 order, which carried the inevitable consequence that the en bloc rateable value of hereditaments occupied by PowerGen would not be affected by changes during the rating year, was so unreasonable that Parliament could not have intended to authorise it by the general words of para 3(2) of Sch 6 to the 1988 Act. My Lords, I find it impossible to say this of a system which, in its essential principles, Parliament had thought appropriate for the electricity generating industry for the previous 30 years. In my opinion the purpose of para 3(2) was to allow that system to be retained, with whatever formulae the government thought appropriate and as long as it thought it expedient to do so.

[56] PowerGen acknowledges all this in the written submissions which it made to your Lordships by way of intervention in the appeal. Edison's claim of double taxation would not have any plausibility if it were not for the fact that it agreed to pay an apportioned part of the rates payable by PowerGen which were treated as attributable to the DNC of the two power stations. But this payment, however calculated, is in my opinion nothing more than part of the price which Edison was willing to pay PowerGen for the power stations. It is not, from Edison's point of view, a payment of rates.

[57] For these reasons I consider that the 1994 order was not ultra vires, either as a matter of construction of para 3(2) or because, as Edison has submitted, the Secretary of State acted irrationally or contrary to Edison's rights of property under art 1 of the First Protocol to the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms 1950 (as set out in Sch 1 to the Human Rights Act 1998).

[58] There are two matters to be mentioned in conclusion. The first is the decision of the Court of Appeal in Milford Haven Conservancy Board v IRC [1976] 3 All ER 263, [1976] 1 WLR 817, on which both sides placed some reliance. The 1967 Act, as I have said, consolidated the provisions for the formula rating of a number of public utilities including electricity boards, for which the formula was contained in Sch 7. In the case of mines and quarries, statutory dock and harbour undertakings and broadcasting, however, the particular circumstances were thought likely to be so varied that no formula was included in the primary legislation. Instead, the minister was given power in s 35(1) to make provision by order for determining rateable values 'by such method as may be so specified'. The formula prescribed by the minister for dock undertakings was based on 4% of their receipts, including receipts from some parts of their property which had been let and on which the occupiers were therefore paying rates in the ordinary way. The Milford Haven Conservancy Board complained that the order was ultra vires because it involved double taxation. But the Court of Appeal rejected this submission. Cairns LJ said ([1976] 3 All ER 263 at 269–270, [1976] 1 WLR 817 at 824–825):

> 'In my view the language of [the statute] is sufficiently clear to entitle the Secretary of State to prescribe any method of valuation, however far it departs from previously established principles ... [R]ateable value, whenever it departs from net annual value, either by being related to net annual value in some specific way, or by being assessed without reference to net annual value, is an artificial concept. The profits basis of valuation was a means of estimating the rent that the hypothetical tenant would pay (see Kingston Union v Metropolitan Water Board ([1926] AC 331 at 339, [1926] All ER Rep 1 at 7)). But none of the methods of assessment under ss 31 to 35 has that character. Water, gas and electricity undertakings are dealt with on the basis of supply. Mines and quarries ... are given a rateable value ascertained by applying a fraction ... to the rateable value previously assessed.'

[59] This reasoning seems to me to apply equally to the formula adopted by the Secretary of State in the 1994 order. The other matter on which I should comment is the closely reasoned and, on its own terms, persuasive dissenting judgment of Dyson LJ in the Court of Appeal. He first characterised the 1994 order as giving rise to a possibility of double rating and then analysed the provisions of the 1988 Act to see whether it disclosed a clear intention to allow such a consequence. His conclusion was that it did not.

[60] If one looks no further than the scheme of the 1988 Act, I would be inclined to agree. The Act is, as I have said, based on the assumption that conventional valuation will be the norm, and the formula rating applied by the 1994 order is so violent a departure from that norm as to make one doubt whether it could have been authorised by Parliament. But once one looks, as Lord Oliver in Woolwich Equitable Building Society v IRC [1991] 4 All ER 92 at 104, [1990] 1 WLR 1400 at 1412 said one should do, at the 'circumstances surrounding the enactment of the ... legislation', the meaning of the statute becomes plain. The background of formula rating over the previous thirty to forty years provides the key to understanding both the purpose of the powers conferred upon the Secretary of State by para 3 of Sch 6 to the 1988 Act and the way in which he used them. For these reasons and those given by my noble and learned friends Lord Millett and Lord Scott of Foscote, I would dismiss the appeal.

LORD MILLETT.

[61] My Lords, this is a very curious case. The appellant Edison First Power Ltd (Edison) claims that an assessment to central rates in respect of two electricity power stations amounted to double taxation and was unlawful. The Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions denies that the assessment was unlawful but has agreed to reimburse Edison if its claim is upheld. Yet Edison has never been assessed to central rates in respect of the power stations and has never paid them. They were assessed on and paid by PowerGen (UK) plc (PowerGen). If there was a victim of double taxation it was PowerGen. But PowerGen makes no complaint about the assessment and although it is not directly affected by the outcome of the present appeal it has intervened to support the Secretary of State's contention that the assessment was validly made.

[62] While this may make one sceptical about Edison's claim that anything as oppressive as double taxation is involved, it is not determinative. The case does not turn on Edison's locus standi to challenge the assessment on PowerGen. If it was unlawful, Edison has sufficient interest to entitle it to a declaration to that effect.

THE FACTS

[63] PowerGen was created when the Central Electricity Generating Board (the CEGB) was privatised in 1990. Its business was subsequently diversified and now extends to a wide range of activities but continues to include the generation of electricity. Along with other public utilities it was a designated person for the purposes of central non-domestic rating and the hereditaments which it occupied for the purposes of generating electricity were entered on a central rating list. They were rated under a special statutory scheme established by Pt III of the Electricity Supply Industry (Rateable Values) Order 1994, SI 1994/3282 made by the Secretary of State pursuant to powers conferred by para 3(2) of Sch 6 to the Local Government Finance Act 1988.

[64] In 1998 PowerGen was required to dispose of a proportion of its coal-fired generating capacity. In compliance with this requirement PowerGen put two electricity power stations, Fiddlers Ferry and Ferrybridge C, up for sale. Edison agreed to acquire them on long leases from PowerGen.

[65] On 19 July 1999 Edison completed its acquisition of the two power stations and went into rateable occupation. PowerGen remained liable to central rates in respect of the hereditaments which it occupied for the purpose of generating electricity. These no longer included the two power stations which it had sold to Edison, but owing to the way the rateable value of its properties was calculated by reference to its total declared net capacity for generating electricity (DNC) at the beginning of each rating year a change in the hereditaments which it occupied during the year did not affect its liability to rates until the following year and did not do so even then if it did not affect its total DNC. Accordingly for the remainder of the 1999–2000 rating year PowerGen continued to be liable to central rates in an amount which reflected the DNC of the two power stations even though it had disposed of them and Edison was in rateable occupation and liable to local rates in respect of them.

[66] The agreement for sale provided for PowerGen's liability to central rates in respect of the two power stations to be apportioned. PowerGen estimated that they would contribute some £13·5m to its total liability for central rates for the rest of the current rating year. Edison duly paid this sum to PowerGen, though it subsequently contested its liability to do so in arbitration proceedings.

[67] Following its acquisition Edison was assessed to local rates in respect of the two power stations. The assessments were made by the rating authorities for the areas in which the power stations were situated. They were in an identical sum and were made in accordance with a special scheme for the industry established by Pt II of the 1994 order made by the Secretary of State pursuant to powers conferred by para 3(1) of Sch 6 to the 1988 Act. Edison paid under protest but accepts that it had no ground for withholding payment. Being unable to recover its payment of local rates, Edison has turned its attention to the recovery of the central rates paid by PowerGen for the period when Edison was in occupation. If PowerGen was unlawfully assessed to them, they could not properly be apportioned to Edison.

[68] The central valuation officer has refused to make any amendment to the central rating list with effect from the change of occupation in July 1999. He says that he can do so only with effect from the beginning of the following rating year on 1 April 2000. Edison accepts this as correct, and identifies this limitation on his powers as the aspect of the scheme of central rating which is unlawful.

THE RIVAL CONTENTIONS

[69] Edison's case is as follows. (i) It was properly assessed to local rates in respect of its occupation of the two power stations for the period from 19 July 1999–31 March 2000. The assessment was based on the DNC of the power stations. This is common ground. (ii) The DNC of the two power stations also continued to be taken into account in determining the amount of central rates payable by PowerGen for the same period even though Edison was in rateable occupation of the power stations and PowerGen was not. This too is common ground. (iii) The assessment on PowerGen was inconsistent with two basic principles of rating law: (a) that rates are payable in respect of the occupation of a hereditament (save in the case of vacant property when they may be payable by the owner); and (b) that (save in the case of joint occupiers) only one person can be in rateable occupation of a hereditament at any one time (see Smith & Son v Lambeth Assessment Committee (1882) 9 QBD 585 at 595; Westminster City Council v Southern Rly Co [1936] 2 All ER 322 at 352, [1936] AC 511 at 565; Brook (Valuation Officer) v National Coal Board [1975] RA 367 at 371. (iv) The assessment on PowerGen was ultra vires: (a) because on the true construction of the enabling provisions of the 1988 Act they did not authorise such a radical departure from the basic principles of rating; or alternatively (b) because the assessment infringed the presumption against double taxation or double recovery and was not required by the Act whether as a matter of express language or as a matter of necessary implication. (v) In particular the 1994 order was ultra vires the 1988 Act in so far as it provided for the recalculation of the rateable value of the hereditaments shown on a central list only at yearly intervals and did not provide for recalculation during the course of a rating year when a hereditament ceased to be occupied by a designated person and became subject to local rates.

[70] The Secretary of State acknowledges that the general principles of rating law are as Edison describes them. But he says that the 1988 Act authorised him to establish a scheme for central rating which departed from those principles and that the scheme which he adopted was neither irrational nor unfair. He accepts that the 1988 Act did not require him to make a scheme which provided for annual recalculation only but says that it authorised him to do so and that annual recalculation was a long-accepted practice in the industry and represented a pragmatic solution to a practical problem. He denies that strictly speaking the scheme which he established involved any element of double taxation, and to the extent that it involved an element of double recovery he says that, taken as a whole, it was not oppressive or objectionable and did not need to be authorised by express words or necessary implication in the enabling Act.

THE RATING OF PUBLIC UTILITIES

[71] My noble and learned friend Lord Hoffmann has described the various methods which have been adopted from time to time to determine the rateable value of hereditaments occupied by public utilities and situated in numerous rating districts. As he has shown, it has been found necessary for practical reasons for Parliament to authorise departures, and often radical departures, from conventional rating principles. The Local Government Act 1948 introduced a system known as 'formula rating' based on the method formerly employed for the railways under the Railways Act 1921. This system, however, was not extended to the electricity industry until the Local Government Act 1958. In the meantime the industry was exempted from rates and required instead to pay to central government a fixed sum in lieu of rates which was then distributed by central government to local authorities.

[72] By the time of the 1988 Act the large majority of statutory undertakers, as well as some private enterprises, were rated by statutory formula. It is not necessary to describe the system in any detail, but two of its features may be briefly remarked upon. First, the liability of an undertaking for rates had only a tenuous connection with the hereditaments which it actually occupied. Notional hereditaments were created in each rating district and the liability of the undertaking was based on the initial aggregate (or 'cumulo') rateable value of the hereditaments which it was deemed to occupy when the valuation list came into force. This was adjusted annually to reflect changes during the life of the list. The formula differed from industry to industry. In the case of the CEGB the initial cumulo figure represented a pre-determined proportion of the payment which it had made to central government in lieu of rates in the last year of the old system, and this figure was adjusted periodically to reflect changes in its output of electricity. Accordingly while changes in the hereditaments which the CEGB occupied from time to time affected the distribution of its payments among local rating authorities they did not affect the amount of its overall liability unless they affected its total output. Secondly, in common with other undertakings subject to this form of rating, the CEGB's output was revised at the beginning of each year, so that changes during the year did not affect the amount of its liability until the following year.

[73] These two features were retained in the scheme of central non-domestic rating which the Secretary of State established for the industry under Pt III of the 1994 order.

THE 1988 ACT

Non-domestic rating

[74] The long title to the 1988 Act describes it as an Act (inter alia) 'to create new rating systems'. Part III of the 1988 Act introduced a new system of rating for non-domestic property. This differs from the familiar system of domestic rating in two ways. First, the rate or poundage is not set by individual local rating authorities. Instead a single national rate is set for the whole of England by the Secretary of State. Secondly, the proceeds are not retained by the rating authorities in the areas where the relevant hereditaments are situated. Instead they are paid into a central pool which is administered by the Secretary of State and distributed among local authorities on a basis which is independent of the location of the hereditaments in question.

[75] The 1988 Act established two forms of non-domestic rating, one by means of local lists (see ss 41–51) and one by means of central lists (see ss 52–54). Some classes of property are exempt from rates altogether, but all rateable non-domestic property must be rated by inclusion in one list or the other. The two lists are mutually exclusive; it is not possible for the same property to appear in both lists at the same time.

[76] A unit of rateable property is known as a hereditament (see s 64(1)). For the purposes of non-domestic rating the financial year runs from 1 April (see s 145(3)). Both local and central lists were to be compiled on 1 April 1990 and on 1 April in every fifth year thereafter (see s 41(1)(2) (local lists) and s 52(1)(2) (central lists)). Lists remain in force for a period of five years (see s 41(3) (local lists) and s 52(3) (central lists)). The present case is concerned with the local and central rating lists compiled for the period of five years beginning on 1 April 1995.

Local list rating

[77] Local non-domestic rating lists are maintained by local rating authorities. They continue to be responsible for the valuation of hereditaments in their areas and for the assessment and collection of the rates. Hereditaments are individually assessed by local valuation officers, and the rateable value of a hereditament is ordinarily determined on a conventional basis. This is not, however, so in all cases. In the case of the electricity generating industry and some (but by no means all) other utilities the conventional basis of valuation has been disapplied and special schemes of valuation by statutory formula have been substituted.

[78] Sections 42–44 are the key provisions. Section 42 governs the contents of local lists. A local rating list must show every relevant non-domestic hereditament which is situated in the authority's area and which is not a hereditament which must be shown for the day in a central non-domestic rating list. It is this last requirement which prevents a hereditament from being shown for the same day in both a local and a central list. The local list must also show the rateable value of the hereditament for each day on which it is shown in the list.

[79] Sections 43–44 are concerned with liability to local list rates. This is based on rateable occupation for a chargeable day. A ratepayer is subject to local non-domestic rates in respect of a chargeable financial year if on any day in the year (a) he is in occupation of all or part of the hereditament and (b) the hereditament is shown for the day in a local list (see s 43(1)). The chargeable amount for a chargeable day is ascertained by multiplying the rateable value shown for the day by the non-domestic multiplier for the financial year and dividing the product by the number of days in the financial year (see ss 43(2)–(4) and 44).

Central list rating

[80] Central list rating was designed to accommodate those public utilities which were to continue to be dealt with on a global basis and rated undertaking by undertaking rather than locally and hereditament by hereditament, though not necessarily by use of a formula. As one might expect, therefore, the statutory provisions relating to central lists are closely modelled on those for local lists with only such variations as are necessary to reflect the aggregate and undifferentiated nature of the hereditaments shown in the list.

[81] Central non-domestic rating lists are maintained by the central valuation officer. Sections 53–55 are the key provisions. Section 53(1) is the enabling section. It explains the statutory purpose and gives the Secretary of State power to designate the undertakings and hereditaments to be shown in a central list. It provides:

> 'With a view to securing the central rating en bloc of certain hereditaments, the Secretary of State may by regulations designate a person and prescribe in relation to him one or more descriptions of relevant non-domestic hereditament.'

[82] Section 53 governs the contents of central lists. It provides that, where the regulations so require (as they do), a central non-domestic rating list must show, for each day in each chargeable year for which it is in force, the name of the designated person and, against it, each hereditament (wherever situated) which on the day concerned (a) is occupied or (if unoccupied) owned by him and (b) falls within any description prescribed in relation to him. It must also show for each such day against the name of the designated person the rateable value (as a whole) of the hereditaments so shown, i e the hereditaments occupied, or if not occupied, owned by the designated person on that day.

[83] This is amplified by s 67(9) which provides that a hereditament is to be treated as shown in a central list for a day if on that day it falls within a class of hereditament shown for that day in the list; and by s 67(9A) a class may be expressed by reference to whether hereditaments are occupied or owned by a designated person and fall within any description prescribed in relation to him.

[84] These provisions make it unnecessary for every hereditament occupied or owned by a designated person to be identified individually and entered separately in the central list. In PowerGen's case the central list contained against its name the description: 'The electricity supply hereditaments as described in Part 2 of the Schedule to the Central Rating Lists Regulations 1994.' The description referred to (see the Schedule to the Central Rating List Regulations 1994, SI 1994/3121, Pt 2, para I) is:

> 'Hereditaments (other than excepted hereditaments) wholly or mainly used for the purposes of the generation of electrical power, or for ancillary purposes.'

[85] This is a generic description of a fluctuating body of hereditaments. To come within the description on any particular day a hereditament must on that day (i) be occupied or (if unoccupied) owned by the designated person and (ii) be wholly or mainly used for the generation of electrical power or for ancillary purposes. On the disposal of the two power stations to Edison they failed to meet the first condition and automatically ceased to come within the description. It followed that they ceased to be treated as shown in the central list and qualified for inclusion in local lists instead.

[86] Section 54 deals with liability to central list rates. A ratepayer is subject to central non-domestic rates in respect of a chargeable financial year if for any day in the year his name is shown in a central non-domestic rating list in force for the year. There is naturally no requirement that he should be in occupation of the hereditaments shown in the list, because the hereditaments are already defined by reference to his occupation or ownership. The chargeable amount for a chargeable day is ascertained in a similar manner to that required by ss 44–45 in relation to hereditaments in the local lists (see s 54(4)).

FORMULA RATING: THE CONSULTATION PAPER

[87] As I have already mentioned, most statutory undertakers were subject to formula rating in 1988. The 1987 consultation paper Paying for Local Government: Non-domestic Rates (the consultation paper) which preceded the 1988 Act stated that the existing formulae would require extensive recasting, and that the government would be reviewing them, in consultation with the industries concerned, with the intention of bringing them up to date at the same time as the general non-domestic revaluation in 1990. The review could not be completed in time to be included in the main legislation, and accordingly the government had it in mind to replace the existing statutory provisions relating to formula rating with a simple enabling power. The consultation paper stated that there was no intention of substantially extending the scope of formula rating, and that indeed in some cases it might be possible to revert to conventional methods of valuation. In the meantime it was proposed that the rateable value of hereditaments subject to formula rating should be determined as a specified sum or be calculated in a specified manner and for the value to be adjusted for changes in occupation.

[88] Eventually, it seems, it was hoped that formula rating could be phased out altogether; though in the event this was not achieved for the electricity generating industry until the next quinquennial revaluation in 2000. This objective could be the more easily achieved the more closely assessments produced by formula rating approximated to those which would be produced by conventional methods of valuation. Accordingly the consultation paper stated (para 7.5) that the object would be—

> 'to replicate, in very broad terms, the rate burden a hereditament or industry might have borne had it been capable of being conventionally rated' (my emphasis).

(The reference to 'hereditament' was a reference to local rating and the reference to 'industry' to central rating.) It was envisaged that different provision would be made for determining rateable values for different industries, and that the Secretary of State would consult representatives of each industry before varying the existing formula or applying formula rating for the first time or ceasing to apply it.

VALUATION UNDER THE 1988 ACT

[89] As foreshadowed by the consultation paper, the 1988 Act takes the form of an enabling Act with power for the Secretary of State to make provision by statutory instrument for particular classes of hereditaments to be rated by formula. Whether because it was recognised that formula rating was a departure from the norm and was not appropriate for all public utilities, or because it was intended to phase it out eventually, the 1988 Act makes general provision for hereditaments, whether in local or central lists, to be valued by conventional methods, while giving the Secretary of State power to disapply those methods in particular cases and substitute formula rating in such form as he may prescribe.

[90] Section 56(1) of the 1988 Act gives effect to Sch 6, which contains detailed rules for determining the rateable value of non-domestic hereditaments, whether shown in local or in central lists. Paragraph 2(1) of Sch 6 sets out the conventional method of valuation. So far as material it provides:

> 'The rateable value of a non-domestic hereditament shall be taken to be an amount equal to the rent at which it is estimated the hereditament might reasonably be expected to let from year to year if the tenant undertook to pay all usual tenant's rates and taxes and to bear the cost of the repairs and insurance and the other expenses (if any) necessary to maintain the hereditament in a state to command that rent.'

[91] Paragraph 3 of Sch 6, however, gives the Secretary of State power to disapply this paragraph and substitute valuation by such method as he may prescribe. Subparagraph (1) of para 3 applies to local lists and sub-para (2) to central lists. The paragraph provides:

> '(1) The Secretary of State may by order provide that in the case of a non-domestic hereditament of such class as may be prescribed—(a) paragraphs 2 to 2B above shall not apply, and (b) its rateable value shall be such as is determined in accordance with prescribed rules.
>
> (2) The Secretary of State may by order provide that in the case of non-domestic hereditaments to be shown in a central non-domestic rating list by virtue of regulations under section 53(2) above—(a) paragraphs 2 to 2B above shall not apply, and (b) their rateable value shall be such as is specified in the order or determined in accordance with prescribed rules.'

In each case the order required an affirmative resolution of each House of Parliament (see s 143(8)).

[92] By the 1994 order the Secretary of State exercised these powers in relation to hereditaments used or available for use for the purpose of generating electricity. The order was made on 20 December 1994 following extensive consultations with the industry and came into force on the following day. Part II of the 1994 order applies to hereditaments shown on local lists and Pt III to hereditaments treated as shown on central lists. In relation to a hereditament shown on a local list art 6(1) disapplies paras 2–2B of Sch 6 and stipulates that its rateable value in any year beginning on or after 1 April 1995 shall be £11,620 per megawatt of its DNC (or, where the primary source of energy is wind or tidal power, half that figure). This formed the basis on which the rateable value of each of the two power stations acquired by Edison was determined when it was entered in the relevant local list with effect from 19 July 1999.

[93] In relation to each class of hereditaments shown on a central list art 8(1) of the 1994 order similarly disapplies paras 2–2B of Sch 6. For each designated person the rateable value of its centrally listed hereditaments as a whole is specified as a single figure. In the case of PowerGen the figure for its hereditaments in England as at 1 April 1995 is stated to be £178·8823m (Pt I, para A of the Schedule to the 1994 order).

[94] The basis of this figure is not explained in the 1994 order but is agreed by the parties to have been as follows. It represented the net book value of PowerGen's rateable assets as shown in its current cost accounts. Allowance was made for particular disabilities of the hereditaments to leave the effective capital value of the assets, and this was then converted into an annual rateable value by the application of a 6% decapitalisation rate. This corresponds to the conventional 'contractor's basis' of valuation. The resulting figure embraced all non-excepted property in England within the specified description. Items such as offices and other property not on operational land were excepted from the specified description. But the figure included both productive and non-productive property, the latter being property which did not contribute directly to PowerGen's total DNC. An example of non-productive property canvassed in argument would be a car park for the use of staff employed at a power station; but many other examples could be given.

[95] The figure was calculated in December 1994 and was adjusted to take account of changes between then and 1 April 1995 when it took effect, but nothing turns on this in the present appeal.

[96] For subsequent years the figure was adjusted annually by means of a specified 'recalculation factor' to reflect changes in the total DNC of generating plant within PowerGen's prescribed class of hereditaments, taken at 31 March in the immediately preceding year, compared with 31 March 1995. In PowerGen's case art 9(1) of the 1994 order specifies the figure of £11,620 as the recalculation factor.

[97] The basis of this figure is also not explained in the 1994 order, but the evidence shows that it was calculated by adding together the rateable values of the hereditaments occupied by PowerGen and National Power (the other former publicly owned non-nuclear electricity generator in the central list) and dividing the total by their combined DNC in megawatts at the same date. The resulting figure was taken to represent the average value to a designated person of the occupation of its power stations in terms of pounds per megawatt of generating capacity. It was applied to the DNC of each of the independent generators to arrive at the rateable value of their hereditaments.

[98] The basic scheme of Pt III of the 1994 order is common to all centrally listed hereditaments in relation to which the Secretary of State exercised his powers under para 3(2) of Sch 6 to the 1988 Act. These included gas and water undertakings and the railways. In each case the ordinary basis of determining rateable values is expressly disapplied and instead a single global or cumulo figure is prescribed as the rateable value of the relevant class of hereditaments for the year beginning on 1 April 1995. For each subsequent year the figure is subject to annual adjustment by means of a specified recalculation factor to reflect changes in the proxy selected for the utility in question. As envisaged in the consultation paper, some utilities were centrally rated but were conventionally valued under paras 2–2B of Sch 6. These included telecommunications, canals and long-distance pipelines.

THE CONSEQUENCES OF THE SALE TO EDISON

[99] On the acquisition of the two power stations by Edison they ceased to come within the generic description of the hereditaments treated as shown against PowerGen's name in the central list and qualified instead for inclusion in the relevant local lists. PowerGen ceased to be subject to central rates in respect of them and Edison became liable to local rates in its place. But since PowerGen's liability was determined by its total DNC at the beginning of each rating year, the reduction in its DNC was not reflected in the amount of its liability to central rates until the beginning of the following year.

[100] Although the power stations transferred from central to local listing, they did not cease to be subject to formula rating. Their rateable value was now determined under Pt II of the 1994 order instead of Pt III, but in all essential respects it was determined by the same formula as before. It continued to be based on DNC, so that the acquisition or disposal by Edison of non-productive property would not affect its rateable value while the current lists remained in force. Moreover the conversion (or 'recalculation') factor of £11,620 per megawatt was unaffected. Given the way this figure was calculated the rateable value of the two power stations continued to reflect an element of value derived from the rateable value of non-productive property formerly occupied by PowerGen (or National Power for that matter) and not included in the sale to Edison. Each of these features represents a marked departure from conventional rating principles, but neither is challenged by Edison.

[101] The transfer of the power stations from central to local listing had two consequences. First, each of them was now rated individually as a separate hereditament and not as an unidentified and undifferentiated part of a larger whole. Secondly, changes in its DNC would now be taken into account with immediate effect and not merely with effect from the beginning of the following rating year. The two features are interrelated; for annual adjustment of the total is (and has always been) a feature of global or cumulo rating. It is not a necessary concomitant of formula rating, as is evidenced by the treatment of the power stations after they transferred to local lists.

IS THE 1994 ORDER AUTHORISED BY THE 1988 ACT?

[102] It is convenient to deal with this question in two stages, first by disregarding any element of double taxation and considering the question as a pure matter of construction of the language of the 1988 Act. The question is whether, on its true construction, para 3(2) of Sch 6 to the 1988 Act authorises so radical a departure from the conventional principles of rating as that which Pt III of the 1994 order established.

[103] I would unhesitatingly answer this question in the affirmative. Indeed, but for the opinion of my noble and learned friend Lord Bingham of Cornhill, which I have had the advantage of reading in draft, I would have regarded the contrary as unarguable. Paragraph 3(2) of Sch 6 to the 1988 Act gives the Secretary of State express power to disapply the conventional method of valuation and substitute a different, and it follows an unconventional, one. It expressly authorises him to specify the rateable value of PowerGen's centrally rated hereditaments as a single global sum, and that is what he did for the 1995–96 rating year. There are no restrictions on the methods which he may employ in arriving at the specified figure, save no doubt that they must not be unreasonable or irrational; and Edison does not challenge them. The 1988 Act also authorises the Secretary of State to prescribe rules for determining the rateable value of such hereditaments, and that is what he did for each of the following years. There are no restrictions on the nature of the rules which he may prescribe, and save in one respect Edison does not challenge them either. It confines its challenge to the frequency with which the global figure is to be adjusted to reflect changes in PowerGen's total DNC. a

[104] This makes it necessary to examine the reason why the Secretary of State chose to prescribe rules which require the global figure shown in the central lists to be adjusted annually while leaving changes to the rateable value of hereditaments shown on local lists to be made on a daily basis if necessary. In approaching this question it should be borne in mind that annual adjustment was b a feature of the cumulo system under which public utilities had been rated ever since 1948 and continued to be rated under provisions contained in the General Rating Act 1967. There had never been a mechanism for altering the global or cumulo rateable value of their hereditaments during the course of a rating year. This is some indication, to say the least, that it had a rational basis and was adopted with the approval of Parliament. c

[105] In my opinion its rationale is obvious. When an operational unit such as a power station is rated as an individual hereditament and by reference to a proxy such as its generating capacity, effect must be given to changes in its capacity as soon as they occur if its rateable value is not to become seriously distorted. But when a large number of such hereditaments are taken together d and rated as a single whole, changes in the capacity of individual units (in both directions) are likely to be both far more frequent and much less significant. There is not the same need to take individual account of every such change as soon as it occurs; and changes in total capacity can reasonably be given effect less frequently.

[106] In the case of some utilities more frequent adjustments would be quite e impractical. British Gas plc, for example, owned or occupied many thousands of miles of gas supply pipeline which were embraced in the specified global valuation figure at the date of the relevant statutory instrument. There will have been a great many variations in the extent of its operational holdings during the course of a rating year. The specification of a global figure avoids the need for f every such variation to be individually assessed for its significance as and when it occurs, a process which would be required under conventional rating methods. But it is inherent in a system of en bloc or cumulo rating that the amount of a ratepayer's liability will not necessarily have to change from day to day in order to reflect every change in the individual hereditaments which it occupies.

[107] While abandonment of the system of annual adjustment which had g previously obtained would not have been completely impractical in the case of PowerGen, it would have meant a large number of adjustments (in each direction) being made each year and would have been productive of much administrative inconvenience without any significant countervailing advantage in accuracy. The 1994 order followed extensive consultations with the industry h in which the principle of annual recalculation of rateable values was specifically drawn to its attention and accepted by an industry working party. Moreover it was manifest on the face of the 1994 order when it was laid before Parliament and affirmed by resolution of each House.

[108] These considerations would not, of course, prevail if the terms of the j 1988 Act did not permit annual adjustment. Edison places much reliance on the fact that s 54(4) of the 1988 Act requires the chargeable amount of hereditaments treated as shown in a central list to be ascertained for each chargeable day. This is necessary in the case of local list rating, which is based on rateable occupation for the day. But it serves no useful purpose under the form of central rating which the Secretary of State prescribed by Pt III of the 1994 order. This, Edison says, shows that in so far as it does not make provision for daily revision the 1994 order is ultra vires.

[109] But this consequence simply does not follow. The presence of s 54(4) is sufficiently explained by the fact that, as foreshadowed in the consultation paper, the Secretary of State is authorised to make different schemes for different industries and is not required to disapply conventional rating for every industry subject to central list rating. Provision needed to be made for the rateable value of property entered on a central list to be determined in a conventional way and by reference to rateable occupation for the day. On any view s 54(4) cannot be said to be otiose. Edison might have had a point if the 1994 order made it impossible to do the calculation; but it merely made it unnecessary. The calculation can still be done; it merely produces the same result despite changes in the composition of the hereditaments which are treated as shown in the list.

[110] Edison also relies on s 67(9A) of the 1988 Act, which it says indicates that a designated person is not to remain liable for rates assessed by reference to the value of hereditaments which he does not own or occupy. But s 67(9) and (9A) are concerned with the contents of central lists. They indicate that the designated person is not to remain liable for rates in respect of hereditaments which he does not own or occupy. They say nothing about the method by which the global rateable value of the hereditaments which he does occupy is to be determined.

[111] In my opinion the language of the enabling provision of the 1988 Act is sufficiently wide to entitle the Secretary of State to prescribe any method of valuation however far it departs from conventional principles, provided only that it is not unreasonable or irrational. There is certainly nothing in the 1988 Act to indicate that he must depart from long-established practice and require the global or cumulo figure in a central list to be adjusted more frequently than once a year.

[112] I must now turn to the second stage of the inquiry and consider whether I should modify my opinion because of the element of double taxation to which Pt III of the 1994 order is said to give rise.

IS THERE AN ELEMENT OF DOUBLE TAXATION?

[113] Carnwath J held ([2001] RA 1) that there clearly was an element of double assessment. From 19 July 1999 and for the remainder of the rating year the Secretary of State received payments of rates based on the DNC of the two power stations from both PowerGen and Edison. Simon Brown LJ observed ([2001] EWCA Civ 1096 at [45], [2001] RA 229 at [45]) that the situation was not that PowerGen was continuing to pay central rates on power stations no longer in its occupation. Once they were disposed of they ceased to be treated as shown in the central list. It was rather that PowerGen was not entitled to a revaluation of its remaining hereditaments until the beginning of the following year. May LJ, who agreed with him, took the view (at [67]) that this did not amount to 'straightforward double taxation'. Dyson LJ considered that it amounted to double assessment in substance if not in form. In an impressive dissenting judgment he said (at [71]):

> 'As a matter of form, it may be said that after the date of transfer Powergen was no longer liable to pay rates in respect of the power stations, because they had ceased to be treated as shown on the central list. This is because s 53(3) provides that the central list must show the rateable value of the hereditaments that are shown on the list. But in reality, the position was otherwise. After the transfer, the rateable value of the remaining hereditaments remained unchanged; it continued to reflect the previous value ascribed to the two power stations, and Powergen continued to be liable (on a daily basis) for rates as before the transfer. The method of calculation and the amount payable were unaffected by the transfer. In reality, therefore, PowerGen continued to be liable to pay rates in respect of the two power stations notwithstanding the transfer in respect of a period during which Edison was also liable to pay rates calculated in more or less the same way in respect of the same two power stations.'

[114] My Lords, I have no doubt, and the Secretary of State concedes, that Dyson LJ's analysis of the effect of the legislation is correct, and that the question has to be addressed as a matter of substance and not as a matter of form. I also have no doubt that it is generally regarded as oppressive for the same person to be taxed twice over in respect of the same matter (see IRC v Clifforia Investments Ltd [1963] 1 All ER 159, [1963] 1 WLR 396; IRC v FS Securities Ltd [1964] 2 All ER 691 at 695, [1965] AC 631 at 644). The present, however, is not such a case.

[115] There is not, in my opinion, necessarily the same objection to double recovery where two different persons are taxed in respect of the same matter. In Furniss (Inspector of Taxes) v Dawson [1984] 1 All ER 530 at 542, [1984] AC 474 at 525 Lord Brightman observed that there was an element of double taxation whenever a shareholder sells at a profit his shares in a company that has itself realised a capital asset at a profit, but that he did not see any undesirable element of double taxation in such cases.

[116] This shows that the presumption against double taxation is not a strong presumption which gives effect to a high constitutional norm, like the presumptions against the abrogation of the privilege against self-incrimination or legal professional privilege. It is rather a species of a wider genus, viz the presumption that Parliament intends to act reasonably (see IRC v Hinchy [1960] 1 All ER 505 at 512, [1960] AC 748 at 767 per Lord Reid). The courts will presume that Parliament did not intend a statute to have consequences which are objectionable or undesirable; or absurd; or unworkable or impracticable; or merely inconvenient; or anomalous or illogical; or futile or pointless.

[117] But the strength of these presumptions depends on the degree to which a particular construction produces an unreasonable result. The more unreasonable a result, the less likely it is that Parliament intended it (see (in a contractual context) L Schuler AG v Wickman Machine Tool Sales Ltd [1973] 2 All ER 39 at 45, [1974] AC 235 at 251 per Lord Reid). I do not, therefore, find it profitable to discuss whether the effect of the 1994 order amounts to 'double taxation' or 'double assessment' (whether straightforward or not) or the rather less objectionable 'double recovery'. I would prefer to go straight to the real question: whether the scheme established by the 1994 order is so oppressive, objectionable or unfair that it could only be authorised by Parliament by express words or necessary implication.

[118] My Lords, as I said at the outset, Edison is not the victim of double taxation. It has been chargeable to one set of rates and one set only, namely local rates; and these were levied on Edison in an appropriate amount and for an appropriate period. It has never been subject to central rates, and was not charged to the central rates which are in issue in the present case. It undertook a contractual obligation to pay an apportioned part of PowerGen's liability to central rates for the 1999–2000 rating year, but this was a voluntary assumption of liability on its part as part of a larger commercial transaction. There is no reason to suppose that it paid more in total than it was willing to pay, or than PowerGen was content to receive, as the price of the power stations.

[119] If anyone was treated unfairly it was PowerGen. It was liable to central rates in respect of an element of value, namely the DNC of the two power stations, which it no longer possessed. Yet it does not complain. It has explained its consent to the 1994 order by saying that it accepted the Secretary of State's view that in the case of the central list the administrative burden in making changes to rateable values during the course of the rating year outweighed any potential disadvantage to the ratepayer in not doing so. For the ratepayer there were advantages as well as disadvantages in annual adjustment. Although plant taken out of commission or disposed of during the year was not reflected in a change in rateable value until the beginning of the following year, neither was the commissioning of new plant. 'Swings and roundabouts' were inherent in the scheme; and it seems that there were more 'swings' than 'roundabouts', since PowerGen was able to work the system to its own advantage, bringing forward the commissioning of new plant to the beginning of the rating year and delaying the decommissioning of existing plant until nearer the end.

[120] Dyson LJ found ([2001] RA 229 at [79]) any analogy between disposal and decommissioning of plant to be unconvincing. On a disposal, he observed, a power station ceases to be occupied by one ratepayer and is transferred into the occupation of another. In the case of decommissioning, the position is different. Ownership remains vested in the first ratepayer, and there is no double assessment to rates.

[121] This is true, of course; but I think that it makes the case for the Secretary of State, not against him. It shows that any potential unfairness to the ratepayer has nothing to do with double assessment. It arises on decommissioning, when the ratepayer ceases to enjoy the element of value by reference to which his liability is calculated. It does not arise on subsequent disposal when for the first time another ratepayer becomes liable to rates in respect of the same element of value. In itself this has no effect on the first ratepayer's liability.

[122] Both parties have placed reliance on the decision of the Court of Appeal in Milford Haven Conservancy Board v IRC [1976] 3 All ER 263, [1976] 1 WLR 817. The case bears a strong resemblance to the present. It concerned the validity of a statutory instrument which prescribed a system of formula rating of the hereditaments of a statutory dock or harbour board. The terms of the enabling Act, which were very wide, included power to repeal or amend enactments relating to valuation. The relevant statutory instrument based the valuation on the board's receipts; but these were not limited to receipts of the hereditaments in question and this, the board said, was not a method of valuing the hereditaments at all. Moreover, the receipts in question included the rents from a cottage let to a tenant who was himself in rateable occupation. This was a straightforward case of double recovery.

[123] The board claimed that the statutory instrument was ultra vires. It said that it was contrary to fundamental principles of rating and, under the guise of prescribing a method of valuation, imposed a form of tax which Parliament cannot have intended.

[124] Bridge J dismissed the board's claim, and his judgment was unanimously upheld by the Court of Appeal. The court held that the language of the enabling Act was sufficiently wide to entitle the Secretary of State to prescribe any method of valuation, however far it departed from established principles, and notwithstanding that it appeared to countenance double taxation. Scarman LJ was troubled by the question of double taxation. He said that it appeared wrong that rates should be paid twice, once by the tenant and once by the landlord. But this did not avail the board because the statutory instrument was concerned only with the method of valuation and not with the identity of the hereditament.

[125] My Lords, that is equally true in the present case. But whether that decision was right or wrong, I am with respect not impressed by the reasoning of the Court of Appeal. If the question of double taxation is to be approached as a matter of substance and not form, as I consider that it is, then the distinction is without a difference. What matters is the result, not the means by which it is achieved. I agree with Dyson LJ in the present case that there was an element of double recovery in that the Secretary of State received payments by reference to the same element of value during the same period from both PowerGen and Edison. But for the reasons I have given, I do not consider that this was unfair or unreasonable. It is not just a question of swings and roundabouts, though this goes a long way to alleviate any unfairness. It is rather that the element of double recovery arose as a result of the provision for annual adjustment, which was an appropriate and long-established feature common to the various global or cumulo systems under which public utilities, including the electricity generating industry, were rated for many years before 1988. It cannot possibly be said that it was beyond the contemplation of Parliament that it would be retained for central non-domestic rating where the Secretary of State, after consultation with the relevant industry, might think it appropriate.

THE EUROPEAN CONVENTION ON HUMAN RIGHTS

[126] Both Carnwath J and the Court of Appeal considered that the principles of the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms 1950 (as set out in Sch 1 to the Human Rights Act 1998) do not add anything of value to the basis of Edison's challenge to the validity of the 1994 order. Subject to one point in its printed case which it has subsequently abandoned, Edison accepts that they were correct on this point.

CONCLUSION

[127] Accordingly, in agreement with my noble and learned friends Lord Hoffmann and Lord Scott of Foscote, I would dismiss the appeal.

LORD SCOTT OF FOSCOTE.

[128] My Lords, I have had the advantage of reading in advance the opinions prepared by my noble and learned friends Lord Hoffmann and Lord Millett and gratefully adopt their exposition of the circumstances and statutory context in which the issue in this case has arisen.

[129] Statutory provisions made pursuant to the Local Government Finance Act 1988 established a regime for the assessment, collection and payment of rates on most, but not all, non-domestic hereditaments that is relatively easy to comprehend. Liability was based on occupation of the hereditament in question. The occupier was liable to pay the rate for each day that he was in occupation. Each local authority was required to maintain a list of the non-domestic hereditaments in its area showing the rateable value of each hereditament. The valuations were to be carried out by local valuation officers. The lists were called 'local non-domestic rating' lists.

[130] But the 1988 Act also contained provisions under which a different rating regime could be applied to some non-domestic hereditaments. Section 52 of the 1988 Act created a 'central' non-domestic rating list. The Secretary of State was given power to designate the persons to be placed on the central list and the non-domestic hereditaments in respect of which they were to be centrally rated (see s 53(1) of the 1988 Act and the Central Ratings Lists Regulations 1994, SI 1994/3121 (the Central Rating Regulations)). The purpose of this was (see s 53(1)) 'to [secure] the central rating en bloc of certain hereditaments' (my emphasis). The designation of the hereditaments to which central rating would apply did not have to specify them individually but could specify them as a class (see s 67(9)).

[131] The Secretary of State placed PowerGen on the central list and designated all its hereditaments 'wholly or mainly used for the purpose of the generation of electrical power, or for ancillary purposes' (see the Schedule to the Central Rating Regulations, Pt 2, para 1, as the non-domestic hereditaments in respect of which PowerGen would be centrally rated. Hereditaments of PowerGen falling within this class could not be and were not, therefore, included in any local non-domestic rating list.

[132] Paragraph 3 of Sch 6 to the 1988 Act gave express power to the Secretary of State by order to disapply the normal method of establishing the rateable value of a non-domestic hereditament (see para 2(1) of Sch 6) and instead to provide that, in the case of non-domestic hereditaments on local lists, '[their] rateable value shall be such as is determined in accordance with prescribed rules' (see sub-para 1(b)) and, in the case of non-domestic hereditaments on a central list, 'their rateable value shall be such as is specified in the order or determined in accordance with prescribed rules' (see sub-para 2(b)).

[133] By the Electricity Supply Industry (Rateable Values) Order 1994, SI 1994/3282 the Secretary of State made 'prescribed rules' in relation to hereditaments used for the purpose of generating electricity. Part II of the 1994 order applied to hereditaments on local lists. The rateable value of each of these hereditaments was to be assessed by reference to its declared net capacity (DNC) in respect of electricity generation. Part III applied to hereditaments on the central list. Here, a rateable value was not attributed to each hereditament. Instead the designated hereditaments of each designated person, eg PowerGen, were to be given an en bloc rateable value based upon their en bloc DNC. My noble and learned friend Lord Millett has described at [94], above how the en bloc rateable value was calculated. It suffices for present purposes to say that the original en bloc valuation was varied on 1 April of each rating year by a complex formula that reflected any changes in PowerGen's DNC during the past year. PowerGen's rating liability for the next rating year was then calculated accordingly. If, for example, a new power station were acquired by PowerGen and began generating electricity, its capacity would be built into PowerGen's DNC at the beginning of the next rating year and would affect the amount of PowerGen's rating liability for that year. But for the remainder of the rating year in which the new power station had been acquired, PowerGen's rating liability would not be affected. Conversely, if PowerGen were to sell or decommission a power station the consequence of this would have no impact on PowerGen's rating liability for the remainder of the rating year in question. But the loss of capacity would be taken into the DNC calculation at the end of the rating year and thus affect the rating liability for the next year. In relation to ancillary premises, such as car parks, garages, facilities for employees etc, which fell within the designated class but did not themselves generate electricity, PowerGen's ownership, occupation, sale or purchase of them during a particular rating year would have no effect whatever on its rating liability for that year or thereafter.

[134] The rating scheme as applied to PowerGen and its central list designated hereditaments was fundamentally different from the ordinary scheme applied to ordinary non-domestic hereditaments, including those of electricity generating companies not on the central list. Under the latter scheme, rating liability was, and is, based on occupation. When occupation ceases, liability ceases. When occupation commences, liability commences. And the amount of the liability was dependent on the rateable value of each individual property of which the ratepayer was in occupation and in respect of which he was liable to pay rates. Under the former scheme, rating liability was not based on occupation of any particular property and the amount of the liability was based on the total rateable value of all the ratepayer's designated hereditaments calculated as at the beginning of the rating year. The payment of rates by PowerGen, calculated accordingly, would discharge its rates liability in respect of all its hereditaments falling within the designated class during the rating year in question, regardless of its occupation of them during that year.

[135] It is the contrast between the two schemes that has produced the complaint by the appellant, Edison, in the present case. Edison completed its purchase from PowerGen of the two power stations on 19 July 1999. It was entered in the local non-domestic rating list as liable for rates in respect of those hereditaments as from 19 July 1999. Edison does not challenge this liability. As from the same date, 19 July 1999, the power stations ceased to fall within the class of designated properties in respect of which PowerGen was liable to be centrally rated. But PowerGen's rating liability for the year 1999–2000 had been fixed as at 1 April 1999. PowerGen's ownership of the two power stations and their contribution to PowerGen's total DNC had, of course, contributed to the amount of that liability. The rating consequences of the contribution continued for the rest of the rating year notwithstanding that during the year PowerGen had divested itself of the two power stations.

[136] The continuing and unreduced rating liability of PowerGen after its sale of the power stations to Edison might be thought an insecure basis for a complaint by Edison. Edison's complaint is, however, attributable to PowerGen's success in obtaining, as a term of the contract of sale between itself and Edison, a provision under which Edison agreed to pay an apportionment of the rates payable by PowerGen in relation to the power stations in the rating year 1999–2000. The amount of PowerGen's rating liability for the year 1999–2000 attributable to the two power stations was a sum in excess of £13·5m. Edison has accepted its contractual liability to pay PowerGen this sum and has duly paid it. Edison protests, however, that in relation to the two power stations the central rating scheme produced by the Secretary of State in purported reliance on his statutory power under the 1988 Act has led to double recovery, from PowerGen on the one hand and from Edison on the other, in respect of the same properties (the power stations) and in respect of the same period (19 July 1999–31 March 2000). Edison contends that the statutory power under which the Secretary of State purported to act ought not to be construed as permitting such a result. There is, it is contended, a presumption that Parliament does not intend double taxation or, in the context of rates, double recovery in respect of the same property or properties. General words in a statute, such as those in para 3 of Sch 6 to the 1988 Act, are not, it is submitted, sufficient to displace this presumption. And if the central rating scheme is ultra vires, as contended, then PowerGen was not liable to pay the £13·5m; Edison was not liable to pay that sum to PowerGen and is entitled to repayment. So the argument goes.

[137] My Lords, as an aid to construction of statutes, presumptions are from time to time invoked. This is particularly so where rights of citizens regarded as of fundamental importance appear to be encroached upon by a particular application of a statute. In such a case it is presumed that Parliament, if it intended the statute to encroach upon the important fundamental right, would have expressly said so. If Parliament has not expressly said so, and if the statute is capable of being given sensible effect without encroaching upon the fundamental right, a construction of the statutory language may be adopted that would leave unimpeded the right in question. As Lord Hoffmann put it in R v Secretary of State for the Home Dept, ex p Simms [1999] 3 All ER 400 at 412, [2000] 2 AC 115 at 131:

> 'Fundamental rights cannot be overridden by general or ambiguous words. This is because there is too great a risk that the full implications of their unqualified meaning may have passed unnoticed in the democratic process. In the absence of express language or necessary implication to the contrary, the courts therefore presume that even the most general words were intended to be subject to the basic rights of the individual.'

[138] A very good recent example of this is the decision of the House in R (on the application of Morgan Grenfell & Co Ltd) v Special Comr of Income Tax [2002] UKHL 21, [2002] 3 All ER 1, [2002] 2 WLR 1299. The case concerned legal professional privilege. It raised the question whether the statutory power of the Revenue to require production of documents extended to documents covered by legal professional privilege. The statutory provision relied on by the Revenue was in general terms and apt to cover all and any relevant documents. But the right of citizens, or companies, to seek and receive legal advice in the knowledge that the communications between them and their lawyers cannot be the subject of compulsory disclosure is of such fundamental importance in a society governed by the rule of law as to require express statutory language or an unavoidable implication if it is to be overruled by statute. General words in a statute will not suffice. So the House held.

[139] There are no doubt other rights whose fundamental importance may justify similar reverence but I need not try and identify them for it is surely clear that the so-called presumption against double taxation or double recovery does not derive from a fundamental right of that character. There is no fundamental right not to be taxed, or not to be taxed in a particular way or at a particular time. The so-called presumption against double taxation is in reality no more, and no less, than the formulation in a taxation context of the broader interpretative presumption that Parliament does not intend that legislation should bring about results that are unreasonable or unfair or arbitrary.

[140] As Lord Reid said in IRC v Hinchy [1960] 1 All ER 505 at 512, [1960] AC 748 at 768:

'One is entitled and, indeed, bound to assume that Parliament intends to act reasonably and, therefore, to prefer a reasonable interpretation of a statutory provision if there is any choice.'

In IRC v Clifforia Investments Ltd [1963] 1 All ER 159 at 163, [1963] 1 WLR 396 at 402, where the Inland Revenue were proposing an interpretation of a taxing Act that would result in double taxation, Ungoed-Thomas J referred to the double taxation result as 'patently unjust'.

[141] In Vestey v IRC (Nos 1 and 2) [1979] 3 All ER 976 at 986, [1980] AC 1148 at 1174 Lord Wilberforce declined to accept a construction of a taxing Act that led to a result that was 'arbitrary, unjust, and in [his] opinion unconstitutional' and explained that 'it is a well accepted principle that if one interpretation of an Act of Parliament produces such a result, but another avoids it, the latter is to be preferred'. It was the unfairness of a tax regime that subjected a number of discretionary beneficiaries to the burden of paying tax on income that they might never receive that prompted those remarks. The statutory provision in question had been enacted in order to combat a particular type of tax avoidance scheme, but it was not the beneficiaries who were the tax avoiders. They had not participated in setting up the scheme. They were simply named as beneficiaries. The House did not accept that Parliament could have intended to impose on each of the discretionary beneficiaries a liability to pay tax on the income generated by the funds in the scheme. Such a result would have been, in Ungoed-Thomas J's words, 'patently unjust' and the House construed the taxing provision in question so as to avoid that result.

[142] By way of contrast, in R v Dimsey (No 2) [2001] UKHL 46, [2001] 4 All ER 786, [2002] 1 AC 509 it was the tax avoider himself who was liable to tax on income that he might never receive. The actual recipient of the income was the corporate tax avoidance vehicle that the tax avoider had used. For reasons that it is unnecessary to explain the tax avoider contended that his own liability to tax ought to lead to a construction of the relevant taxing statute that relieved the tax avoidance vehicle from liability to tax on the same income. The presumption that Parliament did not intend the same income to be taxed twice was invoked. The House declined to accept these submissions. For the tax avoider to be liable to tax did not seem in the least unjust and there was no practical likelihood of the Revenue, even if they had wanted to do so, being able to recover tax from the tax avoidance vehicle, an overseas company incorporated in a tax haven.

[143] These cases, my Lords, are some distance removed from the rating issue that is before the House on this appeal. But they are relevant to the approach that the House should adopt. It is said that the House should presume that Parliament did not intend the 1988 Act to bring about a result under which more than one ratepayer was liable to pay rates in respect of the same hereditament and for the same period. My Lords, I do not doubt that in general such a presumption would arise. If it were contended, for example, in relation to a house in joint ownership that each owner/occupier of the house was liable to pay the full amount of rates on the house whether or not some other joint owner had already paid, the courts would rightly look for express statutory words mandating such an unjust result before acceding to the contention. It would be the unfairness and the unreasonableness of the result contended for that would justify the assumption that Parliament did not intend that result and would justify the insistence on express words or unavoidable implication. It would not be the compressing of the facts of the case into a box labelled 'no double taxation' or 'no double recovery' that would do so.

[144] The present case is not a case of double taxation at all. It might, arguably, be described as a case of double recovery. It might, therefore, be said to justify an initial assumption that the general statutory words in para 3 of Sch 6 to the 1988 Act were not intended by Parliament to allow the Secretary of State to produce that result. But, as Lord Oliver of Aylmerton observed in Woolwich Equitable Building Society v IRC [1991] 4 All ER 92 at 103–104, [1990] 1 WLR 1400 at 1412–1413, such a presumption is no more than a presumption. He said:

> 'But these are only presumptions. They are clearly rebuttable if sufficiently clear express words are used. But they can also be rebutted, as it seems to me, by circumstances surrounding the enactment of the particular legislation which lead to an inevitable inference that Parliament intended, in using the words that it did, that these presumptions or principles should not apply.'

[145] The circumstances surrounding the enactment of the 1988 Act include the history of the rating of non-domestic hereditaments, and the history of 'formula rating' in particular, set out in the opinions of Lord Hoffmann and Lord Millett. This history rebuts, in my opinion, any inference that Parliament could not have intended the Secretary of State to be able to prescribe an en bloc rating system with yearly changes based on changes in electricity generating capacity for designated electricity generators such as PowerGen. And I can see no room for any compelling inference that would debar the Secretary of State from prescribing a system under which for a period within a particular rating year he might, on the one hand, receive rates under the en bloc system in respect of a hereditament which for the same period was attracting for its occupier a rating liability under the local occupation-based system or, on the other hand, receive no rates under the en bloc system in respect of a hereditament which had become rateable under the central list and which, therefore, for the same period did not attract rates under the local system.

[146] The result produced by the system prescribed by the Secretary of State cannot, in my opinion, be described as unfair, unreasonable or arbitrary. Edison was liable under the 1988 Act for rates in respect of the two power stations for the period 19 July 1999–31 March 2000. Its liability was based on its occupation of the power stations for that period. PowerGen's rating liability for the year 1999–2000 derived in part from its ownership of the two power stations on 1 April 1999 and on their contribution to its DNC on that date.

[147] My Lords, this is not double taxation or double recovery in the sense in which those expressions are normally used. It is true that it was because the two power stations were owned and occupied by PowerGen at the commencement of the 1999–2000 rating year that PowerGen's rating liability for that year was in part attributable to the two stations. And it is true that the Secretary of State may, in consequence of their sale during that year and consequent entry on the local non-domestic rating list, be regarded as having made in a sense double recovery for the period 19 July 1999–31 March 2000. But this analysis does not take into account the distinctly different bases on which the respective liabilities of PowerGen and Edison arose.

[148] In any event, however, I do not regard the wielding of a double taxation or double recovery banner as apt to provide a sound answer to the appellant's contentions on this appeal. The critical issue is whether the statutory power given to the Secretary of State by para 3 of Sch 6 to the 1988 Act, correctly construed, authorised him to prescribe the rating system for PowerGen and other electricity generating companies that has produced the result now challenged by Edison. The language of the paragraph is in my opinion, plainly wide enough to frank the system and unless the result can be shown to be unfair, unreasonable or arbitrary the challenge, based on the presumed intention of Parliament, must fail. a b

[149] Neither PowerGen nor, so far as your Lordships have been told, any other electricity generating company has complained of the unfairness of the central rating scheme. PowerGen, indeed, has intervened in these proceedings and expressly disavowed any such complaint. The burden on Edison has been caused not by the imposition on Edison of an unfair statutory rating liability but by Edison's agreement in a freely negotiated contract of sale to pay PowerGen an additional sum calculated by reference to PowerGen's rating liability derived from the two power stations. The liability of PowerGen that Edison agreed to pay did not arise from PowerGen's occupation of the power stations for the period, 19 July 1999–31 March 2000, during which Edison were in rateable occupation. It derived from a quite different base. I can find nothing unreasonable or unfair or arbitrary in the central list formula rating system prescribed by the Secretary of State. c d

[150] For these reasons and for those expressed by Lord Hoffmann and Lord Millett with which I am in full agreement, I would dismiss this appeal.

Appeal dismissed. e

Dilys Tausz Barrister.

European Roma Rights Centre and others v Immigration Officer at Prague Airport and another (United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees intervening)

[2003] EWCA Civ 666

COURT OF APPEAL, CIVIL DIVISION

SIMON BROWN, MANTELL AND LAWS LJJ

10–12 MARCH, 20 MAY 2003

Immigration – Leave to enter – Refugee – Scheme enabling immigration rules to be operated extra-territorially – Pre-entry clearance system at Prague Airport – Claimants Czech Roma – Whether system contrary to international refugee convention – Whether system discriminating against Czech Roma – Race Relations Act 1976 – Convention Relating to the Status of Refugees 1951, art 33.

The claimants, who were organisations devoted to the protection of the rights of Romani people in Europe and six Czech Roma who had been refused leave to enter, challenged the pre-entry clearance immigration control operated intermittently at Prague Airport from July 2001 pursuant to the Secretary of State for the Home Department's scheme, introduced in 1999, whereby immigration rules were operated extra-territorially rather than simply at UK ports of entry. On an application for judicial review they argued, inter alia, that the Scheme violated the United Kingdom's international obligations under the Geneva Convention relating to the Status of Refugees 1951 and under customary international law; as the United Kingdom was not permitted to take such active steps to prevent those seeking refuge from persecution from leaving their own state. Article 33[a] of the convention provided: 'No contracting state shall expel or return ('refouler') a refugee in any manner whatsoever to the frontiers of territories where his life or freedom would be threatened on account of his race, religion, nationality, membership of a particular social group or political opinion'. The judge dismissed the application. The claimants appealed. In the course of argument the Court of Appeal itself raised the issue of whether the Roma were to be regarded as subject to unlawful racial discrimination contrary to the Race Relations Act 1976 in that they were less favourably treated on racial grounds than a relevant comparator when processing their applications for leave to enter for non-asylum purposes as they were regarded as more likely to lie about their intentions in visiting the United Kingdom and therefore were subjected to longer and more intensive questioning.

Held – (1) On its true construction art 33 of the convention did not give a right of access to any country to claim asylum. Moreover, the convention as a whole was concerned not with permitting access to asylum seekers but rather with the non return of those who had already left their own state. The convention could have, but chose not to concern itself with enabling people to escape from their own country by providing for a right to admission to another country to allow them to do so. The Secretary of State was therefore under no obligation to facilitate the arrival of asylum seekers, indeed he was entitled to take steps to prevent their arrival (see [37], [89], and [93], below); T v Secretary of State for the Home Dept [1996] 2 All ER 865 and R v Secretary of State for the Home Dept, ex p Hoverspeed [1999] Eu LR 595 considered.

a Article 33, so far as material, is set out at [22], below

(2) (Laws LJ dissenting) Clearly it was unacceptable for someone to be treated less favourably because of his race whatever the motives underlying such treatment and whether or not it resulted from the discriminator making stereotyped assumptions. It was true that Roma were questioned more intensively and with a greater degree of scepticism than non-Roma, but that did not mean that such an examination had necessarily to be unlawful. Having regard to authority which held that each application had to be investigated individually, there could be no objection to the more rigorous questioning of some than others. The policy at Prague airport was manifestly not to refuse Roma as Roma; rather it was to refuse prospective asylum seekers, or those who could not satisfy the immigration office to the requisite standard that they would not claim asylum on arrival. It followed that the Roma applicants were not being treated less favourably than others, all that was being applied was a requirement or condition which applied equally to others, namely that they had to satisfy the immigration office they were not travelling to the United Kingdom with a view to claiming asylum. Accordingly the claimants' appeal failed (see [81], [84], [87], and [92], below); Hurley v Mustoe [1981] IRLR 208 and James v Eastleigh BC [1990] 2 All ER 607 considered.

Decision of Burton J [2002] All ER (D) 127 (Oct) affirmed.

Notes

For the powers and duties of the Secretary of State, immigration officers etc and for asylum, refugees, and consideration of asylum claims, see 4(2) Halsbury's Laws (4th edn) (2002 reissue), paras 140 and 238–240 respectively.

Cases referred to in judgments

Applicant A v Minister for Immigration and Ethnic Affairs (1997) 190 CLR 225, Aust HC.
Bain v Bowles [1991] IRLR 356, CA.
Behluli v Secretary of State for the Home Dept [1998] Imm AR 407, CA.
Brind v Secretary of State for the Home Dept [1991] 1 All ER 720, sub nom R v Secretary of State for the Home Dept, ex p Brind [1991] 1 AC 696, [1991] 2 WLR 588, HL.
Cameroon v Nigeria (1998) ICJ Rep 275, ICJ.
Chundawadra v Immigration Appeal Tribunal [1988] Imm AR 161, CA.
Equal Opportunities Commission v Director of Education (22 June 2001, unreported), Hong Kong HC.
Equal Opportunities Commission, Re (No 1) [1998] NI 223.
Glasgow City Council v Zafar [1998] 2 All ER 953, [1997] 1 WLR 1659, HL.
Golder v UK (1975) 1 EHRR 524, [1975] ECHR 4451/70, ECt HR.
Hurley v Mustoe [1981] IRLR 208, EAT.
International Transport Roth GmbH v Secretary of State for the Home Dept [2002] EWCA Civ 158, [2003] QB 728, [2002] 3 WLR 344.
James v Eastleigh BC [1990] 2 All ER 607, [1990] 2 AC 751, [1990] 3 WLR 55, HL; rvsg [1989] 2 All ER 914, [1990] 1 QB 61, [1989] 3 WLR 123, CA.
King v Great Britain-China Centre [1992] ICR 516, CA.
Maclaine Watson & Co Ltd v Dept of Trade and Industry, Maclaine Watson & Co Ltd v International Tin Council [1989] 3 All ER 523, sub nom Rayner (JH) (Mincing Lane) Ltd v Dept of Trade and Industry [1990] 2 AC 418, [1989] 3 WLR 969, HL.

Minister for Immigration and Ethnic Affairs v Teoh [1995] 183 CLR 273, Aust HC.
Minister for Immigration and Multicultural Affairs v Ibrahim (2000) 175 ALR 585, Aust HC.
Nagarajan v London Regional Transport [1999] 4 All ER 65, [2000] 1 AC 501, [1999] 3 WLR 425, HL.
Nguyen Tuan Cuong v Director of Immigration [1997] 1 WLR 68, PC.
R v Commission for Racial Equality, ex p Westminster City Council [1985] ICR 827, CA.
R v Secretary of State for the Home Dept, ex p Ahmed [1998] INLR 570, CA.
R v Secretary of State for the Home Dept, ex p Hoverspeed [1999] Eu LR 595, DC.
R v Secretary of State for the Home Dept, ex p Sivakumaran (UN High Comr for Refugees intervening) [1988] 1 All ER 193, [1988] AC 958, [1988] 2 WLR 92, HL.
R v Uxbridge Magistrates' Court, ex p Adimi, R v Secretary of State for the Home Dept, ex p Sorani, R v Crown Prosecution Service, ex p Sorani, R v Secretary of State for the Home Dept, ex p Kaziu [1999] 4 All ER 520, [2001] QB 667, [2000] 3 WLR 434, DC.
Saad v Secretary of State for the Home Dept, Diriye v Secretary of State for the Home Dept, Osorio v Secretary of State for the Home Dept [2001] EWCA Civ 2008, [2001] All ER (D) 307 (Dec), CA.
Sale, Acting Comr, Immigration and Naturalisation Service v Haitian Centers Council Inc (1993) 509 US 155, US SC.
Skyrail Oceanic Ltd v Coleman [1981] ICR 864, CA.
T v Secretary of State for the Home Dept [1996] 2 All ER 865, [1996] AC 742, [1996] 2 WLR 766, HL.
West Midlands Passenger Executive v Singh [1988] 2 All ER 873, [1988] 1 WLR 730, CA.

Cases referred to in skeleton arguments

Aerial Incident of 10 August 1999 (Pakistan v India) (2000) ICJ Rep 12, ICJ.
Anguelova v Bulgaria [2002] ECHR 38361/97, ECt HR.
Anya v University of Oxford [2001] EWCA Civ 405, [2001] ICR 847.
Bankovic v Belgium (2001) 11 BHRC 435, ECt HR.
Barclays Bank v Kapur (No 2) [1995] IRLR 87, CA.
Border and Transborder Armed Actions (Nicaragua v Honduras) (1988) ICJ Rep 105, ICJ.
Certain Norwegian Loans (France v Norway) (1957) ICJ Rep 9, ICJ.
Chassagnou v France (1999) 7 BHRC 151, ECt HR.
Conka v Belgium (2002) 11 BHRC 55, ECt HR.
East African Asians v UK (1973) 3 EHRR 76, ECt HR.
Fisheries Jurisdiction (Federal Republic of Germany v Iceland) (1973) ICJ Rep 49, ICJ.
Freda v Italy (1980) 21 DR 250, E Com HR.
Gabcikovo-Nagymaros Project (Hungary/Slovakia) (1997) ICJ Rep 7, ICJ.
Harakel v Secretary of State for the Home Dept [2001] EWCA Civ 884, (2001) 98(28) LSG 44.
Illich Sanchez Ramirez v France [1996] 86 DR 155, E Com HR.
Khan v Chief Constable of West Yorkshire Police [2001] UKHL 48, [2001] 4 All ER 834, [2001] 1 WLR 1947.
Ministry of Home Affairs v Fisher [1980] AC 319, PC.
Nuclear Tests Australia v France case (1974) ICJ Rep 253, ICJ.
Ocalan v Turkey [2003] ECHR 46221/99, ECt HR.
Prinz Hans-Adam II of Liechtenstein v Germany [2001] ECHR 42527/98, ECt HR.
R (on the application of Morgan Grenfell & Co Ltd) v Special Comr of Income Tax [2002] UKHL 21, [2002] 3 All ER 1, [2000] 2 AC 115, [2002] 2 WLR 1299.
R (on the application of Sivakumar) v Secretary of State for the Home Dept [2003] UKHL 14, [2003] 2 All ER 1097, [2003] 1 WLR 840.

R v Bernard (1858) 8 State Tr NS 887.
R v North and East Devon Health Authority, ex p Coughlan [2000] 3 All ER 850, [2001] QB 213, [2000] 2 WLR 622, CA.
R v Secretary of State for the Home Dept, ex p Simms [1999] 3 All ER 400, [2000] 2 AC 115, [1999] 3 WLR 328, HL.
Reyes v R [2002] UKPC 11, [2002] 2 AC 235, [2002] 2 WLR 1034.
Rights of Nationals of the United States of America in Morocco (1952) ICJ Rep 176, ICJ.
Sepet v Secretary of State for the Home Dept [2003] UKHL 15, [2003] 3 All ER 304, [2003] 1 WLR 856.
Shamoon v Chief Constable of the Royal Ulster Constabulary [2003] UKHL 11, [2003] 2 All ER 26.
Sidhu v Aerospace Composite Technology Ltd [2001] ICR 167, CA.
Smith v Safeway plc [1996] ICR 868, CA.
Z v UK (2001) 10 BHRC 384, ECt HR.

Appeal

The claimants, the European Roma Rights Centre and six Czech Roma appealed with permission of Burton J from his decision on 8 October 2002 ([2002] EWHC 1989, [2002] All ER (D) 127 (Oct)), dismissing the claimants' application for judicial review to challenge the decision of the Secretary of State for the Home Department to introduce pre-entry clearance immigration control at Prague Airport to operate from 18 July 2001. The United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees intervened in the proceedings. The facts are set out in the judgment of Simon Brown LJ.

Lord Lester of Herne Hill QC and Dinah Rose (instructed by Liberty) for the claimants.
John Howell QC, Michael Fordham and Claire Weir (instructed by the Treasury Solicitor) for the respondents.
Guy Goodwin-Gill (instructed by SJ Berwin) for the intervener.

Cur adv vult

20 May 2003. The following judgments were delivered.

SIMON BROWN LJ.

[1] The increasing flow of asylum seekers to the United Kingdom over recent years is well known. It is well known too that it occasions great public concern. For the most part it is sought to control the problem (called in these proceedings 'asylum overload') by imposing visa regimes upon those states from which most asylum seekers come. Linked to these visa regimes is carriers' liability without which, as the Divisional Court pointed out in R v Secretary of State for the Home Dept, ex p Hoverspeed [1999] Eu LR 595, the requirement for prior entry clearance would have little effect. The object of these controls, of course, so far as asylum seekers are concerned, is to prevent them reaching these shores. 'Their very arrival here otherwise entitles them to apply for asylum and thus defeats the visa regime': see my judgment in Ex p Hoverspeed (at 599).

[2] There are difficulties, however, of a political nature in imposing visa regimes on certain friendly states and so Parliament in 1999 authorised the Home Secretary to introduce in addition a scheme enabling the immigration rules to be operated extra-territorially rather than simply at United Kingdom ports of entry. Intending asylum seekers would in this way be refused leave to enter the United Kingdom by immigration officers operating abroad and so be unable to travel to the United Kingdom to claim asylum here.

[3] Such a scheme was duly introduced and under it, by agreement with the Czech Republic, pre-entry clearance immigration control has been operated at Prague Airport since 18 July 2001. It is aimed principally at stemming the flow of asylum seekers from the Czech Republic, the vast majority of these being of Romani ethnic origin (Roma), and in this it has plainly had some considerable success; whereas in the three weeks before the operation began there were over 200 asylum claims (including dependants) at United Kingdom ports from the Czech Republic, only some 20 such claims were made in the first three weeks following its introduction, over 110 intending travellers from Prague being refused leave to enter the United Kingdom during that period. The pre-clearance procedure at Prague has been operated irregularly but sufficiently frequently and unpredictably that intending asylum seekers continue to be deterred.

[4] These proceedings challenge the Prague operation on two central grounds. First it is said to violate the United Kingdom's international obligations both under the Geneva Convention relating to the Status of Refugees (Geneva, 28 July 1951; TS 39 (1953); Cmnd 9171) (as amended by the 1967 Protocol (New York, 31 January 1967; TS 15 (1969); Cmnd 3906) (the 1951 convention) and under customary international law: the United Kingdom is not permitted to take such active steps to prevent those seeking refuge from persecution from leaving their own state. Secondly, and independently, it is said to contravene s 19B of the Race Relations Act 1976 and to constitute direct racial discrimination against those Czech Roma who are seeking to come to the United Kingdom not as asylum seekers but for some other purpose provided for under the immigration rules. A third and subsidiary ground of challenge is that the claiming of asylum itself is said to be a purpose covered by the rules so that the immigration officers were therefore breaching the rules in refusing leave to enter to Roma coming for that purpose. A fourth ground of challenge was advanced below, namely that the Secretary of State had fettered his discretion in refusing in the case of the individual appellants to consider exercising his extra-statutory discretion to grant them entry clearance to come to the United Kingdom as refugees.

[5] In a reserved judgment given on 8 October 2002 ([2002] EWHC 1989 (Admin), [2002] All ER (D) 127 (Oct), [2003] ACD 53), following a three-day hearing in July 2002, Burton J rejected all four grounds of challenge and so dismissed the application. He gave permission to appeal, however, with regard to the convention ground of challenge and also the alleged breach of the immigration rules. This court (Ward and Laws LJJ) on 24 January 2003 ([2003] EWCA Civ 60, [2003] ACD 47) gave permission to appeal with regard to the race discrimination challenge. Permission to appeal on the fourth ground of challenge was refused; there was nothing in it: the appellants remain able to invite the Secretary of State's exercise of his extra-statutory discretion.

[6] The appellants are respectively the European Roma Rights Centre (ERRC), a non-governmental organisation based in Budapest devoted to the protection of the rights of Romani people in Europe (some nine million in all), and six Czech Roma who were refused leave to enter the United Kingdom by immigration officers at Prague Airport. Five of the six were in fact intending to claim asylum in the United Kingdom, three having candidly stated that intention, the other two having initially sought to conceal it, falsely stating that they were intending only a short visit to the United Kingdom. The sixth (HM) asserts that she was genuinely intending only a short visit to her granddaughter and grandson-in-law although the immigration officer who interviewed her was not satisfied of this. a

[7] Before turning to the individual grounds of challenge I must first outline the main parts of the domestic legislation governing the Prague operation.

[8] Apart from EEA nationals and British citizens, a person may not enter the United Kingdom 'unless given leave to do so in accordance with the provisions of, or made under, [the Immigration Act 1971]' (see s 3(1)(a) of the 1971 Act). The power to give or refuse leave to enter is generally exercised by immigration officers (see s 4(1)), the Secretary of State only being able to do so in prescribed circumstances (see s 3A(7)). Section 3(2) permits the Secretary of State to make rules as to the practice to be followed in the administration of the 1971 Act and immigration officers are required to act in accordance with these rules and such instructions as may be given to them by the Secretary of State which are not inconsistent with such rules (see para 1(3) of Sch 2 to the 1971 Act). b c

[9] The relevant immigration rules made under s 3(2) are contained in the Statement of Changes in Immigration Rules ((1994) HC 395) and set out at length the various grounds upon which entry clearance (advance leave to enter either by way of visa or entry certificate) or leave to enter (on arrival at the United Kingdom port) can be sought and obtained. Stringent conditions apply to each category of applicant and in each case the rules specify the matters of which the applicant must satisfy the immigration officer. Rule 320 provides that entry clearance or leave to enter 'is to be refused' if, amongst other things, 'entry is being sought for a purpose not covered by these Rules'. d e

[10] With regard to asylum the rules provide as follows:

> '327. Under these Rules an asylum applicant is a person who claims that it would be contrary to the United Kingdom's obligations under the United Nations Convention and Protocol relating to the Status of Refugees [the Geneva Convention] for him to be removed from or required to leave the United Kingdom. All such cases are referred to in these Rules as asylum applications. f
>
> 328. All asylum applications will be determined by the Secretary of State in accordance with the United Kingdom's obligations under the [Geneva Convention]. Every asylum application made by a person at a port or airport in the United Kingdom will be referred by the Immigration Officer for determination by the Secretary of State in accordance with these Rules. g
>
> 329. Until an asylum application has been determined by the Secretary of State or the Secretary of State has issued a certificate ... no action will be taken to require the departure of the asylum applicant or his dependants from the United Kingdom. h
>
> 330. If the Secretary of State decides to grant asylum and the person has not yet been given leave to enter, the Immigration Officer will grant limited leave to enter ...
>
> 334. An asylum applicant will be granted asylum in the United Kingdom if the Secretary of State is satisfied that: (i) he is in the United Kingdom or has arrived at a port of entry in the United Kingdom; and (ii) he is a refugee, as defined by the [Geneva Convention]; and (iii) refusing his application would result in his being required to go (whether immediately or after the time limited by an existing leave to enter or remain) in breach of the [Geneva Convention], to a country in which his life or freedom would be threatened j on account of his race, religion, nationality, political opinion or membership of a particular social group ...

336. An application which does not meet the criteria set out in paragraph 334 will be refused.'

[11] As those rules make plain, all claims for asylum, whether made at the point of entry or following the grant of leave to enter on some other basis, have to be referred to the Secretary of State. Many asylum seekers, of course, are subsequently found to have no proper claim but meanwhile will have remained in the United Kingdom, whether in detention or in the community, for months and often for years, and, according to published statistics, a substantial number of those eventually refused are never in fact removed. As Burton J observed below (at [10]), '[t]his is the administrative, financial and indeed social burden borne as a result of failed asylum seekers'. Asylum overload, however, refers not only to asylum seekers who fail in their claims, but also to those who succeed.

[12] Asylum overload has led both to an increase in visa control and also, as stated, to legislation to allow immigration officers to be stationed and to operate the rules abroad. Section 1 of the Immigration and Asylum Act 1999 introduced a new s 3A into the 1971 Act:

'(1) The Secretary of State may by order make further provision with respect to the giving, refusing or varying of leave to enter the United Kingdom.

(2) An order under subsection (1) may, in particular, provide for—(a) leave to be given or refused before the person concerned arrives in the United Kingdom ...'

[13] This was given effect to by art 7 of the Immigration (Leave to Enter and Remain) Order 2000, SI 2000/1161, whereby:

'(1) An immigration officer, whether or not in the United Kingdom, may give or refuse a person leave to enter the United Kingdom at any time before his departure for, or in the course of his journey to, the United Kingdom.

(2) In order to determine whether or not to give leave to enter under this article (and, if so, for what period and subject to what conditions), an immigration officer may seek such information, and the production of such documents or copy documents, as an immigration officer would be entitled to obtain in an examination under ... the Act ...'

[14] By HC 704 a new r 17A was introduced into the rules whereby:

'Where a person is outside the United Kingdom but wishes to travel to the United Kingdom an Immigration Officer may give or refuse him leave to enter ...'

[15] Following an agreement negotiated with the Czech government, this new power to operate the rules extra-territorially was implemented at Prague Airport on 18 July 2001. As Mr James Munro, assistant director of the United Kingdom Immigration Service and the person responsible for operating the pre-clearance scheme, has stated in these proceedings, the Czech Republic had produced an unusually large proportion of failed asylum seekers:

'Asylum applications received in the United Kingdom from nationals of the Czech Republic, excluding dependants, had reached some 515 per annum in the year 1998. By 2000 it had reached 1200 per annum. Of the 1800 asylum decisions made in 2000 (which will have included applications made previously) there were ten decisions by the Secretary of State granting asylum. A further ten cases were granted exceptional leave to remain outside the asylum rules. The success rate of asylum appeals by Czech nationals was, at the beginning of 2001, only around 6%.'

[16] As already indicated, the vast majority of asylum applicants from the Czech Republic are Roma. The Home Office's own Country Assessment for August 2001 records:

'[T]here are approximately 300,000 members of the Roma ethnic group, i.e. about 3% of the country's population ... Roma may face discrimination from elements within Czech society in employment, education, housing and access to services ... Sporadic acts of violence by "skinheads" against members of the Roma minority have continued to occur ... [D]iscrimination and harassment experienced by Roma will, in most cases, not amount to persecution within the terms of the Convention. The threshold may however be passed in individual cases.'

[17] The ERRC executive director paints an altogether bleaker picture:

'... daily human rights abuse [of Roma] often motivated by, linked with or exacerbated by extreme levels of discrimination, notably in the fields of education, housing, employment and the provision of health and social services, as well as in the administration of justice ... high levels of racially-motivated violence including racially-motivated violent acts by neo-Nazi skinheads, members of the wider public and even members of law enforcement agencies.'

[18] It is no part of the court's task on this appeal to reach any view as between those differing positions, still less as to whether any of these appellants would have a valid claim for asylum. Rather our task on the first part of the case is to decide whether a scheme designed to prevent any such asylum claims (whether genuine or otherwise) being made in the United Kingdom is consistent with the United Kingdom's obligations in international law, in particular under the 1951 convention.

[19] With those few introductory paragraphs I turn now to this first issue, pausing only to observe that a substantially fuller account of the background to these proceedings is to be found in Burton J's admirably clear and comprehensive judgment below.

THE CONVENTION CHALLENGE

[20] Section 2 of the Asylum and Immigration Appeals Act 1993 provides: 'Nothing in the immigration rules (within the meaning of the 1971 Act) shall lay down any practice which would be contrary to the Convention.'

[21] The convention, of course, is concerned with refugees. The term is defined in art 1A of the 1951 convention:

'For the purposes of the present Convention, the term "refugee" shall apply to any person who ... (2) ... owing to well-founded fear of being persecuted for reasons of race, religion, nationality, membership of a particular social group or political opinion, is outside the country of his nationality and is unable, or owing to such fear, is unwilling to avail himself of the protection of that country; or who, not having a nationality and being outside the country of his former habitual residence ... is unable or, owing to such fear, is unwilling to return to it.'

[22] Article 33, entitled 'Prohibition of expulsion or return ("refoulement")', lies at the heart of this appeal:

'1. No Contracting State shall expel or return ("refouler") a refugee in any manner whatsoever to the frontiers of territories where his life or freedom would be threatened on account of his race, religion, nationality, membership of a particular social group or political opinion ...'

[23] It is convenient at this stage to set out two articles of the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties (Vienna, 23 May 1969; TS 58 (1980); Cmnd 7964) (which has been incorporated into domestic law) and two further provisions in international treaties (which have not been so incorporated).

[24] Articles 26 and 31(1) of the Vienna Convention provide respectively:

'26. Every treaty in force is binding upon the parties to it and must be performed by them in good faith ...

31(1) A treaty shall be interpreted in good faith in accordance with the ordinary meaning to be given to the terms of the treaty in their context and in the light of its object and purpose.'

[25] Article 14(1) of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights (Paris, 10 December 1948; UN TS 2 (1949); Cmd 7226) provides: 'Everyone has the right to seek and to enjoy in other countries asylum from persecution.'

[26] Article 12(2) of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (New York, 16 December 1966; TS 6 (1977); Cmnd 6702) provides: 'Everyone shall be free to leave any country, including his own.'

[27] The appellants' central submission was recorded below as follows:

'A good faith obligation, interpreted in the light of the object and purpose of the Convention, must include an obligation, not necessarily to facilitate an asylum seeker to leave his own country and/or to reach one's border, but not to take steps to prevent him from doing so (at least unless the refugee is already in a safe third country). Thus, it is submitted, where, as here, such state is in practice extending its frontier out to Prague, it must not turn away an intending asylum seeker albeit that that person is not (yet) a refugee.'

[28] In support of their argument below the appellants prayed in aid the views expressed in a lengthy letter from the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR) dated 19 July 2002:

'4. We acknowledge that the primary questions in this legal action do not turn on the text of the [Geneva] Convention. Rather, they turn on understanding the international protection regime as a complex of international practice and precepts drawn from refugee law, human rights law and general principles of international law. The [Geneva] Convention is the cornerstone of this complex. Where, as in the present case, issues arise that strictly do not fall within the Convention's textual scope, its objectives and purposes should act as a reliable guide. UNHCR's reservations to the pre-screening procedures are best understood in this light ...

8. The [Geneva] Convention's objects and purposes are important in ensuring that States' approach to illegal migration is consistent with their Convention obligations. UNHCR acknowledges that States have a legitimate interest in controlling illegal migration. Such controls should not, however, be introduced in a manner which makes it difficult or impossible for refugees to access international protection. The pre-clearance procedures at Prague Airport have precisely the effect of preventing persons from boarding a flight to the UK when they express an intent to seek asylum. This means that persons at risk of persecution will be prevented from gaining access to international protection.

9. The international refugee protection regime would be significantly jeopardised if States which have agreed to provide protection for refugees were free to cut off all reasonable modalities of access to its territory for refugees [the letter should perhaps say 'potential refugees'] in the name of migration control ...

13. Although the decision to grant asylum to a particular refugee remains the prerogative of the State, there is an implicit responsibility on States to refrain from preventing asylum seekers from finding safety or from obtaining access to asylum procedures. Without such an implied responsibility the right to seek asylum might be rendered illusory.

14. It should be noted that denial of access to asylum procedures carries with it a significant amount of risk to the safety of the individual. Clearly the potential risks are heightened where—as is the case with the procedures at Prague Airport—access to procedures is denied in co-operation with the very country from which international protection is sought.'

[29] The office of the UNHCR now intervenes in the appeal by permission of Laws LJ and we have been helpfully provided with a number of written arguments prepared on its behalf by Mr Guy Goodwin-Gill (nowadays disavowing professorial rank) extending in all to some 70 pages and supported by four volumes of texts and authorities in addition to the 50 or 60 authorities cited by the other parties. It will not, I fear, be possible to do justice to many of the arguments placed before us. Let me, however, record at this stage the essence of Mr Goodwin-Gill's final written submissions. (i) The pre-entry clearance practice as operated is contrary to international law and the international obligations accepted by the United Kingdom both under treaty and under customary international law. (ii) The practice frustrates the object and purpose of the 1951 convention contrary to the international legal principle of good faith. (iii) It constitutes a revision of a multilateral treaty (increasing the burden on others), implemented without reference to the other parties. (iv) It is incompatible with the United Kingdom's other obligations under international law, including the obligation to exercise rights in good faith. It renders the 1951 convention nugatory and prevents provisions such as arts 31 or 33 ever being engaged. (v) Given that the practice of pre-clearance 'extends' the United Kingdom's frontiers beyond the territory of the United Kingdom, the United Kingdom's international legal responsibilities go with it. (vi) A state lacks good faith in the application of a treaty, not only when it openly refuses to implement its undertakings, but equally when it seeks to avoid or to 'divert' the obligation which it has accepted or to do indirectly that which it is not permitted to do directly.

[30] The convention challenge, it must be recognised, raises two quite distinct issues: one is the substantive question as to the United Kingdom's obligations under international law having regard to the terms of the 1951 convention; the other, the justiciability of this question given the limited extent to which these obligations have been incorporated into domestic law. Although logically, no doubt, justiciability may be thought the prior issue, I have preferred to address first the substantive questions of international law arising as to the true nature of the United Kingdom's obligations under the 1951 convention, in particular under the non-refoulement provision in art 33, construed in conformity with art 31(1) of the Vienna Convention.

[31] That art 33 of the 1951 convention has no direct application to the Prague operation is plain: as Mr Howell QC for the respondents points out, it applies in terms only to refugees, and a refugee is defined by art 1A(2) as someone necessarily 'outside the country of his nationality' (or, in the case of a stateless person, 'former habitual residence'). For good measure art 33 forbids 'refoulement' to 'frontiers' and, whatever precise meaning is given to the former term, it cannot comprehend action which causes someone to remain on the same side of the frontier as they began; nor indeed could such a person be said to have been returned to any frontier.

[32] I have already indicated the broad outline of Mr Goodwin-Gill's argument on behalf of the UNHCR. Lord Lester of Herne Hill QC for the appellants puts the argument a little differently. It is his submission that the Prague operation constitutes 'a form of constructive refoulement', alternatively that—> 'in the absence of an express obligation on a state not to act so as deliberately to prevent those alleging that they are suffering convention persecution from leaving their country of nationality so as to acquire refugee status under the 1951 convention, such an obligation is to be implied into the convention so as not to defeat or frustrate its purpose and as part of the obligation of good faith.'

[33] One of the respondents' contentions accepted below as a reason for rejecting Lord Lester's argument centred on the decision of the United States Supreme Court in Sale, Acting Comr, Immigration and Naturalisation Service v Haitian Centers Council Inc (1993) 509 US 155. The court there was concerned with a boatload of refugees from Haiti intercepted by the American Immigration Services in international waters and returned under agreement with the Haitian government to Haiti. The court held by a majority of 8:1 that the action was lawful on the ground that art 33 was not intended to govern a state's conduct outside its national borders or territorial waters. Burton J below commented (at [44]) on the decision as follows:

> 'It may be thought that the conclusion that the action of returning those already refugees to their country of origin was not in contravention of the 1951 convention is a fortiori to the question as to whether any obligation is owed to those who are still in their country of origin and not yet refugees.'

[34] Before us the appellants were to my mind able to demolish that particular argument by reference to the report of the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights (No 51/96) which was fiercely critical of the majority decision of the Supreme Court and preferred the dissenting judgment of Blackmun J, the approach which has subsequently been followed. For present purposes I propose to regard Sale's case as wrongly decided; it certainly offends one's sense of fairness.

[35] Where, however, does that leave the present case? Lord Lester submits that there is only the narrowest distinction between the two cases: narrow in both the territorial and the jurisprudential sense. If it is impermissible to return refugees from the high seas to their country of origin, why should it be permissible to prevent their leaving in the first place? How can the legality of the putative receiving state's action be determined simply by reference to which side of the frontier (perhaps a land frontier) the prospective asylum seeker is standing?

[36] Lord Lester further submits that a generous and purposive interpretation should be given to convention provisions concerned, as clearly these are, to further human rights, and in this regard he prays in aid the decision of the European Court of Human Rights in what he contends is the closely analogous case of Golder v UK (1975) 1 EHRR 524. Golder was a prisoner refused permission by the Home Secretary to consult a solicitor with a view to bringing libel proceedings against a prison officer. The court construed art 6 of the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms 1950 (as set out in Sch 1 to the Human Rights Act 1998), which provides that '[i]n the determination of his civil rights ... everyone is entitled to a fair ... hearing', as requiring a right of access to a solicitor. So too here, submits Lord Lester, the court should construe art 33 of the 1951 convention as implying a right of access to a prospective refugee so that his claim for asylum may be fairly determined.

[37] Skilfully and powerfully though these arguments were advanced, they cannot to my mind prevail over the many and compelling arguments to the contrary. To start with Golder v UK, it provides in my judgment no real analogy with the present case at all. The decision there turned on the true construction of art 6. The English text was ambiguous. The French text was ultimately found by the majority decisive. It cannot be suggested that on any construction of art 33, however generous, a right of access to this or any other country to claim asylum can be found within it. So far, indeed, from this being so, not merely art 33 itself but the 1951 convention as a whole can be seen to be concerned not with permitting access to asylum seekers but rather with the non-return of those who have managed to gain such access. Having defined as refugees solely those who have already left their own state, the 1951 convention then imposes on member states a series of obligations with regard to them. Article 33 itself, as already explained, is concerned only with where a person must not be sent, not with where he is trying to escape from. The 1951 convention could have, but chose not to, concern itself also with enabling people to escape from their own country by providing for a right of admission to another country to allow them to do so. The legal position is correctly stated in Oppenheim's International Law (9th edn, 1991) vol 1, pp 901–902 (para 402) as follows:

> 'The so-called right of asylum is not a right possessed by the alien to demand that the state into whose territory he has entered should grant protection and asylum. For such state need not grant such demands. The constitutions of a number of countries expressly grant the right of asylum to persons persecuted for political reasons, but it cannot be said that such a right has become a "general principle of law" recognised by civilised states and as such forming part of international law. Neither is any such right conferred by Art 14 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights ... The Declaration, which in any case is not a legally binding instrument, does not confer a right to receive asylum ...'

[38] To the same essential effect are passages in Hathaway The Law of Refugee Status (1991) and the UNHCR Handbook on Procedures and Criteria for Determining Refugee Status (Geneva, September 1979), both quoted in the judgment below:

'The first element of Convention refugee status is that the claimant must be outside his country of origin. There is nothing intuitively obvious about this requirement: many if not most of the persons forced to flee their homes in search of safety remain within the boundaries of their state. Their plight may be every bit as serious as that of individuals who cross borders, yet the Convention definition of refugee status excludes internal refugees from the scope of global protection.' (See Hathaway p 29.)

'It is a general requirement for refugee status that an applicant who has a nationality be outside the country of his nationality. There are no exceptions to this rule. International protection cannot come into play as long as a person is within the territorial jurisdiction of his home country.' (See the UNHCR Handbook p 21 (para 88).)

Such an approach is supported also by the authorities, domestic and foreign. I shall content myself with brief citations only.

[39] Lord Mustill in T v Secretary of State for the Home Dept [1996] 2 All ER 865 at 868, [1996] AC 742 at 754 put it thus:

'... although it is easy to assume that the appellant invokes a "right of asylum", no such right exists. Neither under international nor English municipal law does a fugitive have any direct right to insist on being received by a country of refuge.'

He continued ([1996] 2 All ER 865 at 873, [1996] AC 742 at 758):

'The [domestic] legislation must be viewed against the background of a complete absence of any common law right, either national or international, for a refugee to insist on being admitted to a foreign country.'

[40] To similar effect, Lord Goff of Chieveley and Lord Hoffmann in their joint dissenting opinion in the Privy Council in Nguyen Tuan Cuong v Director of Immigration [1997] 1 WLR 68 at 78–79 said:

'A person who satisfies [the convention] definition is said to have refugee status. The rest of the Convention imposes upon the contracting states certain obligations towards persons having refugee status. For the purposes of immigration control, the most important are contained in articles 31 and 33 ... [art 31 forbids the imposition of penalties on refugees arriving in another country without authorisation—unlike art 33, it is derogable under art 42]. Refugee status is thus far from being an international passport which entitles the bearer to demand entry without let or hindrance into the territory of any contracting state. It is always a status relative to a particular country or countries. And the only obligations of contracting states are, first, not to punish a refugee who has entered directly from the country in which his life or freedom was threatened for a Convention reason and secondly, not to return him across the frontier of that country. In all other questions of immigration control: for example, punishment for illegal entry from a third country, or expulsion to a third country from which there is no danger of refoulement to a country falling within article 33, the question of whether a person has refugee status is simply irrelevant.'

[41] Of the many foreign authorities I shall refer to only one, the judgment of the High Court of Australia in Minister for Immigration and Multicultural Affairs v

Ibrahim (2000) 175 ALR 585, and cite but a single passage from Gummow J's leading judgment on behalf of the majority:

> 'The scope of the 1951 convention
>
> [136] The remaining issues also turn on the meaning to be given to the [1951 convention] definition, but they involve more fundamental considerations respecting the scope and purpose of the [1951 convention] itself. The provisions of the [1951 convention] "assume a situation in which refugees, possibly by irregular means, have somehow managed to arrive at or in the territory of the contracting State" ...
>
> [137] First, it has long been recognised that, according to customary international law, the right of asylum is a right of states, not of the individual; no individual, including those seeking asylum, may assert a right to enter the territory of a state of which that individual is not a national ...
>
> [138] Secondly, as Professor Sir Hersch Lauterpacht pointed out at the time, the Universal Declaration of Human Rights (Paris, 10 December 1948; UN TS 2 (1949); Cmd 7226), adopted in 1948, that is to say, shortly before the formation of the [1951 convention], was accompanied by a general repudiation by member states of the idea that the Declaration imposed upon them a legal obligation to respect the human rights and fundamental freedoms which it proclaimed. Article 14 declared that "[e]veryone has the right to seek and to enjoy in other countries asylum from persecution". But this right "to seek" asylum was not accompanied by any assurance that the quest would be successful. A deliberate choice was made not to make a significant innovation in international law which would have amounted to a limitation upon the absolute right of member states to regulate immigration by conferring privileges upon individuals. Over the last 50 years, other provisions of the Declaration have, as Professor Brownlie puts it, come to "constitute general principles of law or [to] represent elementary considerations of humanity" and have been invoked by the European Court of Human Rights and the International Court of Justice. But it is not suggested that Art 14 goes beyond its calculated limitation. Nor was the matter taken any further by the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (New York, 16 December 1966; TS 6 (1977); Cmnd 6702) (the ICCPR). This entered into force for Australia on 13 November 1980. Article 12 of the ICCPR stipulates freedom to leave any country and forbids arbitrary deprivation of the right to enter one's own country; but the ICCPR does not provide for any right of entry to seek asylum and the omission was deliberate.'

[42] As Mr Howell has pointed out, only two provisions in the 1951 convention apply to admissions and they are of the most limited scope. Article 11 applies to refugee seamen and requires no more than that a state under whose flag they are serving 'shall give sympathetic consideration to ... their temporary admission in its territory'. Article 28(1) requires states to issue 'to refugees lawfully staying in their territory travel documents for the purpose of travel outside their territory' and by para 13(1) of the Schedule to the 1951 convention the state undertakes that the holder of such a document 'shall be re-admitted to its territory at any time during the period of its validity'. The very limitations upon these obligations serve to illustrate the distinction between, on the one hand, the obligations owed to those already within a state's territory and, on the other, the lack of any obligation to admit those (perhaps simply across a land frontier) aspiring to become refugees.

[43] It is, indeed, accepted by the appellants that a state is under no obligation to admit refugees. How then can there be an obligation not to impede but rather to admit someone so that he can become a refugee? For my part I remain of the view I expressed in R v Secretary of State for the Home Dept, ex p Hoverspeed [1999] Eu LR 595, namely that not merely is the Home Secretary under no obligation to facilitate the arrival of asylum seekers but rather he is entitled to take steps to prevent their arrival. I referred there (at 603) to the 'tension [which] undoubtedly arises from our obligation to asylum seekers under the 1951 Convention on the one hand, and our entitlement to impede their arrival on the other'. In the later case of R v Uxbridge Magistrates' Court, ex p Adimi [1999] 4 All ER 520 at 524, [2001] QB 667 at 674, in the context of art 31, I noted that states strive increasingly to prevent the arrival of asylum seekers and observed that '[t]he combined effect of visa requirements and carrier's liability has made it well nigh impossible for refugees to travel to countries of refuge without false documents'. None of this, I readily acknowledge, is entirely satisfactory. In an ideal world there would no doubt be provision for states to facilitate the escape of persecuted minorities by allowing entry to their own country. I am satisfied, however, that on no view of the 1951 convention is this within its scope. The distinction between on the one hand a state preventing an aspiring asylum seeker from gaining access from his own country to its territory and on the other hand returning such a person to his own country (the distinction, in short, between this case and Sale, Acting Comr, Immigration and Naturalisation Service v Haitian Centers Council Inc (1993) 509 US 155) can be made to seem a narrow and unsatisfactory one. In my judgment, however, it is a crucial distinction to make and it is supported both by the text of the 1951 convention and by the authorities dictating its scope.

[44] It is supported too, as Mr Howell points out, by reference to the 1977 draft UN convention on territorial asylum which ultimately failed to achieve approval but which would otherwise have provided by art 3 that no person eligible for the benefits of asylum—

> 'who is at the frontier seeking asylum ... shall be subjected [by a contracting state] to measures such as rejection at the frontier ... which would compel him to remain in ... a territory with respect to which he has a well-founded fear of persecution.'

What need for such further convention if the law is already as the appellants submit?

[45] It seems to me important to recognise that in entering into international treaties states are undertaking limited obligations only and that the courts must recognise and respect such limitations. The good faith allegation upon which Mr Goodwin-Gill lays such stress should be approached with this in mind. As the International Court of Justice stated in Cameroon v Nigeria (1998) ICJ Rep 275 at 297 (para 39):

> '[A]lthough the principle of good faith is "one of the basic principles governing the creation and performance of legal obligations ... it is not in itself a source of obligation where none would otherwise exist" ...'

[46] It is pertinent in this connection to refer also to the judgments of the High Court of Australia in Applicant A v Minister for Immigration and Ethnic Affairs (1997) 190 CLR 225. Dawson J there, having graphically described (at 248) the limits on the extent to which the 1951 convention attempts to translate into practical reality the concern expressed in its preamble that persons enjoy the 'widest possible exercise of ... fundamental rights and freedoms', continued:

> 'In that respect, the Convention, like many international and municipal instruments, does not necessarily pursue its primary purpose at all costs. The purpose of an instrument may instead be pursued in a limited way, reflecting the accommodation of differing viewpoints, the desire for limited achievement of objectives, or the constraints imposed by limited resources ... It would therefore be wrong to depart from the demands of language and context by invoking the humanitarian objectives of the Convention without appreciating the limits which the Convention itself places on the achievement of them.'

[47] Included within Mr Goodwin-Gill's final submissions is the suggestion that the Prague scheme 'renders the 1951 convention nugatory and prevents provisions such as arts 31 or 33 ever being engaged' (see 29, above). This surely overstates the argument. Of course, if those intending refugees who are affected by the Prague scheme are unable on that account ever to leave the Czech Republic, they can never benefit from arts 31 or 33. But many others benefit and will continue to do so. In the end, as it seems to me, all Mr Goodwin-Gill's submissions rest on this: that no individual state can impede the flow of prospective asylum seekers to its shores. To do so, it is said, either precludes their becoming refugees and thereby benefiting from arts 31 and 33 in the first place (if they have to remain in their country of origin), or at least 'avoids' or 'diverts' onto other states the burden of processing their claims and providing them with sanctuary where appropriate. For the reasons already given these are not arguments I feel able to accept.

[48] Let me at this stage address the distinctions which the appellants seek to draw between visa regimes and the Prague scheme, distinctions which they suggest make the latter the more objectionable of the two types of control. Lord Lester criticises in particular the fact that the decision to refuse leave is made at the airport, after the intending asylum seeker has already committed himself to purchasing a ticket and to effecting an escape, and in such a way as to increase the risk of persecution. He contrasts this with the more discreet process involved in making an advance visa application in writing. He complains too that the pre-clearance scheme operates only on a sporadic basis which is accordingly arbitrary and unfair as between asylum seekers. Mr Goodwin-Gill too submits that there is a distinction to be made between 'the active interdiction or interception of persons seeking refuge from persecution' on the one hand and 'passive regimes, such as visa and carrier sanctions' on the other.

[49] In my judgment there is nothing in these criticisms and indeed the Prague scheme seems to me to constitute if anything a less, rather than more, serious problem for would-be asylum seekers than visa control. The fact that it operates only sporadically means that sometimes the intending asylum seeker will be free to travel. In any event it applies only to travel to the United Kingdom: the intending asylum seeker can travel anywhere else he pleases and, indeed, if he does so, there is nothing in the scheme which precludes his then travelling on to the United Kingdom. There is no stamping of his travel document or any permanent record of his having been refused leave. Rather the immigration officer when refusing leave merely issues a document recording such refusal which he faxes to the airline. Although in practice the airline will be unwilling to carry the passenger and will immediately refund the ticket price, it is not in fact prohibited from carrying the passenger to the United Kingdom. Nor indeed would it incur carrier's liability (as it would if a visa regime were imposed) although it might be liable to some lesser financial sanction pursuant to paras 8 or 20 of Sch 2 to the 1971 Act. Whilst in certain countries the operation of the scheme might perhaps expose a refused asylum seeker to the risk of further persecution for having sought to escape, that certainly cannot be said of the Prague operation: persecuted Czech Roma ordinarily suffer at the hands of non-state agents; they are not subject to persecution by the state itself.

[50] In short, it seems to me impossible to draw any principled distinction in international law between the legality of the Prague operation and visa controls. Both Lord Lester and Mr Goodwin-Gill, I should note at this point, take exception also to visa controls, at any rate in so far as they are designed to impede the escape of prospective asylum seekers. In this regard Mr Goodwin-Gill puts before us a letter from the UNHCR to the Home Secretary dated 13 December 2002 objecting to the then proposed visa restrictions on Zimbabwean nationals. In my judgment, however, these objections do not sound in international law. Rather one must hope that when in truth acute humanitarian concerns arise states will respond beyond the strict call of their international obligations. This, I believe, is the only answer the court is entitled to give when Lord Lester conjures up the spectre of a fresh Holocaust. Visa controls are, in short, clearly not outlawed under the 1951 convention or under international law generally. EU law, indeed, not merely sanctions them but requires for certain countries both visa controls and carriers' liability with stipulated minimum penalties attaching—as to which see International Transport Roth GmbH v Secretary of State for the Home Dept [2002] EWCA Civ 158 at [56], [2003] QB 728 at [56], [2002] 3 WLR 344.

JUSTICIABILITY

[51] Had I reached a different conclusion on the substantive issue of international law here arising it would have been necessary to consider at length the question whether that issue is strictly justiciable under domestic law. As it is, however, I propose to leave this question, difficult and complex as it is, for another day. For present purposes I wish to say no more than that, in the light of the extensive arguments developed before us both orally and in writing, I now recognise that the views I expressed in the Divisional Court in R v Uxbridge Magistrates' Court, ex p Adimi [1999] 4 All ER 520 at 533–534, [2001] QB 667 at 685–686 (in particular in reliance on R v Secretary of State for the Home Dept, ex p Ahmed [1998] INLR 570), are to be regarded as at best superficial, and that the conclusion I reached there, with regard to the legitimate expectations of asylum seekers to the benefits of art 31, is suspect. Mr Howell has mounted a formidable argument against that conclusion, based not least on this court's decisions in Chundawadra v Immigration Appeal Tribunal [1988] Imm AR 161 and Behluli v Secretary of State for the Home Dept [1998] Imm AR 407, neither of which was referred to in Ex p Ahmed (a rather special case under the prerogative) nor cited to us in Ex p Adimi. Whether in the light of s 2 of the Asylum and Immigration Appeals Act 1993 (see [20], above) or by reference to the principle of legality in the context of customary international law Lord Lester would have persuaded us that we have the right to quash the Prague scheme had we in the event thought it incompatible with the United Kingdom's obligations under the 1951 convention, I cannot say. I prefer to leave this important issue undecided.

THE ALLEGED BREACH OF THE RULES

[52] This complaint is advanced on behalf of those appellants who were expressly seeking to come to the United Kingdom as asylum seekers. I can deal with it quite briefly. Rule 320 (see [9], above) provides that 'leave to enter the United Kingdom is to be refused [if] entry is being sought for a purpose not covered by these Rules'. The appellants argue that asylum—either the making of the application or the gaining of refugee status—is a purpose covered by the rules so that the immigration officer in Prague, faced with these applications, should not have refused leave to enter but rather should have allowed the applicants to travel, neither granting nor refusing leave to enter and thus enabling them to make their application for asylum on arrival at Heathrow, applications which would then have been referred to the Secretary of State under r 328 (see [10], above). When an asylum application is made to the immigration officer on arrival in the United Kingdom and then referred to the Secretary of State, leave to enter is initially neither given nor refused. If the Secretary of State later grants asylum, limited leave to enter will then be given (see r 330). Meantime the applicant is either detained or granted temporary admission.

[53] In my judgment the argument fails. Of course the rules make provision for what is to happen if an asylum application is made in the United Kingdom. (That the rules apply only to applications made in the United Kingdom is apparent both from r 327, which defines an asylum applicant as someone complaining that it would be contrary to the 1951 convention to remove him from the United Kingdom, and indeed from r 328 which refers only to applications made 'at a port or airport in the United Kingdom'.) That is not to say, however, that asylum seeking is 'a purpose covered by [the] Rules'. In my judgment it is not. Those purposes are rather confined to the particular categories of entrant provided for by the rules, for example, visitors, students, spouses, ministers of religion and so forth. For each category the rules specify the matters of which the applicant must satisfy the immigration officer. Neither the seeking of asylum nor the enjoyment of refugee status constitutes such a category and, of course, it is the Secretary of State, not an immigration officer, who must be satisfied of the matters stipulated by r 334 before asylum will be granted.

[54] On this part of the case I add only this: were the challenge to succeed on this basis and no other the victory would be pyrrhic and short-lived—the Secretary of State could immediately counter it by a simple change in the rules.

RACE DISCRIMINATION

[55] The statutory framework within which this issue arises is as follows. Section 1(1) of the Race Relations Act 1976 provides that a person discriminates against another if in any relevant circumstances—

> '(a) on racial grounds he treats that other less favourably than he treats or would treat other persons; or (b) he applies to that other a requirement or condition which he applies or would apply equally to persons not of the same racial group as that other but—(i) which is such that the proportion of persons of the same racial group as that other who can comply with it is considerably smaller than the proportion of persons not of that racial group who can comply with it; and (ii) which he cannot show to be justifiable irrespective of the colour, race, nationality or ethnic or national origins of the person to whom it is applied; and (iii) which is to the detriment of that other because he cannot comply with it.'

[56] Section 3(4) provides:

> 'A comparison of the case of a person of a particular racial group with that of a person not of that group under section 1(1) must be such that the relevant circumstances in the one case are the same, or not materially different, in the other.'

[57] Pursuant to a recommendation in the Macpherson Report, the 1976 Act was amended so that its provisions applied (as previously they had not) to public authorities, albeit subject to certain exceptions. Section 1 of the Race Relations (Amendment) Act 2000 introduced into the 1976 Act further provisions as follows:

> '19B.—(1) It is unlawful for a public authority in carrying out any functions of the authority to do any act which constitutes discrimination ...
>
> 19D.—(1) Section 19B does not make it unlawful for a relevant person to discriminate against another person on grounds of nationality or ethnic or national origins in carrying out immigration and nationality functions.
>
> (2) For the purposes of subsection (1), "relevant person" means—(a) a Minister of the Crown acting personally; or (b) any other person acting in accordance with a relevant authorisation ...
>
> 27(1A) In its application in relation to granting entry clearance (within the meaning of the Immigration Act 1971) section 19B applies in relation to acts done outside the United Kingdom, as well as those done within Great Britain.'

[58] A relevant authorisation under s 19D(2)(b) was in fact given by the minister on 23 April 2001. By para 2, under the heading 'Examination of passengers', it provided:

> 'Where a person falls within a category listed in the Schedule and is liable to be examined by an immigration officer under paragraph 2 of Schedule 2 to the Immigration Act 1971 the immigration officer may, by reason of that person's ethnic or national origin—(a) subject the person to a more rigorous examination than other persons in the same circumstances ...'

[59] Paragraph 3 of the authorisation, under the heading 'Persons wishing to travel to the United Kingdom', provided:

> 'Where a person falls within a category listed in the Schedule and is outside the United Kingdom but wishes to travel to the United Kingdom, an immigration officer or, as the case may be, the Secretary of State may, by reason of that person's ethnic or national origin—(a) decline to give or refuse the person leave to enter before he arrives in the United Kingdom ...'

The schedule there referred to contains a list of persons of seven ethnic or national origins including '(b) Roma'.

[60] It is Mr Munro's evidence that the authorisation, which in any event was revoked on 11 June 2002, was never adopted or made use of with regard to the pre-clearance scheme at Prague Airport. The respondents accept rather that the Prague operation had to be operated consistently with the 1976 Act and it is their assertion that it was. The appellants submit to the contrary that the scheme operated in a systematically discriminatory fashion. As noted at the outset, the allegation here is not of discrimination against Roma asylum seekers but rather against those Roma who were applying to come to the United Kingdom for reasons other than to claim asylum.

[61] What was alleged below was direct discrimination contrary to s 1(1)(a) of the 1976 Act in the following two respects:

> '(a) Longer and more intrusive questioning in the case of Roma than non-Roma, and the treatment of the former with greater suspicion and a requirement for a higher standard of proof.
>
> (b) In the event the decision-making was such that Roma were refused while comparable non-Roma were not.'

In those respects it was said that the defendants in operating the pre-clearance scheme have treated Roma less favourably than non-Roma. The appellants relied not least on some striking figures compiled between late January and late April 2002 based on observations made by a Czech Roma citizen working as a consultant for ERRC which were accepted for the purposes of the argument below. These showed that, during that three-month period, out of 6,170 passengers recorded as Czech nationals but not Roma, only 14 (0·2%) were refused entry while, of 78 who were apparently Roma (Roma being for the most part visually identifiable) 68 (87%) were refused. The case below rested in part on those statistics; in part on the very existence of the authorisation even though the respondents asserted that it had in no way influenced the approach to the Prague operation; and in part on evidence as to what had in fact occurred in relation to the six claimants and to five other people who were not claimants. Two of the non-claimants (one Czech Roma, Mr Samko; one Czech non-Roma, Ms Novakova) were journalists whose applications were the subject matter of a Czech television programme. Three (two Czech Roma, Ms Grundzova and Ms Polakova; one Czech non-Roma, Ms Dedicova) were the subject of the ERRC's own test. All five (whose expenses had been paid respectively by the television station and by ERRC) were ostensibly seeking leave to enter as visitors. Leave to enter was, in the event, given to Ms Novakova, Ms Polakova and Ms Dedicova, but not to Mr Samko or to Ms Grundzova. In other words, of the five whose applications were staged, both the non-Roma applicants were granted leave but only one of the three Roma. Even in the case of that one, moreover, Ms Polakova who had a well-paid job, it was contended that she was subjected to longer and more intrusive questioning than would have been the case had she been a non-Roma.

[62] The argument below turned entirely on the facts. The parties were in full agreement on the applicable principles of law which were stated by the judge as follows ([2002] All ER (D) 127 (Oct) at [50]):

> '(i) A complainant must prove his or her case on the balance of probabilities (see King v Great Britain-China Centre [1992] ICR 516 at 528–529 approved in Glasgow City Council v Zafar [1998] 2 All ER 953 at 958, [1997] 1 WLR 1659 at 1664–1665). (ii) Claims brought under the race and sex discrimination legislation present special problems of proof for complainants, since those who discriminate on the grounds of race or gender do not in general advertise their prejudices: indeed they may not even be aware of them (see Zafar's case [1998] 2 All ER 953 at 958, [1997] 1 WLR 1659 at 1664). (iii) It is unusual to find direct evidence of racial discrimination. The outcome of the case will therefore usually depend on what inferences it is proper to draw from the facts (see King's case [1992] ICR 516 at 528–529 approved in Zafar's case [1998] 2 All ER 953 at 958, [1997] 1 WLR 1659 at 1664). (iv) If a claimant can show that he has been less favourably treated a than comparable individuals from a different racial group, the court will look to the alleged discriminator for an explanation. If no explanation is put forward or if such explanation is inadequate or unsatisfactory it will be legitimate to infer that the discrimination was on racial grounds (see King's case [1992] ICR 516 at 528–529 approved in Zafar's case [1998] 2 All ER 953 at 958, [1997] 1 WLR 1659 at 1664).'

b [63] It is convenient to cite also the next two paragraphs from Burton J's judgment which similarly set out undisputed matters of law:

'[51] The claimants draw attention to the danger of stereotyping, which does not need to be deliberate, and to guidance to be obtained from Lord Nicholls of Birkenhead in Nagarajan v London Regional Transport [1999] 4 All ER 65 at 71, 72, c [2000] 1 AC 501 at 511–512: "All human beings have preconceptions, beliefs, attitudes and prejudices on many subjects. It is part of our make-up. Moreover, we do not always recognise our own prejudices ... Members of racial groups need protection from conduct driven by unrecognised prejudice as much as from conscious and deliberate discrimination."

d [52] Balcombe LJ in West Midlands Passenger Executive v Singh [1988] 2 All ER 873 at 877, [1988] 1 WLR 730 at 736 referred to "a conscious or unconscious racial attitude which involves stereotyped assumptions", and there was helpful reference to the Court of Appeal decision in Skyrail Oceanic Ltd v Coleman [1981] ICR 864 (itself cited in a recent Hong Kong case in which Lord Lester QC was involved).'

e

[64] The judge then dealt in very considerable detail with the many arguments based on the facts of the case before finally stating his conclusion as follows:

'[74] The conclusion that is sought to be drawn is that the Prague operation was discriminatory against Roma. I am wholly unpersuaded that f such a proposition is supported or furthered by the refusal of leave of entry to HM [claimant] or by the television programme. Is the apparently differential treatment of the Roma in the ERRC test enough, coupled with the statistics, to draw a conclusion that the operation was targeted against Roma and was discriminatory? I am satisfied that this is not established. g (i) The ERRC test is in my judgment insufficient to draw any conclusion as to the nature of the whole operation, not least given the fact that all three were acting out a part. (ii) The evidence as to the individual claimants cannot be ignored. I have already concluded that I do not draw support for a case for discrimination from the case of HM, and obviously the same goes for the three claimants who simply claimed asylum and do not allege h discrimination. But the evidence in respect of the other two claimants must plainly be taken into account. RG and AKu [claimants] both now admit that they lied by concealing their intentions to claim asylum, and no longer claim discrimination. The contemporaneous notes in respect of RG show his interrogation, and the carefully developing thought processes of the officer, j whereby, notwithstanding the then assertion by RG of an intention of a short-term visit, by reference to questioning as to the wife's cousin whom he alleged that he was to visit, and his own financial circumstances, the officer concluded that the expenditure of a trip "was wholly out of proportion to the likely resultant benefits for someone of modest economic background" and that he "could not be satisfied that the passenger and his family were genuinely seeking entry as visitors for the period stated". When Ms Rose talks of a "bulls eye" in relation to the ERRC test, it is in the context that none of the evidence in relation to the claimants, or the other non-claimant, supports the case of discrimination. (iii) Mr Munro makes clear in his evidence that different officers have different techniques and different methods. Not always are the same questions asked, and certainly interrogations will vary in length, depending upon whether early answers are satisfactory or not. I am not persuaded that the evidence of Mr Munro is displaced; namely that the authorisation was neither in place nor in mind, and that the operation in Prague was to be and was carried out non-discriminatorily. Whatever might be the position if Ms Grundzova or indeed Ms Polakova were a claimant in respect of their own individual circumstances (whether in s 57 proceedings, if permitted, or otherwise), I am wholly unpersuaded that, even taken with anything that could be made of the statistics, this limited evidence shows that the operation in Prague was carried out discriminatorily, or a fortiori that the six claimants are entitled to relief in respect of discrimination, or in particular that any of the claimants can establish, as asserted in Lord Lester's skeleton argument, that the practice of pre-clearance is being operated in a way that discriminates against Roma on racial grounds. In those circumstances I express no view either way as to the desirability of the introduction, either in the United Kingdom or in Prague, of any system of recording by immigration officials of ethnicity.'

[65] Ms Rose (who argued this part of the case on behalf of the appellants) seeks to attack those conclusions by reference to a number of detailed criticisms of the judge's many findings of fact which underlay them. By way of example only, she criticises the judge's earlier finding that there was nothing surprising in 68 out of 78 Roma being refused leave to enter since this was 'a not dissimilar ratio' to the five out of six claimants whom it was conceded were in fact asylum seekers and thus properly refused. Ms Rose submits that the judge should have taken, for the purposes of the comparison, not the five out of six who failed to get leave, but rather the four out of nine (the nine being the six claimants together with the three Roma who were involved in the television and ERRC trials) who she says should have been granted leave (HM, Mr Samko, Ms Grundzova and Ms Polakova) whereas only one, Ms Polakova, was. I would reject this criticism which seems to me founded on the false premise that the Roma applicants involved in the television and ERRC trials were properly to be regarded as typical of the ordinary run of Roma applicants seeking leave to enter the United Kingdom. To examine within this judgment all of Ms Rose's many criticisms of the judge's factual conclusions would be a lengthy process indeed. I decline to embark on it and would say only that I reject almost all of them and conclude that even those few which are made good do not in my judgment seriously undermine the judge's final conclusions.

[66] That, however, is not the end of the case on discrimination. Rather the court itself raised in the course of argument, and later sought additional written submissions upon, what seems to me the all-important question arising on the race discrimination challenge. The question is this: what is the position in law if, as seems to the court wholly inevitable, immigration officers, aware of the fact that the overwhelming majority of those seeking asylum from the Czech Republic are Roma (it may be doubted, indeed, whether any such are non-Roma), bring a greater degree of scepticism to bear on a Roma's application for leave to enter for some permitted purpose than upon an apparently comparable application by a Czech non-Roma? Mr Howell for the respondents, I should at once record, does not accept the premise of the question. None the less, at our invitation, he addressed the court's concern in this regard.

[67] Let me state the problem as clearly as I can. What we are postulating is this.

(i) The immigration officers at Prague have treated all passengers in the same way irrespective of race in the sense that they have genuinely tried their utmost not to discriminate against Roma but rather to give Roma and non-Roma alike a fair and equal opportunity to satisfy them on the balance of probabilities that they are coming for a permitted purpose and will not apply for asylum on arrival. So the judge below has found and so to my mind he was entitled to find.

(ii) Being aware, however, that Roma alone as a group suffer discrimination (whether or not amounting to persecution) in the Czech Republic and so in general have a much greater incentive than others to seek asylum and therefore, when being questioned at Prague Airport, to lie about their intentions in visiting the United Kingdom, immigration officers on that account are inevitably more sceptical of a Roma applicant's true intentions than those of a non-Roma, and are less easily persuaded that the Roma is genuinely intending to come only for a permitted purpose.

(iii) Generally, therefore, Roma are questioned for longer and more intensively than non-Roma and are more likely to be refused leave to enter than non-Roma.

[68] Are Roma in these circumstances properly to be regarded as subject to unlawful direct discrimination? Are they in short to be regarded as being less favourably treated on racial grounds than a relevant comparator? Lord Lester submits so; Mr Howell submits not.

[69] When I first raised with Ms Rose what seemed to me the obvious point that immigration officers at Prague could not fail to be more sceptical of Roma than non-Roma applicants in processing their applications for leave to enter for non-asylum purposes—they would surely not otherwise be doing their duty which is to refuse leave unless satisfied that applicants are genuinely coming for a permitted purpose—I had thought the point fatal to her argument. Once one predicates, as for this purpose one must, the lawfulness of the policy of excluding prospective asylum seekers from the United Kingdom, immigration officers are surely entitled to act logically in its implementation. Her response was that on the contrary it makes good her argument. Having initially found this perplexing I very soon came to regard it as the most troubling part of the case. Indeed, I confess to having changed my mind upon it more than once.

[70] The first point made by the appellants is that an assumption that the effective implementation of the Prague scheme requires a racially discriminatory approach on the part of the immigration officers involved underlies the very authorisation granted by the minister just ten weeks before the operation began (see [58], [59], above). The authorisation expressly provided for such discrimination. True, the Home Office for whatever reason chose not to make use of it. Its grant, however, is not without significance; rather it emphasises the need for such an exception to justify the practice.

[71] As for why the operation is to be regarded as directly discriminatory, all the appellants' arguments seem to me to depend ultimately on two central principles of discrimination law: the irrelevance of motive and the impermissibility of stereotyping. First it is said that the immigration officers' motive in treating Roma applicants differently is irrelevant: it matters not that they perceive Roma as being in a materially different position from non-Roma applicants on the basis that they have a greater incentive to lie. The fact, therefore, that the immigration officers are honestly concerned simply to enforce the immigration rules cannot avail them. Secondly the appellants submit that the Prague operation involves stereotyping—treating Roma less favourably because of the group's assumed characteristics: those of a race subject to discrimination who therefore have an incentive to seek asylum and a propensity to lie to achieve it. Let me briefly refer to the main authorities relied on in support of each argument.

(I) MOTIVE

[72] The authorities principally relied upon by the appellants under this head are R v Commission for Racial Equality, ex p Westminster City Council [1985] ICR 827, Bain v Bowles [1991] IRLR 356 and James v Eastleigh BC [1990] 2 All ER 607, [1990] 2 AC 751.

[73] In the Westminster City Council case the council had dismissed a black road sweeper to whose appointment the trade union objected on racial grounds. That the council's motive for doing so was to avert industrial action could not avail them.

[74] Similarly in Bain v Bowles, The Lady magazine had no defence to a complaint by a man whose advertisement for a housekeeper in Tuscany they had refused to accept. Following past complaints of sexual harassment, the magazine's policy was to accept such advertisements only where the employer was a woman. As Beldam LJ said (at 358 (para 25)):

> 'In my judgment the perception of the risk of harm to those who answer the advertisement was not a relevant circumstance for the purpose of the [Sex Discrimination Act 1975]. Essentially, it comes within the category, as [Dillon LJ] has said, of motive for the discrimination and for the policy adopted by the defendants.'

[75] In James' case the council allowed free entry to its swimming pools to those of pensionable age (ie women of 60 and men of 65). A 61-year-old man successfully complained of sexual discrimination. The House of Lords by a majority of 3:2 overturned the Court of Appeal's decision ([1989] 2 All ER 914, [1990] 1 QB 61) that the policy was not discriminatory 'on the ground of his sex'. As Lord Bridge of Harwich said ([1990] 2 All ER 607 at 611, [1990] 2 AC 751 at 763, 764):

> 'The fallacy, with all respect, which underlies and vitiates [the Court of Appeal's reasoning] is a failure to recognise that the statutory pensionable age, being fixed at 60 for women and 65 for men, is itself a criterion which directly discriminates between men and women in that it treats women more favourably than men "on the ground of their sex" ... The expression "pensionable age" is no more than a convenient shorthand expression which refers to the age of 60 in a woman and the age of 65 in a man. In considering whether there has been discrimination against a man "on the ground of his sex" it cannot possibly make any difference whether the alleged discriminator uses the shorthand expression or spells out its full meaning.'

(II) STEREOTYPING

[76] The appellants' two main authorities under this head are Hurley v Mustoe [1981] IRLR 208 and Equal Opportunities Commission v Director of Education (22 June 2001, unreported) in the High Court of Hong Kong (in which Hartmann J's very full judgment considers a number of the earlier cases).

[77] In Hurley's case the Employment Appeal Tribunal was concerned with an employer's refusal to employ women with small children because he regarded them as unreliable employees and needed to have reliable staff for his small business. As Browne-Wilkinson J (as he then was) put it (at 210):

> '... [W]e are not deciding whether or not women with children (as a class) are less reliable employees. Parliament has legislated that they are not to be treated as a class but as individuals. No employer is bound to employ unreliable employees, whether men or women. But he must investigate each case, and not simply apply what some would call a rule of convenience and others a prejudice to exclude a whole class of women or married persons because some members of that class are not suitable employees.'

[78] The Hong Kong case resulted in the striking down of the director of education's policy of weighting children's exam results so as to neutralise a perceived advantage enjoyed by girls over boys at that stage of their development. As Hartmann J explained:

> 'It is not disputed that the right to equal treatment free of sex discrimination is in our society a fundamental right; as Lord Lester expressed it, a right of high constitutional importance. As an individual right ... it ... cannot be undermined or negatived by broad assumptions or generalisations. What may be true of a group may not be true of a significant number of individuals within that group.'

[79] Amongst the earlier authorities considered in that case was Hutton J's judgment in Re Equal Opportunities Commission (No 1) [1998] NI 223 in which the court struck down a policy under which non-fee paying school places were awarded to an equal percentage of boys and girls (in each case the top 27%) notwithstanding that some of the girls not thereby qualifying obtained higher marks than some of the boys who did.

[80] Under this head of argument the appellants submit further that the treatment of Roma at Prague Airport is directly analogous to other such obviously objectionable discriminatory practices as police officers stopping and searching black youths more frequently than white youths on the assumption that they are more likely to have been engaged in criminal activity, or tax inspectors more frequently or more rigorously investigating Jews than non-Jews on the assumption that Jews are more prone to financial crime. They argue that it is not open to the discriminators to say that the appropriate comparators in these cases are respectively other recognisable groups of asylum seekers (this being one of Mr Howell's arguments) or drivers of white vans (like black youths, frequently stopped and searched by the police) or self-employed plumbers (whose tax returns, we are told, are often found unreliable).

[81] Both arguments, I readily acknowledge, appear to have considerable force. Clearly it is unacceptable for someone to be treated less favourably because of his race whatever the motives underlying such treatment and whether or not it results from the discriminator making stereotyped assumptions. My difficulty, however, is in recognising in the practice followed at Prague Airport anything that can realistically be regarded as less favourable treatment of Roma qua Roma. True, as we ourselves have postulated, Roma are questioned more intensively and with a greater degree of scepticism that non-Roma (although I reject the appellants' contention—see 61, above—that they are subjected to a higher standard of proof). True too, para 2 of the s 19D(2)(b) authorisation provided in terms for 'a more rigorous examination [for, amongst others, Roma] than other persons in the same circumstances'. I reject, however, the contended-for implication that such an examination must necessarily otherwise be unlawful. How, I ask rhetorically, is an objection to the more rigorous questioning of some than others reconcilable with the exhortation repeatedly to be found throughout the case law that applications must be investigated individually, each applicant being given the opportunity to establish that he or she can satisfy whatever may be the legitimate requirements of the questioner? How can it be said that the Prague operation falls foul, for example, of the principle established in Hurley v Mustoe? On the contrary, what Browne-Wilkinson J surely was advocating there, in place of the wholesale rejection of women with children as an unreliable class of employees, was the questioning individually of women in that position, questioning logically likely to be more intensive in their case than in the case of other applicants for the same job. Consider similarly an employer interviewing for a job involving heavy lifting. He may not be entitled to refuse to interview women at all, but is he not permitted to question a female applicant for the job more sceptically and rigorously than her male counterpart?

[82] Nor do I see the operation of the Prague scheme as being in any way inconsistent with the majority decision of the House of Lords in James v Eastleigh BC [1990] 2 All ER 607, [1990] 2 AC 751. Once it was recognised that the council there might just as well have said that entry was free to women, but not men, in the 60–65 age group, the direct discrimination involved against men became indisputable. The condition of pensionability was itself patently gender-based. The position would in my judgment have been very different had the policy been instead to admit free, say, those who were in fact retired, or who could otherwise establish that they were of limited means; that would not have involved direct discrimination and, if challenged as indirect discrimination, would surely have been capable of justification.

[83] The gender-based discrimination so plainly evident in James' case was, of course, itself unlawful. The appellants appear to suggest that that is mirrored here by the discrimination against Roma in the Czech Republic which, of course, is what underlies the inevitable scepticism surrounding Roma applications for leave. I readily accept that the race discrimination against Roma in the Czech Republic is no less objectionable than sex discrimination in the United Kingdom. But it does not follow that the fact that Roma are discriminated against must be ignored and so cannot properly found the basis of otherwise legitimate concerns felt by immigration officers at Prague about Roma applicants seeking to enter the United Kingdom. On the contrary, once it is recognised as lawful to operate in Prague a policy designed to keep asylum seekers away from the United Kingdom, that policy must inevitably focus on those suffering discrimination abroad and for this purpose it cannot sensibly matter whether such discrimination is by reason of race, sex, politics, or whatever else may found a claim of persecution on convention grounds.

[84] The policy at Prague Airport is manifestly not to refuse Roma as Roma; rather it is to refuse prospective asylum seekers, or rather those who cannot satisfy the immigration officer to the requisite standard that they will not claim asylum on arrival. (That the policy is designed also to prevent travel to the United Kingdom even for one of the permitted purposes if the applicant cannot satisfy the immigration officer of a relevant condition for entering, seems to me for present purposes immaterial.) It is, it must be noted, a very different policy from that which could properly have been adopted pursuant to para 3 of the s 19D(2)(b) authorisation, namely a refusal of leave to any and all Roma qua Roma, irrespective of their purpose in travelling. That, of course, would have involved direct discrimination and been unlawful save under an express statutory authorisation.

[85] Nor to my mind can the Prague operation be said to fall foul of the principle established in Equal Opportunities Commission v Director of Education (22 June 2001, unreported) (see [76], above) or Re Equal Opportunities Commission (No 1) [1998] NI 223 (see [79], above). In both those cases a general policy was being adopted which necessarily depended for its validity upon assumed characteristics as between the respective sexes and which inevitably, therefore, disadvantaged a number of girls without their being given an opportunity to qualify for the relevant benefit on individual merit.

[86] I have already recognised that, because of the greater degree of scepticism with which Roma applicants will inevitably be treated, they are more likely to be refused leave to enter than non-Roma applicants. But this is because they are less well placed to persuade the immigration officer that they are not lying in order to seek asylum. That is not to say, however, that they are being stereotyped. Rather it is to acknowledge the undoubtedly disadvantaged position of many Roma in the Czech Republic. Of course it would be wrong in any individual case to assume that the Roma applicant is lying, but I decline to hold that the immigration officer cannot properly be warier of that possibility in a Roma's case than in the case of a non-Roma applicant. If a terrorist outrage were committed on our streets today, would the police not be entitled to question more suspiciously those in the vicinity appearing to come from an Islamic background? Similarly in the case of sectarian violence in Northern Ireland. These seem to me the relevant analogies here, not the now defunct practice of repeatedly stopping and searching black youths, clearly an unjustifiable interference with their liberty unless reasonable grounds exist for suspecting those actually stopped.

[87] There are, it seems to me, various jurisprudential paths by which to reach what I conceive to be the commonsense result in this case. I would hold either that the Roma applicants are not being treated less favourably than others in the respects alleged, alternatively, if they are, that this is not 'on racial grounds'. If necessary I would hold that there are no relevant comparators against whom to judge the treatment of Roma applicants. I believe that the true analysis of this case is that, so far from Roma applicants being treated less favourably than others in a comparable position, in reality there is being applied to them a requirement or condition which is applied equally to others: the requirement that they satisfy the immigration officer that they are not travelling to the United Kingdom with a view to claiming asylum. True, a considerably smaller proportion of Roma applicants than others are able to satisfy that requirement, but it is none the less justifiable. In other words, this appears to me to be a case of justifiable indirect discrimination. No case of indirect discrimination, however, has ever been advanced here, or is now sought to be advanced. The appellants' claim stands or falls as one of direct discrimination. For the reasons already given, I take the view that it falls.

[88] It follows from all this that in my judgment none of the appellants' arguments is sustainable and in the result the appeal fails and should be dismissed.

MANTELL LJ.

[89] I entirely agree with Simon Brown LJ that this appeal should be dismissed and for the reasons he gives. It is only because I am aware that Laws LJ does not that I add a few thoughts of my own and then, simply, on the area of disagreement.

[90] Applying Lord Steyn's test in Nagarajan v London Regional Transport [1999] 4 All ER 65 at 80, [2000] 1 AC 501 at 521–522 the question becomes: why did the immigration officer treat the Roma less favourably than the non-Roma? Surely the answer must be: because the Roma is more likely than the non-Roma to wish to claim asylum. It may be and almost certainly is the case that the wish to claim asylum comes about because the Roma has suffered discrimination from being Roma but that is not to answer the question posed. To turn the facts on their heads, suppose the object was to allow genuine asylum seekers to travel and to prevent those without genuine reasons from doing so: could it be said that the more intensive questioning of non-Roma amounted to discrimination against them? Another analogy might be where it is known that a dangerous virus is epidemic in, say, China and stringent medical examinations are imposed on all incoming travellers from that country. They are all Chinese. The same is not required of incomers from elsewhere. It cannot be disputed that the Chinese in such a case suffer different and discriminatory treatment, but not on racial grounds. The reason for the different treatment is that they are coming from a place where they might have been exposed to the virus: it just so happens that they are all Chinese. In that case a true comparator might be a non-Chinese travelling from China on the same plane, as in the present it would be a non-Roma believed likely to have been a victim of discrimination or persecution.

[91] The difference between the present case, the chosen analogues and the example put forward in argument is that, in the latter, generalised assumptions are being made about the character or proclivities of black youths by reason of their colour or race, whereas in the former the only assumption is about the possible effect on an individual of influences from outside.

[92] If, as I believe, that analysis is correct, it would follow that the practice at Prague Airport does not amount to direct racial discrimination which is all the Secretary of State has to meet, a satisfactory outcome since any other would be an affront to common sense. If it were to amount to indirect discrimination I would hold it to be justifiable for the reasons given by Simon Brown LJ.

LAWS LJ.

[93] I adopt with gratitude the description of the facts, the account of the material legislation and treaty provisions, and the learning given in the judgment of Simon Brown LJ whose judgment I have had the opportunity to read in draft. I agree entirely with his conclusions on what he has called the convention challenge, and the challenge based on the alleged breach of the immigration rules; and with his reasons for concluding on these points as he does. In light of the importance of the convention challenge and the depth of the arguments about it which were presented to us, I will add some observations of my own relating to what has been called the 'justiciability' aspect of this part of the case.

[94] However before doing so I have to say that as regards the appellants' claim of direct race discrimination I am unable to agree with the conclusions arrived at by Simon Brown LJ, and shared by Mantell LJ; and I will of course explain why not.

THE CONVENTION CHALLENGE: JUSTICIABILITY

[95] The genesis of an international treaty is quite different from the genesis of an Act of the United Kingdom Parliament. An international treaty is forged by debate, compromise and negotiation between the governments of sovereign nation states. Simon Brown LJ has referred (at [46], above) to the observation of Dawson J in Applicant A v Minister for Immigration and Ethnic Affairs (1997) 190 CLR 225 at 248 that '[t]he purpose of an instrument may ... be pursued in a limited way, reflecting the accommodation of differing viewpoints ...' (my emphasis). And there is generally no legal tribunal or political assembly before whom the outcome of this process may overall be called to account. Treaties are, to adopt a phrase from an altogether different discipline, free radicals.

[96] By contrast an Act of the United Kingdom Parliament is, as everyone knows, made by a national assembly answerable to the citizens at elections. There may be negotiations between parties; between factions within parties; between the two Houses of Parliament. But every party to any such negotiation is subject only to our law and constitution, and the outcome of the process may very firmly be called to account: for the legality of what is done in its name, to the courts of law; for its wisdom, to the people at the ballot box.

[97] There is no analogue to these procedures in the case of an international treaty. Treaties are, under our constitution, made by the Executive and not by the legislature. Saving certain arcane exceptions, the Executive is not a source of law in England. Hence the rule that no treaty comes within the body of the law of the land unless it is specifically incorporated by Act of Parliament. The rule is a benign one: no one is to be subjected to any burden or requirement imposed by the state, unless it is given by the common law or by or under statute. The rule applies no less where the treaty under consideration confers advantages, advantages here are burdens there. I think it salutary to repeat the well-known words of Lord Oliver of Aylmerton in Maclaine Watson & Co Ltd v Dept of Trade and Industry, Maclaine Watson & Co Ltd v International Tin Council [1989] 3 All ER 523 at 544–545, [1990] 2 AC 418 at 500:

> '... as a matter of the constitutional law of the United Kingdom, the royal prerogative, whilst it embraces the making of treaties, does not extend to altering the law or conferring rights on individuals or depriving individuals of rights which they enjoy in domestic law without the intervention of Parliament. Treaties, as it is sometimes expressed, are not self-executing. Quite simply, a treaty is not part of English law unless and until it has been incorporated into the law by legislation. So far as individuals are concerned, it is res inter alios acta from which they cannot derive rights and by which they cannot be deprived of rights or subjected to obligations; and it is outside the purview of the court not only because it is made in the conduct of foreign relations, which are a prerogative of the Crown, but also because, as a source of rights and obligations, it is irrelevant.'

[98] For these reasons it is important to be precise as to the extent to which any given international treaty has by municipal legislation become part of our law. It is commonplace to suppose that the 1951 convention has been 'incorporated' in domestic law. But this is in context a loose expression. The exact position is given, first, by s 2 of the Asylum and Immigration Appeals Act 1993 which provides: 'Nothing in the immigration rules (within the meaning of the [Immigration Act 1971]) shall lay down any practice which would be contrary to the Convention.' Secondly, the Geneva Convention relating to the Status of Refugees (Geneva, 28 July 1951; TS 39 (1953); Cmnd 9171) (as amended by the 1967 Protocol (New York, 31 January 1967; TS 15 (1969); Cmnd 3906) (the 1951 convention) is engaged in our domestic law by the statutory provisions which confer rights of appeal to the immigration appellate authorities on individuals who claim that their removal or deportation from the United Kingdom would contravene their convention rights. These provisions have been revised from time to time. It is unnecessary to enter into the detail. It is true that in R v Secretary of State for the Home Dept, ex p Sivakumaran (UN High Comr for Refugees intervening) [1988] 1 All ER 193 at 195, [1988] AC 958 at 990 Lord Keith of Kinkel observed that the 1951 convention had 'for all practical purposes been incorporated into United Kingdom law'. But with respect it is clear in context that he was referring, and only referring, to the obligations which the Secretary of State had undertaken by force of the immigration rules then in force. I would of course accept without cavil that in a case where and to the extent that the 1951 convention is engaged, the Secretary of State's duty is to be loyal to it with all that that entails, and the court will insist that the duty is observed. So much is given, but in the context of the present case with respect no more is given, by the judgment of this court presided over by Lord Phillips of Worth Matravers MR in Saad v Secretary of State for the Home Department, Diriye v Secretary of State for the Home Department, Osorio v Secretary of State for the Home Department [2001] EWCA Civ 2008, [2001] All ER (D) 307 (Dec).

[99] In my judgment the convention challenge is concluded against the appellants on these following short grounds. There is nothing in the immigration rules which lays down any practice which would be contrary to the 1951 convention. There is thus no contravention of s 2 of the 1993 Act. I do not understand this proposition to be seriously contested. No submission has been made to us that anything in the rules is ultra vires s 2. Nor has any argument been advanced to the effect that any statutory right of appeal has been frustrated or undermined by the pre-clearance scheme at Prague Airport. Indeed (as I understand is accepted) no question as to the statutory appeal rights arises, since on the facts there is no person facing removal or deportation from the United Kingdom who is thereby in a position to assert that his convention rights would or might be violated. The appellants are therefore, as I see the matter, driven to assert that the 1951 convention has distinct and enforceable effects in the domestic law of England which transcend the reach of its incorporation by Parliament. But that is a constitutional solecism.

[100] In my judgment it is important that the convention point should be dismissed on this short ground. Nothing, surely, is more elementary than the certainty required for the identification of what is and is not law in our modern constitution; and we must not be seduced by humanitarian claims to a spurious acceptance of a false source of law. I should say that these considerations have led me to feel, with great respect, some unease in relation to a particular line of authority relied on by Lord Lester of Herne Hill QC for the appellants, which is to be found in R v Secretary of State for the Home Dept, ex p Ahmed [1998] INLR 570 and R v Uxbridge Magistrates' Court, ex p Adimi [1999] 4 All ER 520, [2001] QB 667. In the former case Lord Woolf MR ([1998] INLR 570 at 583–584) and Hobhouse LJ (at 591–592) indicated, obiter, that the Crown's ratification of, or entry into, a treaty might be capable of giving rise to a legitimate expectation upon which the public in general would be entitled to rely. Reference was made to the decision of the High Court of Australia in Minister for Immigration and Ethnic Affairs v Teoh (Human Rights and Equal Opportunities Commission intervening) [1995] 183 CLR 273 at 291 (per Mason CJ and Deane J). In Ex p Adimi the Divisional Court had to consider art 31 of the 1951 convention. Simon Brown LJ referred to Ex p Ahmed, and accepted what Lord Woolf MR had said obiter; he continued ([1999] 4 All ER 520 at 535, [2001] QB 667 at 686):

> 'By the time of these applicants' prosecutions, at latest, it seems to me that refugees generally had become entitled to the benefit of art 31 in accordance with the developing doctrine of legitimate expectations ...'

[101] The proposition that the act of ratifying a treaty could without more give rise to enforceable legitimate expectations seems to me to amount, pragmatically, to a means of incorporating the substance of obligations undertaken on the international plane into our domestic law without the authority of Parliament. In Chundawadra v Immigration Appeal Tribunal [1988] Imm AR 161 this court held that ratification of the European Convention on Human Rights created no justiciable legitimate expectation that the convention's provisions would be complied with. In Behluli v Secretary of State for the Home Dept [1998] Imm AR 407 a like conclusion was arrived at in this court in relation to the Convention determining the State responsible for examining Applications for Asylum lodged in one of the Member States of the European Communities (Dublin; TS 72 (1997); Cm 3806 (the Dublin Convention). Beldam LJ said (at 415):

> 'In ... Minister for Immigration and Ethnic Affairs v Teoh [1995] 3 LRC 1 ... it was said that in that jurisdiction ratification of a Convention was to be regarded as a positive statement by the executive Government and its agencies that they would act in accordance with the Convention and that that positive statement was an adequate foundation for a legitimate expectation in the absence of statutory or executive indications to the contrary. But as is clear from [Brind v Secretary of State for the Home Dept [1991] 1 All ER 720, [1991] 1 AC 696], that is not the law in this country.'

We are of course bound by Chundawadra's case and Behluli's case, which were not referred to in the judgments in Ex p Ahmed and Ex p Adimi; and the report shows that they were not cited to the Divisional Court in the latter case.

RACE DISCRIMINATION

[102] Simon Brown LJ states (at [67], above) the premises of this part of the appeal in three propositions. The last of them, which with respect is plainly true on the facts of the case, is put thus: '... Roma are questioned for longer and more intensively than non-Roma and are more likely to be refused leave to enter than non-Roma'. It seems to me inescapable that this fact constitutes less favourable treatment to the Roma in comparison with the treatment of non-Roma, within the meaning of s 1(1)(a) of the Race Relations Act 1976. I have heard no sensible argument to the contrary. The question is whether such treatment is on racial grounds; if it is, direct discrimination is established.

[103] Clearly, whether A's less favourable treatment of B is on racial grounds or not is a question of fact, though it is constrained by certain matters of law which the tribunal deciding the question has to get right. Of these one of the most important is that it does not have to be shown that the putative discriminator was actuated by a conscious or unconscious racial motivation. Simon Brown LJ has referred to the principal authorities (at [72] ff, above). In any given case the motivation may have nothing whatever to do with race. As Simon Brown LJ has said (at 67, above) it is inevitable on the facts here that an immigration officer, involved in the scheme at Prague Airport, will be more sceptical of the true intentions of a Roma who asserts a desire to travel to the United Kingdom for a non-asylum reason than in the case of a non-Roma who asserts the same. Indeed it is in particular the conscientious immigration officer who will thus be more sceptical. And like Simon Brown LJ I would accept without cavil that the immigration officers operating the scheme are not in the least motivated by any desire to discriminate against Roma as Roma.

[104] The factual inquiry which the tribunal, faced with a complaint of direct discrimination, has to make was shortly expressed by Lord Steyn in Nagarajan v London Regional Transport [1999] 4 All ER 65 at 80, [2000] 1 AC 501 at 521–522 as follows:

> '... in s 1(1)(a) cases the tribunal simply has to pose the question: why did the defendant treat the employee less favourably? They do not have to consider whether a defendant was consciously motivated in his unequal treatment of an employee. That is a straightforward way of carrying out its task in a s 1(1)(a) case.'

[105] Simon Brown LJ has also cited (at [76] ff, above) authority which demonstrates the imperative of avoiding what has been called 'stereotyping'. I think it convenient to repeat two judicial observations which were cited by Burton J below ([2002] EWHC 1989 at [51], [52], [2002] All ER (D) 127 (Oct) at [51], [52], [2003] ACD 53), though they have already been recalled by Simon Brown LJ (at [63], above). First there is what was said by Lord Nicholls of Birkenhead in Nagarajan's case [1999] 4 All ER 65 at 71, 72, [2000] 1 AC 501 at 511–512:

> 'All human beings have preconceptions, beliefs, attitudes and prejudices on many subjects. It is part of our make-up. Moreover, we do not always recognise our own prejudices ... Members of racial groups need protection from conduct driven by unrecognised prejudice as much as from conscious and deliberate discrimination.'

Secondly, there is Balcombe LJ's reference in West Midlands Passenger Executive v Singh [1988] 2 All ER 873 at 877, [1988] 1 WLR 730 at 736, to 'a conscious or unconscious racial attitude which involves stereotyped assumptions'.

[106] In my judgment the irrelevance of motive, and the impermissibility of stereotyping, have to be considered with some care. Each involves a risk of confusion. As for the first, what is irrelevant is the discriminator's motive, or reason, for acting on racial grounds. He may discriminate against a person or persons of a particular race even though he possesses no animus whatever, conscious or unconscious, against persons of that race. R v Commission for Racial Equality, ex p Westminster City Council [1985] ICR 827, cited by Simon Brown LJ (at [72], [73], above), is a good example. The irrelevance of motive does not prohibit the tribunal from investigating the discriminator's state of mind; indeed, very obviously, that is where his grounds for acting as he did are to be ascertained. The risk of confusion here is that motive's being out of bounds might lead one to suppose that the exercise of adjudication in a direct discrimination case is merely one of ascertaining an objective cause of the actor's conduct, as distinct from his thought processes; but that would in truth be a meaningless exercise. Lord Browne-Wilkinson's reasoning in Nagarajan's case [1999] 4 All ER 65 at 68–70, [2000] 1 AC 501 at 508–509, which with respect I need not set out, bears on this part of the case.

[107] The law then is clear: once it is shown that the discriminator's act was taken on racial grounds, the reason why he acted on such grounds is neither here nor there. I would wish respectfully to repeat these observations of Lord Nicholls in Nagarajan's case [1999] 4 All ER 65 at 71, [2000] 1 AC 501 at 511:

> '... a second and different question: if the discriminator treated the complainant less favourably on racial grounds, why did he do so? The latter question is strictly beside the point when deciding whether an act of racial discrimination occurred. For the purposes of direct discrimination ... the reason why the alleged discriminator acted on racial grounds is irrelevant. Racial discrimination is not negatived by the discriminator's motive or intention or reason or purpose (the words are interchangeable in this context) in treating another person less favourably on racial grounds.'

[108] The mistake that might arise in relation to stereotyping would be a supposition that the stereotype is only vicious if it is untrue. But that cannot be right. If it were, it would imply that direct discrimination can be justified; whereas it is entirely plain that the legislature has advisedly chosen to allow justification of indirect, but not direct, discrimination.

[109] A consideration of all these factors provides, in my judgment, the answer to this part of the case. As Ms Rose submitted at para 2 of her written reply, when a Roma and non-Roma both present themselves at the desk at Prague Airport and state they wish to visit London for the weekend, the immigration officer at that stage knows nothing of their personal circumstances. He has not seen what evidence they have to support their applications for leave to enter as visitors. All he knows, from their appearance, is that one is Roma and the other is not. He treats the Roma less favourably, by subjecting him or her to a more intrusive inquiry with a lesser prospect of leave to enter being granted. One asks Lord Steyn's question: why did he treat the Roma less favourably? It may be said there are two possible answers: (1) because he is Roma; or (2) because he is more likely to be advancing a false application for leave to enter as a visitor. But it seems to me inescapable that the reality is that the officer treated the Roma less favourably because Roma are (for very well understood reasons) more likely to wish to seek asylum and thus more likely to put forward a false claim to enter as a visitor. The officer has applied a stereotype; though one which may very likely be true. That is not permissible. More pointedly, he has an entirely proper reason (or motive) for treating the Roma less favourably on racial grounds: his duty to refuse those without a claim under the rules, manifestly including covert asylum seekers, and his knowledge that the Roma is more likely to be a covert asylum seeker. But that is irrelevant to the claim under s 1(1)(a) of the 1976 Act.

[110] For these reasons I am driven to disagree with Simon Brown and Mantell LJJ on this part of the case. I do so with no satisfaction. The Prague scheme is entirely unobjectionable vis-à-vis the United Kingdom's international obligations. The government is perfectly entitled to form the political judgment that it is a desirable initiative in the public interest. And my view on the discrimination issue, had it prevailed, might have had surprising ramifications well beyond the four corners of this case. But elementarily, we are not concerned with such things.

[111] I would allow the appeal.

The appeal would be dismissed. Permission to appeal to the House of Lords granted.

Dilys Tausz Barrister.

R (on the application of B) v Merton London Borough Council

[2003] EWHC 1689 (Admin)

QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION (ADMINISTRATIVE COURT)
STANLEY BURNTON J
6 JUNE, 14 JULY 2003

Immigration – Asylum seeker – Unaccompanied asylum seeker claiming to be under 18 years old – Local authority assessing whether asylum seeker child in need – Determination of age – Guidance – Children Act 1989.

The claimant was an unaccompanied asylum seeker with no means of support in the United Kingdom. He claimed to be 17 years old. The Home Office did not consider him to be a minor and treated him as an adult. As a person aged under 18, and in need, he would have been owed a duty under Pt III of the Children Act 1989 by the local authority in whose area he was, including a duty to provide him with accommodation. The defendant local authority interviewed him in order to assess whether he was a child in need. The interview was conducted by a social worker in person, with an interpreter available on the telephone. The social worker considered there were a number of inconsistencies in the claimant's account of his history which led her to doubt his credibility, but she did not put those inconsistencies to the claimant. She determined that, while in need, the claimant was aged at least 18. He sought judicial review of that determination. The court was asked to give guidance as to the requirements of a lawful assessment under Pt III of the 1989 Act by a local authority of the age of a young asylum seeker claiming to be under the age of 18 years.

Held – The assessment of age in borderline cases was a difficult matter, but not a complex one. It was not an issue which required anything approaching a trial, and judicialisation of the process was to be avoided. It was a matter which could be determined informally, provided safeguards of minimum standards of inquiry and of fairness were adhered to. Except in clear cases, the decision-maker could not determine age solely on the basis of the appearance of the applicant. In general, the decision-maker had to seek to elicit the general background of the applicant, including his family circumstances and history, his educational background, and his activities during the previous few years. Ethnic and cultural information might also be important. If there were reason to doubt the applicant's statement as to his age, the decision-maker would have to make an assessment of his credibility, and ask questions designed to test credibility. There was no onus of proof on the applicant, the authority had to make its assessment on the material available to and obtained by it. There should be no predisposition, divorced from the information and evidence available to an authority, to assume that an applicant was an adult, or conversely that he was a child. A local authority could not simply adopt a decision made by the Home Office on an application for asylum. It might take into account information obtained by the Home Office, but it had to make its own decision, and for that purpose had to have available to it adequate information. Medical reports were not likely to be helpful; for someone close to the age of 18 there was no reliable a medical or other scientific test to determine whether he was over or under that age. It was not necessary for an authority to provide support for a period of some weeks to give the opportunity for others to observe the applicant, if the information available was sufficient for a decision to be made. Where an interpreter was required, it was greatly preferable for him to be present during the interview to avoid a risk of misunderstandings. Although it was not necessary b as a matter of law for there to be verbatim notes of the interview, such a note would enable the court to be more confident of its accuracy and to address any suggestion that the interviewer had put words into the mouth of the applicant by asking leading questions. If the decision-maker formed the provisional view that an applicant was lying as to his age then the applicant had to be given the opportunity to address the matters that had led to that view, so that he could c explain himself if he were able to. Following an interview and any other inquiries, an authority was obliged to give adequate reasons for its decision refusing support under the 1989 Act. The consequences of such a decision might be drastic for the applicant, and he was entitled to know the basis for it, and to consider whether the decision was a lawful one. Nevertheless, the reasons did d not need to be long or elaborate. It would be sufficient to state that the decision was based on the appearance and behaviour, or demeanour, of the applicant and the matters which led the authority to conclude that the applicant was not truthful. In the instant case, the possibility that the claimant might have been able to rectify any misunderstanding, if the matters relied upon by the defendant in coming to its decision had been put to him, meant that the defendant had not e satisfied the onus of establishing that, even if, they had been put to the claimant, the same decision would inevitably have been made. There was no evidence that there had been a suitable alternative complaint or review procedure available to the claimant to challenge the defendant's decision. Accordingly, the defendant's decision would be set aside. The defendant was to reconsider the age of the f claimant using the information presently available to it (see [22], [36]–[39], [45], [48], [52], [54]–[58], below).

Notes

For a local authority's duty to provide accommodation for children in need g within its area and the application and scope of the duty to act fairly, see 5(3) Halsbury's Laws (4th edn reissue) para 1319 and 1(1) Halsbury's Laws (4th edn) (2001 reissue) para 96, respectively.

Cases referred to in judgment

h Nash v Chelsea College of Art and Design [2001] EWHC 538 (Admin), [2001] All ER (D) 133 (Jul), (2001) Times, 25 July.

R v Northamptonshire CC, ex p W [1998] ELR 291.

R (on the application of Ashworth Mental Hospital) v Mental Health Review Tribunal for West Midlands and North West Region [2001] EWHC 901 (Admin), (2002) 5 CCL j Rep 78; affd in part [2002] EWCA Civ 923, [2003] 1 WLR 127.

R (on the application of Q) v Secretary of State for the Home Department [2003] EWHC 195 (Admin), [2003] All ER (D) 251 (Feb), (2003) 100(15) LSG 26; affd [2003] EWCA Civ 364, [2003] 2 All ER 905, [2003] 3 WLR 365.

R v Westminster City Council, ex p Ermakov [1996] 2 All ER 302, CA.

Wallworth v Balmer [1965] 3 All ER 721, [1966] 1 WLR 16, DC.

Cases referred to in skeleton arguments

Doody v Secretary of State for the Home Dept [1993] 3 All ER 92, [1994] 1 AC 531, [1993] 3 WLR 154, HL.

Lavender (H) and Son Ltd v Minister of Housing and Local Government [1970] 3 All ER 871, [1970] 1 WLR 1231.

R v Civil Service Appeal Board, ex p Cunningham [1991] 4 All ER 310, [1992] ICR 816, CA.

R v Higher Education Funding Council, ex p Institute of Dental Surgery [1994] 1 All ER 651, [1994] 1 WLR 242, DC.

Application

The claimant, B, applied for judicial review of the determination of the defendant, Merton London Borough Council, on 13 February 2003, that the claimant was at least 18 years old and was accordingly owed no duty by the defendant under Pt III of the Children Act 1989. The facts are set out in the judgment.

Robert Latham (instructed by Shelter Legal Services) for the claimant.

Nicholas O'Brien (instructed by Julie Belvir) for the defendant.

Cur adv vult

14 July 2003. The following judgment was delivered.

STANLEY BURNTON J.

INTRODUCTION

[1] The claimant is an asylum seeker. He has no means of support in this country. He claims to be aged 17. If so, he is not an asylum seeker within the meaning of the Nationality, Immigration and Asylum Act 2002, which does not apply to those who are not aged at least 18 years (see s 18(1)(a)), and the Secretary of State for the Home Department has no responsibility for his support under that Act. But, if he is under 18, and is in need, he is owed a duty under Pt III of the Children Act 1989 by the local authority in whose area he is, including a duty under s 20 of that Act to provide him with accommodation.

[2] However, on 13 February 2003 the defendant determined that he was aged at least 18. On that basis, he was not a child and the local authority owed him no duty under the 1989 Act.

[3] In these proceedings the claimant seeks the judicial review of that determination.

[4] Both parties have asked the court to give guidance as to the requirements of a lawful assessment by a local authority of the age of a young asylum seeker claiming to be under the age of 18 years. There are significant numbers of unaccompanied children entering the United Kingdom and claiming asylum. An acronym has come into use: UASC (unaccompanied asylum-seeking child).

THE FACTS

[5] The claimant's case is as follows. He was born in the Ivory Coast on 6 February 1986. His father was a Catholic; his mother a Muslim. She was Senegalese. He was educated in part in Catholic schools and confirmed into the Catholic faith in 2000. His mother died in 2001 and was buried in Senegal. His father and he went to Senegal for the funeral, and while there his father was murdered. He then spent a year living on the streets in Senegal. He speaks French, but not English.

[6] The claimant states that he arrived in the United Kingdom from Senegal on 1 February 2003. On 7 February 2003 he was taken to the Refugee Council, which secured accommodation for him for the weekend.

[7] On Monday 10 February 2003 he applied for asylum at Croydon. He could not name the airport where he had arrived in this country. The National Asylum Support Service (NASS) decided that he was not a minor and should be treated as an adult; they refused him support on the ground that they were not satisfied that he had made his asylum claim as soon as reasonably practicable after his arrival in the United Kingdom.

[8] On 12 February 2003 the Refugee Council referred the claimant to the defendant borough for assistance under s 17 of the 1989 Act. The defendant did not assess him immediately, and asked him to return on 13 February 2003.

[9] On that day, he was interviewed by Christine Rodney, a social worker of the defendant's Department of Housing and Social Services. He had with him the NASS letter of 10 February 2003 stating that the Home Secretary did not consider him to be a minor and refusing him support, and he produced it to Ms Rodney. The duration of the interview is in issue, the claimant estimating it at 25–30 minutes and Ms Rodney at 45 minutes, but it is accepted by both sides that my decision cannot turn on this issue. Ms Rodney does not speak French. The interview was conducted through an interpreter on the other end of a telephone: Miss Rodney would give the interpreter the question, the telephone was then passed to the claimant for him to hear the French translation and to give his answer, and the telephone would then be passed to Ms Rodney for her to hear the translation of the claimant's answer and to ask the next question.

[10] Ms Rodney did not keep a verbatim record of the interview. She used a pro forma document, the Framework of Assessment for Children in Need and their Families, and completed it following the interview. She noted that he had gone to a Catholic school, but also that he identified with the Islamic faith and its culture. She took a family history, which included the murder of his father. She noted:

> 'Both (B's) parents are dead. His father was slayed by masked men. (B) was able to escape. (B) spent a year in Senegal on the streets before being assisted in coming to the UK.'

[11] Under the heading of 'Ethnicity', Ms Rodney noted: '(B) is a Black African, he is of the Catholic faith ...' Under the heading 'Summary', she noted:

> '(B) is a young man who claims to be 17 years old. (B's) appearance is that of a much older man. My calculated guess (is that) he is in his late teens. Unfortunately, (B's) history is that of ... experiencing loss and violence and this alone will affect him emotionally.'

[12] The original manuscript of the form shows that the number 17 was written over another number. The typescript made from the manuscript has the figure 16. Ms Rodney does not deal with this discrepancy in her witness statement. The most likely explanation is that the figure of 16 was originally written on the form, on the basis of her calculation of his age from the date of birth he had given and which she had written on p 1 of the form.

[13] Ms Rodney concluded that although the claimant was in need, he was not a child. Her assessment was as follows:

> '(B) is not a child in need. I am not disputing that he is in need in his own right. I have followed the procedure by undertaking an assessment and from this assessment I am taking the stance of the Home Office.'

[14] In her witness statement, Ms Rodney stated:

> '(B) has the physical appearance of a person older than 17. He does not have a youthful appearance and in my view is at least 18–20 years old. Throughout the interview (B) was very mature and confident. I am of the view that (B's) level of confidence is unusual for an unaccompanied minor.'

Mr Latham relied upon the difference between this statement and that in the form that he was 'in his late teens', and said that this part of her witness statement was an ex post facto attempt to justify her decision.

[15] Ms Rodney also referred in her witness statement to inconsistencies in the claimant's account of his history. She stated:

> 'There were a number of inconsistencies in (B's) account of his history which made (me) doubt his credibility as follows: (a) (B) did not remember what one of his educational diplomas was for. I am of the view that this is unusual for a 17-year-old. (b) (B) indicated that he was in school until four months ago but later in the interview said that he had been on the streets in Senegal for a year. (c) (B) said that four months ago he had to stop school because his parents could no longer afford the fees, yet he said that his father had died a year ago and his mother before that. (d) (B) said that he had been befriended by two strangers (one in the United Kingdom who took him to the Refugee Council and one in Senegal who took him to this country). (B) was unable to identify these people. I am of the view that this account was a little far-fetched.'

[16] At the end of the interview, Ms Rodney gave the claimant a decision letter, dated 13 February 2003, signed by her team manager. It stated:

> 'This Department has taken the stance of the Home Office. The Secretary of State does not accept that you are a minor and is satisfied that you should be treated as an adult. Accordingly, you will need to return to the Refugee Council and request that they advocate on your behalf with the Home Office.'

THE PARTIES' CONTENTIONS IN SUMMARY

[17] The claimant contends: (i) The inquiries made by the defendant were inadequate. It is not possible to determine age on the basis of appearance only, and the defendant should have arranged for a medical examination before making its decision. (ii) There was procedural unfairness, in that he should have been given an adequate opportunity to answer the points that the defendant was minded to hold against him. (iii) The defendant did not itself make a determination of the claimant's age, but simply adopted the conclusion of the Home Secretary.

[18] The defendant contends that the assessment process was rational, adequate and lawful; the decision made by it was a reasonable decision on a question of fact; and therefore that it cannot be impugned.

[19] Mr Latham also submitted that the determination of the age of the claimant was a determination of his civil rights within the meaning of art 6 of the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms 1950 (as set out in Sch 1 to the Human Rights Act 1998). If it is, clearly the decision of the defendant's social worker is not that of an independent and impartial tribunal. However, Mr Latham also accepted that judicial review of the defendant's decision would render the process as a whole convention compliant.

THE BACKGROUND

[20] In a case such as the present, the applicant does not produce any reliable documentary evidence of his date of birth or age. In such circumstances, the determination of the age of the applicant will depend on the history he gives, on his physical appearance and on his behaviour.

[21] There is no statutory procedure or guidance issued to local authorities as to how to conduct an assessment of the age of a person claiming to be under 18 for the purpose of deciding on the applicability of Pt III of the 1989 Act.

[22] The determination of an applicant's age is rendered difficult by the absence of any reliable anthropometric test: for someone who is close to the age of 18, there is no reliable medical or other scientific test to determine whether he or she is over or under 18. The Health of Refugee Children—Guidelines for Paediatricians published in November 1999 by the Royal College of Paediatrics and Child Health states (p 13 (para 5.6)):

> 'In practice, age determination is extremely difficult to do with certainty, and no single approach to this can be relied on. Moreover, for young people aged 15–18, it is even less possible to be certain about age. There may also be difficulties in determining whether a young person who might be as old as 23 could, in fact, be under the age of 18. Age determination is an inexact science and the margin of error can sometimes be a much as 5 years either side ... Overall, it is not possible to actually predict the age of an individual from any anthropometric measure, and this should not be attempted. Any assessments that are made should also take into account relevant factors from the child's medical, family and social history.'

[23] Different people living in the same country, with the same culture and diet, mature physically and psychologically at different rates. It is difficult for a layman to determine the age of someone born in this country with any accuracy. A general practitioner is very unlikely to have the knowledge or experience to improve on the accuracy of an intelligent layman. To obtain any reliable medical opinion, one has to go to one of the few paediatricians who have experience in this area. Even they can be of limited help, as in the instant case and is referred to below.

[24] The difficulties are compounded when the young person in question is of an ethnicity, culture, education and background that are foreign, and unfamiliar, to the decision-maker.

[25] Shelter obtained a report on the claimant from Dr Colin Michie, a consultant paediatrician with a particular interest in investigating physiological changes with age who had conducted over 300 examinations in order to estimate age in the last year alone. He stated:

> 'It is possible that (B) has provided a correct birth date. His social history supports this year of birth with some accuracy. Further his height and weight, skin fold thickness, the skin signs seen in young adults and his dental examination were consistent with a chronological age of 18 ± 2 years when compared with published charts of these measures (see references). This observation is supported by non-objective assessment of the psychological maturity of the client during the interview. A more narrow error margin is not possible using these methods. The birth date given to me today by (B) falls within these wide error limits.'

[26] Mr Latham relied on Dr Michie's report as supporting the claimant's case. But it equally supports the defendant's: his range of 18 plus or minus two years is also consistent with Ms Rodney's assessment. Indeed, it is more supportive of Ms Rodney's assessment than the claimant's case, since the median age given by Dr Michie is 18.

[27] Of course, there may be cases where it is very obvious that a person is under or over 18. In such cases there is normally no need for prolonged inquiry; indeed, if the person is obviously a child, no inquiry at all is called for. The present is not such a case. The difficulty normally only arises in cases, such as the present, where the person concerned is approaching 18 or is only a few years over 18. But the possibility of obvious cases means that it is not possible to prescribe the level or manner of inquiry so as sensibly to cover all cases.

[28] Given the impossibility of any decision-maker being able to make an objectively verifiable determination of the age of an applicant who may be in the age range of, say, 16–20, it is necessary to take a history from him or her with a view to determining whether it is true. A history that is accepted as true and is consistent with an age below 18 will enable the decision-maker in such a case to decide that the applicant is a child. Conversely, however, an untrue history, while relevant, is not necessarily indicative of a lie as to the age of the applicant. Lies may be told for reasons unconnected with the applicant's case as to his age, for example to avoid his return to his country of origin. Furthermore, physical appearance and behaviour cannot be isolated from the question of the veracity of the applicant: appearance, behaviour and the credibility of his account are all matters that reflect on each other.

[29] In this context, as in others, it would be naïve to assume that the applicant is unaware of the advantages of being thought to be a child. Draft Practice Guidelines for Age Assessment of Young Unaccompanied Asylum Seekers (issued by the London Boroughs of Hillingdon and Croydon) state:

> 'Assessment of age is a complex task, which is a process and not an exact science. This is further complicated by many of the young people attempting to portray a different age from their true age.'

It advises the decision-maker/interviewer: 'It is also important to be mindful of the "coaching" that the asylum seeker may have had prior to arrival, in how to behave and what to say.'

[30] The lack of a passport or other travel document may itself justify suspicion, as it did in the present case, particularly if the applicant claims to have entered this country overtly, for example through an airport, in circumstances in which a passport must be produced.

DECISIONS IN OTHER CONTEXTS

[31] This is not the only context in which decisions may have to be made as to whether a person is over 18. Where the person is not brought before the court to give evidence, s 99 of the Children and Young Persons Act 1933 applies. It does not expressly stipulate what inquiries are appropriate where there is a material dispute as to age. Section 152 of the Magistrates' Courts Act 1980 provides that where a person's age is material for the purposes of the provisions of that Act regulating the powers of a magistrates' court, his age at the material time shall be deemed to be or to have been 'that which appears to the court after considering any available evidence to be or to have been his age at that time'. Part I of the Criminal Justice Act 1982 is concerned with the treatment of young offenders, and s 1(6) of that Act makes similar provision in relation to the determination of a person's age by the court or the Home Secretary for the purposes of that Act. The wording of these provisions is indicative of the difficulty of precise and objective determination of age in the absence of reliable documentary evidence.

[32] Mr O'Brien sought to rely on the decision of the Divisional Court in Wallworth v Balmer [1965] 3 All ER 721, [1966] 1 WLR 16, in which, on a prosecution for knowingly selling liquor to a person under 18, the only evidence before the magistrate had been the appearance of the boys, who were present in court, to whom the liquor had been sold. Neither the prosecution nor the defence had sought to question the boys, and no evidence had been called as to their age. It was held that the magistrate, who was satisfied as to their age, had rightly convicted the defendant. I do not find that case of assistance. In the first place, the youth of the boys appears to have been obvious. Secondly, the defendant had the opportunity to question the boys or to call evidence as to their true age. He having failed to do so, the magistrate was entitled, indeed bound, to decide the case on the evidence before him. There could have been no complaint of lack of due process or of an unfair procedure.

OTHER GUIDANCE AS TO THE APPROPRIATE PROCEDURE

[33] A draft document entitled Practice Guidelines for Age Assessment of Young Unaccompanied Asylum Seekers, issued by the London Boroughs of Hillingdon and Croydon, who are participating in a pilot project for practitioners in social work with unaccompanied asylum-seeking children, makes sensible suggestions. It states that it is beneficial to have two assessing workers: clearly, two heads may be better than one. It implies a preference for age assessment to be undertaken over a period of time and involve other professionals, such as residential social worker staff, teachers, and other young people. It states:

> 'It is very important to ensure that the young person understands the role of the assessing worker, and comprehends the interpreter. Attention should also be paid to the level of tiredness, trauma, bewilderment and anxiety that may be present for the young person. The ethnicity, culture, and customs of the person being assessed must be a key focus throughout the assessment. It is also important to be mindful of the "coaching" that the asylum seeker may have had prior to arrival, in how to behave and what to say. Having clarified the role of the social services, it is important to engage with the person and establish as much rapport as the circumstances will allow. This process is sometimes known as "joining". The assessing worker needs to acknowledge with the young person that they will have had to already answer many questions, and that it may be difficult and distressing to answer some of the questions. In utilising the assessment framework, the practitioner should ask open-ended non leading questions. It is not expected that the form should be completed by systematically going through each component, but rather by formulating the interview in a semi-structured discussion gathering information at different stages, the use of circular questioning is a useful method as it is less obvious to the person being assessed that the questions relate directly to age and hence may reveal a clear picture of age related issues.'

[34] The draft includes a form for use when assessing the age of an applicant, with spaces for information as to his or her physical appearance and demeanour, manner of interaction with the assessing worker, social history and family composition, developmental considerations (ie information about the types of activities that the person was involved in before arriving in the United Kingdom), education, his or her level of independence and self-care, health and medical assessment, information from documentation and other sources and, finally, the conclusion of the assessment. In relation to the health and medical assessment, the form comments that 'A medical opinion and view on age will always be helpful', a statement with which it is difficult to quarrel. Side notes make helpful but commonsense suggestions, such as 'Life experience and trauma may impact on the ageing process'.

HOME OFFICE POLICY

[35] Policy Bulletin 33: Age Disputes, published by the Immigration and Nationality Directorate of the Home Office, states:

'8.1 If the applicant claims to be a minor but his/her appearance strongly suggests that s/he is over 18 the applicant will be treated as an adult until such time as credible documentary or medical evidence is produced which demonstrates that s/he is the age claimed. In borderline cases the Immigration Service will continue to give the applicant the benefit of the doubt and to deal with the applicant as a minor. In accordance with existing policy they will continue to inform the Refugee Council's Panel of Advisers of anyone who has claimed to be a minor, even when the age is disputed and the decision has been taken to treat the applicant as an adult ...

9.1 An asylum seeker who declares on arrival that s/he is under 18, and is given the benefit of the doubt by the Immigration Service, will be referred to the local authority social services department (SSD) for support under the Children Act 1989. The SSD will conduct an assessment and on the basis of that assessment may reach the conclusion that the person is aged over 18.

9.2 Where an application is received from an asylum seeker who declares that s/he is under 18, but it is accompanied by a letter from the SSD stating that, in their opinion, the person is aged over 18, s/he should be deemed to be an adult for NASS purposes until such time as s/he can prove otherwise. The burden of proof lies with the asylum seeker. It is up to him/her to prove that s/he is a minor. The applicant should be advised accordingly. A proforma letter, to be adapted as necessary, is attached at Annex A.'

The emphasis is in the original.

DISCUSSION

[36] The assessment of age in borderline cases is a difficult matter, but it is not complex. It is not an issue which requires anything approaching a trial, and judicialisation of the process is in my judgment to be avoided. It is a matter which may be determined informally, provided safeguards of minimum standards of inquiry and of fairness are adhered to.

[37] It is apparent from the foregoing that, except in clear cases, the decision-maker cannot determine age solely on the basis of the appearance of the applicant. In general, the decision-maker must seek to elicit the general background of the applicant, including his family circumstances and history, his educational background, and his activities during the previous few years. Ethnic and cultural information may also be important. If there is reason to doubt the applicant's statement as to his age, the decision-maker will have to make an assessment of his credibility, and he will have to ask questions designed to test his credibility.

[38] I do not think it is helpful to apply concepts of onus of proof to the assessment of age by local authorities. Unlike cases under s 55 of the 2002 Act, there is in the present context no legislative provision placing an onus of proof on the applicant. The local authority must make its assessment on the material available to and obtained by it. There should be no predisposition, divorced from the information and evidence available to the local authority, to assume that an applicant is an adult, or conversely that he is a child. Of course, if an applicant has previously stated that he was over 18, the decision-maker will take that previous statement into account, and in the absence of an acceptable explanation it may, when considered with the other material available, be decisive. Similarly, the appearance and demeanour of the applicant may justify a provisional view that he is indeed a child or an adult. In an obvious case, the appearance of the applicant alone will require him to be accepted as a child; or, conversely, justify his being determined to be an adult, in the absence of compelling evidence to the contrary.

[39] However, the social services department of a local authority cannot simply adopt a decision made by the Home Office. It must itself decide whether an applicant is a child in need: i e whether the applicant is a child, and if so whether he or she is in need within the meaning of Pt III of the 1989 Act. A local authority may take into account information obtained by the Home Office; but it must make its own decision, and for that purpose must have available to it adequate information. It follows that if all the defendant had done was, as stated by its letter of 13 February 2003, to have taken the stance of the Home Office, its decision would have been unlawful.

[40] In fact, however, the evidence satisfies me that the defendant did make its own assessment. That it did so, and the reasons given for its decision, are inconsistent with the letter of 13 February 2003. The issue is raised by Mr Latham whether in these circumstances the court should permit the defendant to justify its decision by reference to matters that were not referred to in that letter.

[41] In my judgment in Nash v Chelsea College of Art and Design [2001] EWHC 538 (Admin), [2001] All ER (D) 133 (Jul), (2001) Times, 25 July, I sought to summarise the principles applicable to this issue.

> '[34] In my judgment, the following propositions appear from the above authorities: (i) Where there is a statutory duty to give reasons as part of the notification of the decision, so that (as Law J put it in [R v Northamptonshire CC, ex p W [1998] ELR 291 at 299]) "the adequacy of the reasons is itself made a condition of the legality of the decision", only in exceptional circumstances if at all will the court accept subsequent evidence of the reasons. (ii) In other cases, the court will be cautious about accepting late reasons. The relevant considerations include the following, which to a significant degree overlap: (a) Whether the new reasons are consistent with the original reasons. (b) Whether it is clear that the new reasons are indeed the original reasons of the whole committee. (c) Whether there is a real risk that the later reasons have been composed subsequently in order to support the tribunal's decision, or are a retrospective justification of the original decision. This consideration is really an aspect of (b). (d) The delay before the later reasons were put forward. (e) The circumstances in which the later reasons were put forward. In particular, reasons put forward after the commencement of proceedings must be treated especially carefully. Conversely, reasons put forward during correspondence in which the parties are seeking to elucidate the decision should be approached more tolerantly.

[35] To these I add two further considerations. The first is based on general principles of administrative law. The degree of scrutiny and caution to be applied by the court to subsequent reasons should depend on the subject matter of the administrative decision in question. Where important human rights are concerned, as in asylum cases, anxious scrutiny is required; where the subject matter is less important, the court may be less demanding, and readier to accept subsequent reasons.

[36] Secondly, the court should bear in mind the qualifications and experience of the persons involved. It is one thing to require comprehensiveness and clarity from lawyers and those who regularly sit on administrative tribunals; it is another to require those qualities of occasional non-lawyer tribunal chairmen and members.'

[42] Subsequently, in R (on the application of Ashworth Mental Hospital) v Mental Health Review Tribunal for West Midlands and North West Region [2001] EWHC 901 (Admin) at [56], (2002) 5 CCL Rep 78 at [56], I accepted that the statement at 34 of my judgment in Nash's case was too widely expressed. Reasons that merely elucidate reasons given contemporaneously with a decision will normally be considered by the court (see R v Westminster City Council, ex p Ermakov [1996] 2 All ER 302).

[43] Unlike Ex p Ermakov, this is not a case in which statute required that reasons be given for the decision, let alone that reasons be given at the same time as the decision. The factors to which I referred in Nash's case point strongly to the admission of the defendant's evidence as to its true reasons for its decision. In particular, the original reason given can be ascribed to a lack of thought when the letter was written, and on that basis is not wholly in conflict with the evidence now put forward: compare that part of the assessment form quoted at [13], above with the letter of 13 February 2003 quoted at [16], above. There has been no undue delay; Ms Rodney is not a lawyer and a degree of latitude is appropriate when considering the letter she drafted. Most importantly, it is clear that the evidence before me does represent the true basis of, and gives the reasons for, Ms Rodney's decision, and in my judgment those reasons are adequate. The relatively minor inconsistency referred to at [14], above does not lead me to doubt the genuineness of her notes or of the reasons she has put forward for her decision.

[44] On this basis, the issues are: was the information available to the defendant adequate, and was the decision procedurally fair?

[45] However, I accept Mr Latham's submission that a local authority is obliged to give adequate reasons for its decision that an applicant claiming to be a child is not a child, and who is therefore refused support under Pt III of the 1989 Act. The consequences of such a decision may be drastic for the applicant, and he is entitled to know the basis for it, and to consider, if he can, with legal assistance if it is available to him, whether the decision is a lawful one. In my judgment this is the position at common law, irrespective of the issue as to the applicability of art 6 of the convention, as to which I say nothing. It is noteworthy that in the analogous context of a decision by the Home Secretary to refuse support under s 55 of the 2002 Act, in R (on the application of Q) v Secretary of State for the Home Department [2003] EWHC 195 (Admin) at [21], [2003] All ER (D) 251 (Feb) at [21], (2003) 100(15) LSG 26; affd [2003] EWCA Civ 364 at [80], [2003] 2 All ER 905 at [80], [2003] 3 WLR 365, the Home Secretary accepted that he was under a duty to give reasons for a decision adverse to an asylum seeker. I see no relevant distinction between those cases and the present. I bear in mind that the hypothesis is that the applicant is determined to be over 18, and therefore able to comprehend (if necessary in translation) the reasons given to him.

[46] The availability of an internal review or complaints procedure, to which I refer below, does not obviate the need for reasons: reasons are required so that the applicant may make an informed decision whether to ask the local authority to review its decision or to make a complaint concerning the decision, quite apart from the need for him (or rather a legal adviser) to be able to ascertain whether the decision is lawful or amenable to judicial review.

[47] Mr O'Brien told me that in practice reasons are given, but submitted that it is sufficient for a local authority to state that it refuses to provide the applicant with support under the 1989 Act because he is not a child. In my judgment, such a brief statement is a statement of the decision of the local authority, not of the reasons for its decision.

[48] However, in general, the reasons need not be long or elaborate. On what is ultimately a simple if difficult issue, it should not be necessary to go to the lengths seen in, for example, adjudicators' determinations in asylum cases. In the present case, it would have been sufficient to have stated that the decision was based on the appearance and behaviour (or demeanour) of the claimant, and on the matters referred to in Ms Rodney's statement (referred to at [15], above), which led her to conclude that he was not truthful.

THE ADEQUACY OF THE INFORMATION AVAILABLE TO THE DEFENDANT

[49] Mr Latham submitted that the information available to the defendant, and its procedure, were inadequate. If so, the decision reached by the defendant would be liable to be set aside as being one that no reasonable authority could have arrived at in the circumstances. He submitted that the form used by Ms Rodney was unsuited to the inquiry on which she was engaged: it was designed for an inquiry as to whether a child and his family were in need, not whether the person claiming to be a child is such. He suggested that the questions put to the claimant, and his answers, should have been noted verbatim, by Ms Rodney or by someone else present during the interview, so that the claimant's legal advisers and the court could be assured that the questions were open-ended, fair and appropriate. The procedure used, involving the use of an interpreter at the other end of the telephone, was replete with risk of confusion and misunderstanding. He suggested that medical evidence was required, and should have been obtained. He pressed the advantages of observation of the applicant over a period of time, preferably by a number of professionals, as mentioned at [33], above.

[50] In my judgment, the court should be careful not to impose unrealistic and unnecessary burdens on those required to make decisions such as that under consideration. Judicialisation of what are relatively straightforward decisions is to be avoided. As I have stated, in such cases the subject matter of decision is not complex, although in marginal cases the decision may be a difficult one. Cases will vary from those in which the answer is obvious to those in which it is far from being so, and the level of inquiry unnecessary in one type of case will be necessary in another. The court should not be predisposed to assume that the decision-maker has acted unreasonably or carelessly or unfairly: to the contrary, it is for a claimant to establish that the decision-maker has so acted.

[51] Ms Rodney did not make her decision on the basis of the appearance and demeanour of the claimant alone. It is not suggested that the claimant was unaware of the purpose of his interview. She took a full family and personal history, including the claimant's educational history. It was not necessary to obtain a medical report, which for reasons stated above would not have been helpful and was unlikely to have been so. It was not necessary for the local authority to provide support for a period of some days or weeks to give the opportunity for others to observe the claimant, and for him to be observed and assessed over that period, if the information available was sufficient for a decision to be made, which it was.

[52] However, where an interpreter is required, it is obviously greatly preferable for him or her to be present during the interview. The procedure adopted in this case carried with it the risk of misunderstandings, and great care was required of Ms Rodney and of the interpreter to ensure that no mistakes were made. As far as I am aware, the interpreter made no note, in either English or French, of the questions asked by Ms Rodney or of the claimant's answers, either in verbatim or rolled up form (i e with the questions and answers combined). Such a note by the interpreter would have been highly relevant to the claimant's suggestions that what he said was not correctly noted, or was misunderstood, by Ms Rodney, who heard his answers at second hand. I am concerned at the contradiction between Ms Rodney's note that the claimant 'identifies with the Islamic faith and its culture' and her later note that 'he is of the Catholic faith'. The contradiction is not referred to in her witness statement, and was not one of the reasons for her decision to reject the claimant's credibility. If she correctly noted his statements, he made an obvious and unintelligent contradiction. In view of my decision in this case, I need say no more about it.

[53] In cases such as the present, the social worker must of course bear in mind her unfamiliarity with the background of the applicant. There is no reason to believe that Ms Rodney did not do that. I should also mention that her sympathy with the claimant's situation is apparent from her notes.

[54] In my judgment, it is not necessary as a matter of law for there to be a verbatim note of the interview; but such a note would enable the court to be more confident of its accuracy and to address any suggestion that the interviewer put words into the mouth of the applicant by asking leading questions that led the young applicant to accept what was suggested to him. It is not necessary for the note to be countersigned by the applicant, although again that may be helpful for a a local authority evidentially. The claimant complains that he was not asked to countersign Ms Rodney's notes, but since he cannot speak English, there would have been no point in asking him to do so. Indeed, it would have been thoughtless to have asked him to countersign them.

OTHER REQUIREMENTS OF FAIRNESS

b [55] So far as the requirements of fairness are concerned, there is no real distinction between cases such as the present and those considered in R (on the application of Q) v Secretary of State for the Home Department [2003] 2 All ER 905, [2003] 3 WLR 365. It follows that the decision-maker must explain to an applicant the purpose of the interview. It is not suggested that that did not happen in this case. If the decision-maker forms the view, which must at that stage be a c provisional view, that the applicant is lying as to his or her age, the applicant must be given the opportunity to address the matters that have led to that view, so that he can explain himself if he can. In other words, in the present case, the matters referred to at [15], above should have been put to him, to see if he had a credible response to them. The dangers of misunderstandings and mistranslations d inherent in the absence of the interpreter reinforced the need for these matters to be put, to give the claimant an opportunity to explain.

[56] The claim form clearly alleged that the claimant should have been given an adequate opportunity to answer the points that the defendant was minded to hold against him. Ms Rodney does not suggest that this was done. It follows that her decision should be set aside unless the defendant has established that his e responses to the matters on which she relied could not reasonably have affected her decision. The claimant addresses these matters in his second witness statement. Not surprisingly, he gives no explanation of the implausibility referred to at 15, above. His explanations of the matters referred to at (b) and (c) are unsatisfactory, and in essence amount to an assertion that Ms Rodney f must have misunderstood him. It is the risk that there was some misunderstanding of what he said, a risk that is accentuated by the inconsistency between her notes of the two statements as to his religion to which I have referred, and the possibility that he might have been able to rectify any misunderstanding if the matters relied upon had been put to him, that leads me to conclude, albeit with considerable hesitation, that the defendant has not g satisfied the onus of establishing that even if they had been put to the claimant, the same decision would inevitably have been made.

[57] Mr O'Brien submitted that this case is to be distinguished from Q's case because of the availability of the complaints and review procedure required by s 26 of the 1989 Act and regulations made under it, which provide a suitable h alternative remedy to judicial review. Mr Latham countered that the complaints procedure is not a suitable remedy, because someone in the position of the claimant requires immediate relief. Section 26(3)(a) requires a local authority to establish a procedure for investigating any complaint or representation made by 'any child ... who is not being looked after by them but is in need'. The Representations Procedure (Children) Regulations 1991, SI 1991/894 require a j response to a representation or complaint within 28 days of its receipt, and this is indeed too long a period in the context of a child in need who has no available accommodation or support. The availability of internal review was not referred to by the defendant in correspondence or in the defendant's acknowledgement of service, and I have no evidence before me as to the complaints or review procedure operated by the defendant, and in particular how it would have been operated if it had been implemented by the claimant. In these circumstances, I am not satisfied that there was a suitable alternative procedure available to the claimant to challenge the defendant's decision. a [58] In the result, therefore, the defendant's decision will be set aside. The defendant must reconsider the age of the claimant. It will do so on the information now available to it.

b

Order accordingly.

Dilys Tausz Barrister.

R v Wacker

[2002] EWCA Crim 1944

COURT OF APPEAL, CRIMINAL DIVISION
KAY LJ, COLMAN AND OUSELEY JJ
14 JUNE, 31 JULY 2002

Criminal law – Manslaughter – Involuntary manslaughter – Joint unlawful activity – Whether person criminally responsible for death of others engaged in joint unlawful activity.

Sentence – Manslaughter – Proper approach to sentencing where death caused in context of other criminal activity.

The defendant drove a lorry from Rotterdam to Zeebrugge and embarked on a vehicle ferry to Dover. The lorry had been loaded with a container in which 60 illegal immigrants were concealed. The ventilation to the container was by means of a small vent. Those inside the container had been told that for part of the journey the vent would be shut and that whilst it was shut, to assist in avoiding detection, they must remain silent. The vent was shut several kilometres before the lorry arrived at Zeebrugge and remained closed for over five hours. Fifty-eight of the people hidden in the container died from lack of air. The defendant's fingerprints were later found on the outside covering of the vent. Customs officers stopped the lorry as it was disembarking from the ferry, searched it, and discovered the bodies and the two survivors. The defendant was tried and convicted of conspiracy to facilitate the entry into the United Kingdom of illegal immigrants and of 58 offences of manslaughter. He was sentenced to eight years' imprisonment for the conspiracy and to six years' imprisonment on each of the manslaughter charges. The six-year sentences were to run concurrently but to be consecutive to the eight-year sentence. At his trial the Crown accepted the general proposition that the principle of ex turpi causa non oritur actio applied in determining whether there was a duty of care in considering a charge of manslaughter by gross negligence just as it did in determining whether a civil claim for damages for negligence could succeed. The judge held that a proper distinction could be drawn between those criminal activities for which the passengers were solely responsible, those for which there was a shared responsibility, and those for which the defendant and others were solely responsible. He ruled that the defendant's failure to ensure that the concealed illegal immigrants had sufficient air was incidental to their role but critical to the defendant's own role so that, in establishing the necessary duty of care, since the immigrants would be 'relying' on a matter incidental to their criminality, they would not be 'relying' upon their own unlawful conduct. The defendant appealed against the manslaughter convictions contending that no duty of care could be said to have been owed by him to the illegal immigrants because they shared the same joint illegal purpose; and that the judge had been wrong in his directions to the jury as to the circumstances in which a duty of care would arise. He also appealed against sentence. The Attorney General referred to the court the sentences for manslaughter as being unduly lenient, although he did not contend that the total sentence should be increased but only to the way in which the total of 14 years had been made up.

Held – (1) As a matter of public policy there was no justification for concluding that the criminal law should decline to hold a person as criminally responsible for the death of another simply because the two were engaged in some joint unlawful activity at the time or because there might have been an element of acceptance of a degree of risk by the victim in order to further the joint unlawful enterprise. Nor could the duty to take care be permitted to be affected by the countervailing demands of the criminal enterprise. It was not necessary to examine whether the distinction between matters for which the immigrants were responsible and those incidental to their illegality was a proper one; how matters might have been characterised in a civil claim had no relevance to the issue that the jury had to decide. Accordingly, the approach taken in the court below had been too favourable to the defendant. In every other respect the necessary ingredients of the offences of manslaughter had been properly left to the jury and there were no reasons to doubt the safety of those convictions (see [35], [39], [40]–[42], below).

(2) The element of the unlawful activity in the setting of which manslaughter occurred was relevant to the sentence. The sentence which would have been appropriate had no death occurred should be considered and then the extent to which it should be increased to reflect the very serious circumstances of death. Using that approach meant there was a danger of punishing the underlying criminality twice if consecutive sentences were imposed and therefore concurrent sentences should be passed. Accordingly, each of the sentences of six years' imprisonment for manslaughter would be increased to 14 years and would run concurrently with the sentence of eight years for conspiracy (see [51]–[54], below).

Notes

For responsibility for recklessness or gross negligence, for sentencing for manslaughter, and for the duty of care owed each other by wrongdoers, see 11(1) Halsbury's Laws (4th edn reissue) paras 447 and 437 n1 and 33 Halsbury's Laws (4th edn reissue) para 608, respectively.

Cases referred to in judgment

Attorney General's References (Nos 19, 20 and 21 of 2001) [2001] EWCA Crim 1432, [2002] 1 Cr App (R) S 136.
Jackson v Harrison (1978) 138 CLR 438, Aust HC.
R v Adomako [1994] 3 All ER 79, [1995] 1 AC 171, [1994] 3 WLR 288, HL.
R v Brown [1993] 2 All ER 75, [1994] 1 AC 212, [1993] 2 WLR 556, HL.
Saunders v Edwards [1987] 2 All ER 651, [1987] 1 WLR 1116, CA.

Cases referred to in skeleton arguments

Ashton v Turner [1980] 3 All ER 870, [1981] QB 137, [1980] 3 WLR 736.
Beresford v Royal Insurance Co Ltd [1938] 2 All ER 602, [1938] AC 586, HL.
Colburn v Patmore (1834) 1 Cr M&R 73, 149 ER 999.
Cross v Kirkby (2000) Times, 5 April, [2000] CA Transcript 321.
Euro-Diam Ltd v Bathurst [1988] 2 All ER 23, [1990] 1 QB 1, [1988] 2 WLR 517, CA.
Gala v Preston (1991) 172 CLR 243, (1991) 65 ALJR 366, Aust HC.
Hall v Hebert [1993] 2 SCR 159, Can SC.
Hall v Woolston Hall Leisure Ltd [2000] 4 All ER 787, [2001] 1 WLR 225, CA.
Hillen v ICI (Alkali) Ltd [1934] 1 KB 455, CA; affd [1936] AC 65, [1935] All ER Rep 555, HL.

Holman v Johnson (1775) 1 Cowp 341, [1775–1802] All ER Rep 98, 98 ER 1120.
Italiano v Barbaro (1993) 114 ALR 21, Aust Fed Ct.
Pitts v Hunt [1990] 1 QB 302, [1989] 3 WLR 795; affd in part [1990] 3 All ER 344, [1991] 1 QB 24, [1990] 3 WLR 542, CA.
R v Bateman (1925) 19 Cr App R 8, [1925] All ER Rep 45, CCA.
R v Khan (Rungzabe) [1998] Crim LR 830, CA.
R v Sinclair [1998] All ER (D) 416, (1998) 148 NLJ 1353, CA.
R v Singh (Gurphal) [1999] Crim LR 582, CA.
Revill v Newbery [1996] 1 All ER 291, [1996] QB 567, [1996] 2 WLR 239, CA.
Sacco v Chief Constable of South Wales Constabulary [1998] CA Transcript 1382.
Shelley v Paddock [1980] 1 All ER 1009, [1980] QB 348, [1980] 2 WLR 647, CA.
Smith v Jenkins (1970) 119 CLR 397, Aust HC.
Standard Chartered Bank v Pakistan National Shipping Corp (No 2) [2000] 1 All ER (Comm) 1, CA; rvsd [2002] UKHL 43, [2003] 1 All ER 173, [2003] 1 AC 959, [2002] 3 WLR 1547.
Thackwell v Barclays Bank plc [1986] 1 All ER 676.
Tinsley v Milligan [1992] 2 All ER 391, [1992] Ch 310, [1992] 2 WLR 508, CA; affd [1993] 3 All ER 65, [1994] 1 AC 340, [1993] 3 WLR 126, HL.
Vellino v Chief Constable of Greater Manchester [2001] EWCA Civ 1249, [2002] 3 All ER 78, [2002] 1 WLR 218.
Weir v Wyper 1992 SLT 579, Ct of Sess.
Winnik v Dick 1984 SLT 185, Ct of Sess.

Appeal against conviction, application for leave to appeal against sentence, application for leave to refer sentence

The defendant, Perry Wacker, appealed with leave granted by McCombe J, against his conviction, on 5 April 2001 in the Crown Court at Maidstone before Moses J and a jury, for conspiracy to facilitate the entry of illegal immigrants into the United Kingdom and for 58 counts of manslaughter. He also applied for leave to appeal against his sentences of eight years' imprisonment for the conspiracy and six years' imprisonment for each of the convictions for manslaughter running concurrently with each other but consecutively to the eight-year sentence. The Attorney General, by an amended reference dated 29 May 2001, applied for leave to refer the sentences for manslaughter to the court as being unduly lenient, pursuant to s 36 of the Criminal Justice Act 1988. The facts are set out in the judgment of the court.

Michael Lawson QC and Simon Russell Flint (instructed by the Registrar of Criminal Appeals) for the defendant.
Victor Temple QC and Duncan Penny (instructed by the Crown Prosecution Service) for the Crown.
Orlando Pownall QC (instructed by the Crown Prosecution Service) for the Attorney General.

Cur adv vult

31 July 2002. The following judgment of the court was delivered.

KAY LJ.

[1] On 18 June 2000, Customs and Excise officers stopped a lorry which was disembarking from a ferry at Dover. When they examined a container loaded onto the trailer, they made the horrific discovery that it contained the bodies of 58 illegal immigrants of Chinese origin and two other such immigrants who were still alive. This appeal raises the issue of whether the lorry driver who was in sole charge of the lorry could properly be held responsible for the manslaughter of each of those who died and if so, whether the sentence imposed upon him, a total of 14 years' imprisonment, was a proper sentence.

[2] The defendant, Perry Wacker, a Dutch national aged 34, was tried in the Crown Court at Maidstone before Moses J and a jury. On 5 April 2001 he was convicted of conspiracy to facilitate the entry into the United Kingdom of illegal immigrants and of 58 offences of manslaughter. He was sentenced to eight years' imprisonment for the conspiracy and to six years' imprisonment on each of the manslaughter charges, the six-year sentences being ordered to run concurrently with one another but consecutively to the eight-year sentence. The total sentence was thus 14 years' imprisonment.

[3] The defendant appeals against each of the manslaughter convictions by leave of the single judge. He does not appeal against his conviction on the conspiracy charge. He also applies for leave to appeal against sentence, his application having been referred to the full court by the single judge. The Attorney General has also applied to the court for permission to refer to the court the manslaughter sentences as being unduly lenient although he does not seek to persuade the court that the total sentence of 14 years' imprisonment should be increased.

[4] Because of the extent of the loss of life, the facts of the case, not surprisingly, attracted a great deal of public attention. All 60 of those who were in the container were on their way from China with the intention of gaining illegal entry into the United Kingdom. Their journey was organised by others, whose involvement was manifestly to make a profit out of the desire of people in China to leave that country and settle elsewhere. Each of the immigrants eventually arrived in Holland and it was there that they were loaded into the container to make the fateful journey by ferry to Dover. There was evidence placed before the jury to connect the defendant with the preparations for that journey, which, since he does not appeal against his conviction for the conspiracy, it is unnecessary to detail.

[5] Evidence about the journey was given by the two survivors and this was supplemented by information available from the lorry's tachograph. From this information the following picture emerged. The Chinese immigrants were loaded into the lorry at a place near Rotterdam. The container had been adapted by the construction of a wooden framework partitioning it into two distinct areas. The immigrants were required to go behind the partition and that part of the container nearer the container door was loaded with tomatoes to conceal the illegal human cargo behind. The container was then sealed and it was not possible to open the door from the inside.

[6] When the journey commenced the only ventilation to the container came from a small metal window or vent in the front of the container. The container was intended for use as a refrigerated container and accordingly it was constructed with seals in such a way as not to allow any air to enter the container other than through the vent when it was open. Those inside the lorry were told that the journey would be uncomfortable and that for part of the time the vent would be shut. They were advised that when it was opened, they could talk quietly but when it was shut they must be silent. The purpose of shutting the vent and of the instructions to remain silent was clearly to assist in avoiding detection.

[7] The tachograph recorded the journey as starting at 2.53 pm (continental time). There were several short stops and then at 6.49 pm (continental time), the lorry stopped some four-and-a-half kilometres from Zeebrugge. The two survivors told how at this stage the small vent was shut by someone from the outside. The defendant's fingerprints were found on the outside covering of the vent.

[8] At 7.01 pm (continental time) the lorry resumed its journey, boarding the ferry at Zeebrugge. The ferry crossing to Dover was anticipated to take four-and-a-half hours. The survivors described how approximately two hours after the vent had been shut, those inside began to become distressed because it was difficult to breathe. One described how eventually there was a lot of screaming but no one had come to help them.

[9] The ferry trip took somewhat longer than was anticipated and it was not until 11.14 pm (English time—which was 12.14 am continental time) that disembarkation at Dover commenced. Very soon afterwards the lorry was driven off the ferry and was stopped by the customs officers. The container was then searched and the dreadful loss of life was discovered. The deaths had been caused by the lack of air in the container.

[10] At trial, the defendant denied any knowledge of the illegal immigrants in the container. He claimed that he was simply driving what he believed to be a load of tomatoes from Rotterdam to Bristol.

[11] At the conclusion of the prosecution case, Mr Michael Lawson QC on behalf of the defendant submitted to the trial judge that there was no case for the defendant to answer on each of the manslaughter charges. He took as the foundation for his submission, the observation of Lord Mackay of Clashfern LC in R v Adomako [1994] 3 All ER 79 at 86–87, [1995] 1 AC 171 at 187:

> '... in my opinion the ordinary principles of the law of negligence apply to ascertain whether or not the defendant has been in breach of a duty of care towards the victim who has died. If such breach of duty is established the next question is whether that breach of duty caused the death of the victim. If so, the jury must go on to consider whether that breach of duty should be characterised as gross negligence and therefore as a crime.'

[12] Mr Lawson therefore submitted that the first question to be decided was whether applying 'the ordinary principles of the law of negligence', the defendant owed to those in the container a duty of care. He submitted that one of the general principles of the law of negligence, known by the Latin maxim of ex turpi causa non oritur actio, was that the law of negligence did not recognise the relationship between those involved in a criminal enterprise as giving rise to a duty of care owed by one participant to another. In his ruling Moses J summarised Mr Lawson's submission on the facts of the case:

> 'Mr Lawson contends that a failure to produce sufficient air or ventilation stems directly from the criminal activity in which both driver and passengers were engaged. It was essential to the criminal activity of all that secrecy be maintained. The closure of the vent, and the failure to reopen it during the course of the journey on board the ferry, which caused the death by suffocation of the 58 occupants, arose directly, he contends, from an enterprise the very essence of which was that secrecy was maintained.

Secrecy could only be maintained by keeping the vent closed, since if it was open voices might be heard and, as the evidence of at least one of the survivor's revealed, the occupants had been told only to speak when the vent was open. Moreover, it is not possible for the court to determine the appropriate standard of care to be exercised by the driver. What is the appropriate standard of care to be applied in the case of a driver seeking, as part of a joint criminal exercise, to conceal the presence of 60 occupants of his lorry? In other words, the criminal activity on which all were engaged does, so he submits, have a bearing upon the appropriate standard of care. That standard cannot be ascertained without regard to the clandestine nature of the joint criminal activity. It was the driver's job to increase the chance of entry without detection, the very object which the passengers themselves sought to achieve.'

[13] Mr Temple QC on behalf of the Crown accepted the general proposition that the principle of ex turpi causa applied to determining whether there was a duty of care in considering a charge of manslaughter just as it did in determining whether a civil claim for damages for negligence could succeed. He submitted, however, that the failure to take reasonable steps to ensure that a supply of sufficient air to breathe was wholly incidental to the criminal enterprise upon which the passengers were engaged and as such the principle would not prevent a claim in negligence. The standard of care could be identified. It was the ordinary standard of care to be expected of a competent and experienced heavy goods vehicle driver carrying 60 people in the container pulled by the tractor he was driving.

[14] Moses J in his ruling accepted the concession made by the prosecution that the principle of ex turpi causa applied to a charge of manslaughter. He said:

'There is no doubt but that the ordinary principles of the law of negligence applied to ascertain whether the defendant owed a duty of care to the victims (see R v Adomako). Thus, in order to make good an allegation of manslaughter, the Crown must establish that under ordinary civil law principles the defendant owed a duty of care to the occupants of the lorry. This introduces a certain air of unreality to the problem. This is not a case where the relatives of the occupants, or the surviving occupants of the lorry, are seeking to claim compensation. It is a criminal case, where the state is seeking to vindicate a wrong done not primarily to the victims but to the state as a whole. None the less, as all acknowledge, the fact that that issue arises in the context of manslaughter as opposed to a claim in tort makes no difference.'

[15] Clearly the judge's view that 'an air of unreality' was introduced to the problem was right. It is only necessary to consider the test as to the standard of care that had been suggested by the prosecution to see that wholly artificial concepts were being introduced. It will be necessary to examine later whether this view accepted at trial as being the law relating to manslaughter is really right.

[16] However, having ruled that the concept of ex turpi causa was as much a part of the law of manslaughter as other principles of the law of negligence, the judge then considered whether the Crown's submission that the principle had no application to the facts of the case was right. This involved a careful examination of the authorities relating to civil claims for damages for negligence involving some form of unlawful activity. The judge said:

> 'I derive from these authorities the following propositions. (1) No duty of care can be established absent the ability of the court to determine an appropriate standard of care. (2) The court cannot determine a standard of care, that is the content of the duty of care, in circumstances where it is compelled to weigh and adjust the conflicting demands of joint criminal activity and the safety of the participants in order to identify the appropriate standard of care. In short, the question is whether the criminal activity on which the plaintiff is engaged, or for which the plaintiff shares responsibility, bears upon the standard of care reasonably to be expected of the participants from whom he is seeking to claim.'

[17] He then referred to further authority and quoted from the judgment of Bingham LJ in Saunders v Edwards [1987] 2 All ER 651 at 666, [1987] 1 WLR 1116 at 1134:

> '... I think that on the whole the courts have tended to adopt a pragmatic approach to these problems, seeking where possible to see that genuine wrongs are righted so long as the court does not thereby promote or countenance a nefarious object or bargain which it is bound to condemn. Where the plaintiff's action in truth arises directly ex turpi causa, he is likely to fail ... Where the plaintiff has suffered a genuine wrong, to which allegedly unlawful conduct is incidental, he is likely to succeed ...'

[18] On the facts of the case, Moses J concluded that a proper distinction could be drawn between those criminal activities for which the passengers were solely responsible, those for which there was a shared responsibility and those for which the drivers and others were solely responsible. The driver's failure to ensure that the passengers had sufficient air was, he ruled, incidental to the passengers' role but, implicitly, critical to his own role. Thus since the passengers would be 'relying' on a matter incidental to their criminality, they would not be 'relying' upon their own unlawful conduct. Accordingly he ruled that there was a case to answer.

[19] When the judge summed the case up to the jury, he explained to them that the allegation was that the death of the 58 who died was caused by 'gross negligence amounting to criminal negligence'. He then explained what was meant by negligence saying:

> 'In order to prove negligence the prosecution must make you sure that Mr Wacker, the driver, owed a duty of care to each and every passenger in the container; if he owed it to one he owed it to all. He owed a duty of care to each passenger in the container and that his conduct amounted to a breach of that duty. That that breach caused the death of those 58 passengers and that having regard to the risk of death involved the conduct of the defendant was so bad, so grossly negligent, as to amount in your judgment to a criminal failure.'

He then looked at each of the elements in turn.

[20] As to duty of care, he explained how in certain circumstances in everyday life one person owes a duty to take reasonable care for the safety of another. He illustrated the general concept by reference to the duty upon a motorist and that upon a pedestrian and explained that the essential feature was that the person ought reasonably to have foreseen that their conduct, whether it was an act or omission, might cause injury to that other person. a

[21] He then said:

> 'Thus, in this case, subject to one qualification I will come to, if the driver knew that he was carrying 60 passengers and ought reasonably to have foreseen that his failure to take any reasonable care to see that there was adequate air or ventilation to sustain life was supplied to the container so that it might result in injury or loss of life, then that driver owed a duty of care to each and every occupant.' b

[22] He then turned to the one qualification to which he had referred and dealt with the principle of ex turpi causa saying: c

> 'There are circumstances where the law will not recognise a duty of care. A person is not allowed to sue for negligence, bring an action in a court, alleging a failure to take care if that failure arises out of his own criminal action; note those words, "arising out of his own criminal action".'

He gave the well-known illustration of one safebreaker blowing up another and d continued:

> 'Why is that relevant in this case? It is relevant because of an argument adopted and advanced by Mr Lawson on behalf of Mr Wacker that you must consider. In this case the occupants themselves were committing a criminal offence. What was that? Seeking to enter the United Kingdom illegally. e They got on the lorry, they were told that the vent was going to be closed to preserve secrecy and, therefore, it is said—this is an argument on behalf of Mr Wacker—they shared responsibility for the criminal arrangements made to smuggle them into the country and thus, it is said, the driver owed them no duty of care. What of that argument? It may be it need not keep you for very long for this reason. What you have to consider is whether in reality f they did assume or may have assumed significant responsibility for the arrangements which were made. If they did or may have assumed such significant responsibility, no duty of care was owed by Mr Wacker; end of the case of manslaughter against him. But, if you are sure that they did not in any significant way assume responsibility for the arrangements by which g they were carried then subject to the issues I have already dealt with—importantly knowledge, of less significance in this case foreseeability of harm—he did owe a duty. In this case you may think that death arose from the failure to take care to see that there was an adequate supply of air for those 60. That failure arose from the arrangements which were in fact h made for their transport. Did the occupants of the container play any part in making those arrangements?'

[23] The judge then looked at the facts relevant to the question he had just posed and concluded by saying: 'You may think that the evidence falls miles short of saying that they may have shared responsibility for the arrangements j which caused the deaths.'

[24] Thereafter the judge looked in a little more detail at the issues of whether there was a breach of duty, whether it caused death and, if so, whether it could be characterised as criminally negligent.

[25] The grounds of appeal against conviction contend: (i) that the judge was wrong to rule that there was a case to answer; and (ii) that the direction given to the jury as to the circumstances in which a duty of care would arise was wrong.

[26] Mr Lawson, in his helpful and realistic submissions to the court, contended that no duty of care can be said to be owed by the defendant to the Chinese because they shared the same joint illegal purpose which: (a) displaced the duty of care; (b) made it impossible for the court to define the content of the relevant duty of care; and (c) made it inappropriate for the court to define the content of a relevant duty of care.

[27] He further submitted that since the allegation was of an omission or failure by the defendant to act, by opening the vent, the relevant time at which the 'duty' arose could not in any event be ascertained.

[28] Mr Lawson further submitted that categorisation of the omission to act as being one which was merely incidental to the unlawful purpose of the Chinese is one that is untenable in the circumstances. The sole purpose of closing, and therefore keeping closed, the vent was to bring about the very unlawful objective upon which not only the driver was engaged but also the Chinese, namely their entry into the United Kingdom without detection. In this context Mr Lawson placed particular reliance on the formulation of the rule by Mason J in the High Court of Australia in Jackson v Harrison (1978) 138 CLR 438 at 455–456:

> 'If a joint participant in an illegal enterprise is to be denied relief against a co-participant for injury sustained in that enterprise, the denial of relief should be related not to the illegal character of that activity but rather to the character and incidents of the enterprise and to the hazards which are necessarily inherent in its execution. A more secure foundation for denying relief, though more limited in its application—and for that reason fairer in its operation—is to say that the plaintiff must fail when the character of the enterprise in which the parties are engaged is such that it is impossible for the court to determine the standard of care which is appropriate to be observed.'

[29] Mr Temple on behalf of the prosecution argued that the judge, and ultimately the jury, were entitled to draw the distinction that since the method of effecting the illegal entry to the United Kingdom was not something with which the Chinese were in any way concerned, whilst there might be a shared objective, there was no shared responsibility for the arrangements and accordingly such arrangements including the shutting of, and the failure to reopen before it was too late, the vent were incidental to the unlawful activity of the Chinese.

[30] There are occasions when it is helpful when considering questions of law for the court to take a step back and to look at an issue of law that arises without first turning to, and becoming embroiled in, the technicalities of the law. This is such a case. We venture to suggest that all right-minded people would be astonished if the propositions being advanced on behalf of the defendant correctly represented the law of the land. The concept that one person could be responsible for the death of another in circumstances such as these without the criminal law being able to hold him to account for that death even if he had shown not the slightest regard for the welfare and life of the other is one that would be unacceptable in civilised society. Taking this perspective of the case causes one immediately to question whether the whole approach adopted by both counsel and the judge in the court below can be correct, and we must, therefore, examine this matter.

[31] The first question that it is pertinent to ask is why it is that the civil law has introduced the concept of ex turpi causa. The answer is clear from the authorities. Bingham LJ in Saunders v Edwards [1987] 2 All ER 651, [1987] 1 WLR 1116 in the passage quoted at [17], above, explains that as a matter of public policy the courts will not 'promote or countenance a nefarious object or bargain which it is bound to condemn'.

[32] In other situations, it is clear that the criminal law adopts a different approach to the civil law in this regard. A person who sold a harmless substance to another pretending that it was an unlawful dangerous drug could not be the subject of a successful civil claim by the purchasers for the return of the purchase price. However the criminal law would, arising of out of the same transaction, hold that he was guilty of the offence of obtaining property by deception. Many other similar examples readily come to mind.

[33] Why is there, therefore, this distinction between the approach of the civil law and the criminal law? The answer is that the very same public policy that causes the civil courts to refuse the claim points in a quite different direction in considering a criminal offence. The criminal law has as its function the protection of citizens and gives effect to the state's duty to try those who have deprived citizens of their rights of life, limb or property. It may very well step in at the precise moment when civil courts withdraw because of this very different function. The withdrawal of a civil remedy has nothing to do with whether as a matter of public policy the criminal law applies. The criminal law should not be disapplied just because the civil law is disapplied. It has its own public policy aim which may require a different approach to the involvement of the law.

[34] Further the criminal law will not hesitate to act to prevent serious injury or death even when the persons subjected to such injury or death may have consented to or willingly accepted the risk of actual injury or death. By way of illustration, the criminal law makes assisting another to commit suicide a criminal offence and denies a defence of consent where significant injury is deliberately caused to another in a sexual context (see R v Brown [1993] 2 All ER 75, [1994] 1 AC 212). The state in such circumstances has an overriding duty to act to prevent such consequences.

[35] Thus looked at as a matter of pure public policy, we can see no justification for concluding that the criminal law should decline to hold a person as criminally responsible for the death of another simply because the two were engaged in some joint unlawful activity at the time or, indeed, because there may have been an element of acceptance of a degree of risk by the victim in order to further the joint unlawful enterprise. Public policy, in our judgment, manifestly points in totally the opposite direction.

[36] The next question that we are bound to ask ourselves is whether in any way we are required by authority to take a different view. The foundation for the contention that ex turpi causa is as much a part of the law of manslaughter as it is a part of the law of negligence is the passage from the speech of Lord Mackay of Clashfern LC in R v Adomako [1994] 3 All ER 79, [1995] 1 AC 171 set out at [11], above. In particular it is Lord Mackay's reference to 'the ordinary principles of the law of negligence'.

[37] R v Adomako was a case where an anaesthetist had negligently brought about the death of a patient. It, therefore, involved no element of unlawful activity on the part of either the anaesthetist or the victim. 'We have no doubt that issues raised in the case we are considering would never have crossed the minds of those deciding that case in the House of Lords. In so far as Lord Mackay referred to 'ordinary principles of the law of negligence' we do not accept for one moment that he was intending to decide that the rules relating to ex turpi causa were part of those ordinary principles. He was doing no more than holding that in an 'ordinary' case of negligence, the question whether there was a duty of care was to be judged by the same legal criteria as governed whether there was a duty of care in the law of negligence. That was the only issue relevant to that case and to give the passage the more extensive meaning accepted in the court below was in our judgment wrong.

[38] The next question which is posed is whether it is right to say in this case that no duty of care can arise because it is impossible or inappropriate to determine the extent of that duty. We do not accept this proposition. If at the moment when the vent was shut, one of the Chinese had said 'you will make sure that we have enough air to survive', the defendant would have had no difficulty understanding the proposition and clearly by continuing with the unlawful enterprise in the way that he did, he would have been shouldering the duty to take care for their safety in this regard. The question was such an obvious one that it did not need to be posed and we have no difficulty in concluding that in these circumstances the defendant did voluntarily assume the duty of care for the Chinese in this regard. He was aware that no one's actions other than his own could realistically prevent the Chinese from suffocating to death and if he failed to act reasonably in fulfilling this duty to an extent that could be characterised as criminal, he was guilty of manslaughter if death resulted.

[39] One further issue merits consideration, namely is it any answer to a charge of manslaughter for a defendant to say 'we were jointly engaged in a criminal enterprise and weighing the risk of injury or death against our joint desire to achieve our unlawful objective, we collectively thought that it was a risk worth taking'. In our judgment it is not. The duty to take care cannot, as a matter of public policy, be permitted to be affected by the countervailing demands of the criminal enterprise. Thus, in this case, the fact that keeping the vent shut increased the chances of the Chinese succeeding in entering the United Kingdom without detection was not a factor to be taken into account in deciding whether the defendant had acted reasonably or not.

[40] Mr Lawson's final point was that the time when the duty arose cannot be established in the circumstances. With respect to him that is not right. The duty arose from the moment the vent was shut but it was a continuing duty, which continued until air was allowed into the container. At the moment when the duty first arose, the defendant was outside the jurisdiction in Holland. However the duty continued once the ferry had sailed and it is quite clear on the evidence that if the vent had been opened at that stage, the deaths would not have resulted. Thus we can see no difficulty in this regard.

[41] In our judgment, the approach taken in the court below, as advanced by Mr Lawson and accepted by Mr Temple and the judge, was too favourable to the defendant. It is, therefore, wholly unnecessary to examine whether the distinction between matters for which the Chinese were responsible and those incidental to their illegality was a proper distinction or not. Whichever way they might have been characterised in a civil claim had no relevance to the issue that the jury had to decide.

[42] In every other respect we are satisfied that the necessary ingredients of the offences of manslaughter were properly left to the jury. Once the jury had concluded that the defendant was lying when he said that he did not know about the Chinese in the container, this was, in our judgment, as plain a case on the manslaughter charges as one could encounter. Not surprisingly, and rightly, the jury convicted. There are, therefore, no reasons to doubt the safety of these convictions and the appeal against the conviction is dismissed.

[43] We turn now to the questions arising in relation to the sentences. First the defendant seeks leave to appeal against sentence on the ground that the sentences were manifestly excessive and wrong in principle. It is first argued that it is wrong in principle for consecutive sentences of imprisonment to have been imposed in this case since the offences were so clearly related in their subject matter. Secondly it is contended that the totality of the sentences was manifestly excessive.

[44] The second matter relating to sentence with which the court is concerned is the application by the Attorney General for leave to refer to the court the sentences for the manslaughter offences which he considers to be unduly lenient, pursuant to s 36 of the Criminal Justice Act 1988. Very helpfully Mr Pownall QC who appeared on behalf of the Attorney General made clear from the outset that it was not to be the contention of the Attorney General that the total sentence imposed by the trial judge should be increased and that the application related solely to the way in which the total of 14 years had been made up. The Attorney General's concern is that the imposition of concurrent sentences of six years' imprisonment for the manslaughter offences when compared with the eight years' imprisonment for the conspiracy charge sent out an unacceptable message in that it may have suggested to the public that the court saw the involvement with the evasion of the immigration rules to be a more serious matter than causing the death of 58 people.

[45] Whilst, in many cases, the Court of Appeal will only be concerned as to the total sentence passed and not the way in which the sentences are distributed between particular offences, there are rare cases where the way in which the total sentences are composed may cause public concern and diminish the faith of the public in the criminal justice system as a whole. In such circumstances, and we can see why the Attorney General considers this case comes into that exceptional category, it seems to us right that, provided the point is made out, this court should intervene and give guidance that will assist sentencers not merely to arrive at the right total sentence in the future but also to impose such sentences in a way that promotes public confidence. For these reasons we grant leave to the Attorney General.

[46] We look first at the question of totality. Mr Lawson has pointed to a number of factors that he submits ought to have resulted in a shorter total sentence than 14 years' imprisonment. He first points to the fact that this was a case where the manslaughter convictions were on the basis of gross negligence. It is not suggested that the defendant had any criminal intention to harm any of his victims in any way at all. Next he points to the fact that others connected with the criminal conspiracy, who were at least as involved as the defendant, and in all probability higher up the chain of command, were apprehended in Holland and have received shorter sentences. Further the defendant finds himself imprisoned in this country, which is not his own, and it is submitted that the effect of any sentence for him will be harder to bear than if he was in his own country where he could the more easily be visited by family and friends.

[47] Mr Lawson recognises that the death of so many victims places this case in an exceptional category but he argues that there was no evidence that the defendant knew just how many people were inside the container. He further submits that the sentence imposed was out of line with other sentences for gross negligence and manslaughter.

[48] We do not accept Mr Lawson's contentions. The professional smuggling of large numbers of illegal immigrants into this country is in itself a very serious matter. The causing of so many deaths by gross negligence arising from a desire to avoid detection whilst committing such a serious offence, in our judgment, puts this case into a category of its own. We are unaware of any case which can remotely be said to be comparable. Accordingly we ask ourselves the straightforward question whether we view a sentence of 14 years' imprisonment as being manifestly excessive for the totality of the defendant's criminal conduct. The answer quite simply is that we do not. This was a difficult sentencing exercise. No sentence could fairly do justice to the loss of life on such a scale but we consider that the total sentence arrived at by the judge fairly reflected the seriousness of the matter and the limited mitigation that could be advanced on behalf of the defendant. Accordingly we refuse leave to appeal against sentence.

[49] We turn to the composition of the sentence. Mr Lawson complained that it was wrong in principle to make the sentences consecutive to one another. In the light of our conclusion as to the correct total sentence, this argument is, from the point of view of the defendant, academic because even if it succeeded, we would alter the sentences to concurrent sentences but increase their length so as to maintain the overall sentence of 14 years' imprisonment. The real issue in this regard is whether sentences of six years' imprisonment for each of the manslaughter cases can properly be viewed as unduly lenient.

[50] In Attorney General's References (Nos 19, 20 and 21 of 2001) [2001] EWCA Crim 1432 at [41], [2002] 1 Cr App (R) S 136 at [41], this court reviewed the approach to manslaughter sentences in the context of a death caused in the course of a street robbery. The court concluded:

> 'In considering any case of manslaughter the court inevitably looks at a number of factors to determine the appropriate sentence. First the court will examine the context in which the death was caused. If it is particularly reprehensible conduct, or conduct that calls for deterrence, the court is bound to impose a longer sentence than otherwise might be the case. The response to these factors must inevitably bear a relationship to the prevailing climate and the attitude at the time.'

[51] Thus the element of the unlawful activity in which setting the manslaughter occurs is relevant to the sentence for manslaughter. The court considered in the case to which we have just referred that the sensible approach to such a sentence was to consider what sentence would have been appropriate if no death had occurred and then considered the extent to which the sentence should be increased to reflect the very serious circumstance of death.

[52] If such an approach is adopted there is clearly a danger of punishing the underlying criminality twice if consecutive sentences are imposed. Accordingly we consider that the correct approach is to pass concurrent sentences. The sentence for manslaughter involving death in the particular criminal conducts will thus inevitably be the longer sentence.

[53] Not only does this method of sentencing eliminate the danger of double punishment for the same criminality but it has the further advantage for which the Attorney General contends in this case, namely that it will be more readily understood by the public. It will not give the appearance, as may have occurred in this case, of devaluing the loss of life. a [54] We think that, since the sentence for an offence of manslaughter must take into account the criminal context in which it has been committed, the Attorney General is right to contend that six years' imprisonment for each manslaughter was unduly lenient. Accordingly we propose to alter the sentences. Each of the sentences of six years' imprisonment for the manslaughter b offences will be increased to 14 years' imprisonment but the sentence of eight years' for the conspiracy will now run concurrently with the other sentences. Thus the total sentence remains unaltered but there is a proper reflection of the seriousness of the manslaughter charges in this quite dreadful case.

Appeals dismissed. c

Lynne Townley Barrister.

R (on the application of Van Hoogstraten) v Governor of Belmarsh Prison

[2002] EWHC 1965 (Admin)

QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION (ADMINISTRATIVE COURT)
JACKSON J
19, 20, 23 SEPTEMBER 2002

Prison – Access to legal adviser – Reasonable facilities for legal adviser to interview prisoner in connection with proceedings to which he was a party – Right to a fair trial – 'Legal adviser' defined as 'counsel or solicitor' – Prisoner instructing foreign lawyer – Whether foreign lawyer falling within definition of 'legal adviser' – Courts and Legal Services Act 1990, ss 27, 28 – Human Rights Act 1998, Sch 1, Pt I, art 6(3) – European Communities (Services of Lawyers) Order 1978, SI 1978/1910, art 5 – Prison Rules 1999, SI 1999/728, r 2(1).

The claimant was convicted of a criminal offence and was remanded in custody awaiting sentencing. He decided to instruct S, an Italian lawyer (an avvocato), in relation to his plea in mitigation and his possible appeals against conviction and sentence. It was envisaged that S would instruct English solicitors as agents who would instruct English counsel in relation to the appeals. Rule 38(1)[a] of the Prison Rules 1999 provided that a prisoner's legal adviser was to be afforded reasonable facilities for interviewing him in connection with proceedings to which he was a party. The defendant, the governor of the prison in which the claimant was remanded, refused to allow S access to give the claimant legal advice on the basis that he was not a 'legal adviser', which term was defined in r 2(1)[b] of the 1999 rules as a prisoner's 'counsel or solicitor'. The claimant applied for judicial review of the defendant's refusal to admit S, contending that it breached his right to a fair trial under art 6 of the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms 1950 (as set out in Sch 1 to the Human Rights Act 1998). Article 6(3)(b)[c] entitled everyone charged with a criminal offence the right to have adequate time and facilities for the preparation of his defence and art 6(3)(c) entitled such a person, inter alia, to defend himself through legal assistance of his own choosing. The European directive, intended to facilitate the effective exercise by lawyers of freedom to provide services in accordance with the provisions of the EC Treaty, had been implemented by the European Communities (Services of Lawyers) Order 1978. The definition of an 'EEC lawyer' in art 2[d] of the 1978 Order included an avvocato and art 5[e] provided that an EEC lawyer was not to be prevented from providing any service in relation to any proceedings by reason only that he was not an advocate, barrister or solicitor, provided that he was instructed and acted in conjunction with an advocate, barrister or solicitor who was entitled to practise before the relevant court or tribunal. In the course of the hearing the defendant conceded that art 5 of the 1978 Order impacted upon ss 27 and 28[f] of a Rule 38, so far as material, is set out at [6], below

b Rule 2, so far as material, is set out at [5], below
c Article 6, so far as material, is set out at [35], below
d Article 2, so far as material, is set out at [28], below
e Article 5, so far as material, is set out at [29], below the Courts and Legal Services Act 1990, which identified the persons who had a right of audience before the English courts and those who had a right to conduct litigation before English courts so that a person who conformed with the requirements of the 1978 Order was entitled to exercise either such a right of audience or such a right to conduct litigation.

Held – The claimant was entitled to instruct anyone who had rights of audience under s 27 of the 1990 Act or anyone who had rights to conduct litigation under s 28, although he could not engage an excessive number of lawyers or change them with undue frequency. It followed that he was entitled to instruct an avvocato who had rights under ss 27 and 28 to represent him in ongoing criminal proceedings. He was in the midst of the trial process and was entitled under art 6(3)(b) of the convention to have adequate time and facilities for the preparation of his plea in mitigation and under art 6(3)(c) to defend himself through legal assistance of his own choosing. Accordingly, in r 2 of the 1999 rules, construed in a manner conforming with art 6(3)(b), (c) the term 'legal adviser' embraced any lawyer who was (a) chosen by the prisoner and (b) was entitled to represent the prisoner in criminal proceedings to which the prisoner was a defendant. S had been chosen by the claimant to represent him in ongoing criminal proceedings and fell within the definition of an 'EEC lawyer' in the 1978 Order. It followed that S fell within the term 'his solicitor or counsel' in r 2 and that under r 38(1) he was to be afforded reasonable facilities for interviewing his client (see [38]–[42], below).

Notes

For prisoners' access to legal advice and for facilities in connection with litigation, and for the rights to a fair trial, to adequate time and facilities to prepare a defence, and to have legal assistance, see 36(2) Halsbury's Laws (4th edn reissue) paras 606, 607 and 8(2) Halsbury's Laws (4th edn reissue) paras 134, 144 and 145.

For the Courts and Legal Services Act 1990, ss 27, 28, see 11 Halsbury's Statutes (4th edn) (2000 reissue) 1311.

For the Human Rights Act 1998, Sch 1, Pt I, art 6(3), see 7 Halsbury's Statutes (4th edn) (2002 reissue) 554.

For the European Communities (Services of Lawyers) Order 1978, SI 1978/1910, art 5, see 19 Halsbury's Statutory Instruments (2002 issue) 4.

For the Prison Rules 1999, SI 1999/728, r 2(1), see 15 Halsbury's Statutory Instruments (2002 issue) 335.

Application

The claimant, Nicholas Van Hoogstraten, a prisoner remanded in custody pending sentencing, applied with permission of Jackson J granted on 19 September 2002, for judicial review of the decision of the defendant, the governor of HM Prison Belmarsh, to refuse access to his lawyer, Giovanni Di Stefano, an avvocato, on the basis that he was not a legal adviser within r 2 of the Prison Rules 1999. The facts are set out in the judgment.

f Sections 27 and 28, so far as material, provide: '27(2) A person shall have a right of audience before a court in relation to any proceedings ... (b) where ... he has a right of audience granted by or under any enactment ... 28(2) A person shall have a right to conduct litigation in relation to any proceedings ... (b) where ... he has a right to conduct litigation granted by or under any enactment ...'

Alan Newman QC, Jonathan Lennon and Alison Dorrell (instructed by Attridge) for the claimant.

Jeremy Johnson and Jason Beer (instructed by the Treasury Solicitor) for the governor.

Cur adv vult

23 September 2002. The following judgment was delivered.

JACKSON J.

[1] This judgment is in six parts: 1. Introduction; 2. The facts; 3. The present proceedings; 4. Is Mr Di Stefano a 'legal adviser' as defined in the Prison Rules 1999, SI 1999/728?; 5. he further challenges to Mr Di Stefano which are foreshadowed; and 6. Conclusion.

1. INTRODUCTION

[2] This is a claim for judicial review. The claimant, Mr Nicholas Van Hoogstraten, is a prisoner on remand. The defendant is the governor of HM Prison Belmarsh, where the claimant is held.

[3] The central issue in this case is whether the claimant is entitled to receive legal visits from Mr Giovanni Di Stefano, who is an Italian lawyer. Mr Di Stefano is principal of the firm Studio Legale Internazionale. That firm is based in Rome.

[4] I must now set out certain relevant statutory provisions. Section 47(1) of the Prison Act 1952 provides:

> 'The Secretary of State may make rules for the regulation and management of prisons ... and for the classification, treatment, employment, discipline and control of persons required to be detained therein.'

[5] Pursuant to that section the Secretary of State made the 1999 rules. Rule 2(1) of the 1999 rules provides:

> 'In these Rules, where the context so admits, the expression ... "legal adviser" means, in relation to a prisoner, his counsel or solicitor, and includes a clerk acting on behalf of his solicitor ...'

[6] Rule 38(1) of the 1999 rules provides:

> 'The legal adviser of a prisoner in any legal proceedings, civil or criminal, to which the prisoner is a party shall be afforded reasonable facilities for interviewing him in connection with those proceedings, and may do so out of hearing but in the sight of an officer.'

[7] The claimant contends that Mr Di Stefano is a legal adviser within the meaning of the 1999 rules and that, accordingly, pursuant to r 38(1) of the rules, Mr Di Stefano must be permitted to visit him in prison.

[8] Having given this brief introduction, I should now turn to the facts in a little more detail.

2. THE FACTS

[9] Earlier this year the claimant stood trial at the Central Criminal Court on a charge of murder. On 22 July 2002, the claimant was acquitted of murder but convicted of manslaughter. The trial judge, Newman J, adjourned the question of sentence to be dealt with on 2 October. He ordered that the claimant be remanded in custody. Since 22 July, the claimant has been held as a category A prisoner at HM Prison Belmarsh.

[10] Following his conviction the claimant dispensed with the services of the solicitors and counsel who had represented him at trial. The claimant decided to instruct Mr Di Stefano to advise and act for him. Mr Alan Newman QC, who is the claimant's counsel for the purpose of these judicial review proceedings only, has explained that the claimant's intentions are as follows. Mr Di Stefano will from now on be the claimant's principal legal adviser in relation to the current criminal proceedings. Mr Di Stefano will take instructions in relation to mitigation and will take any necessary steps to prepare for the plea in mitigation. Mr Di Stefano will then instruct Attridge, a firm of solicitors, to act as his London agents and as solicitors for the claimant in relation to the hearing at the Central Criminal Court on 2 October, when the claimant is due to be sentenced. Attridge in turn will instruct counsel to represent the claimant at that hearing and to make the plea in mitigation.

[11] The claimant has it in mind to appeal against his conviction and, depending on how matters proceed on 2 October, he may wish to appeal against sentence. In relation to the proposed appeal the claimant again wishes Mr Di Stefano to act as his principal legal adviser. It is envisaged that in relation to the appeal Mr Di Stefano will instruct Attridge as his London agents, and that Attridge in turn will instruct counsel.

[12] Mr Di Stefano visited the claimant in HM Prison Belmarsh on 16 August 2002. The arrangements for this visit were made by Mr Paul Martin. Mr Martin is a solicitor and is employed by the firm Attridge as a consultant.

[13] Following that initial visit, the governor of HM Prison Belmarsh has refused to allow Mr Di Stefano to make further visits to the claimant in prison. A number of different grounds for refusing access have been advanced by the prison authorities in correspondence and in telephone conversations.

[14] By 13 September, however, the prison authorities were only relying on one ground. Mr John Knight, the head of security operations at HM Prison Belmarsh, summarised that ground as follows in his letter dated 13 September to Attridge:

> 'The prison's stance remains that we will not allow Mr Di Stefano access as a legal visitor. To this effect we will not accept the legal visit booking for Monday 16 September.'

[15] In other words, the prison authorities took the view that Mr Di Stefano was not a 'legal adviser' for the purpose of the 1999 rules. Therefore the claimant was not entitled to receive legal visits from Mr Di Stefano pursuant to r 38(1). The claimant was aggrieved by that decision and, in order to challenge it, he has brought the present proceedings for judicial review.

3. THE PRESENT PROCEEDINGS

[16] By a claim form issued on 17 September (which was six days ago) the claimant challenged the governor's decision refusing access to Mr Di Stefano on the following grounds:

> 'The decision is unlawful as it breaches art 6(3)(b) and (c) of the convention [the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms 1950 (as set out in Sch 1 to the Human Rights Act 1998], ie the defendant, by refusing the claimant access to his chosen legal representative, is restricting his need for adequate time and facilities to prepare for his sentence (part of trial process) to be heard on 2 October 2002—and his appeal against conviction.'

[17] In the claim form the claimant sought two orders from this court: (1) an order that the defendant's decision of 13 September refusing access be quashed; and (2) a mandatory order that visits by Mr Di Stefano to the claimant be allowed forthwith.

[18] These proceedings are on any view urgent. If the claimant is to be represented at the hearing on 2 October by lawyers who were not present during the trial, he needs to confer with those lawyers as soon as possible. These proceedings also raise an important question of law, namely the interpretation of rr 2 and 38 of the 1999 rules in the light of the Human Rights Act 1998 and EU law.

[19] On 17 September Mr Nigel Pleming QC, a deputy judge of the High Court, considered the papers in this matter and ordered that the application for permission be listed for oral hearing on 19 September. The permission application was listed before me on Thursday, 19 September and duly came on for hearing at the end of the morning. It rapidly became apparent that this case raised serious issues. Accordingly, I granted permission to apply for judicial review.

[20] In view of the urgency of this case and the imminence of the date for sentencing, I asked counsel on both sides whether they were ready to proceed immediately to the full hearing. Both counsel told me that they were ready to proceed and that they would welcome that course. I therefore directed that the full hearing should take place immediately.

[21] Mr Jeremy Johnson, who appears for the defendant, stated that his client might refuse access to Mr Di Stefano on other grounds relating to Mr Di Stefano's character in the event that the claimant was successful on the issues currently before the court. Despite that possibility, both parties wished to obtain the court's final decision on the present issues.

[22] Accordingly, the substantive hearing of these judicial review proceedings took place on the afternoon of Thursday, 19 September and between 9.30 and 10.30 am on the morning of Friday, 20 September. On the Friday morning counsel stated that they wished to do further research on the European aspect of this case. Since I had other cases in the list for hearing that day, I suggested that counsel carry out their further researches during the rest of that day and send to me their additional submissions in writing. Both counsel agreed that that was a sensible way to proceed. Neither party sought an adjournment for further oral argument. Both counsel were content that I should give judgment on the morning of Monday, 23 September, based upon the oral argument of Thursday and Friday, and the supplemental written submissions lodged on Friday evening.

[23] This I now do.

4. IS MR DI STEFANO A 'LEGAL ADVISER' AS DEFINED IN THE 1999 RULES?

[24] It is common ground that Mr Di Stefano is not a member of the English legal profession. He is neither a solicitor nor a barrister. The claimant's evidence shows, and the defendant's evidence does not contradict, that Mr Di Stefano is an avvocato who is qualified to practise, and does practise, at the Italian Bar.

[25] Article 59 of the EC Treaty (now art 49 EC) provides:

'Within the framework of the provisions set out below, restrictions on freedom to provide services within the Community shall be progressively abolished during the transitional period in respect of nationals of Member

States who are established in a State of the Community other than that of the person for whom the services are intended.' a [26] As a result of the Treaty of Amsterdam (Amsterdam, 2 October 1997) (OJ C340 10.11.97 p 1), the numbering of that article has since May 1999 been changed to art 49 EC.

[27] On 22 March 1977, the Council of the European Communities adopted Council Directive (EEC) 77/249 (OJ 1977 L078 p 17) (the directive). The purpose of the directive is to facilitate the effective exercise by lawyers of freedom to provide services in accordance with art 59 of the EC Treaty (now art 49 EC). Article 1 of the directive defines 'lawyer'. That definition includes an Italian avvocato. Article 2 of the directive requires each member state to recognise any such person as a lawyer. Articles 3–6 set out various rules and restrictions which I need not read out. Article 7 provides: b c

'1. The competent authority of the host Member State may request the person providing the services to establish his qualifications as a lawyer.

2. In the event of non-compliance with the obligations referred to in Article 4 and in force in the host Member State, the competent authority of the latter shall determine in accordance with its own rules and procedures the consequences of such non-compliance, and to this end may obtain any appropriate professional information concerning the person providing services. It shall notify the competent authority of the Member State from which the person comes of any decision taken. Such exchanges shall not affect the confidential nature of the information supplied.' d e

[28] The directive has been implemented in this country by the European Communities (Services of Lawyers) Order 1978, SI 1978/1910. Article 2 of the 1978 order defines 'EEC lawyer' as—'a person entitled to pursue his professional activities under the designation, in Belgium of an avocat—advocaat, in Denmark of an advokat, in Germany of a Rechtsanwalt, in France of an avocat, in the Hellenic Republic of a dikegoros, in the Republic of Ireland of a barrister or solicitor, in Italy of an avvocato, in Luxembourg of an avocat-avoué, or in the Netherlands of an advocaat ...' f g

[29] Article 5 of the 1978 order provides:

'No enactment or rule of law or practice shall prevent an EEC lawyer from providing any service in relation to any proceedings, whether civil or criminal, before any court, tribunal or public authority (including appearing before and addressing the court, tribunal or public authority) by reason only that he is not an advocate, barrister or solicitor; provided that throughout he is instructed with, and acts in conjunction with, an advocate, barrister or solicitor who is entitled to practise before the court, tribunal or public authority concerned and who could properly provide the service in question.' h j

[30] Article 12 of the 1978 order provides: 'A competent authority may at any time request a person seeking to provide any services to verify his status as an EEC lawyer.'

[31] Article 13 of the 1978 order provides:

'Where a request has been made under article 12, the person to whom it is made shall not, except to the extent (if any) allowed by the competent authority making the request, be entitled to provide services in the United Kingdom until he has verified his status as an EEC lawyer to the satisfaction of that authority.'

[32] For the purposes of this case the competent authority referred to in arts 12 and 13 is the Law Society.

[33] Section 27 of the Courts and Legal Services Act 1990 identifies the persons who have a right of audience before the English courts. Section 28 of the 1990 Act identifies the persons who have a right to conduct litigation before English courts.

[34] In his second supplemental skeleton argument delivered on Friday afternoon, Mr Johnson conceded that art 5 of the 1978 order impacts upon ss 27 and 28 of the 1990 Act. In my view this concession is correct. An Italian avvocato who conforms with the requirements of the 1978 order is entitled to exercise either (a) a right of audience before the English courts, or (b) a right to conduct litigation before the English courts.

[35] At this point it is necessary to turn to art 6 of the convention, upon which the claimant relies in his claim form. Article 6 provides:

'1. In the determination of his civil rights and obligations or of any criminal charge against him, everyone is entitled to a fair and public hearing within a reasonable time by an independent and impartial tribunal established by law ...

2. Everyone charged with a criminal offence shall be presumed innocent until proved guilty according to law.

3. Everyone charged with a criminal offence has the following minimum rights: (a) to be informed promptly, in a language which he understands and in detail, of the nature and cause of the accusation against him; (b) to have adequate time and facilities for the preparation of his defence; (c) to defend himself in person or through legal assistance of his own choosing ...'

[36] The claimant is currently in the midst of the trial process. He has been found guilty of manslaughter by the jury. The trial judge has not yet addressed the question of sentence. The claimant continues to enjoy the rights set out in art 6 of the convention. He is entitled to have adequate time and facilities for the preparation of his plea in mitigation in accordance with art 6(3)(b). In relation to sentence he is entitled to defend himself through legal assistance of his own choosing in accordance with art 6(3)(c).

[37] In the course of his opening submissions Mr Johnson said that it was an oddity that the claimant should dismiss the solicitors and counsel who represented him at trial, and then instruct an Italian advocate as his principal legal adviser rather than fresh English solicitors and counsel.

[38] On this point I agree with the observation of Mr Newman: it is no business either of the court or of the defendant whom the claimant wishes to instruct to represent him in criminal proceedings. Of course the claimant cannot engage an excessive number of lawyers, or change his legal team with undue frequency. Subject to that, however, the claimant is entitled to instruct anyone who has rights of audience under s 27 of the 1990 Act, or anyone who has rights to conduct litigation under s 28 of that Act. Accordingly, the claimant is entitled if he wishes to instruct an Italian lawyer who has rights under those provisions to represent him in ongoing criminal proceedings.

[39] Let me now turn to r 2 of the 1999 rules. Section 3(1) of the Human Rights Act 1998 requires this court so far as possible to read and give effect to the 1999 rules in a way which is compatible with convention rights. Accordingly, I shall construe r 2 of the 1999 rules in a manner which conforms with art 6(3)(b) and (c) of the convention.

[40] The term 'legal adviser' in r 2 must embrace any lawyer who (a) is chosen by the prisoner, and (b) is entitled to represent the prisoner in criminal proceedings to which the prisoner is a defendant. On the evidence before the court, Mr Di Stefano is an Italian avvocato who falls within the definition of 'EEC lawyer' in the 1978 order. He has been chosen by the claimant to represent him in ongoing criminal proceedings. It therefore follows that Mr Di Stefano falls within the term 'his counsel or solicitor' in r 2 of the 1999 rules.

[41] Under r 38(1) Mr Di Stefano must be afforded reasonable facilities for interviewing his client in HM Prison Belmarsh in connection with the current criminal proceedings.

[42] The answer to the question posed in part 4 of this judgment is Yes.

5. THE FURTHER CHALLENGES TO MR DI STEFANO WHICH ARE FORESHADOWED

[43] In his second supplemental skeleton argument Mr Johnson stated that on Friday, 20 September the defendant was inviting the Law Society to request Mr Di Stefano to verify his status as an EEC lawyer pursuant to art 12 of the 1978 order. Mr Johnson stated that thereafter Mr Di Stefano would be disentitled from providing legal services in the United Kingdom under art 13 of the 1978 order. Accordingly, the defendant would continue to deny Mr Di Stefano access on that basis.

[44] I am perplexed by this argument. If the Law Society or the defendant doubt that Mr Di Stefano is a qualified Italian avvocato, they have had every opportunity since 16 August to request that he verifies his status. They have not done so. Any request which is made at this late stage for the purpose of triggering art 13 of the 1978 order would appear to have as its consequence a denial of the claimant's art 6 rights during the crucial last few days before he appears in the Central Criminal Court for sentence. I accept, of course, that the Law Society can at any time request Mr Di Stefano to verify his status as an EEC lawyer. However, during the period of time which Mr Di Stefano requires to deal with that request, it would not be a lawful exercise of discretion to deny Mr Di Stefano access to his client in HM Prison Belmarsh.

[45] I turn to the second possible future challenge which is foreshadowed. This is a challenge based on Mr Di Stefano's character. I quite accept that if there are substantial grounds of this nature (such as those hinted at), then the defendant would be entitled to deny Mr Di Stefano access to any prison establishment. In the meantime, however, unless and until the defendant relies upon substantial grounds relating to character, his exclusion of Mr Di Stefano from HM Prison Belmarsh is unlawful.

6. CONCLUSION

[46] For the reasons set out in part 4 of this judgment, I grant to the claimant the first item of relief which he claims, that is a quashing order quashing the defendant's decision dated 13 September 2002.

[47] For the reasons set out in part 5 of this judgment, I do not consider that a mandatory order is appropriate. It may possibly be that the defendant will put forward substantial grounds relating to character for denying Mr Di Stefano access to HM Prison Belmarsh. I therefore propose to grant a declaration along the following lines:

> 'It is declared that the defendant is obliged to permit Mr Di Stefano to visit the claimant in Belmarsh Prison in accordance with r 38(1) of the 1999 rules, unless and until the defendant refuses access on substantial grounds relating to Mr Di Stefano's character. No basis for such refusal has yet been put forward by the defendant.'

[48] I leave the precise wording of the declaration to be discussed between counsel. If it cannot be agreed, I will hear argument on drafting matters later today.

Application allowed in part.

James Brooks Barrister.

Practice Direction (Coal Mining Hand Arm Vibration Syndrome (Vibration White Finger))

COURT OF APPEAL, CIVIL DIVISION
LORD WOOLF CJ
31 JULY 2003

Practice – Coal mining hand arm vibration syndrome (vibration white finger) actions – Commencement of proceedings.

LORD WOOLF CJ gave the following direction at the sitting of the court.

1. This practice direction revises the scope of the practice note of Lord Woolf CJ made herein on 12 January 1994 (see Practice Note (Vibration White Finger Actions) (No 1) (1994) Times, January 13) and the practice direction of Lord Woolf CJ made herein on 29 July 1999 (see Practice Direction (Queen's Bench Division: Vibration White Finger Actions (No 3) (1999) Times, August 5).

2. It applies to any proceedings in which a party, whether by claim or counterclaim alleges that he/she has suffered personal injuries in the form of HAVS/VWF or any other injury to the fingers, thumbs, hands, wrists or arms caused or contributed to by exposure to vibration in the course of employment by one or more of the defendants in or about a coal mine, and had not at 16 May 2003 lodged a letter of claim in the British Coal Corporation Vibration White Finger litigation.

3. Any such claim made after 16 May 2003 is not subject to the practice note of 1994 and the practice direction of 1999 and/or any orders of the court made in the British Coal Corporation Vibration White Finger litigation.

4. Any relevant proceedings arising out of such a claim begun after 16 May 2003 should be commenced in the county courts of either Newcastle-upon-Tyne, Sheffield or Cardiff.

5. Any delay or increase in the costs occasioned by the unjustified failure to comply with this practice direction may be taken into account in the assessment of costs.

Kate O'Hanlon Barrister.

R (on the application of B) v Ashworth Hospital Authority

[2003] EWCA Civ 547

COURT OF APPEAL, CIVIL DIVISION

SIMON BROWN, DYSON AND SCOTT BAKER LJJ

31 MARCH, 1, 15 APRIL 2003

Mental health – Patient – Medical treatment – Mental disorder of patient subject to restriction order specified as mental illness – Consent of patient not required for medical treatment given him for mental disorder from which he was suffering – Patient treated for psychopathic disorder – Whether treatment for psychopathic disorder requiring patient's consent – Mental Health Act 1983, s 63.

The claimant was detained as a patient by a hospital order under the Mental Health Act 1983. He was also subject to the special restrictions, as to duration and discharge, of a restriction order The 1983 Act required that the hospital order should specify the form or forms of mental disorder, being mental illness, psychopathic disorder, severe mental impairment or mental impairment, which the claimant was found to be suffering from. The mental disorder suffered by the claimant was specified as a mental illness. At the hospital he was clinically diagnosed as also suffering from a psychopathic disorder, being a personality disorder. He was transferred to a personality disorder ward and treated for that condition by the medical officer responsible for him. Part IV of the 1983 Act (ss 57–65) dealt with consent to treatment and s 63[a] provided that the consent of a patient was not required for any medical treatment given to him for the mental disorder from which he was suffering (not being treatment falling within ss 57 or 58[b] which specified certain treatments for which consent and/or a second opinion was required) if the treatment was given by or under the direction of the responsible medical officer. The claimant applied for judicial review of the decision to detain him in a personality disorder ward. The judge held that the hospital could lawfully treat the claimant for a personality disorder despite the fact that he was only classified as suffering from a mental illness. The claimant appealed. On appeal the sole issue was whether s 63 of the 1983 Act sanctioned compulsory treatment of a detained patient for any mental disorder which had been clinically diagnosed, or whether it only authorised such treatment, in the case of a patient who had been made the subject of a restriction order, for the mental disorder specified in the hospital order.

Held – Section 63 of the 1983 Act, construed in its context, permitted compulsory treatment (other than treatment under ss 57 or 58) only for the mental disorders to which the liability to detention under the 1983 Act was linked. Throughout the 1983 Act the liability to detention was linked to the mental disorder from which the patient was classified as suffering and which was considered to be treatable. Part IV of the 1983 Act dealt with the question of defining the circumstances in which forcible treatment for the mental disorder to which the

a Section 63 is set out at [1], below

b Sections 57 and 58 are set out, so far as material, at [32], below liability to detention was linked might be given. The problem presented by the presence of co-existing or additional diseases was inherent in the scheme of the 1983 Act. Patients who suffered from more than one mental disorder presented particular problems for those charged with the task of caring for and treating mental patients. But those problems did not compel a different meaning of s 63. Accordingly, the appeal would be allowed, and unless and until the claimant was re-classified as suffering also from a psychopathic disorder it would not be lawful to continue his treatment for that condition (see [16], [42], [43], [46]-[48], [67], [68], [71], [82], below).

Decision of Sir Richard Tucker [2002] All ER (D) 13 (Jul) reversed.

Notes

For mental disorder, mental impairment and psychopathic disorder, and for consent to treatment, see 30 Halsbury's Laws (4th edn reissue) paras 1202–1203 and 1343–1345, respectively.

For the Mental Health Act 1983, s 63, see 28 Halsbury's Statutes (4th edn) (2001 reissue) 928.

Cases referred to in judgments

B v Croydon Health Authority [1995] 1 All ER 683, [1995] Fam 133, [1995] 2 WLR 294, CA.

B v Forsey [1988] SLT 572, HL.

F v West Berkshire Health Authority (Mental Health Act Commission intervening) [1989] 2 All ER 545, sub nom Re F (mental patient: sterilisation) [1990] 2 AC 1, [1989] 2 WLR 1025, HL.

R (on the application of Wilkinson) v Responsible Medical Officer Broadmoor Hospital [2001] EWCA Civ 1545, [2002] 1 WLR 419.

R v Anglia and Oxfordshire Mental Health Review Tribunal, ex p Hagan (1999) 53 BMLR 9, CA.

R v Pathfinder NHS Trust, ex p Wey (1999) 3 CCL Rep 271.

Appeal

B, a patient detained under ss 37 and 41 of the Mental Health Act 1983, pursuant to an order made by the Crown Court at Birmingham on 25 August 1987, which specified his mental disorder as a mental illness, appealed from the decision of Sir Richard Tucker sitting as a judge of the Queen's Bench Division on 1 July 2002 ([2002] EWHC 1442 (Admin) [2002] All ER (D) 13 (Jul)) dismissing B's application for judicial review of the decision of Ashworth Hospital Authority (Ashworth) to detain him in a personality disorder ward for treatment of a psychopathic disorder. The facts are set out in the judgment of Dyson LJ.

Richard Gordon QC and Hugh Southey (instructed by Roberts Moore Nicholas & Jones) for B.

Oliver Thorold (instructed by Capsticks) for Ashworth.

Cur adv vult

15 April 2003. The following judgments were delivered.

DYSON LJ (giving the first judgment at the invitation of Simon Brown LJ).

THE ISSUE

[1] Section 63 of the Mental Health Act 1983 provides:

> 'The consent of a patient shall not be required for any medical treatment given to him for the mental disorder from which he is suffering, not being treatment falling within section 57 or 58 above, if the treatment is given by or under the direction of the responsible medical officer.'

[2] The sole issue that arises on this appeal is whether this provision sanctions compulsory treatment of a detained patient for any mental disorder which has been diagnosed by the clinicians, or whether it only authorises such treatment (in the case of a patient who has been made the subject of a restriction order under s 41(1) of the 1983 Act) for the mental disorder specified by the court under s 37(7) or by the mental health tribunal (the tribunal) under s 72(5). The judge, Sir Richard Tucker, preferred the first interpretation. He said ([2002] EWHC 1442 (Admin), [2002] All ER (D) 13 (Jul)):

> '[11] Mr Thorold, on behalf of the defendants, observes that it is common ground that a patient can be dual qualified and submits that the reference in the section to the disorder from which he is suffering must refer to the actual disorder as diagnosed by the clinicians, and need not, and should not, be confined to the disorder or that part of the disorder classified by the tribunal.
>
> [12] I prefer Mr Thorold's submissions. If Parliament had intended the mental disorder to be that classified by the tribunal it would have said so. It is clearly a matter for the professional judgment and expertise of the clinicians in charge of B's case to decide upon the best therapeutic regime for the disorder from which they assess him to be suffering. To conclude otherwise would be to put an artificial and strange interpretation upon the words of the section.'

[3] The mental disorder specified by the court under s 37(7) in this case was a mental illness. At all times, B was classified as suffering from a mental illness. At no time has the tribunal specified the mental disorder from which he is suffering as a psychopathic personality disorder within the meaning of s 1(2) of the 1983 Act.

THE FACTS

[4] Save for certain brief interludes, B has been a patient at Ashworth Hospital (Ashworth) since 1987. He is 47 years of age. He is currently detained under ss 37 and 41 of the 1983 Act pursuant to an order made in the Crown Court at Birmingham on 25 August 1987. He had been convicted of the manslaughter of his girlfriend. The mental illness specified by the court in making the hospital order was schizophrenia. Most, if not all, of the clinicians who have had B under their care have been of the view that B also suffers from a psychopathic disorder, being a personality disorder (dissocial type). B's case has been considered by the tribunal from time to time. He has always been classified as suffering from a mental illness, and not a personality disorder.

[5] B has been transferred on several occasions to the Raeside Clinic, a medium secure unit. But on each occasion, there have been problems, and B has been returned to Ashworth.

[6] On 17 August 2000, he applied to the tribunal for an order that he be discharged from liability to be detained. At that time, he was on the Shelley Ward at Ashworth, and his responsible medical officer (RMO) was Dr Kumurajeewa. He submitted a report to the tribunal for the purposes of the hearing, stating that B most probably had a schizo-affective disorder of the manic type. Keith Scholey, a psychologist, also submitted a report recommending that B should be placed on a 'comorbidity' ward suitable for the needs of patients suffering from problems of both mental illness and personality disorder. Reports were obtained from experts instructed on behalf of B. Professor Sashidharan, a psychiatrist, advised that a diagnosis of personality disorder would be 'totally inappropriate'. Eric Bromley, a psychologist, questioned whether B should be detained either for mental illness or personality disorder.

[7] Dr Hughes became B's RMO on 16 August 2001. In his witness statement dated 27 June 2002, he explains that B is—

> 'one of the few patients for whom the traditional classification systems do not provide a straightforward diagnosis. He has been diagnosed as suffering from both a mental illness (schizophrenia) and a psychopathic disorder being a personality disorder (dissocial type), a diagnosis with which I completely agree.'

[8] B was transferred to the Newman Ward at Ashworth on 15 December 2000, and was there at the time of the hearing before the tribunal on 8 May 2001. This is a personality disorder ward as is the Shelley Ward where he had been previously. Dr Hughes explains that the reason for the transfer was 'to treat the personality disorder traits of the patient'.

[9] On 8 May 2001, the tribunal refused B's application for a discharge from liability to be detained, and did not reclassify his mental disorder. He, therefore, remained classified as a patient suffering from a mental illness, and not a personality disorder. They said:

> 'We heard the witnesses and studied the reports listed. On that evidence we are satisfied that the patient suffers mental illness (schizo-affective disorder) of a nature or degree that requires his continued treatment in hospital for his welfare and for the safety of others.'

[10] On 13 August 2001, B's solicitors wrote to Ashworth expressing concern that he was in a ward for patients diagnosed with a psychopathic disorder. They referred to a number of reports which, they said, suggested that there was no reason to conclude that B was suffering from a psychopathic disorder.

[11] On 15 January 2002, the chief executive of Ashworth wrote to B's solicitors saying:

> 'The current clinical team who recognise that, clinically, B has a mental illness and personality disorder consider that his needs are best met, at this time, in the Personality Disorder Service. I am sure you are aware of the difference between a clinical diagnosis of personality disorder and mental health classification of personality disorder. The fact that there has not been a re-classification or added classification having been obtained or requested from the Tribunal is because the matter has been re-examined at Ashworth.

a Your client's mental illness is controlled by medication and it would not be appropriate to transfer him to a mental illness ward given the comorbidity that exists and the outstanding difficulties as regards his personality disorder presentation. These should be addressed, as now, in a PD ward. This is not to say the best placement of your client in the Hospital will not be reviewed on a regular basis.'

b

[12] It was in these circumstances that B sought judicial review of the decision to detain him in a personality disorder ward. The stark issue raised by these proceedings is whether Ashworth could lawfully treat B for a personality disorder despite the fact that he was only classified as suffering from a mental illness. Sir c Richard Tucker held that they could do so, and dismissed the application.

[13] There was no material before Sir Richard Tucker as to the nature of the regime and treatment which B has been receiving for the personality disorder which the clinicians have diagnosed. He is now accommodated in the Owen Ward, which is another ward within the personality disorder unit at Ashworth. d On 15 October 2002, Alan Hazlehurst, B's solicitor made a witness statement which contained the following:

'2. The appellant advised me that when he was initially admitted to Ashworth, he spent a considerable period of time on mental illness wards, and that there is a difference between the present circumstances of his being e on a personality disorder ward compared to his being placed on a mental illness ward.

3. The appellant has described to me that there are broadly the following distinctions between the wards. (i) That there is 24-hour access to rooms on a mental illness ward. On Owen Ward and on the personality disorder unit, f rooms are locked off denying patients access from 8.30 am in the morning. They are then reopened from approximately 12.30 pm to 1.30 pm but again locked off until 4.30 in the afternoon when they are reopened. This means that if a patient is unwell or is unable to attend at a workshop and is kept on the ward, he must stay in the day area and is denied access to his room. (ii) The appellant is not permitted to have parole ie access off his ward on to g the hospital site. Occasionally the appellant and other patients are permitted access off the ward if there is sufficient staff, for a short break outside but this occurrence permitting access off the ward occurred much more frequently on the mental illness wards than on the personality disorder unit. (iii) The personality disordered patients are required to attend workshops, and h effectively they are compulsory whereas this is not the case on the mental illness unit. When a mental illness patient feels on a particular day he is not up to attending at the workshops he need not attend. In the event of not attending at the workshop from the personality disorder unit, then payments, which are stage payments made to patients to reward them for j attending at the workshops are reduced. (iv) There is a major difference in terms of treatment and therapy because of the higher level of security and dependency on the personality disorder unit. (v) The appellant has explained that there is always a high level of observation, supervision and therefore a greater degree of intrusiveness on the part of staff in relation to their control and supervision of patients on a personality disorder ward. Conversely the appellant believes that on the personality disorder unit there is less socialisation and interaction with the staff compared to the mental illness ward.

4. The appellant believes that there are more searches on the personality disorder unit of patients in addition to there being a room search each month, there being random searches of the patient known as rub-down searches when going on and off the ward and when present on the ward.

5. The appellant has instructed me that there is far less frequent meeting with his RMO and supervising doctor compared to his period on the mental illness unit and wards. He advises me that when on the mental illness wards he would see his doctor weekly whereas when on the personality disorder unit, a doctor in his experience is only normally seen on visits and has an appointment with the patient on average every three or four months.

6. On the personality disorder unit wards there is very little by way of activities that can be undertaken whilst present on the ward but there is a TV on each ward. The appellant says that there is more open access on the mental illness wards compared to the wards on the personality disorder unit regarding the TV.

7. The appellant will say that whilst being detained on a 24-hour day basis in a special hospital, these different conditions on the ward and interactions with the care team and staff make a significant difference to his daily quality of life, and his conditions and treatment whilst remaining at Ashworth.'

[14] Mr Thorold submitted that implicit in the challenge to the decision to detain B in a personality disorder ward was the proposition that placement decisions within a hospital are justiciable, and that the designation by a hospital of a particular ward for a particular mental disorder would acquire 'binding legal significance'. Given the relief sought by B in his claim form (an order quashing the decision to detain him in a personality disorder ward), this was an understandable response. But in the light of Mr Hazlehurst's statement and the argument advanced by Mr Gordon QC, it has become clear that the challenge is not to the compulsory placement of B in a personality disorder ward per se. Rather, it is to the compulsory treatment of B for a personality disorder in that ward. In view of the unchallenged evidence of Mr Hazlehurst and, above all, the statement of Dr Hughes, it is not surprising that, in his oral submissions, Mr Thorold did not seek to argue that B is not receiving compulsory treatment for a personality disorder. It is for this reason that the only issue for resolution on this appeal is the true construction of s 63 of the 1983 Act.

THE TRUE CONSTRUCTION OF S 63 OF THE 1983 ACT

The statutory framework

[15] Section 63 appears within Pt IV (ss 56–64), which is entitled 'consent to treatment'. Part II (ss 2–34) is entitled 'compulsory admission to hospital and guardianship'. Part III (ss 35–55) is entitled 'patients concerned in criminal proceedings or under sentence'. Part V (ss 65–79) is entitled 'mental health review tribunals'.

[16] Section 63 must be construed in its statutory context. The 1983 Act provides a detailed and carefully worked out scheme for the admission of mentally disordered patients to hospital for treatment, the review of their condition from time to time, and their discharge when they are no longer liable to be detained. As I shall seek to show, a theme that runs through the Act is that the liability to detention is linked to the mental disorder from which the patient is classified as suffering, and that this disorder is considered to be treatable by the person or body making the classification. For convenience, I shall refer to this as 'the classified disorder', although it is to be noted that the language of classification is not used in the Act (save only in the heading to s 16 'reclassification of patients').

[17] An application for admission to a hospital ('an application for admission for treatment') may be made in respect of a patient under s 3(2) on the grounds that:

> '(a) he is suffering from mental illness, severe mental impairment, psychopathic disorder or mental impairment and his mental disorder is of a nature or degree which makes it appropriate for him to receive medical treatment in a hospital; and (b) in the case of psychopathic disorder or mental impairment, such treatment is likely to alleviate or prevent a deterioration of his condition; and (c) it is necessary for the health or safety of the patient or for the protection of other persons that he should receive such treatment and it cannot be provided unless he is detained under this section.'

[18] An application for admission for treatment must be founded on the written recommendations of two registered medical practitioners in compliance with s 3(3). Such an application, if duly made in accordance with the provisions of the Act, is sufficient authority for the applicant, or any other person authorised by the applicant, to take the patient and convey him to the hospital within the period specified in s 6(1). Where a patient is admitted within the said period to the hospital specified in the application, 'the application shall be sufficient authority for the managers to detain the patient in the hospital in accordance with the provisions of this Act' (see s 6(2)).

[19] These are the material provisions which deal with the admission of a patient for treatment. It will be seen that it is a requirement of an application for admission for treatment that the patient is suffering from one of the specified forms of mental disorder 'of a nature or degree which makes it appropriate for him to receive medical treatment in a hospital' (see s 3(2)(a)). It may be obvious, but it needs to be emphasised, that the basis of the application for admission of the patient is to enable him to receive treatment for the disorder which justifies his detention.

[20] The position of civil patients who are detained is dealt with in ss 16–20. Section 16 provides:

> '(1) If in the case of a patient who is for the time being detained in a hospital in pursuance of an application for admission for treatment, or subject to guardianship in pursuance of a guardianship application, it appears to the appropriate medical officer that the patient is suffering from a form of mental disorder other than the form or forms specified in the application, he may furnish to the managers of the hospital, or to the guardian, as the case may be, a report to that effect; and where a report is so furnished, the application shall have effect as if that other form of mental disorder were specified in it.
>
> (2) Where a report under subsection (1) above in respect of a patient detained in a hospital is to the effect that he is suffering from psychopathic disorder or mental impairment but not from mental illness or severe mental impairment the appropriate medical officer shall include in the report a statement of his opinion whether further medical treatment in hospital is likely to alleviate or prevent a deterioration of the patient's condition; and if he states that in his opinion such treatment is not likely to have that effect the authority of the managers to detain the patient shall cease.

(3) Before furnishing a report under subsection (1) above the appropriate medical officer shall consult one or more other persons who have been professionally concerned with the patient's medical treatment.'

[21] The appropriate medical officer therefore has the power to reclassify the patient's mental disorder, by furnishing the managers with a report that the patient is suffering from a form of mental disorder other than the form or forms specified in the application for admission for treatment. Thus, he may produce a report which has the effect of deleting an existing classified disorder (A), and substituting a new disorder (B), or, where appropriate, adding a new disorder (B) to an existing disorder (A). The mechanism adopted by the statute for giving effect to the opinion of the medical officer that the patient is suffering from a mental disorder other than the form or forms specified in the application for admission is to provide for a deemed amendment to the application. The application takes effect as if the 'other' disorder were specified in it. The reason for doing it this way is that the crucial link is maintained between the mental disorder which justifies the patient's detention and his treatment in hospital for that disorder.

[22] Section 20 makes provision for the duration of the authority to detain the patient. So far as material, it provides:

'(3) Within the period of two months ending on the day on which a patient who is liable to be detained in pursuance of an application for admission for treatment would cease under this section to be so liable in default of the renewal of the authority for his detention, it shall be the duty of the responsible medical officer—(a) to examine the patient; and (b) if it appears to him that the conditions set out in subsection (4) below are satisfied, to furnish to the managers of the hospital where the patient is detained a report to that effect in the prescribed form; and where such a report is furnished in respect of a patient the managers shall, unless they discharge the patient, cause him to be informed.

(4) The conditions referred to in subsection (3) above are that—(a) the patient is suffering from mental illness, severe mental impairment, psychopathic disorder or mental impairment, and his mental disorder is of a nature or degree which makes it appropriate for him to receive medical treatment in a hospital; and (b) such treatment is likely to alleviate or prevent a deterioration of his condition; and (c) it is necessary for the health or safety of the patient or for the protection of other persons that he should receive such treatment and that it cannot be provided unless he continues to be detained; but, in the case of mental illness or severe mental impairment, it shall be an alternative to the condition specified in paragraph (b) above that the patient, if discharged, is unlikely to be able to care for himself, to obtain the care which he needs or to guard himself against serious exploitation ...

(8) Where a report is duly furnished under subsection (3) ... above, the authority for the detention ... of the patient shall be thereby renewed for the period prescribed in that case by subsection (2) above.

(9) Where the form of mental disorder specified in a report furnished under subsection (3) ... above is a form of disorder other than that specified in the application for admission for treatment ... that application shall have effect as if that other form of mental disorder were specified in it; and where a on any occasion a report specifying such a form of mental disorder is furnished ... the appropriate medical officer need not on that occasion furnish a report under section 16 above.'

[23] It will be seen that the conditions in s 20(4) are substantially the same as the conditions in s 3(2), and that the scheme of s 20 is very similar to that of s 16. In particular, if the form of disorder specified in a report is other than that b specified in the application for admission for treatment, the application shall have effect as if that other form of mental disorder were specified in it. So, once again, the important link is maintained between the mental disorder which justifies the patient's detention and his treatment for that disorder.

[24] I turn to the relevant provisions of Pt III. Section 37 makes provision for c hospital orders by the court. Section 37(1) provides that where a person is convicted of certain offences, and the conditions mentioned in sub-s (2) are satisfied, the court may authorise his admission to, or detention in, such hospital 'as may be specified in the order'. The conditions in sub-s (2) are that:

'(a) the court is satisfied, on the written or oral evidence of two registered d medical practitioners, that the offender is suffering from mental illness, psychopathic disorder, severe mental impairment or mental impairment and that either—(i) the mental disorder from which the offender is suffering is of a nature or degree which makes it appropriate for him to be detained in a hospital for medical treatment and, in the case of psychopathic disorder or mental impairment, that such treatment is likely to alleviate or prevent a e deterioration of his condition; or (ii) ... and (b) the court is of the opinion, having regard to all the circumstances including the nature of the offence and the character and antecedents of the offender, and to the other available methods of dealing with him, that the most suitable method of disposing of the case is by means of an order under this section.'

f [25] Section 37(7) provides that the order shall 'specify the form or forms of mental disorder referred to in subsection (2)(a) from which ... the offender is found by the court to be suffering'. Section 40(4) provides that a patient who is admitted to a hospital in pursuance of a hospital order shall be treated for the purposes of the provisions mentioned in Pt 1 of Sch 1 to the Act as if he had been g so admitted in pursuance of an application for admission for treatment, subject to the modifications specified in that Part of the Schedule. Sections 16 and 20 apply, with modifications which are not material to this appeal.

[26] It will be seen, therefore, that, although there are differences of detail between ss 37(1)(2) and (7) to (9) on the one hand, and 3(1) and (2) on the other h hand, the essential link between a patient's mental disorder which justifies his detention in hospital and his treatment for that disorder is common to both.

[27] Section 41(1) provides that where a hospital order is made in respect of an offender in the Crown Court, and the conditions stated in the subsection are satisfied, then the court may further order 'that the offender shall be subject to the special restrictions set out in this section' (a 'restriction order'). The j restrictions include that the provisions of ss 16 and 20 do not apply; and no application may be made to a tribunal in respect of a patient under ss 66 or 69(1). Section 41(6) provides:

'While a person is subject to a restriction order the responsible medical officer shall at such intervals (not exceeding one year) as the Secretary of State may direct examine and report to the Secretary of State on that person; and every report shall contain such particulars as the Secretary of State may require.'

[28] Before I turn to Pt IV, I need to refer to Pt V. Section 66 provides that application may be made to a tribunal in the circumstances specified in sub-s (1). Application may be made where a report is furnished under s 16, and where a report is furnished under s 20 and the patient is not discharged. There is, however, no provision for such an application to be made where treatment is given without the patient's consent under the direction of the RMO under s 63. Section 72 gives the tribunal the power to discharge a patient. Section 72(1) provides:

'Where application is made to a Mental Health Review Tribunal by or in respect of a patient who is liable to be detained under this Act, the tribunal may in any case direct that the patient be discharged, and—(a) the tribunal shall direct the discharge of a patient liable to be detained under section 2 above if they are not satisfied—(i) that he is then suffering from mental disorder or from mental disorder of a nature or degree which warrants his detention in a hospital for assessment (or for assessment followed by medical treatment) for at least a limited period; or (ii) that his detention as aforesaid is justified in the interests of his own health or safety or with a view to the protection of other persons; (b) the tribunal shall direct the discharge of a patient liable to be detained otherwise than under section 2 above if they are not satisfied—(i) that he is then suffering from mental illness, psychopathic disorder, severe mental impairment or mental impairment or from any of those forms of disorder of a nature or degree which makes it appropriate for him to be liable to be detained in a hospital for medical treatment; or (ii) that it is necessary for the health or safety of the patient or for the protection of other persons that he should receive such treatment; or (iii) in the case of an application by virtue of paragraph (g) of section 66(1) above, that the patient, if released, would be likely to act in a manner dangerous to other persons or himself.'

[29] Section 72(5) provides:

'Where application is made to a Mental Health Review Tribunal under any provision of this Act by or in respect of a patient and the tribunal do not direct that the patient be discharged or, if he is (or is to be) subject to after-care under supervision, that he cease to be so subject (or not become so subject), the tribunal may, if satisfied that the patient is suffering from a form of mental disorder other than the form specified in the application, order or direction relating to him, direct that that application, order or direction be amended by substituting for the form of mental disorder specified in it such other form of mental disorder as appears to the tribunal to be appropriate.'

[30] Section 73 gives the tribunal the power to direct the discharge of restricted patients. Subsection (1) provides:

'Where an application to a Mental Health Review Tribunal is made by a restricted patient who is subject to a restriction order, or where the case of such a patient is referred to such a tribunal, the tribunal shall direct the absolute discharge of the patient if—(a) the tribunal are not satisfied as to the matters mentioned in paragraph (b)(i) or (ii) of section 72(1) above; and a (b) the tribunal are satisfied that it is not appropriate for the patient to remain liable to be recalled to hospital for further treatment.'

[31] It will be seen that in s 72(5) there is a further assertion of the link between the liability to be detained and the mental disorder specified in the application (in the case of civil patients) and in the order or direction relating to the patient (in the case of criminal patients).

b [32] I can now come to Pt IV. Section 57 applies to the 'following forms of medical treatment for mental disorder'. In the case of these forms of treatment, there is a requirement of consent and a second opinion. Section 58 applies to the 'following forms of medical treatment for mental disorder'. These forms of treatment require the consent of the patient or a second opinion. Section 62(1) c provides:

'Sections 57 and 58 above shall not apply to any treatment—(a) which is immediately necessary to save the patient's life; or (b) which (not being irreversible) is immediately necessary to prevent a serious deterioration of his condition; or (c) which (not being irreversible or hazardous) is

d immediately necessary to alleviate serious suffering by the patient; or (d) which (not being irreversible or hazardous) is immediately necessary and represents the minimum interference necessary to prevent the patient from behaving violently or being a danger to himself or to others.'

[33] And then we come to s 63 which I shall repeat:

e

'The consent of a patient shall not be required for any medical treatment given to him for the mental disorder from which he is suffering, not being treatment falling within section 57 or 58 above, if the treatment is given by or under the direction of the responsible medical officer.'

f

DISCUSSION

[34] Mr Thorold submits that Sir Richard Tucker construed s 63 correctly. It permits any medical treatment not falling within ss 57 or 58 to be given by or under the direction of the RMO for any mental disorder from which the patient is suffering, whether or not it is a classified disorder. In support of his contention, g he makes a number of points.

[35] First, there is no reference to a patient's classification anywhere in Pt IV. If Parliament had intended that the provisions of Pt IV should apply only to treatment for classified mental disorders, it would have said so explicitly, and not left the matter to 'inference and statutory construction alone' (I quote from h Mr Thorold's skeleton argument).

[36] Secondly, if s 63 does not permit the giving of medical treatment for non-classified mental disorders, there is an important lacuna in the 1983 Act. The inability to administer medical treatment for such mental disorders in urgent cases would be a serious matter, and cannot have been intended by Parliament.

j It is true that in the case of civil patients, and unrestricted criminal patients who are subject to hospital orders, there is no difficulty, since the appropriate medical officer can reclassify the patient by furnishing a report under s 16. But this speedy solution is not available in the case of restricted criminal patients. In their case, the only route to reclassification is by a reference to the tribunal by the Secretary of State under s 71, with a view to the exercise by the tribunal of its power to reclassify under s 72(5). This is a somewhat cumbersome process which takes time, and is not apt to deal with cases where there is an urgent need for reclassification.

[37] Nor can the problem be overcome by recourse to the common law. Mr Thorold accepts that, but for the Act, it would be open to the hospital at common law to administer essential medical treatment without the patient's consent in those cases where he or she does not have the capacity to give consent, and in all cases of emergency, regardless of capacity (see the valuable analysis of Lord Goff of Chieveley in F v West Berkshire Health Authority (Mental Health Act Commission intervening) [1989] 2 All ER 545 at 563–567, [1990] 2 AC 1 at 72–78). But he submits that the common law power to administer compulsory medical treatment to mental patients who are liable to be detained in a hospital has been impliedly removed by Pt IV of the Act. He relies by analogy on the decision of the House of Lords in B v Forsey [1988] SLT 572. In that case, it was held that the powers of detention conferred on hospital authorities by the Mental Health Act (Scotland) Act 1984 are exhaustive, and that any power of detention which they might otherwise have possessed at common law have been impliedly removed by the statute. The provisions of the 1984 Act correspond, so far as material, with those of the 1983 Act. Lord Keith of Kinkel delivered the principal speech. He said (at 576):

> 'In my opinion it is impossible to reach any other conclusion than that the powers of detention conferred upon hospital authorities by the scheme were intended to be exhaustive. Procedure is laid down for emergency, short term and long term detention. The period of short term detention might reasonably be expected to be long enough for an application for long term detention to be submitted to and approved by the sheriff under s. 18. What happened in this case was that the petitioner's condition appeared initially to be improving, so that an application under s. 18 was not thought appropriate. Dr Mackay was of opinion that an application which turned out to be unnecessary would be upsetting and harmful to the patient. The petitioner's condition suddenly and unexpectedly deteriorated, and by then it was too late to have an application submitted and approved before the expiry of the short term detention. That would appear to be a situation which was not in the contemplation of the framers of the legislation. However, I am of opinion that the provisions of ss. 24 (6), 25 (5) and 26 (7) are absolutely inconsistent with a possible view that the legislature intended that a hospital authority should have a common law power to detain a patient otherwise than in accordance with the statutory scheme. That scheme contains a number of safeguards designed to protect the liberty of the individual. It is not conceivable that the legislature, in prohibiting any successive period of detention under provisions containing such safeguards, should have intended to leave open the possibility of successive periods of detention not subject to such safeguards. I would therefore hold that any common law power of detention which a hospital authority might otherwise have possessed has been impliedly removed.'

[38] By parity of reasoning, Mr Thorold submits that the powers of compulsory treatment conferred on hospital authorities by Pt IV of the 1983 Act were intended to be exhaustive. Section 62(1) addresses the question of urgent treatment in terms. In these circumstances, there is no room for the operation of the common law doctrine of necessity to authorise the compulsory treatment of mental patients who are liable to be detained in hospital.

[39] The third point made by Mr Thorold is that, if the s 63 power is restricted to classified mental disorders, this will give rise to great practical difficulty in cases of comorbidity. Take a patient who suffers from mental disorder A (which by itself would justify detention in a hospital having regard to the criteria specified by the Act), and from mental disorder B (which by itself would not justify detention on the basis of those criteria). Mr Thorold submits that it would be unfortunate if the patient can only be treated for disorder A without his consent. Even worse if disorder B aggravates disorder A. Such an outcome cannot have been intended by Parliament. It is in my view unfortunate that the respondent has not adduced any evidence to explain how, and to what extent, if Sir Richard Tucker's construction of s 63 is wrong, this will cause real practical difficulty in cases of comorbidity. As it is, the court has had to make do with Mr Thorold's assertions.

[40] He further submits that, if Sir Richard Tucker's construction is correct, a patient has considerable protection against the possibility of an abuse of the power conferred by s 63. Decisions under s 63 may be challenged by judicial review, and on such a challenge, the court is entitled to reach its own view as to whether the treatment amounts to an infringement of the patient's human rights (see R (on the application of Wilkinson) v Responsible Medical Officer Broadmoor Hospital [2001] EWCA Civ 1545, [2002] 1 WLR 419).

[41] I cannot accept Mr Thorold's submissions, and in large measure for the reasons advanced by Mr Gordon QC. I do not think that Mr Thorold's first (linguistic) point carries any weight. There is nothing which clearly indicates that Parliament intended Pt IV to apply to any mental disorder from which the patient is suffering while liable to be detained in hospital, whether classified or not. Compulsory medical treatment is a serious intrusion of a person's autonomy. I would not impute to Parliament an intention to permit compulsory treatment unless this was expressed in clear and unambiguous language. It is important to underline the full reach of Mr Thorold's submission: it is that s 63 authorises any forcible medical treatment for a non-classified mental disorder, even if it does not meet the emergency criteria stated in s 62(1). In my judgment, s 63 comes nowhere near to evincing a clear intention by Parliament to permit such treatment for non-classified mental disorder.

[42] It is true that, if Pt IV is considered in isolation from the rest of the Act, it might appear to apply to any mental disorder from which the patient is diagnosed as suffering, whether classified or not. But Pt IV must be interpreted in its context. The Act contains detailed provisions for the admission to and detention in hospital of patients who suffer from classified mental disorders. It also contains provisions which are designed to ensure that they remain liable to be detained only so long as they continue to suffer from classified mental disorders. I have earlier set out the relevant provisions. Part IV apart, Mr Thorold was unable to draw our attention to any provision in the Act which deals with non-classified mental disorders. Part IV apart, the Act is no more concerned with non-classified mental disorders than it is with physical disorders. The Act is concerned with mental disorders which are treatable and which justify detention for their treatment. In these circumstances, I do not find it at all surprising that Pt IV does not define the mental disorder for which medical treatment may be given without the patient's consent as the classified mental disorder. That is assumed. Part IV is not dealing with the definition of the mental disorder: that is determined elsewhere in the Act. Part IV is dealing with the very important ancillary question of defining the circumstances in which forcible treatment for the mental disorder may be given.

[43] It seems to me, therefore, that the natural interpretation of s 63, when construed in its context, is that treatment (other than treatment falling within ss 57 and 58) may be given without the patient's consent, but only for classified mental disorders. It is at this point that it becomes necessary to examine Mr Thorold's second and third submissions in order to see whether they cast doubt on the correctness of this interpretation.

[44] In my judgment, B v Forsey [1988] SLT 572 is distinguishable from the present case. It does not compel the conclusion that, if the s 63 power may only be exercised in relation to classified mental disorder, the hospital authority has no power at common law to treat urgent non-classified mental disorder. In B v Forsey, it was held, as a matter of statutory construction, that the 1984 Act was exhaustive of the powers of detention in all circumstances, emergency, short-term and long-term. It followed that there was no room for a power to detain at common law in cases of emergency. Such a power would be truly concurrent with the statutory power, and had been excluded by the Act. But the position with regard to treatment under s 63 of the 1983 Act is quite different. The hypothesis under consideration is that s 63 may only be invoked in relation to a classified mental disorder. On that hypothesis, s 63 plainly is not exhaustive of the power to treat for mental disorder. It is only exhaustive of the power to treat for classified mental disorder. It simply does not touch non-classified mental disorder, because the Act is not concerned with such mental disorder, any more than it is concerned with physical illness. It follows that, if a non-classified disorder is diagnosed, and the patient needs emergency treatment to which he or she cannot or will not consent, the common law doctrine of necessity allows the hospital authority to give the treatment. There is no basis for saying that the common law doctrine of necessity has been removed by the Act in such circumstances.

[45] I should add for completeness that Mr Gordon also suggested that s 3 of the Act provides a further alternative solution to the problem where there is a need for emergency treatment of a non-classified mental disorder: the patient can simply be admitted under s 3. But s 5(1) specifies the circumstances in which a patient may be admitted under s 3 if he or she is already in hospital. These are where the patient is an informal in-patient, or is already detained under an application for assessment under s 2. They do not include the situation where the patient has already been detained under ss 3 or 37. In these circumstances, I think that Mr Gordon was right not to pursue this point in oral argument.

[46] I turn to comorbidity (of which the present case is an example). The problem presented by comorbidity is inherent in the scheme of the Act. At the very outset, the doctors who recommend the patient's admission for treatment have to decide which mental disorder(s) are of a nature or degree which make it appropriate for the patient to receive medical treatment in a hospital (see s 3(2)(a)). Similar judgments have to be made by the doctor furnishing a report under ss 16 or 20, and by the tribunal when considering whether to direct a discharge under ss 72 or 73. If a separately identifiable mental disorder does not satisfy the statutory criteria for compulsory detention, the patient cannot be detained or treated against his or her will for that disorder. That applies at all stages of the process. Thus, the patient cannot be admitted by compulsion for such a disorder, and may not continue to be detained for treatment for that disorder if it ceases to satisfy those criteria. As for Mr Thorold's example of disorder B (which alone does not justify detention) aggravating disorder A (which alone does justify detention), if treatment for disorder B is required to treat disorder A, it is difficult to see why treatment for disorder B is not ancillary to, and therefore a necessary part of, the treatment for disorder A. In B v Croydon Health Authority Hoffmann LJ said ([1995] 1 All ER 683 at 687, [1995] Fam 133 at 138–139):

> 'Nursing and care concurrent with the core treatment or as a necessary prerequisite to such treatment or to prevent the patient from causing harm to himself or to alleviate the consequences of the disorder are, in my view, all capable of being ancillary to a treatment calculated to alleviate or prevent a deterioration of the psychopathic disorder.'

[47] In the example just given, the classified disorder is disorder A, but this classification authorises treatment for condition B as part of the treatment for condition A. I accept that patients who suffer from more than one mental disorder present particular problems for those who are charged with the sensitive and difficult task of caring for and treating mental patients. But I am not persuaded that these problems compel a meaning of s 63 which is different from what I conceive to be its natural meaning.

[48] For these reasons, I consider that Sir Richard Tucker misinterpreted s 63, and that the appeal should be allowed. But I should not stop here, since we heard considerable argument as to the purpose of classification, and as to the relevance of the decision of this court in R v Anglia and Oxfordshire Mental Health Review Tribunal, ex p Hagan (1999) 53 BMLR 9.

THE PURPOSE OF CLASSIFICATION

[49] This is directly relevant to the true construction of s 63, since, if that section permits compulsory treatment for any mental disorder which is diagnosed by the clinicians, whether it is classified or not, it is difficult to see what purpose is served by reclassification in ss 16, 20 or 72(5). It is true that ss 16 and 20 do not apply to the present case, since they have no application to restricted patients, but s 72(5) does apply to all patients liable to detention, and anyway s 63 applies indifferently as between restricted and unrestricted patients. If Mr Thorold is right, the purpose of reclassification is not to identify those mental disorders which justify a patient's continued detention and for which compulsory treatment may be given. He is, it seems, unable to attribute any significant purpose to reclassification.

[50] In my view, it is clear that the elaborate provisions in the 1983 Act for classification and reclassification are intended to serve a real purpose. In R v Pathfinder NHS Trust, ex p Wey (1999) 3 CCL Rep 271, the applicant was detained in hospital under s 3. His classified mental disorder was 'mental illness'. His disorder was reclassified as 'mental illness and psychopathic disorder' under s 16. The applicant appealed to the tribunal. The tribunal made an order under s 72(5) reclassifying his mental disorder back to 'mental illness'. The appropriate medical officer then purported to exercise his s 16 power to reclassify his disorder yet again as 'mental illness and psychopathic disorder'. The applicant sought judicial review of this last decision. The application succeeded before Kay J. The issue was whether, without a significant change of circumstances, the medical officer could make a classification decision which was in conflict with that of the tribunal. Kay J said that he could not do so. He said:

'If the effect of the Act is that, immediately afterwards and with no material change of circumstances, the doctor can re-exercise his powers under section 16, then the protection given for the patient is totally toothless and in no way affords any protection at all.'

[51] If Mr Thorold is right, the exercise of classification is not intended to provide the patient with any protection. Classification is irrelevant to treatment, since a patient may be treated for any mental disorder under s 63. It is at this point that I need to consider R v Anglia and Oxfordshire Mental Health Review Tribunal, ex p Hagan (1999) 53 BMLR 9.

[52] In that case, the applicant was a restricted patient. The hospital order specified that he was suffering from mental illness and psychopathic disorder which were of a nature or degree which made it appropriate for him to be detained in a hospital for medical treatment. In other words, it was a comorbidity case where, at the admission stage, both mental disorders were classified. The applicant applied to the tribunal to be discharged under s 73. The tribunal refused to discharge him. It found that he continued to suffer from the psychopathic disorder, which continued to be of a nature and degree that required his detention in hospital for his own health and safety, and for the protection of others. It also found that the applicant continued to suffer from the mental illness, which was at that time in remission, but that the mental illness taken alone would not justify his being detained. Nevertheless, the tribunal decided not to exercise its power under s 72(5) to reclassify so as to remove from the hospital order the reference to the mental illness. The applicant argued that, in view of its findings, the tribunal was bound under s 72(5) to delete the reference to mental illness in the hospital order. This argument prevailed before Collins J. The tribunal succeeded on appeal before Lord Woolf MR, Waller and Chadwick LJJ.

[53] The principal judgment was given by Waller LJ. The central question for the court was whether on the facts of that case the tribunal had a discretion or was under a duty to reclassify pursuant to s 72(5), by deleting mental illness on the grounds that it was a mental disorder which would not by itself justify detention. The court held that the tribunal had a discretion. It is necessary to examine the reasoning of Waller LJ's judgment in a little detail. He recorded (at 15) the submission of Mr Gordon (who appeared for the applicant in that case) that it is not lawful to treat a patient compulsorily for any form of mental disorder other than one that is classified: the very submission that he makes on the present appeal. Waller LJ said that it was unnecessary to decide whether this submission was correct, and that it was 'probably better to leave final resolution to a case where it is directly in issue'.

[54] He then turned to the question of reclassification and its purpose. He said (at 17):

'There is force in Mr Gordon's submissions that there should be some touchstone for the use of compulsory powers both of detention and treatment. Nor do I dissent from the view that reclassification is a means whereby that touchstone can be kept under review. Furthermore, I have no doubt that the requirement that there must be at least one common mental disorder as between two medical practitioners before an application is effective, is the touchstone for detention under s 3, but it clearly is not in one sense the touchstone for treatment in that instance because under s 16 one report from the appropriate medical officer stating that the patient is suffering from a different form of mental disorder will lead to the application being deemed to contain that different form.'

[55] He then considered what the position would be if the appropriate medical officer were of the opinion that the applicant (a) continued to suffer from a mental illness which did not alone justify detention, but (b) also suffered from a psychopathic disorder which did justify detention. Waller LJ said that in such circumstances the medical officer would not be able to reclassify under s 16 because 'it would not be appearing to the appropriate medical officer that the patient was suffering from a form of mental disorder other than the form or forms specified in the application'. He added that he did not see any warrant for implying a duty on the medical officer 'to delete a mental disorder from which the patient suffers and may need treatment, albeit that mental disorder alone might not justify detention'. He then considered the position of restricted patients, and said that he derived assistance in construing s 72(5) from the civil context ie the position under s 16.

[56] He said (at 18):

'That leads me to the conclusion that reclassification is not simply about defining those mental illnesses in the sense of making sure that the document authorising detention only contains references to the forms of mental disorder when taken on their own would justify detention. I accept that the document authorising detention, whether it be an application or an order of the court, is the starting point for authorising the powers under the Mental Health Act. But reclassification, in my view, does not involve an obligation to remove from that order a form of mental disorder from which a patient still suffers.'

[57] He summarised his overall conclusions as follows (at 18–20):

'First, the primary purpose of s 72(5) is to enable a tribunal which has concluded that the form of mental disorder which requires the patient to continue to be detained is different from the form of mental disorder specified in an order (or an application or direction), to substitute that mental disorder so as to, in effect, correct the order to accord with the position as it is now known to be. Second, reclassification in the civil context under s 16, would not have taken place if the conclusion of the medical officer was that Mr Hagan still suffered from mental illness, albeit it was in remission, and in the result in the civil context: (a) the application would still have specified mental illness; and (b) whatever s 63 means, treatment for mental illness could continue to be compulsorily administered. Section 72(5) ought to be construed as providing the mental health tribunal with a discretion so that they are not obliged to reclassify Mr Hagan in a way different from that which he would have been classified as a civil patient. In addition, in the context of ss 37 and 41, s 72(5) ought to be construed as giving the mental health tribunal a discretion not to delete a mental disorder from which a patient still suffers where deletion might frustrate their powers in relation to conditional discharge in the future. Reclassification relates to whether the patient suffers from a particular mental disorder; not to whether he is detainable for that mental disorder if it stood alone. It is possible that if the conclusion was that a patient no longer suffered from a form of mental disorder previously specified in the order at all, that deletion in circumstances where substitution was not required would be permissible, but that is not this case. The judge put Mr Gordon's submissions in this way: "In short, what Mr Gordon's submissions boil down to is this. The purpose of classification, whether it be in an application or in an order, or indeed any other formal document, is to show the basis for the detention of the relevant person. It is, as it were, akin to a warrant or a court order justifying detention in, for example, a prison, because detention in a mental hospital is as much a deprivation of liberty as detention in any other sort of institution. Such a detention must be justified. The document shows third parties why a person is being detained and, therefore, should contain, and contain only, the reference to the form of mental disorder which justifies any current detention." It will be noted that he commences with the words "purpose of classification". I do not dissent from the view that at least part of the purpose of classification in the original form of application, and the court order under s 37, is to show the basis for the detention and at least part of the purpose is to identify the mental disorder for which compulsory treatment is needed (albeit the treatment aspect was not much pursued before the judge). It also seems to me that the reason why under s 16 a report may generate some other form of mental disorder being specified in the application has to do with the lawfulness or otherwise of continued detention pursuant to an application, and the purpose of substitution under s 72(5) has to do with ensuring that the order correctly reflects a basis for detention. But it does not follow in either case that the purpose of reclassification is to ensure that there is not described in the application or order a form of mental disorder from which the patient suffers and may need treatment if he continues to be detained on the basis of another form of mental disorder. Indeed, the ordinary application of s 16 leads to that conclusion, and there is no reason why the tribunal, under s 72(5), should be obliged to reach a different conclusion. Thus, the judge was wrong to accept the submission that the purpose of reclassification wherever it appeared in the Mental Health Act was to ensure that there was not described in the application or the order a mental disorder from which the patient suffered but which would not on its own justify detention. In particular, it seems to me the judge was wrong to accept the submission that the purpose of reclassification under s 72(5) was to describe accurately the basis on which the patient was lawfully detained. The patient was lawfully detained under an order of the court, and there was nothing inaccurate in describing him as being lawfully detained on the bases specified in the order. Furthermore, there is no warrant in my view for reading into the section that it is: "incumbent upon [the tribunal] to reclassify if it decides that one of the current forms of mental disorders, from which the patient is suffering which is contained in the order or application or direction which has lead to his detention, is no longer appropriate ... because the relevant mental illness is not of a nature or degree which makes it appropriate for him to receive medical treatment" where the conclusion of the tribunal is that for another reason the patient is to be detained. Of course, if the conclusion relating to the mental illness related to the only basis for detention, reclassification would not be appropriate but discharge either absolutely or conditionally would follow. I would finally add that there is, in my judgment, possibly a short answer to this case even accepting much of Mr Gordon's submissions. The conclusion of the tribunal was that the mental illness alone would not render him liable to be detained. That conclusion emphasises that Mr Hagan still suffers from mental illness, and that it may recur unless treatment was available. The conclusion I suggest can be fairly read as being that the mental illness, when taken together with the psychopathic disorder which can be alleviated by treatment in hospital, makes it appropriate for him to be detained in hospital for medical treatment in relation to both types of mental disorder. Clearly, there could be no criticism of the tribunal's refusal to reclassify so as to delete the mental illness if that was their view.'

[58] Mr Gordon submits that Ex p Hagan was wrongly decided. He contends that the court should have held that classification is the touchstone for both detention and treatability, and that the decision of Collins J was correct. He submits that it is open to this court not to follow Ex p Hagan since that decision was made before the Human Rights Act 1998 came into force, and without reference to the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms 1950 (as set out in Sch 1 to the 1998 Act). He nevertheless submits that the decision in Ex p Hagan is no bar to his appeal in the present case, since the court expressly refused (see (1999) 53 BMLR 9 at 15–16) to decide the point that arises here, namely whether it is lawful to treat a patient compulsorily for any form of mental disorder that is not classified.

[59] Mr Thorold submits that Ex p Hagan was correctly decided, but he does not contend that the answer to the question that arises in the present case is provided by Ex p Hagan. Counsel are, therefore, agreed that Ex p Hagan is not determinative of the s 63 question. Nevertheless, it seems to me that at least some of Waller LJ's reasoning is relevant to that question.

[60] I confess, with the greatest of respect, that I am unable to agree with some of that reasoning. The court in Ex p Hagan seems to have been of the opinion that classification is the touchstone for detention, but not necessarily for treatability. Waller LJ states in various places that it is the touchstone for detention. Thus, he says (at 18) that the primary purpose of s 72(5) of the 1983 Act is to enable a tribunal which has concluded that the form of disorder which requires a patient to continue to be detained is different from the classified disorder to make a substitution 'so as to, in effect, correct the order to accord with the position as it is now known to be'. And he says (at 19) that (a) 'at least part of the purpose' of an original classification is to show the basis for detention; (b) the reason why a s 16 report may reclassify a mental disorder 'has to do with the lawfulness or otherwise of continued detention pursuant to an application'; and (c) the purpose of substitution under s 72(5) 'has to do with ensuring that the order correctly reflects a basis for detention'. In these passages, Waller LJ is clearly saying that the reason for a reclassification under ss 16 or 72(5) is to provide a touchstone for lawful detention: to ensure that the application or hospital order (as the case may be) accurately describes the mental disorder which justifies the patient's lawful detention in hospital.

[61] As to whether classification provides the touchstone for treatability, Waller LJ sees force (at 17) in the submission that it does; and at least part of the purpose of the original classification is 'to identify the mental disorder for which compulsory treatment is needed' (at 19). But this did not require the removal from the order of a form of mental disorder from which a patient still suffers, even though that would not by itself justify detention (see 18).

[62] It seems to me that two factors played a considerable, and perhaps decisive, part in the conclusion to which I have just referred. First he was of the opinion (at 17) that an appropriate medical officer cannot reclassify under s 16 if he considers that one of two classified disorders no longer satisfies the s 3(2) criteria. This led to his point that there was no warrant for adding by implication some duty on the medical officer to delete a mental disorder from which the patient suffers and may need treatment, albeit that this mental disorder alone might not justify detention. But I do not see why the medical officer cannot reclassify in such a case (see [21], above). At the outset, there are two classified disorders A and B. The medical officer now considers that there is only one, A. It appears to him that the disorder from which the patient is suffering (A) is 'other' than the disorders which were specified in the application form (A and B). The importance of Waller LJ's opinion as to the scope of s 16 in the reasoning that led to his conclusion about the meaning of s 72(5) is evident from his judgment (at 18–19).

[63] The second important factor in Waller LJ's reasoning is the concern expressed (at 15–16) about the implications of accepting Mr Gordon's submissions as to the meaning of s 63. Waller LJ speaks of an 'unsatisfactory state of affairs' if the tribunal were bound to delete mental illness from the order since (1) the hospital could not treat the patient compulsorily so as to keep his mental illness in remission, and (2) even more worryingly, 'could not treat [him] compulsorily if the mental illness came out of remission until they had gone through the Secretary of State route to get the order re-amended'. No reference is made to the possible recourse to the power to treat under the common law doctrine of necessity. It would seem that the relevance of this power was not brought to the attention of the court.

[64] Waller LJ acknowledges that part of the purpose of classification is to identify the mental disorder for which compulsory treatment is needed. I respectfully agree. But in my view the corollary is that it is not the purpose of classification to identify a mental disorder for which compulsory treatment is not needed.

[65] In my judgment, the better view of ss 16, 20 and 72(5) is that, where a classified mental disorder ceases to meet the s 3(2) or 37(2) criteria, then there should be a reclassification to delete the disorder from the application for admission or hospital order as the case may be. For the reasons that I have given, neither of the factors which seem to have led the court in Ex p Hagan to its conclusion as to the meaning of s 72(5) justifies that conclusion.

[66] It follows that I do not feel able to agree with the reasoning that led the court to allow the appeal in Ex p Hagan. I do not, however, find it necessary to say that it was wrongly decided. In my view, the correct basis for allowing the appeal in Ex p Hagan was identified by Waller LJ (at 19–20). It is not, therefore, necessary to consider Mr Gordon's submission that Ex p Hagan can no longer be regarded as good law since the 1998 Act came into force.

CONCLUSION

[67] For the reasons given earlier, the natural and correct interpretation of s 63 of the 1983 Act is that it permits compulsory medical treatment only for classified mental disorders. Were it otherwise, the carefully drafted provisions for reclassification in ss 16, 20 and 72(5) would serve no real purpose. Those provisions are designed to ensure that the essential link is maintained between the mental disorder which justifies the patient's detention and his treatment for that disorder, and no other.

[68] In my opinion, this appeal should be allowed.

SCOTT BAKER LJ.

[69] I have had the advantage of reading in draft the judgments of Dyson and Simon Brown LJJ and I agree with them. Detention in a mental hospital is something that the law permits only if the specified conditions are satisfied. I can see no reason why a patient should ordinarily be subjected to treatment without his consent for a condition that does not justify his detention. That this is the position under the Mental Health Act 1983 is in my view clear from the careful analysis of the Act by Dyson LJ.

[70] I cannot see that our conclusion should present an insuperable problem for the treating doctors. Where a patient is suffering from more than one form of mental disorder justifying detention it will be important for him to be classified accordingly and mental health review tribunals will need to keep this in mind. I also see the force of Dyson LJ's point (at [46], above) that there will be circumstances where treatment for disorder B is required to treat disorder A, and it is difficult in such a case to see why treatment for disorder B is not ancillary to, and therefore a necessary part of, the treatment for disorder A.

[71] I too would allow the appeal.

SIMON BROWN LJ.

[72] I too would allow this appeal for the reasons given by Dyson LJ but because of the obvious importance of the case and because our decision may be thought to sit somewhat uneasily alongside that in R v Anglia and Oxfordshire Mental Health Review Tribunal, ex p Hagan (1999) 53 BMLR 9, I want to add a few words of my own.

[73] Dyson LJ (at [16], above) set out to show, and later in his judgment plainly does show that—

> 'a theme that runs through [the Mental Health Act 1983] is that the liability to detention is linked to the mental disorder from which the patient is classified as suffering, and that this disorder is considered to be treatable by the person or body making the classification'.

[74] That theme of itself to my mind calls into question the correctness of parts at least of the reasoning in Ex p Hagan if not the actual result there arrived at. If the patient can only lawfully be detained for a classified treatable mental disorder, there ought properly to be a correlation between the disorder(s) classified and the treatable disorder(s) from which the patient is suffering. That, however, is not directly the question raised on this appeal. Rather the question here is whether, assuming the patient to be lawfully detained, he can thereafter be compulsorily treated for any mental disorder diagnosed by his responsible medical officer (RMO) or only for such disorder(s) as he is at that time classified to be suffering from.

[75] It is the respondent's submission (and here I quote Mr Thorold's skeleton argument) that—

> 'The primary purpose of classification under the 1983 Act is to establish a legal basis for detention, and to indicate which diagnoses are in issue at a tribunal, not to limit the permissible limit of treatments which can be given to the specified disorders.'

[76] In common with my Lords, that is not a submission I feel able to accept. I explained in R (on the application of Wilkinson) v Responsible Medical Officer

Broadmoor Hospital [2001] EWCA Civ 1545 at [9], [2002] 1 WLR 419 at [9], the scheme for compulsory treatment under the 1983 Act: a

> 'Detention under the Act does not of itself authorise treatment without consent. It is not sufficient merely that the patient was admitted (and indeed remains detained) because his condition was regarded as treatable. Compulsory treatment must be authorised if at all under Part IV of the Act. As section 63 makes plain, it is a prerequisite of such treatment that it shall be given "for the mental disorder from which [the patient] is suffering". Without that it will be unlawful in any event. Sections 57 and 58 then provide a range of safeguards graded to reflect the severity of the various treatments which may be contemplated. Section 57 (not here directly in point) is concerned with surgery for destroying brain tissue or other forms of severe and perhaps irreversible treatment prescribed by the Secretary of State and it precludes any such treatment being given compulsorily. Rather it requires both the patient's capacitated consent, which must be certified to be valid by a panel of three persons including a SOAD [second opinion appointed doctor], and also the SOAD's certified approval for such treatment having regard to the likelihood of it assisting the patient's condition. Section 58 applies to two defined forms of treatment for mental disorder: ECT and long-term medication. These are forbidden save—and thereby, taken in conjunction with section 63, permitted only—upon the stipulated conditions. These are that the patient has either (a) given a capacitated consent, so certified by the RMO or a SOAD, or (b) not given such a consent (or, indeed, indicated a capacitated refusal) but the SOAD, having consulted with two others as required, has nevertheless certified that the treatment should be given.' b c d e

[77] We are not here concerned with s 57 (which, in any event, as provided by s 56(2), applies 'also to any patient who is not liable to be detained under this Act') because, subject only to the requirement for urgent treatment as defined in s 62, it requires in every case the patient's capacitated consent. Section 58 (also subject to s 62), however, does not always require the patient's consent so that, were Mr Thorold's submission correct, patients classified as suffering only from mental disorder A could be compulsorily subjected to the sorts of severe treatment provided for by s 58 with regard to mental disorder B. That is not a conclusion that I would reach except upon the clearest language and s 63 does not provide it. f g

[78] Two important considerations should be borne in mind when construing s 63: first, that on no view does it extend to treatment for any physical condition, however serious, and however mentally incapacitated the patient may be. Secondly, that a person suffering from a treatable mental disorder, but not one of a nature or degree which makes it appropriate for him to receive medical treatment in a hospital, cannot be detained and treated under the Act. If the patient cannot be forcibly treated in either of those circumstances, why should he be amenable to such treatment for a non-specified mental disorder merely because he is already lawfully detained for the treatment of some other mental disorder? h j

[79] I add only this. The mental health review tribunal's decision here was made on 8 May 2001, well after this court's judgment in Ex p Hagan and presumably with that case in mind. It may be doubted whether in those circumstances, given that the tribunal found the appellant still liable to be detained on the ground of mental illness, they thought it necessary to give serious consideration to the exercise of their s 72(5) power to reclassify him as suffering also, assuming they thought he was, from a psychopathic disorder. To my mind, indeed, if one looks at the totality of the reasoning for their decision, it seems tolerably clear that they did not. Dyson LJ (at [9], above) has set out the first part of the tribunal's reasoning. It continued as follows:

> 'The RMO gave evidence in accordance with his report and its addendum. He was emphatic that the patient had improved over the last 18 months. That had allowed greater engagement with the care team. The patient was still ill, and without medication and the structured care of the hospital, would relapse. The RMO outlined a pattern of treatment which he considered should be put in hand before a transfer could be considered. The risk factor was difficult to assess but was real. Dr Scholey and Mrs White gave evidence emphasising that of the RMO. Professor Sashidharan considered that the mental illness was controlled by the medication and that the patient's outbursts in past years were due to the culture from which he came reacting against the regime of the hospital, rather than mental illness. However, the Professor was specific that the patient wherever he was, must continue medication for fear of a relapse. Mr Bromley echoed the Professor's view that some of the patient's behaviour was due to growing up in a criminal subculture, but agreed that the patient presented some risk, not readily quantifiable. The patient was courteous and articulate. He was anxious to say that he suffered no mental illness and had not for many years. Questioned, he said that although mad at the time of the offence, he had already recovered by the time he came before the Crown Court for sentence. He would take medication if it was enforceable but not otherwise. We note that the patient has made progress over the past year or two, but much work remains before a transfer would be appropriate.'

[80] Had the tribunal appreciated that it would be unlawful to treat the appellant compulsorily in a personality disorder ward without reclassifying him as suffering from that disorder—indeed, that he was already being unlawfully treated in such a ward—it may be supposed that they would have addressed the issue of reclassification altogether more directly, rather than merely appearing to approve the RMO's proposed pattern of future treatment.

[81] Clearly, following our judgments on this appeal, the question of reclassifying patients to include other disorders will assume a far greater importance than hitherto it has had.

[82] These observations, however, cannot affect the outcome of the present appeal. Clearly it succeeds so that unless and until the appellant is hereafter reclassified by a tribunal as suffering also from a psychopathic disorder it will not be lawful to continue his treatment for that condition.

Appeal allowed.

Dilys Tausz Barrister.

Lambert v Lambert

[2002] EWCA Civ 1685

COURT OF APPEAL, CIVIL DIVISION

THORPE, MAY LJJ AND BODEY J

14, 15 OCTOBER, 14 NOVEMBER 2002

Divorce – Financial provision – Matters to be considered by court when making order – Contribution by each of the parties to welfare of family – Whether concept of 'special contribution' by money-making partner legitimate in justifying unequal division of assets – Matrimonial Causes Act 1973, s 25(2).

The parties were married in 1974 and had two adult children. During the course of their marriage, the husband developed a successful company through a combination of hard work, innovation, initiative, determination and business acumen. By creating the family's wealth, the husband made a substantial contribution to its welfare. The wife made a full contribution by looking after their home and caring for their family, supplemented when the need arose by her willingness to support her husband in his efforts to develop the business. The parties separated in 1997. Two years later, the husband's company was sold, and he received nearly £20m for his shares. Several million pounds were also paid into a trust for the two children who were therefore financially independent. The wife, whose life expectancy was 12 years greater than her husband's, brought ancillary relief proceedings, seeking an equal division of the assets. The husband offered her only 30%. At the hearing, the judge considered the factors that he was required to take into account by s 25(2)[a] of the Matrimonial Causes Act 1973, including the contributions that the parties had made to the welfare of their family, and concluded that a split of 63% to 37% in the husband's favour constituted a fair distribution of the assets. In reaching that conclusion, the judge held that an unequal distribution was justified because the husband's contribution had been 'exceptional', even though he had earlier concluded that the husband could not be described as a genius and that the wife could probably not have done any more to justify an award of 50%. On the wife's appeal, the Court of Appeal considered the legitimacy of the concept of special contribution and whether the judge had fallen into the trap of gender discrimination.

Held – Special contribution remained a legitimate possibility, but only in exceptional circumstances. It was both futile and dangerous to attempt to speculate on the boundaries of the exceptional. The danger of gender discrimination resulting from a finding of special financial contribution was plain. If all that was regarded was the scale of the breadwinner's success, discrimination was almost bound to follow since there was no equal opportunity for the homemaker to demonstrate the scale of her comparable success. Although there might be cases where the product alone justified a conclusion of special contribution, a case for such a contribution would be hard to establish in the absence of some exceptional and individual quality in the generator of the fortune. A good idea, initiative, entrepreneurial skills and extensive hard work were insufficient to attract the label. It would be too easy to compile a comparable catalogue of qualities that the homemaker had brought to the other essential contribution. In the instant case, once the judge had concluded that the husband was not a genius and that the wife could have done no more, he should not have elevated one contribution above the other, given that the two were essentially incommensurable. The only justification for a departure from equality asserted by the husband could not be upheld without discrimination. It was also important that the wife's needs, given the respective ages of the parties, pointed towards equality. Accordingly, the appeal would be allowed (see [45], [46], [52], [53], [62], [64], [65], [77], below).

a Section 25, so far as material, is set out at [37], below

H-J v H-J (financial provision: equality) [2002] 1 FLR 415 approved.

Cowan v Cowan [2001] 2 FCR 331 distinguished.

Notes

For equality of division, see 29(3) Halsbury's Laws (4th edn reissue) para 731.

For the Matrimonial Causes Act 1973, s 25, see 27 Halsbury's Statutes (4th edn) (2000 reissue) 972.

Cases referred to in judgments

Cowan v Cowan [2001] EWCA Civ 679, [2001] 2 FCR 331, [2002] Fam 97, [2001] 3 WLR 684.

Duxbury v Duxbury [1990] 2 All ER 77, [1992] Fam 62, [1991] 3 WLR 639, CA.

Farmer v Bramley [2000] FamCA 1615, Aust FC.

Figgins v Figgins [2002] FamCA 688, Aust FC.

G v G (2 July 2002, unreported), Fam D.

H v H (financial provision: special contribution) [2002] 2 FLR 1021.

H-J v H-J (financial provision: equality) [2002] 1 FLR 415.

Lynch v Lynch [2000] FamCA 1353, [2001] FLC 93-075, Aust FC.

M v M [2002] NIJB 47.

Piglowska v Piglowski [1999] 3 All ER 632, [1999] 1 WLR 1360, HL.

White v White [2001] 1 All ER 1, [2001] 1 AC 596, [2000] 3 WLR 1571, HL.

Appeal

By notice dated 16 November 2001, Shan Elizabeth Rose Lambert, the applicant in ancillary relief proceedings brought against her former husband, Harry Paul Lambert, appealed from the order of Connell J on 22 October 2001 ([2002] 2 FCR 413) awarding her a lump sum of £3,152,732 rather than the sum of £5,751,474 which she sought. The facts are set out in the judgment of Thorpe LJ.

Nicholas Mostyn QC and Richard Todd (instructed by Schillings) for the wife.

Martin Pointer QC and Nigel Dyer (instructed by Manches & Co) for the husband.

Cur adv vult

14 November 2002. The following judgments were delivered.

THORPE LJ.

INTRODUCTION

[1] This is an appeal from the judgment of Connell J dated 22 October 2001 ([2002] 2 FCR 413). He conducted the trial of the ancillary relief proceedings brought by Shan Lambert against her husband Harry Lambert for eight days between 2 and 10 October. The judgment that he gave some 12 days later was reserved and handed down. Permission to appeal was given by me on paper on 5 December 2001, the application having been lodged with this court on 16 November following refusal by Connell J on 31 October. An interval of ten months between grant of permission and listing of the appeal is most unusual and in many ways undesirable. The skeleton arguments of the appellant and respondent were settled on 14 November 2001 and 17 May 2002 respectively. In the year between trial and listing of the appeal there have been a number of significant decisions both here and abroad in a fluid area of the law. Accordingly the skeletons were but scant guide to the oral submissions. Such a delay is above all undesirable for the parties. Until the litigation is concluded it is difficult for them to complete the transition from married life to independent life either financially or emotionally.

[2] The case would be very suitable for use in a textbook on ancillary relief. It is a big money case, and the family fortune, taken by the judge to be £20·2m, was all generated during the marriage. Both husband and wife worked hard for their success. There are two children now grown up and independently rich as a consequence of the diversion of a substantial proportion of the family fortune into a trust for their benefit. There are no complicating factors. Following a take over of the husband's company after the separation the family fortune is more or less all liquid. The wife has always contended for an equal division. The husband offered her only 30% on the grounds that his special contribution entitled him to the lion's share.

THE SHAPE OF THE JUDGMENT OF CONNELL J

[3] Having introduced the parties as being then aged respectively 49 (the applicant wife) and 57 (the respondent husband), Connell J summarised the essential history with admirable brevity as follows:

> '[2] The marriage lasted 23 years. There are two children, a son aged 20 and a daughter aged nearly 19. Both are at university and are wealthy as a result of a trust which was created for them by their parents in 1985 and which is based in Guernsey. The value of the trust assets is now £7·3m and both children in reality are financially independent.
>
> [3] The parties' significant wealth arises from the sale of the shares in the company A Ltd in September 1999 for £75m. Of this sum the husband received £19,726,000, the wife received £500,000, and the children's trust received £6m. This company had been floated on the stock exchange in 1987, and the quoted share price at the time of the sale was 155p. However the price paid for the shares after negotiation conducted by the husband and the board of directors was 263p. The company was founded by the husband in March 1973, nine months before he met the wife and 15 months before he married her in June 1974. The company produced and distributed a free local newspaper funded by advertising revenue, and it expanded dramatically over the course of the marriage until it was sold as described.'

[4] The judge recorded (at [4]–[5]) the principal area of factual dispute between the parties. The husband's case was that he had launched the company and set it on a successful path prior to the marriage, and that its success during the marriage was the result of his drive and initiative. After the separation he contended that the eventual sale was at an outstanding price achieved by his special negotiating skills. He asserted that his wife's involvement in the company was more or less ornamental.

[5] By contrast the wife claimed for herself not only a committed contribution as wife and mother but also a contribution to the success of the business which she asserted was pivotal. The judge then recorded Mr Pointer QC's submission that, on the husband's case, his contribution to the creation of the family fortune was exceptional, as defined by this court in Cowan v Cowan [2001] EWCA Civ 679, [2001] 2 FCR 331, [2002] Fam 97, and that it significantly outweighed the admittedly full but domestic contribution of the wife.

[6] The judge directed himself as to the law, impeccably in my opinion ([2002] 2 FCR 413 at [6]). He said:

> 'The court's fundamental duty however remains to apply s 25 of the Matrimonial Causes Act 1973 to all the circumstances of this case in its attempt to arrive at a fair outcome. Although the issue of the parties contributions to the welfare of the family has been uppermost in the minds of the parties' and of their representatives, I observe that that issue can claim no statutory priority in the discretionary exercise. I must have regard to each of the eight matters separately specified in s 25(2) against the background of all the circumstances of the case. Since each of the children is now adult and wealthy as described, their welfare no longer requires "first consideration" ...'

[7] The judge then carried out the s 25 exercise considering in turn each of the s 25(2) criteria. That exercise took him from paras [7] to [28]. He reviewed (at [29]–[38]) those passages in White v White [2001] 1 All ER 1, [2001] 1 AC 596 and Cowan v Cowan of particular application to the case. Finally (at [39] and [40]) he expressed his conclusion, namely a 63%:37% split in favour of the husband. That left the wife with assets totalling £7·5m, nearer the figure of £6m for which Mr Pointer QC had contended than the figure of £10·2m for which Mr Mostyn QC had striven. The order was summarised thus in the final paragraph (at [41]):

> 'Matrimonial home worth £1·6m will be transferred to the wife. She has other assets worth £2·8m in round figures. I shall in addition order a lump sum payment in full and final satisfaction of all her claims of £3·1m.'

THE GROUNDS OF APPEAL

[8] In his grounds of appeal Mr Mostyn attacks the judgment on three fronts. (i) First he contends that Connell J fell into the trap of gender discrimination by concluding that the husband's contribution as a money-maker was special, of greater value than the wife's, and a justification for an unequal division of the family fortune. (ii) Second he submits that the husband held the proceeds of sale of his shares in the company as trustee pending the outcome of the wife's ancillary relief claims. His subsequent investments were reckless and the wife's entitlement should have been determined on the notional basis that the assets retained the value that they held immediately after the sale of the business. (iii) Third he says that the judgment focussed insufficiently on the wife's needs as the future owner of the final matrimonial home, with the consequence that the yield from her investment capital would not meet her outgoings.

[9] This appeal was dominated by the first ground, which raises many difficult questions and requires a review of recent authorities both here and abroad. The submission underlying the second ground had been rejected by Connell J on the facts and particularly on his assessment of the husband's good faith. Before us when Mr Mostyn saw that the wind was against him he tacitly abandoned this ground. The third ground requires no consideration of law and principle. It is fact dependent and focuses on a single paragraph in the judgment below. I will defer any consideration of ground three until I have dealt with the first ground.

CONNELL J'S TREATMENT OF CONTRIBUTIONS

[10] How then did Connell J deal with contributions? It is perhaps indicative that the section of his judgment devoted to contributions is the longest. He considered the wife's contribution, dealing first with home life. He said (at [18]):

> 'The wife's contribution as wife and mother is accepted by the husband. Given that this was a husband who was intent on building up the company, who worked long hours to that end and who, on his own account, was often away from home for much of the working week, the contribution made by the wife in this regard was particularly valuable. The husband's contribution vis-à-vis home life and his children was primarily confined to weekends; so that he was a committed but frequently absent husband and father. When home he made the major decisions on modernisation ... and the wife did her best to implement these when he was away.'

He noted that for at least the first five years of the marriage the wife ran her own business which enabled her to pay for the food and other domestic articles: 'This was a constructive contribution in the early days of the marriage and in my view is evidence of the unsurprising fact that the parties treated the marriage as a partnership from an early stage.'

[11] He put the wife's contribution to Adscene into proper perspective, thus (at [21]):

> 'I do not see her role as pivotal. On the other hand it would not be fair to her to describe it as purely incidental, since the husband was able to turn to her for support when such was appropriate or necessary in his view. Thus her contribution to the business was modest when compared to that of the husband, but was not irrelevant or meaningless. Bearing in mind the words of the statute, she made a full contribution by looking after the home and caring for the family, which was supplemented when the need arose by her willingness to support the husband in his efforts to develop the business.'

[12] Turning to the husband, he recorded his case for exceptional contribution which was advanced on three fronts: first that the company was created and established prior to marriage, second that during the years of cohabitation the husband's achievement was the product of his exceptional innovation and talent, third that the sale of Adscene some two years after the separation for a price two-and-a-half times the separation value was the product of his exceptional judgment and negotiating skills. As to the first the judge recorded that at the date of the marriage the company was only part way through its first year of trading, that the real growth 'all took place during the course of the marriage and during the time that the wife was supporting the husband as well as looking after his home and bringing up the children. This pot of gold was truly created during the marriage'. However in relation to the second phase the judge held that the development 'was achieved very largely thanks to the husband's efforts and I have no doubt that he was an excellent businessman and manifestly a successful entrepreneur'. Of the third phase, the sale, this was the finding:

> 'The husband is entitled to significant credit for this in view of his early participation in the sale process, but in my view it would be stretching language to describe this part of his contribution as exceptional. No doubt as a successful entrepreneur he displayed the talents of a good negotiator in order to reach a good conclusion. It was a very satisfactory conclusion materially assisted by a good businessman but no more than that.'

[13] Paragraph [26] concluded this section of the judgment with this overall assessment of the husband's contribution:

> 'Thus, as indicated, the husband made a very substantial contribution to the welfare of this family by creating its wealth with occasional assistance from his wife. It would not be right in my view to describe him as a genius, and the most exceptional part of his contribution relates to the very large sum of money acquired by the family as described. It is difficult to envisage a financial contribution in a big money case which is not in one sense exceptional, since by definition exceptional or unusual wealth has been created. Where, as here, that contribution consists of a good idea, initiative, entrepreneurial skills and extensive hard work the question still remains whether that contribution is so special when compared to the contribution of the wife and balanced against the other s 25 circumstances as to demand special recognition.'

[14] The judge's answer to the question that he had posed himself in the final sentence of para [26] comes in paras [39] and [40], which not only answer the question but also decide the outcome of the case. I therefore set them out in full:

> '[39] There is of course a problem in that any court which decides that the contribution of one spouse is properly described as special may appear thereby to decry the contribution of the other spouse. But that is not in fact the case. The wife, as here, may have made a full domestic contribution and a modest business contribution. That being recognised, it cannot be described as an exceptional contribution without causing offence to language. On the other hand the husband may have accumulated exceptional wealth by displaying over many years an innovative approach coupled with excellent business skills and very hard work. If that is so the court must decide whether (per Mance LJ) "there was something really special about the skill or effort devoted" by the husband; and in that case must consider its impact on the appropriate order.
>
> [40] In my view the contribution made by this husband is as entitled to the description "really special" or "exceptional" as was the contribution made by Mr Cowan. Although I would not describe him as a genius, he was more than just a hard working businessman. He showed innovative visions and the ability to develop these visions (see [2001] 2 FCR 331 at [67] per Thorpe LJ). He was not merely a successful businessman but an exceptionally active, determined and innovative one (see [2001] 2 FCR 331 at [94] per Robert Walker LJ). His was a special achievement, via special business skills, acumen and effort (see [2001] 2 FCR 331 at [155] per Mance LJ). The wife's contribution was as described, without any feature which can be described as "really special". In answer to the question posed in argument by Mr Mostyn QC, namely "What more could the wife have done to justify an award of 50%?" The answer is: "In the circumstances, probably nothing". That in my view does not lead to the conclusion that an award of less than 50% is unfair. In a case where the issue of contribution is central to outcome, an award which leaves this wife with approximately 37·5% of the assets (£7,500,000) is a fair outcome, which departs from the yardstick of equality in deference to the really special contribution of the husband as described. It also recognises in full the contribution of this particular wife thanks to whose help and support the husband was free to pursue those skills. In percentage terms it is similar to the award made in Cowan v Cowan where the wife achieved 38%. The husband's proposal of a lump sum of £1·6m would have left the wife with (but) 30%. Such an award would not adequately have recognised the various different elements of her contribution which have been previously described.'

[15] In developing his attack on these paragraphs Mr Mostyn relies upon the decision in White v White and upon five cases that were not available to Connell J. Before coming to his submissions it is convenient to review his authorities.

The recent authorities

[16] There are three authorities in this jurisdiction, which require scrutiny. I take them in chronological order, the first being the case of H-J v H-J (financial provision: equality) [2002] 1 FLR 415. Coleridge J on 17 October 2001 considered cross-appeals in a case first decided by District Judge Million involving assets of approximately £2,711,000. The district judge's order gave the wife approximately 45% of the assets. Coleridge J increased the wife's share to equality. In so doing Coleridge J differed from District Judge Million neither in principle nor in approach but on a point of detail irrelevant to this review. I begin by recording the approach of the district judge. I extract three separate passages from his judgment:

1. 'Counsel says that this greater emphasis on contributions is an inevitable consequence of the decision in White v White. I disagree. It is a temptation but it is not a consequence and to give way to it is to commit the very error which White v White warns us not to, that is to treat some of the factors in s 25(2), in this case contributions, as more important than the others.'

2. 'For my part, I would find it repugnant as a judicial exercise to have, in effect, to draw up a merit table in which fine gradations of contribution give rise to a marginally increased or decreased share in the financial spoils of marriage. By whose standards should I measure such distinctions?'

3. 'In this case, it is sufficient, as I find, to record that both the husband and wife each made their full and equal contributions in their respective roles within this long marriage. The family has been financially successful and the job of raising the children and looking after the various homes has also been successful. The role of the husband has been predominant in the financial success and, as I find, the role of the mother and wife has been predominant in keeping house and raising the children. Any further distinction is, in my judgment, impossible to draw on the evidence.'

[17] Of District Judge Million's approach Coleridge J said (at 428):

'In the context of this case in relation to this question of contribution, I unhesitatingly agree with the district judge that no useful distinction can be drawn between the husband's contribution and the wife's contribution. I can find nothing special, exceptional or stellar about the husband's contribution in this case. He has undoubtedly worked diligently and successfully and over a long period to amass the assets that have been amassed over the duration of this marriage. He has had some good years and some very good years, but if the facts of this case lead to a finding of a special contribution, in my judgment it would be the thin end of a wedge being driven right into the heart of the principles underlying White v White. So I unhesitatingly come to the view that the district judge's findings and approach were correct even in the light of Cowan v Cowan.'

[18] At the conclusion of his judgment Coleridge J said (at 430–431):

'Underlying this appeal and my decision to allow it there seems to me to be two important points:

The significance attaching to a particular fractional percentage is more than merely the monetary value it represents. It goes to the core of the party's understanding of fairness. So 50/50 resonates with fairness (as the House of Lords has identified); both parties depart with the sense of being equally valued. There are no winners or losers. Once there is a departure from equality, as there often has to be, however small that departure, one party (more often the wife) is left with a sense of grievance, of her efforts having been undervalued. Understandably, at the time of divorce these considerations matter a great deal to the parties.

In this case, after a marriage which lasted in excess of 25 years, net assets, after deduction of notional sale costs and capital gains tax, have been accumulated amounting to more than £2·7 million. Accordingly, there is ample to go round. It would indeed be sad if, in this category of cases (as opposed to those cases where the overall means are less than sufficient and so the needs of children and their carers must inevitably remain predominant), the broad and sweeping reform underlying the speeches in White v White was to become bogged down in a welter of zealous, over-sophisticated and costly forensic analysis, or watered down by judicial reticence.'

[19] The next reported case is a decision of a deputy, Mr Peter Hughes QC in H v H (financial provision: special contribution) [2002] 2 FLR 1021. The family assets amounted to approximately £6m. The husband was described as a highly successful city solicitor. Mr Pointer, on his behalf, contended that for various reasons his financial accumulations during the course of his professional life amounted to a special contribution: but on behalf of the wife it was submitted that he was no more than a typical successful city solicitor. The judge noted that the wife had also succumbed to the temptation to play up her own contribution. In rejecting Mr Pointer's submission the judge said:

'[42] I have considerable sympathy for the husband, who has been highly successful and worked extremely hard over many years and no doubt feels that he has created the wealth that exists today. I am unable to accept, though, that his contribution calls for special recognition as in the cases of Cowan and L v L.

[43] It is not easy to define what may amount to a "stellar" or really special contribution, but rather like the elephant, it is not difficult to spot when you come across it.

[44] In Cowan Mance LJ referred to the relevance of the expectations of the parties. In my judgment that is an important consideration. What did the parties anticipate when they set out on their married life together? To what extent have those expectations been realised or have their lives taken a course neither of them would ever have expected and led to riches they would never have contemplated? That was the case in Cowan. It was also so in L v L. In both cases the success of the marriage far exceeded the parties' joint expectations.

[45] That cannot be said here. The husband was already a qualified solicitor with a well-regarded city firm when the parties married. He was set on the career that he has pursued successfully, as both he and the wife hoped for. He has had to work hard and it has not always been easy. The rewards have though been substantial, as no doubt they had hoped they would be, and over the years he has had the full support of the wife in her role of looking after the home and family.'

[20] The last case in this jurisdiction was another decision of Coleridge J given on 2 July 2002 in the case of G v G (unreported). The family assets were in the region of £8·5m. The wife sought a half share. The husband proposed that she should have 40%. The husband had built the family fortune through exceptional hard work and astute business acumen in the field of substantial development and construction projects. The case was largely fought on the issue of the husband's contribution. I cite paras [33] and [34] of the judgment in full:

'But how should the court now evaluate those respective contributions in the context of s 25? It is in this area that, needless to say, enormous amounts of forensic energy have been expended. That this should have happened is largely due, of course, to the recent case law on the subject. I have had the benefit of being referred not only to White v White at length but also all the decided cases which have been reported since that case on this particular subject. The husband's counsel has helpfully produced a folder containing all the relevant authorities. He did this in aid of his argument that the husband's contribution should be not regarded as one of equality with the wife's but of a character and quality which marks it out as special or stellar or outstanding. This, he said, should lead to a finding that (after applying the equality cross-check required since White v White) his client should end up with more than half the resources.

In a number of decisions since White v White e g Cowan v Cowan and L v L (financial provision: contributions) [2002] 2 FCR 413, the court has recognised, in an appropriate case, the possibility of a (financial) contribution by one spouse or another at such an extra-ordinary level that it is entitled to special recognition and value. Unfortunately, this has led to this concept becoming the centrally important issue in almost every case particularly where the assets exceed the party's reasonable needs. Hardly a case is heard nowadays than that one party (usually the husband) seeks to establish that he has played a markedly more valuable part in the accumulation of the wealth and the marriage partnership so that he should be specially rewarded by way of a greater share of the assets. I wonder whether, with respect to the members of the Court of Appeal in Cowan v Cowan, they would have made the extensive remarks they did (about the possibility of a special contribution) if they had realised the forensic Pandora's Box that would be opened in actual practice. The effect is not at all dissimilar to the 'conduct' debates of the 1970s. In those days "conduct" was similarly raised against wives to try and limit their claims. However, the court, recognising the undesirable consequences inherent in those arguments and further the impossibility of fairly adjudicating upon them introduced the concept of "obvious and gross" very effectively to limit their application. It is suggested by some that these current "special contribution" debates are reintroducing conduct by the backdoor. I would say by the front door. For what is "contribution" but a species of conduct. "Conduct" (sub-s 2(g)) refers to the negative behaviour of one of the spouses. "Contribution" (sub-s 2(f)) is the positive behaviour of one or other of the parties. Both concepts are compendious descriptions of the way in which one party conducted him/herself towards the other and/or the family during the marriage. And both carry with them precisely the same undesirable consequences. Firstly they call for a detailed retrospective at the end of a broken marriage just at a time when parties should be looking forward not back. In part that involves a determination of factual issue (and obviously the court is equipped to undertake that). But then, the facts having been established, they each call for a value judgment of the worth of each side's behaviour and translation of that worth into actual money. But by what measure and using what criteria? Negative "conduct" is one thing (particularly where it is recognisably "obvious and gross") but the valuing of positive "contribution" varies from time to time. Should a wealth creator receive more because e g his talents are very unusual or merely conventional but well employed? Should a housewife receive less because part of her daily work over many years was mitigated by the employment of staff? Is there such a concept as an exceptional/special domestic contribution or can only the wealth creator earn the bonus? These are some of the arguments now regularly being deployed. It is much the same as comparing apples with pears and the debate is about as sterile or useful.'

[21] When he came to express his conclusions on the issue of contributions he said (at [36]):

'Does that put the husband into that narrow category of wealth creators whose special gift or talent is the foundation of great wealth? I cannot so find in this case. I cannot evaluate the husband's contribution as greater than the wife's without discriminating against her on the grounds that the work she did over just as long a period was of less value than the husband's. That is precisely the approach foresworn by Lord Nicholls. The husband in this case was a hard working, dedicated husband, a father and provider over 32 years. By the same token the wife was a hard working and dedicated housewife, a mother and homemaker over the same period. "Each in their different spheres contributed equally to the family" per Lord Nicholls. To find otherwise would, on the facts of this case in my judgment, amount to blatant discrimination. The husband's role was the glamorous, interesting and exciting one. The wife's involved the more mundane daily round of the consistent carer. That was the way in which the parties to this marriage chose, between themselves, to organise the overall matrimonial division of labour. How can it then be said fairly, at the end of the day, that one role was more useful or valuable (let alone special or outstanding) than the other in terms of the overall benefit to the marriage partnership or to the family?' a

[22] At the conclusion of his judgment Coleridge J noted that the case had cost the family over £400,000. He continued: b

'That is not especially unusual in this class of case. But the parties are not assisted to achieve compromise when they are encouraged by the law to indulge in a detailed and lengthy retrospective involving a general rummage through the attic of their marriage to discover relics from the past to enhance their role or diminish their spouses. Perhaps "obvious and gross" has a renewed role here. "Obvious" because it imports the concept of very easily discernible and "gross" in the sense of it being abnormally large. Unless this or something similar is soon introduced to curb these debates I fear there is a real danger that the forward looking White innovations will be lost in a sea of post break-up, backward-looking mutual recrimination and the court's task and role in this already uncertain area will thereby be set back at least a generation.' c d

[23] I turn now to the neighbouring jurisdiction of Northern Ireland whose statutory provision more or less mirrors ours. McLaughlin J decided the case of M v M [2002] NIJB 47 on 20 December 2001. The overall assets amounted to about £3·67m. The case had a number of complexities which I need not record. I want only to demonstrate the judge's approach to the evaluation of contributions. He said (at 60): e

'In the course of adducing evidence before me [counsel] sought to tempt me with a bait of this kind. He led evidence, and relied upon it in his closing submissions, that the husband worked very long hours getting out of bed at 6.00 am to be at work by 7.00 am. His work did not finish until late in the evening as he carried on his working day by supervising Y Ltd and the other business premises owned by the company. I accept all of that evidence as true, but to concentrate on that and fail to recognise that, whilst he toiled at work on company business, Mrs M from early in the morning was getting the children ready for school, taking them there, running the home during the day, collecting them after school, cooking and cleaning, nurturing them by ferrying them to social, sporting and recreational activities, supervising homework and tutoring them when required, would be to be guilty of the very kind of discrimination warned against by Lord Nicholls. An example of the value of the life's work of Mrs M can be seen today in the accomplishments and personalities of their children. These are the abiding rewards of her labour of love rather than the transient rewards in the form of money produced by the labour of the husband. In the context of this family's life these admirable qualities of both parties are to be considered of equal value. Indeed the words of Lord Nicholls might almost have been written to describe the respective roles of Mr and Mrs M.' f g h j

[24] I close my review of Mr Mostyn's authorities by recording a recent significant development in Australia. This is of particular relevance given the extent to which Mance LJ was influenced by Australian authority, and particularly the case of Lynch v Lynch [2000] FamCA 1353, [2001] FLC 93-075, in formulating and expressing guidance in the case of Cowan v Cowan on the assessment of what constitutes an exceptional contribution by the family money-maker. The case in point is Figgins v Figgins [2002] FamCA 688. Figgins v Figgins was an appeal to the Full Court in a big money case whose distinguishing features were inheritance and a relatively brief marriage. The Full Court consisted of Nicholson CJ sitting with Ellis and Buckley JJ. In giving the judgment of the court Nicholson CJ said that in the Australian jurisprudence special contribution 'clearly refers to some special factor of skill or capacity that produces the result that there is a loading in favour of the party providing it'. By way of instance he cited the case of Lynch v Lynch and in particular this paragraph from the judgment of the majority of the Full Court:

> 'However, there are cases where the performance of those roles has what may be described as "special" features about it either adding to or detracting from what may be described as the norm. For example in relation to the homemaker role the evidence may demonstrate the carrying out of responsibilities well beyond the norm as, for example, where the homemaker has the responsibility for the home and children entirely or almost entirely without assistance from the other party for long periods or cases such as the care of a handicapped or special needs child. On the other hand, in the breadwinner role the facts may demonstrate an outstanding application of time and energy to producing income and the application of what some of the cases have referred to as "special skills".'

[25] Immediately following that citation comes this highly critical appraisal (para 57):

> 'We are troubled that in the absence of specific legislative direction, courts consider they should make subjective assessments of whether the quality of a party's contributions was "outstanding". It is almost impossible to determine questions such as: Was he a good businessman/artist/surgeon or just lucky? Was she a good cook/housekeeper/entertainer or just an attractive personality? We think it invidious for a judge to in effect give "marks" to a wife or husband during a marriage. We think that this doctrine of "special contribution" should, in an appropriate case, be reconsidered. We think that the decision of the House of Lords in White v White gives force to these concerns.'

[26] The court returned to this theme at para 131. The court's clear message is that the concept of special contribution reached its zenith in the decision of the Full Court in Lynch v Lynch. The impact of White v White in Australia stretches beyond valuing equally the contribution of the male breadwinner and the female homemaker to challenge and seemingly to overrule the proposition that one spouse's contribution might, in an appropriate case, be elevated to such an exceptional degree as to dictate the division of the family fortune. Accordingly it is necessary to cite in full paras 131–134 of the court's judgment:

> 'In Cowan Thorpe LJ commented (at 210) in relation to Lord Nicholls' formulation in White that the ratio of the judgments in White is that the judge's objective is about fairness rather than equality. See Cordle [2001] EWCA Civ 1791.
>
> We respectfully agree. We think that the important concept that can be said to emerge from White is that, in order to test whether a result is fair, or in Australian terms just and equitable, it is important to ask whether the husband and wife are being treated equally. It states in the clearest terms the modern recognition of equality of the sexes and the need to abandon all forms of discrimination.

In the present case we think that the emphasis given by White to gender equality is important in testing the overall result. We think that the lesson to be learned from White is that it is a major error to approach these cases upon the basis that one arrives at a figure that is thought to satisfy the needs of the wife and give the balance to the husband.

In some cases that may produce an appropriate result but in many others it is likely to be productive of a grave injustice. We reject the concept that there is something special about the role of the male breadwinner that means that he should achieve such a preferred position in relation to his female partner. To do so is to pay mere lip service to gender equality. Marriage is and should be regarded as a genuine partnership to which each brings different gifts. The fact that one is productive of money in large quantities is no reason to disadvantage the other. We think that cases such as Lynch v Lynch (supra) and the minority view of Guest J in Farmer v Bramley [2000] FamCA 1615 have missed this point and have led to an imbalance of gender considerations in arriving at results that unduly favour the male partner.'

[27] From these authorities in this and related jurisdictions two consistent themes emerge. First it is unacceptable to place greater value on the contribution of the breadwinner than that of the homemaker as a justification for dividing the product of the breadwinner's efforts unequally between them. Second both the practicality and the value of the exercise of marking the parties to a failed marriage on their respective performances is questioned. Some judges understandably regard it as a distasteful exercise. In this jurisdiction, both in the judgment of District Judge Million and in the judgments of Coleridge J are clear warnings that the excess commonly seen in the litigation of the issue of the applicant's reasonable requirements has now been transposed into disputed, and often futile, evaluations of the contributions of both of the parties. Additionally the decision of the Full Court in Figgins v Figgins clearly supports Coleridge J's distaste for special contributions and suggests the need for this court to return to the relevance of an asserted special contribution and to reconsider its impact upon the s 25 exercise.

[28] Before turning to Mr Mostyn's detailed criticisms of Connell J's approach it is very necessary to remember where L v L stands in the chronology of the authorities cited to us. It was handed down only five days after the decision of Coleridge J in H-J v H-J and it seems reasonable to assume that each was delivered without knowledge of the other. It therefore precedes H v H, G v G and Figgins v Figgins. Had this appeal been listed within three months of the grant of permission, which would be usual enough in family appeals, Mr Mostyn would probably have had only H-J v H-J to support his submissions.

COUNSEL'S SUBMISSIONS

[29] In developing his submissions Mr Mostyn states that the consequence of the decision of this court in Cowan v Cowan has been to create a culture in which the husband in every big money case asserts an exceptional financial contribution, thus provoking lengthy and costly battles. He further states that the judges of the Family Division have divided into those who have embraced the spirit of the decision in White v White and those who have adhered to ingrained discriminatory thinking.

[30] Mr Mostyn's detailed submissions stop short of wholesale assault on the decision in Cowan v Cowan. He suggests that its acknowledgment of the possibility of special contributions must be confined to the rarest instances and perhaps only where the acquisition of the family fortune is achieved by innovative genius: thus the court can terminate the new forensic industry in the field of contribution. He submits that the fundamental and important rule against gender discrimination must lead to the following plain conclusions. (i) The contribution of the homemaker is no less valuable than the contribution of the breadwinner and judges should eschew the undesirable exercise of awarding marks to parties for performance during marriage. (ii) The breadwinner's contribution cannot be rendered special by reference to the size of the product. If the size of the pot alone constitutes a good reason for departure from equality that would mean that the yardstick could never apply in such a case. So too would it be wrong to regard the workaholic breadwinner as having made a special contribution, since invariably his physical and emotional absence from family life casts special burdens on the homemaker. As to entrepreneurs, Mr Mostyn emphasises that they live dangerously: the wife is not shielded when the husband's effort results in bankruptcy. Since she fully shares the risks she should equally share the fruits of success. Finally he suggests that the entrepreneur continues his earning capacity uninterrupted after the division of the family fortune whilst the wife, whose earning capacity has long since been sacrificed, has little or no prospect of reviving it.

[31] Turning to the present case Mr Mostyn emphasises the judge's respective findings that this husband could not be described as a genius whilst the wife could probably have done no more to qualify for an award of 50%. He submits that having categorised the husband's contribution realistically at the outset of para [26] it was not open to the judge to elevate it to something special by taking selected excerpts from the judgments in Cowan v Cowan. Finally he submits that,in so far as exceeded expectations is a relevant consideration, the husband, in advancing the first limb of his claim to special contributions, had asserted that Adscene was immediately and spectacularly successful.

[32] When Mr Mostyn was asked to explain why, given his clear submissions as to the equal worth of the different contributions, he had devoted so much time and effort at the trial to establish the wife's pivotal business contribution, he responded that it was because he anticipated that he had no other prospect of achieving an equal share in front of Connell J. He pointed out that by contrast he had argued the case of Mrs G in front of Coleridge J on the simple basis that her contribution as homemaker was no less valuable than that of Mr G.

[33] I turn to the rival submissions of Mr Pointer. He was critical of the scale of the wife's costs which are put at £650,000. That was to be contrasted with his client's costs which he put at £344,000. That was by way of introduction to his first clear submission that the case had been fully tried by a most experienced Family Division judge over the course of eight days. Having seen and heard the parties the judge had arrived at clear conclusions in the exercise of a broad discretion. The speech of Lord Hoffman in Piglowska v Piglowski [1999] 3 All ER 632, [1999] 1 WLR 1360 rendered any interference by this court unprincipled. He characterised Mr Mostyn's submissions as implicitly labelling the decision in Cowan v Cowan as being inconsistent with that in White v White. He relied most strongly on the judgment of Mance LJ in Cowan v Cowan which shows that the trial judge is entitled, indeed bound, to make a value judgment as to the respective worth of the contributions of the spouses and to place the husband's financial contribution on the spectrum stretching from the ordinary to the extraordinary. Mr Pointer contests that a new litigation industry has developed around the concept of special contribution or in the area of contributions generally. He disputes that exceeded expectations has become a new field of unnecessary skirmishing. He does not recognise a broad division of the Family Division bench into those who seek to find equality and those who seek to avoid it. He submits that the statute requires the judge to make a full and comparative assessment of the respective contributions of the parties. It is a task that cannot be avoided and judges of the Division have particular expertise in making value judgments of that nature. He supports the judge's view that wherever the family fortune is spectacular the breadwinner will in all probability have made a special contribution. He suggests a threshold of about £10m: above that the fortune made entirely within the marriage by the unaided efforts of one of the spouses is likely to be regarded by the court as a significant achievement and therefore a special contribution to be reflected in the outcome. He is particularly critical of the decisions of Coleridge J who he submits has taken an impermissible judicial stride towards a presumption of equality.

[34] Turning to the present case Mr Pointer submits that the single question is whether the wealth generated by Mr Lambert allowed a discretionary choice of a 37%:63% split. He argues that the submission that the wife bore additional burdens because of the husband's commitment to the company is to make a stereotypical assumption: here the children were at boarding schools and the family employed staff. Mr Pointer defends paras [26] and [40] of the judgment as being proper findings in a territory that is essentially that of the trial judge. As to the suggestion that genius alone deserves recognition in the award, Mr Pointer submits that cases are not to be decided by reference to the IQ of the parties but to what has been achieved by acquisition. Finally he draws a comparison between Mrs Cowan, who contributed over 40 years of marriage during which the husband accumulated a fortune of £11·5m, with Mrs Lambert, who contributed during 23 years of marriage during which her husband achieved a fortune of £27m. Ultimately he suggests that greater restraint on unnecessary future litigation would be achieved by dismissing the appeal.

[35] In his submissions in reply Mr Mostyn reiterated that this was essentially a discriminatory judgment. If due allowance be made for the lifetime needs of each, the whole of the balance above that calculation was awarded to the husband.

[36] I will consider the issues raised by these submissions generally and then in their application to the present appeal.

GENERAL CONCLUSIONS

[37] Section 25(2)(f) imposes a duty on the court to have regard amongst other matters in particular to—

> 'the contributions which each of the parties has made or is likely in the foreseeable future to make to the welfare of the family, including any contribution by looking after the home or caring for the family.'

[38] How then is the court to approach that duty in the light of the judicial debate revealed by recent authority? The language of the subsection certainly does not suggest any bias in favour of the breadwinner. Lord Nicholls could hardly have expressed more clearly or more forcefully the need to guard against gender discrimination in this as in all areas of the trial judge's assessment. There must be an end to the sterile assertion that the breadwinner's contribution weighs heavier than the homemaker's. It is easy to criticise with hindsight and I do not mean to do so by suggesting that even in October 2001 Mr Mostyn should have had the courage of his convictions. Perhaps more realistically his strategy was driven by the need to respond to the husband's special contribution riposte to the case for equal division. Hereafter there is much to be said in favour of a straightforward presentation of the homemaker's case on this issue unencumbered by unrealistic and strategic claims to significant contribution to the accumulation of wealth. As Robert Walker LJ succinctly said in Cowan v Cowan the nature of the contributions is intrinsically different and incommensurable. Each should be recognised as no less valuable than the other. Whilst I accept Mr Pointer's submission that the judge has a duty to assess each and every one of the s 25(2) criteria that bear on outcome and equally that judges of the Family Division have great expertise in making value judgments, I do not accept that the duty requires a detailed critical appraisal of the performance of each of the parties during the marriage. Couples who cannot agree division are entitled to seek a judicial decision without exposing themselves to the intrusion, indignity and possible embarrassment of such an appraisal. I fully agree with Coleridge J that any other approach encourages a vain endeavour to recreate historic situations, choices and failings which in the context of a long marriage can never be recaptured fully or accurately. I share the views of District Judge Million cited by Coleridge J in H-J v H-J [2002] 1 FLR 415 at 421. I fully agree with the views expressed by McLaughlin J in the case of M v M. I do not consider that the approach which has been adopted by Coleridge J amounts to an impermissible judicial stride towards a presumption of equality. A distinction must be drawn between an assessment of equality of contribution and an order for equality of division. A finding of equality of contribution may be followed by an order for unequal division because of the influence of one or more of the other statutory criteria as well as the over-arching search for fairness.

[39] A formula for the equal division of assets on divorce is justly criticised for producing crude and unfair outcomes. It might be unfair to the one who inherited those assets years before the marriage. It might be unfair to the one who needs all the available assets to provide a secure home for the children. However a formula for the equal division of whatever surplus there may be having made fair provision for the assessed needs of each of the parties before the court would produce a fair outcome in many test cases. When chairing the Ancillary Relief Working Group charged with advising the Lord Chancellor on options for reform of s 25 I tabled a proposal for some reduction in the width of judicial discretion by adopting a rebuttable presumption of equal division of any surplus (see App 1 to the report). The proposal met with little support at the time. However it was subsequently reflected in the government's proposal contained in para 4.49 of the inter-departmental White Paper Supporting Families published in October 1998. The government's publication in June 1999 of the responses demonstrates that, although the proposal attracted relatively few responses, the vast majority of the responses were in favour. I have since consistently argued that the reform of s 25 along the lines of the government's proposal would be beneficial in many respects, not least in bringing statutory provisions first enacted in 1970 more into line with contemporary social values and expectations. In the absence of legislation and given the encouragement expressed by Lord Nicholls (and more strongly by Lord Cooke of Thorndon) in White v White, Coleridge J is, in my judgment, entitled to regard the crosscheck of equality as an important duty.

[40] I would not, however, share all the reasoning of Coleridge J expressed in the concluding paragraphs of his judgment in H-J v H-J. It is the objective judicial consideration of fairness rather than the parties' subjective understanding that must determine outcome. Parties who share the perception that equality would be fair to each of them never get to trial. The notion that the judge who orders equal division despatches the parties from the judgment seat without a sense of grievance and with a sense of being equally valued may instance a piece of judicial wishful thinking. I am however in full agreement with the approach expressed in his following paragraph to cases that broadly equate with the case that he there decided.

[41] Equally the warnings which he, as an experienced specialist amongst specialists, expresses in para [34] of his judgment in G v G must be heeded. Where a family has accumulated a fortune almost too large to dissipate, it might be thought that an expensive and contentious trial would be an unlikely necessity. But all who specialise in this field know that it is not so and accordingly there is a tendency for the case to escalate as it proceeds, each tactical development attracting at least another in response. Therefore if the decision of this court in Cowan v Cowan has indeed opened what Coleridge J describes as a forensic Pandora's Box, then it is important that we should endeavour to close and lock the lid.

[42] I also endorse concerns that he expresses in his final paragraph at the costs of these tactical exercises. Our concern should be all the greater given that the costs in the present case are estimated to amount to almost £1m.

Special contributions

[43] The absence of any legislative review of s 25 since 1984 has undoubtedly created problems for the judiciary. (I leave aside the somewhat enigmatic amendment to s 25(2)(g) enacted by the Family Law Act 1996 which is not to be brought into force.) The judgments in Cowan v Cowan that consider the legitimacy of a departure from equality on the basis of exceptional financial contribution must be understood in the context of that case. First the trial had been conducted before the decision in White v White and therefore decided on the basis of reasonable requirements. On appeal it was common ground that in principle the court was free to depart from equality if the husband's financial contribution had been sufficiently exceptional. Both parties submitted that that issue should be remitted for determination by the trial judge. Out of a desire to achieve finality and avoid further costs we declined and ourselves made the value judgment from the evidence and findings at trial, which were of course not specifically directed to the issue. With the advantage of hindsight it seems regrettable, given the significance subsequently attached to our judgments, that the crucial issue was not addressed at trial nor was there any argument before this court on the validity of the principle.

[44] The authority of Cowan v Cowan cannot therefore be elevated nearly as high as Mr Pointer would have it. In my judgment I based my departure from equality on five considerations, of which the special character of the husband's contribution was but one. Each member of the court advanced different reasons for arriving at the same result. Those who have subsequently attempted to argue that their breadwinning contributions were special have focused on the judgment of Mance LJ. In his reasoning he placed considerable reliance on the Australian authorities culminating in the decision of the Full Court in Lynch v Lynch. But a large question mark has been placed against that line of authority by the judgment of the Full Court in Figgins v Figgins. In Cowan v Cowan [2001] 2 FCR 331 I offered no new approach and certainly no new principle. As I said (at [41]), this court could do no more than explore the boundaries by the application of the principles to be found in White v White on a case by case basis. I recognise that the specialist professions hope for and probably expect more. But just as this court evolved guidelines for the application of the statutory criteria approximately 30 years ago (notably of course the concept of reasonable requirements and the Duxbury mechanism for capitalisation of reasonable requirements; see Duxbury v Duxbury [1990] 2 All ER 77, [1992] Fam 62), so, it seems to me, this court must adopt the same approach now that those guidelines have to a substantial extent become outdated and then proscribed by the decision in White v White.

[45] Having now heard submissions, both full and reasoned, against the concept of special contribution save in the most exceptional and limited circumstance, the danger of gender discrimination resulting from a finding of special financial contribution is plain. If all that is regarded is the scale of the breadwinner's success then discrimination is almost bound to follow since there is no equal opportunity for the homemaker to demonstrate the scale of her comparable success. Examples cited of the mother who cares for a handicapped child seem to me both theoretical and distasteful. Such sacrifices and achievements are the product of love and commitment and are not to be counted in cash. The more driven the breadwinner the less available will he be physically and emotionally both as a husband and a father. There is also some justification in Mr Mostyn's emphasis on the extent to which the homemaker frequently sacrifices her potential to generate assets by undertaking the domestic commitment to husband and children. At the same time she risks the outcome of failure and so earns her entitlement to share in the successful outcome.

[46] In sum I am much more wary of the issue of special contribution than I was in writing my judgment in Cowan v Cowan. Perhaps Chief Justice Nicholson, who seems poised to banish the phenomenon, may have found the better path. The circumstances set out in [43], above, allow this court to re-evaluate the whole issue. However for the present, given the infinite variety of fact and circumstance, I propose to mark time on a cautious acknowledgment that special contribution remains a legitimate possibility but only in exceptional circumstances. It would be both futile and dangerous even to attempt to speculate on the boundaries of the exceptional. In the course of argument I suggested that it might more readily be found in the generating force behind the fortune rather than in the mere product itself. A number of hypothetical examples were canvassed ranging from the creative artist via the superstar footballer to the inventive genius who not only creates but also develops some universal aid or prescription. All that seems to me to be more safely left to future case by case exploration.

Exceeded expectations

[47] I am doubtful of the development of this test for the existence of a special contribution. There is no doubt that it originates from the judgment of Mance LJ in Cowan v Cowan [2001] 2 FCR 331 at [161]. There he said:

> 'The underlying idea is that a spouse exercising special skill and care has gone beyond what would ordinarily be expected and beyond what the other spouse could ordinarily have hoped to do for himself or herself, had the parties arranged their family lives and activities differently.'

[48] The interpretation that Mr Hughes QC in H v H placed on that passage appears from the paragraphs of his judgment which I have cited above.

[49] Certainly Mance LJ posits success going beyond general expectations but when he turns to the subjective hopes of the other spouse he does not relate those hopes to the outset of the venture but rather to what might have been had family lives and activities been differently divided.

[50] However all that may be I reject the interpretation and approach adopted by Mr Hughes. There is an understandable desire for tests and mechanisms to strengthen judicial confidence in the rationality of the discretionary outcome. But the danger is over-sophistication and complexity that ends up by perverting the statutory task. The concept of special contribution is first formulated and then the concept of exceeded expectations is deployed to demonstrate special contribution. Each provides an opportunity to win a point over the other party. Furthermore the concept of exceeded expectations invites exactly the sort of exchanges that raise the emotional temperature and augment the costs. The exchanges are of questionable relevance to the essential objective assessment of fairness. In any marriage of considerable duration evidence as to what the young couple at the outset of their married life each thought, felt, intended, expected or aspired to is likely to be more imaginative and self-serving than realistic.

SPECIFIC CONCLUSIONS

[51] How then do these general conclusions bear on the principal issue argued in the present appeal, the issue of special contribution? Within it there are two questions: (a) was the judge right to find that the husband's contribution was special, and (b) if yes, was he right on that ground, and on that ground alone, to depart so far from equality?

[52] Mr Mostyn criticises para [26] of the judgment, perhaps not entirely fairly, as posing a question at its close which has effectively already been answered in the negative in the opening. It may be that the main foundation for the judge's conclusion was the size of the family fortune, albeit generated by the husband's hard work, determination and acumen. If that be the yardstick there is an obvious danger of gender discrimination. There may be cases where the product alone justifies a conclusion of a special contribution but absent some exceptional and individual quality in the generator of the fortune a case for special contribution must be hard to establish. If I turn to the question posed by Connell J at the end of para [26], a good idea, initiative, entrepreneurial skills and extensive hard work are in my judgment insufficient to attract the label. It is too easy to compile a comparable catalogue of qualities that the homemaker has brought to the other essential contribution.

[53] I have every sympathy for Connell J and every appreciation of his succinct and skilful judgment. I am in no doubt that he looked at the case as he did in part because of the way the applicant's case was fought with its outdated endeavour to present her as pivotal in the company. Furthermore we judge this appeal against a consistent pattern of recent authority which was not available to Connell J. I recognise that he had eight days of evidence in which to assess the parties, and particularly the special qualities of the husband. I recognise the force of Mr Pointer's submission that it is not for us to interfere with such assessments. However there is a gulf between the approach of Connell J in L v L and the approach of Coleridge J in H-J v H-J, each writing independently and handing down within a week of each other. The two approaches cannot be reconciled and in my judgment the approach of Coleridge J must be supported. Once Connell J had concluded that the husband was not a genius and that the wife could not have done more, he should not have elevated one contribution above the other, given that the two are essentially incommensurable.

[54] Even if Connell J was entitled to find the husband's contribution special it would not in my opinion justify so great a departure from equality. If it be conceived that each needed approximately £7·5m to maintain their respective lifestyles the surplus of £5·2m all went to the husband. That hardly satisfies the fairness test. If outcomes become driven by comparative assessment of contribution then there is an obvious danger of over-emphasis on that criterion with a corresponding under-emphasis of others. Of course, as I have said before, the special characteristics of each case draw to them some of the criteria whilst others are evidently not engaged. We must therefore ask which criteria, other than contribution, were engaged here and how did the judge deal with them?

[55] He dealt with each of the s 25(2) considerations in turn. First he carefully considered the assets, as to the extent of which there was no great contention, although much dispute as to whether after the sale of Adscene the husband had exercised his control and management irresponsibly or selfishly. All those issues were resolved in the husband's favour. Next came needs. This is an important paragraph to which I will return. On the standard of living, Connell J recorded that it had improved dramatically, achieving a rating of high from the mid-1980s onwards and, by the 1990s, extravagant. He concluded that each should be able to enjoy a comparable standard for the future. In relation to age and duration of marriage Connell J recorded the facts: the husband then 57, the wife then 49, the marriage 23 years in duration. However nothing follows as to how those considerations bore on outcome. The lengthy section dealing with contributions I have already reviewed. In relation to the three remaining subsections (disability, conduct and loss of pension) the judge simply recorded that neither party had suggested that these considerations had any bearing on the case.

AGE AND DURATION OF MARRIAGE

[56] With all due respect to Connell J, I consider that some reflection should have been given to age and duration of marriage. As to the latter it is not just the duration of 23 years but the fact that they span the most productive period of the wife's life from 22 to 45. Not only are those the years of child bearing and rearing but those are the years in which an adult develops talents and expends the force of energy in the chosen work. The wife had a modest business which she gave up. What sort of an independent career she sacrificed is a matter of speculation.

[57] In my judgment the respective ages of the parties are also relevant. Of the fortune of £27·5m derived from the sale of Adscene, £7m has been allocated to the children. The greater part that remains is primarily, if not exclusively, for the parties to meet their needs during the remainder of their lives. Applying actuarial tables the wife has a further span of 35 years whilst the husband has a further span of about 23 years. This consideration may require some reflection in an assessment of the respective future needs of the parties, the consideration to which I now turn.

NEEDS

[58] At the outset the judge considered two inter-connected areas of dispute, the wife's desire to remain at the former matrimonial home, Ringleton Manor, and her asserted need for an income of £460,000 a year net. As to the first the judge held that the wife's proposal was reasonable. However the judge did not make any finding as to what her expenditure would be as the owner/occupier of the property. The husband had advanced a figure of £194,000. Connell J merely criticised the forensic exercise of preparing for the wife a budget that was plainly inflated. He said ([2002] 2 FCR 413 at [14]):

> 'I question the value of an exercise of this nature in a case of this type. It is manifest that there are ample funds available to provide properly for the future needs of both spouses. In such a case it is for the wife (or the husband as the case may be) to decide whether a particular aspect of proposed expenditure is justifiable in the circumstances ... In short the Duxbury type exercise which has been undertaken in this case for illustrative purposes as well as by way of quantification of the wife's claim in part is in my view of little value. The wife will have available to her the home which she chooses and sufficient income to enable her to maintain a high standard of living. The same will be the case for the husband ... Whichever solution is preferred by the court in this case both parties will be well able to satisfy their financial needs and to meet their obligations and responsibilities for the foreseeable future.'

[59] Mr Mostyn's argument focuses on the final sentence. The solutions to which the judge refers are the solution of £10·2m or the solution of £6m advanced by the wife and the husband respectively. But Ringleton Manor and its contents account for £1·878m. On the judge's eventual award of £7·5m the sum remaining to the wife for income production is therefore £5,622,000. At an annual yield of 4·5% gross, less tax, that would leave the wife with an annual income of £150,000 approximately without amortisation. So she would be forced to draw down capital in order to remain in the former matrimonial home, even on the husband's assessment of her need at £190,000 a year. Contrast the position of the husband. Under the judge's division he has about £12·7m. Assuming for him the same investment in housing and chattels of £1·878m he has a sum for income production of £10·8m which would produce for him at the same assumed rate nearly £300,000 per annum after tax without amortisation.

[60] In my judgment Mr Mostyn succeeds in this submission which Mr Pointer could not convincingly undo. Assuming in the husband's favour that his present residence in Monaco where he is not subject to United Kingdom tax is only short-term, I see no possible reason why the wife alone should be required to amortise in order to meet the cost of living in the property which the judge has found that she reasonably occupies. If there were any consideration of amortisation then the wife's greater life expectancy enters the calculation. Finally there is validity in Mr Mostyn's submission that after the sale of Adscene the husband resumed his entrepreneurial activities with the prospect of a further decade of successful business. By contrast the wife has no realistic prospect of augmenting the yield from her investment capital.

[61] I conclude that Connell J fell into error in holding that however the family fortune were divided both parties would be able to satisfy their financial needs for the foreseeable future. Had there been a finding as to the wife's reasonable income needs as the occupier of the final matrimonial home (a figure that would presumably be less than half her assertion but no less than the figure for which the husband contended) then it would have become critical to consider whether division of assets at the level proposed by the husband or at any level less than that for which the wife contended, would indeed meet her future needs.

[62] I have therefore reached the conclusion that the wife is entitled to succeed in this appeal. The only justification for a departure from equality asserted by the husband cannot be upheld without discrimination. Of importance too is the rival consideration that the wife's needs, given the respective ages of the parties, point towards equality. I would therefore increase the wife's lump sum from £3,152,732 to £5,751,474 or such other sum as counsel may agree to be necessary to bring her to a 50% share.

[63] I am conscious that this conclusion does little to increase clarity or predictability of outcomes. However any expectation of such was surely unrealistic. Specialists in the field, whether judges, practitioners or academics, have yet to suggest a principle or mechanism that might produce greater certainty or predictability within the very wide discretionary field for which Parliament opted in 1984. Such new approaches as have been advocated or debated all require legislation for their introduction. Accordingly it must be recognised that a largely unfettered judicial discretion comes at a price.

MAY LJ.

[64] I agree that this appeal should be allowed to the extent which Thorpe LJ describes and for the reasons which he gives.

BODEY J.

[65] Notwithstanding the understandable submissions of Mr Pointer QC that this court should not interfere with the discretionary decision of a most experienced Family Division judge, who both saw and heard the witnesses and properly directed himself as to the law, I nevertheless agree that this appeal should be allowed.

[66] This is for two main reasons. The first relates to the evaluation of the parties' differing contributions, in which respect Connell J made four crucial findings of mixed fact and value-judgment, namely: (i) that 'the parties treated this marriage as a partnership from an early stage'; (ii) that 'this pot of gold was truly created during the marriage'; (iii) that 'in answer to the question posed in argument by Mr Mostyn QC, namely "what more could the wife have done to justify an award of 50%?", the answer is "in the circumstances, probably nothing"'; and (iv) that 'it would not be right in my view to describe [the husband] as a genius and the most exceptional part of his contribution relates to the very large sum of money acquired by the family as described'.

[67] Without overlooking the judge's other findings as to the husband's qualities as an exceptionally active, determined and innovative businessman able to develop his visions, it does seem to me that the four findings at (i)–(iv) above flagged up cumulatively the risk of unfairness, if unequal weight were to be given to the differing nature of the parties' respective contributions to the family's welfare according to their particular roles in the marriage.

[68] The recent authorities examined by Thorpe LJ further developing the law both here and elsewhere since the decision under appeal, which we (unlike Connell J) have had the advantage of considering, make this point not only the more forcefully but, in my view, conclusively.

[69] I agree that it is not possible to define once and for all, by way of some formulaic label, the precise characteristics of the fortune-maker (or fortune-making) required in the paradigm case such as this, in order that when the proposed distribution of the resources is checked against the 'yardstick of equality', the fully contributing homemaker should receive a lesser share of the wealth than the fortune-maker.

[70] However, those characteristics or circumstances clearly have to be of a wholly exceptional nature, such that it would very obviously be inconsistent with the objective of achieving fairness (i e it would create an unfair outcome) for them to be ignored.

[71] I do not accept Mr Pointer's submission that to state the position in this way represents an 'impermissible judicial gloss' on one of the s 25 statutory criteria (i e the requirement to consider the parties' contributions). It is rather to apply the guidance of the House of Lords in White v White [2001] 1 All ER 1, [2001] 1 AC 596, recognising that where—in the paradigm case like this—the homemaker has given of her (or his) utmost, then any weighting of the impact of contributions in favour of the fortune-maker is almost always going to be unfair, since ex hypothesi the pure homemaker neither has the opportunity to create wealth, nor in the nature of things the ability to have any meaningful comparative 'value' accorded to her (or his) particular contributions to the welfare of the family.

[72] I conclude that, as the law has now been further developed, such wholly exceptional characteristics and circumstances as are referred to in [70], above did not exist in this case.

[73] The second main reason for allowing this appeal, being more of fact and less of general importance, relates to the criterion of the wife's needs.

[74] As demonstrated by Thorpe LJ, her income position under the existing award would be insufficient to enable her to continue to reside at Ringleton Manor, as was held by the judge to be a reasonable aspiration, unless (even on the basis of the lower budget put forward by the husband for her to do so) she were to amortise part of her capital.

[75] For her to have to amortise capital when the husband himself would not have to do likewise, does not seem to me to meet the aim of achieving fairness in the circumstances of a long marriage such as this, during which the family fortune was created and within which, as found, each party gave respectively of his/her all.

[76] I agree with Thorpe LJ that the wife's presentation below of an excessively high budget would have tended to divert attention away from this significant point, as would the very fact of the judge's conclusion that the husband's contribution by way of wealth creation called for an unequal distribution of the available resources.

[77] For these reasons and the others expressed more fully by Thorpe LJ, I too would replace the order of the learned judge with one achieving an equal division of the overall capital resources.

Appeal allowed.

25 March 2003. The Appeal Committee of the House of Lords refused permission to appeal.

Manjit Gheera Barrister.

Fisher and others v English Nature

[2003] EWHC 1599 (Admin)

QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION (ADMINISTRATIVE COURT)

LIGHTMAN J

18–20 JUNE, 4 JULY 2003

Environment – Protection – Site of special scientific interest – Defendant confirming site as site of special scientific interest – Claimants having interest in site of special scientific interest – Claimants challenging decision to confirm site – Whether defendant having discretion not to confirm – Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981, s 28(1), (5) – Land Compensation Act 1961.

The defendant, English Nature, was a specialist nature conservation body. By s 28(1)[a] of the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981 if English Nature were of the opinion that any area of land was of special interest by reason of any of its flora, fauna or geological features, they were under a duty to notify that fact to every owner and occupier of any of that land and the Secretary of State. Section 28(5)[b] provided that where notification had been given English Nature 'may' within nine months from the date of which notification was served give notice withdrawing notification or confirming it. English Nature decided to confirm the notification of the Breckland Farmland, Norfolk and Suffolk Site as a site of special scientific interest (SSSI) because the site had an important population of stone curlews which was identified by Council Directive (EEC) 79/409 (on the conservation of wild birds) as requiring special conservation measures. Under the directive, member states had to classify the most suitable territories for the conservation of stone curlews as special protection areas (SPAs). English Nature proposed to the Secretary of State that he include the SSSI within an SPA but a decision on that was deferred. The claimants, whose land fell within the SSSI, applied for judicial review of the decision to confirm. They contended, inter alia, that English Nature had exceeded their jurisdiction. The claimants submitted that the stone curlews could have been protected by the imposition of an SPA which would impose less constraints upon and which consequently would be less onerous to the claimants, as landowners, than an SSSI. The question arose therefore whether it was open to English Nature to decide not to confirm the notification of the SSSI for that reason.

Held – On its true construction, s 28(1) of the 1981 Act afforded scope for judgment, but no scope for discretion. English Nature had a duty under that subsection to notify an area if they held the opinion that the statutory criteria were satisfied. The notification of the SSSI had immediate legal effect. With regard to confirmation, although s 28(5) in setting out the alternative courses open to English Nature used the word 'may' a term which ordinarily connoted a discretion, if English Nature continued to be of the opinion that the statutory criteria were satisfied, the discretion could only lawfully be exercised in one way, that was in favour of confirming the notification. They could not lawfully

a Section 28(1) is set out at [15], below

b Section 28(5) is set out at [15], below

withdraw the notification or allow it to lapse. For any other course than confirmation would bring into play again the immediate duty of English Nature to make notification, and the legislature could not sensibly have intended that roundabout method of continuing the legal consequences of the continuing opinion of English Nature that the statutory criteria were satisfied. In particular, English Nature could not refuse to confirm because they considered that the population of stone curlews would be protected more effectively and in a way occasioning less interference with the peaceable enjoyment of their possessions by landowners by voluntary agreements or by the classification by the Secretary of State of the area of land in question as part of an SPA. Whether the area satisfied the criteria of an SSSI could not be affected, still less determined, by the existence of what might appear more attractive alternative courses of action, such as classification as an SPA, nor could their existence lawfully deflect English Nature from the course of notification and confirmation. In the instant case, English Nature had applied and determined the issue of confirmation by reference to the statutory criteria which they considered were satisfied and there could be no challenge to their decision (see [18], [20], [22], and [48], below).

R (on the application of Aggregate Industries UK Ltd) v English Nature [2003] Env LR 83 considered.

Notes

For areas of special scientific interest, see 34 Halsbury's Laws (4th edn reissue) para 210.

For the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981, s 28, see 32 Halsbury's Statutes (4th edn) (2001 reissue) 228, 229.

Cases referred to in judgment

Commission of the European Communities v French Republic Case C–96/98 [1999] ECR I-8531, ECJ.

Fredin v Sweden (1991) 13 EHRR 784, [1991] ECHR 12033/86, ECt HR.

Holder v Law Society [2003] EWCA Civ 39, [2003] 3 All ER 62, [2003] 1 WLR 1059.

James v UK (1986) 8 EHRR 123, ECt HR.

Oerlemans v Netherlands (1989) 62 DR 200, E Com HR.

R (on the application of Aggregate Industries UK Ltd) v English Nature [2002] EWHC 908 (Admin), [2003] Env LR 83.

R v Nature Conservancy Council, ex p London Brick Co Ltd [1996] Env LR 1.

Simplex GE (Holdings) Ltd v Secretary of State for the Environment [1988] 3 PLR 25, CA.

Tre Traktörer Aktiebolag v Sweden (1991) 13 EHRR 309, [1989] ECHR 10873/84, ECt HR.

Cases referred to in skeleton arguments

Chassagnou v France (1999) 7 BHRC 151, ECt HR.

Mellacher v Austria (1990) 12 EHRR 391, [1989] ECHR 10522/83, ECt HR.

R v North and East Devon Health Authority, ex p Coughlan (Secretary of State for Health intervening) [2000] 3 All ER 850, [2001] QB 213, [2000] 2 WLR 622, CA.

Secretary of State for Education and Science v Metropolitan Borough of Tameside [1976] 3 All ER 665, [1977] AC 1014, [1976] 3 WLR 641, CA and HL.

Southern Water Authority v Nature Conservancy Council [1992] 3 All ER 481, [1992] 1 WLR 775, HL.

Sporrong v Sweden (1983) 5 EHRR 35, [1982] ECHR 7151/75, ECt HR.

Application for judicial review

The claimants, the Honourable Patrick Fisher and the trustees of the Honourable PV Fisher's Children's 1986 settlement, applied for judicial review of the decision of the defendant, English Nature, made on 11 July 2001 and communicated to the claimants on 3 August 2001, confirming the notification of the Breckland Farmland, Norfolk and Suffolk Site of special scientific interest under s 28 of the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981. The facts are set out in the judgment.

David Holgate QC and Daniel Kolinsky (instructed by Richard Buxton, Environmental and Public Law, Cambridge) for the claimants.

John Howell QC and Jane Collier (instructed by Browne Jacobson, Nottingham) for English Nature.

Cur adv vult

4 July 2003. The following judgment was delivered.

LIGHTMAN J.

INTRODUCTION

[1] The claimants on this application challenge the decision (the decision) of the defendant English Nature to confirm the notification of the Breckland Farmland, Norfolk and Suffolk Site of Special Scientific Interest (the SSSI) (which includes land belonging to the claimants) under s 28 of the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981. On the same day that English Nature confirmed notification of the SSSI, English Nature confirmed the notification of the Bramshill SSSI which was the subject of a challenge dismissed by Forbes J in R (on the application of Aggregate Industries UK Ltd) v English Nature [2002] EWHC 908 (Admin), [2003] Env LR 83.

[2] English Nature confirmed the notification of the SSSI under s 28 of the 1981 Act on 11 July 2001 and communicated the decision confirming the notification by letter dated 3 August 2001. In confirming the notification the decision confirmed the designation of over 13,335·7 hectares of intensively farmed arable land as an SSSI. The reason given for the notification and confirmation was stated as follows: 'This site is notified for its internationally important population of stone-curlew.' The notification specified five types of operation likely to damage the features of special interest (OLDs) as requiring the prior consent of English Nature.

| 'Stand Ref No | Type of operation |
|---|---|
| 10. | Killing, injuring, taking or removal of stone curlews, or their eggs and nests. Intentional or reckless disturbance of stone curlews, their eggs or chicks.* |
| 12. | Long term afforestation of farmland in excess of 5 hectares. |
| 20. | Extraction of minerals including hard rock, sand and gravel, topsoil and subsoil except for on farm use. |

| | |
|---|---|
| 21. | Construction of roads, or the laying, maintenance or removal of pipelines and cables, above or below ground, except for agricultural or forestry purposes. |
| 23. | Erection of permanent buildings or reservoirs, or the undertaking of engineering work, including drilling, except for agricultural or forestry purposes. |

*Accidental disturbance through agricultural and game management, for example, is not regarded as intentional or reckless disturbance.'

[3] Council Directive (EEC) 79/409 (on the conservation of wild birds) (1979 OJ L103 p 1) (the Birds Directive) as adapted by Council Directive (EEC) 92/43 (on the conservation of natural habitats and of wild fauna and flora) (1992 OJ L206 p 7) (the Habitats Directive) identifies species listed in Annex I that require special conservation measures concerning their habitat in order to ensure their survival and reproduction in their area of distribution. The stone curlew is one of those species. Article 4(1)(d) of the Birds Directive requires the member states to classify 'the most suitable territories in number and size ... for the conservation of' that species as special protection areas (SPAs). SPAs must under national law be provided with a legal protection regime which is capable in particular of ensuring both the survival and reproduction of the species (see Commission of the European Communities v French Republic Case C–96/98 [1999] ECR I-8531). The Secretary of State has the function of classifying SPAs in this country which he performs with the advice of English Nature. English Nature have proposed to the Secretary of State that he include the SSSI (together with other areas) within an SPA. This proposal is supported by the claimants. The Secretary of State is minded to do so, but has decided to defer his decision until the outcome of this application is known. In the meantime the SSSI is merely included within a proposed SPA.

[4] The challenge made on this application is to the decision so far as it confirms the notification. There is no challenge to the notification itself or to the OLDs. The grounds of the challenge are that English Nature: (1) acted irrationally and failed to take into account material, and only material, considerations; (2) exceeded their jurisdiction; and (3) in breach of s 6 of the Human Rights Act 1998 acted in a way that was incompatible with the claimants' rights under art 1 of the First Protocol to the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms 1950 (as set out in Sch 1 to the 1998 Act). The claimants were granted permission to challenge the decision on the ground that English Nature had failed to provide a scientifically justified basis for the area of land which they notified, but the claimants did not pursue this ground at the hearing.

[5] The grievance of the claimants underlying this application is that an SPA imposes less constraints upon and consequently is less onerous to landowners than an SSSI and that the stone curlew could be protected without any need for the notification and confirmation by leaving it to the Secretary of State to include the area in question within an SPA or by concluding voluntary agreements with the landowners. A question to be decided is whether under s 28 of the 1981 Act it was open to English Nature to decide not to confirm the notification of the SSSI for this reason.

THE ORNITHOLOGICAL BACKGROUND

[6] Stone curlews are a migratory species nesting from March onwards in any year and migrating to southern Spain or North Africa from October. The birds nest from March each year in cultivated land which has plenty of bare ground and fairly short vegetation, as they prefer an open relatively unobstructed vista (so as to be aware of predators) and stony ground so that their eggs are camouflaged. The locations of the nests of the stone curlew may vary from year to year and nesting attempts at different locations in one year are commonplace. Field work has found that stone curlews may travel up to 3 km from the nest site to forage. Stone curlews are very sensitive to recreational disturbance and benefit from lack of recreational access on agricultural land. They are not usually affected by mechanised agricultural operations.

[7] The stone curlew is a species identified as being of European significance and as requiring special measures of conservation in the Birds Directive. It is a species that is protected under Pt I of the 1981 Act by special penalties at all times. It is also a priority species under the United Kingdom Biodiversity Action Plan.

[8] The stone curlew is an extremely scarce bird species nationally. Numbers have fallen by 85% in the past 50 years and by more than 50% since 1960. The British population was estimated to be 215 pairs in 1998 and 234 pairs in 1999. It is one of the rarest breeding bird species in Great Britain.

[9] The Joint Nature Conservation Committee established by English Nature, Scottish Natural Heritage and the Countryside Council for Wales under s 128(4) of the Environment Protection Act 1990 produced guidelines (the guidelines) for the selection of sites as SSSIs which are in large part those published by the Nature Conservancy Council in 1989 (Guidelines for the Selection of Biological SSSIs). The guidelines indicate that localities which normally contain 1% or more of the total British breeding population of any native species are eligible for selection and that, in view of the mobility of some species, the guidelines apply to sites used for other essential activities (such as feeding) as well as nesting sites. Two pairs of stone curlews represent approximately 1% of the Great Britain population of that species.

[10] Around 95% of the United Kingdom population is found in two areas: the Norfolk/Suffolk Brecklands and Wessex. Most are in the Brecklands area. That area suits the stone curlew because of the big open fields, mimicking the bird's preferred habitat of open stony heaths, and the amount of bare land resulting from spring sown crops.

[11] The criteria for the selection of SPAs for birds and those for SSSIs for birds are similar. The selection guidelines for SPAs suggest that an area which is used regularly by 1% or more of the Great Britain population of a species listed in Annex I to the Birds Directive is likely to qualify as an SPA. The guidelines state in relation to the Birds Directive and SPAs:

> 'Any site that supports nationally important numbers of an Annex I species or a migratory bird species (at any season of the year) should be given consideration as to whether it should be proposed as an SPA. Some sites holding lower numbers of some Annex I species may also need consideration in view of the requirement to maintain distributions. Any such site should qualify as a potential SSSI. These SSSI selection guidelines have been written to embrace such special interest.'

[12] In January 2000 English Nature submitted proposals to the Secretary of State for a Breckland SPA. In 1998 the Breckland-proposed SPA supported some 142 pairs of stone curlews (66% of the Great Britain population) and in 1999 it supported 159 pairs (68%). A large proportion of the Breckland-proposed SPA stone curlew population nests on arable land. In 2000 arable land supported 61% of the first choice stone curlew nests and 59% of the total fledged in that area was on arable land.

[13] The SSSI falls within the larger Breckland-proposed SPA. The SSSI itself supported some 102 pairs of stone curlews in 1999 (44% of the Great Britain population). The SSSI would qualify on its own as an SPA under the relevant criteria.

STATUTORY PROVISIONS

[14] English Nature (until January 2001 known as the Nature Conservancy Council for England) are a specialist nature conservation body. Section 131 of the 1990 Act provides that English Nature shall have 'nature conservation functions' and defines 'nature conservation' as 'the conservation of flora, fauna or geological or physiographical features'. Section 131 also provides that it is the duty of English Nature in discharging their conservation functions to take appropriate account of actual or possible ecological changes.

[15] Section 28 vests English Nature with responsibilities in respect of SSSIs. Section 28 (which appears in Pt II of the 1981 Act headed 'Nature conservation'), as amended by the Countryside and Rights of Way Act 2000, reads, so far as material:

> 28. Sites of special scientific interest.—(1) Where the Nature Conservancy Council are of the opinion that any area of land is of special interest by reason of any of its flora, fauna or geological or physiographical features, it shall be the duty of the Council to notify that fact—(a) to the local planning authority in whose area the land is situated; (b) to every owner and occupier of any of that land; and (c) to the Secretary of State ...
>
> (3) A notification under subsection (1) shall specify the time (not being less than three months from the date of the giving of the notification) within which, and the manner in which, representations or objections with respect to it may be made; and the Council shall consider any representation or objection duly made.
>
> (4) A notification under subsection (1)(b) shall also specify—(a) the flora, fauna, or geological or physiographical features by reason of which the land is of special interest, and (b) any operations appearing to the Council to be likely to damage that flora or fauna or those features, and shall contain a statement of the Council's views about the management of the land (including any views the Council may have about the conservation and enhancement of that flora or fauna or those features).
>
> (5) Where a notification under subsection (1) has been given, the Council may within the period of nine months beginning with the date on which the notification was served on the Secretary of State either—(a) give notice to the persons mentioned in subsection (1) withdrawing the notification; or

(b) give notice to those persons confirming the notification (with or without modifications).

(6) A notification shall cease to have effect—(a) on the giving of notice of its withdrawal under subsection (5)(a) to any of the persons mentioned in subsection (1); or (b) if not withdrawn or confirmed by notice under subsection (5) within the period of nine months referred to there, at the end of that period.'

(The provision in sub-s (4) for a statement of the council's views was added by the 2000 Act.)

[16] Section 28D of the 1981 Act provides that, if English Nature are of the opinion that all or any part of an SSSI is no longer of special interest by reason of any of the matters mentioned in s 28(1), they may decide to notify that fact, in which case the notification under s 28(1)(b) ceases to have effect.

[17] Notification has a number of legal consequences. In particular: (1) English Nature may enter into an agreement with the owners, lessees and occupiers of any land within such an area for the purpose of conserving or restoring the matters by reason of which the area is of special interest (under s 15 of the Countryside Act 1968), imposing restrictions on the exercise of the rights of those persons and for the carrying out of work or the doing of such other things on the land as may be expedient. English Nature may acquire all or any part of an SSSI compulsorily if they are satisfied that they are unable to conclude an agreement as to the management of the land on reasonable terms or if any such agreement is breached in such a way that the land is not being managed satisfactorily; (2) English Nature may formulate a 'management scheme' for conserving or restoring the matters by reason of which the area is of special interest, following the procedure set out in s 28J of the 1981 Act. If it appears to English Nature that any owner or occupier of land is not giving effect to a provision of a management scheme, that they are unable to conclude an agreement with him as to its management in accordance with the scheme and that, as a result, any such matters are being inadequately conserved or restored, they may serve a 'management notice' on him (under s 28K of the 1981 Act). Such a notice may require him to carry out such work on the land or do such other things with respect to it as are reasonably required to ensure that that the land is managed in accordance with the management scheme. Failure to comply with any requirement of a management notice without a reasonable excuse is a criminal offence and entitles English Nature to do what is required; (3) the owner or occupier of any land included in an SSSI may not carry out, or cause or permit to be carried out, on that land any operation specified in the notification itself as being likely to damage the matters by reason of which the area is of special interest, unless English Nature have been given notice of a proposal to carry it out (specifying its nature and the land on which it is proposed to be carried out) and the operation is carried out either in accordance with the terms of a relevant agreement with English Nature, a management scheme or a management notice or with English Nature's written consent. English Nature's decisions in relation to such consents may be the subject of appeal to the Secretary of State. A person who contravenes these requirements without a reasonable excuse is guilty of a criminal offence. Such an excuse may exist if the operation carried out is an emergency operation, if it was authorised by certain planning permissions or if it was permitted by certain public bodies in other circumstances; and (4) other public bodies are required to take reasonable steps in the exercise of their own functions, in so far as their exercise is likely to affect matters by reason of which the area is of special interest, to further the conservation and enhancement of those matters provided that such steps are consistent with the proper exercise of their own functions. Such public bodies are also required to follow a specific procedure designed to protect such matters which requires them to take into account English Nature's advice if they propose to carry out, or to give any consent for, any operations that are likely to damage such matters. It will be apparent that the consequences of notification go far beyond anything that can be achieved by voluntary agreement of affected landowners.

STATUTORY CONSTRUCTION

[18] I should first say a few words on the construction of ss 28 and 28D of the 1981 Act. English Nature have a duty under s 28(1) to notify an area of land if it holds the opinion that the statutory criteria are satisfied. If (for example) English Nature are of the opinion that an area of land is of special interest because of the bird population which it supports, then they must notify. Section 28(1) affords scope for judgment: it affords no scope for discretion. The notification has immediate legal effect. English Nature must however thereafter within nine months decide whether to withdraw the notification or confirm it (with or without modifications) or it will lapse. Though s 28(5) in setting out the alternative courses available to English Nature uses the word 'may', a term which ordinarily connotes a discretion, notwithstanding the obiter dictum in R v Nature Conservancy Council, ex p London Brick Co Ltd [1996] Env LR 1 to the contrary, as it appears to me, if English Nature continue to be of the opinion that the statutory criteria are satisfied, the discretion can only lawfully be exercised one way, that is in favour of confirming the notification. They cannot lawfully withdraw the notification or allow it to lapse. For any other course than confirmation would bring into play once again the immediate duty of English Nature to make the notification, and the legislature cannot sensibly have intended this roundabout method of continuing the legal consequences of the continuing opinion of English Nature that the statutory criteria are satisfied.

[19] The statutory scheme requires English Nature at two distinct and successive stages to exercise their expert judgment on three matters: (1) to determine whether the statutory criteria are satisfied; and if so (2) to specify the flora, fauna or geological or physiographical features by reason of which it is of special interest; and (3) to specify any operations likely to damage the flora, fauna or those features. The first stage is the notification stage and the second is the confirmation stage when the decisions at the notification stage require reconsideration in the light of objections, representations and further information received in the interim. English Nature in determining whether the area is of special interest for any of the four possible statutory reasons will have regard to the fact that the judgment is called for in the context both of their nature conservation function and of legislation directed at nature conservation and designed to place constraints on landowners required in the interests of such conservation. There is no requirement that the land is of national importance (cf s 29(2)(b) of the 1981 Act since repealed by the 2000 Act).

[20] In view of the arguments before me I must underline one consequence of the fact that the exercise required of English Nature is exclusively one of judgment. If English Nature are of the opinion that the statutory criteria are satisfied, they have no discretion to decline to notify or confirm (and accordingly displace s 28 of the 1981 Act and the statutory scheme of which it forms part) by reason of a preference for application of some other statutory or non-statutory scheme or by reason of any objection to or dissatisfaction with the legal consequences of notification or confirmation. In particular English Nature cannot refuse to confirm (as submitted by the claimants) because they consider that the population of stone curlews would be protected more effectively and in a way occasioning less interference with the peaceable enjoyment of their possessions by landowners by voluntary agreements with landowners or by the classification by the Secretary of State of the area of land in question as part of an SPA.

[21] Further it is clear (notwithstanding submissions by the claimants to the contrary effect) that the duty of English Nature to exercise their own judgment and notify and confirm in accordance with their expert judgment cannot and should not be qualified by their own past practice or by provisions in the guidelines. The guidelines may inform English Nature in reaching their judgment, but not constrain. This fully accords with the judgment of Forbes J in R (on the application of Aggregate Industries UK Ltd) v English Nature [2003] Env LR 83, who made clear that, once the current members of the council of English Nature (the council) came to the conclusion that a site did satisfy the statutory criteria, they were duty bound to act in accordance with their own opinion, whether or not this involved a departure from a previous decision or a change in policy.

[22] As I have already said, it is to the existence of the legal consequences of the notification and confirmation that the claimants take objection as unfair and unnecessary interferences with their rights of ownership and which (they contend) are avoidable by classification as an SPA instead of confirmation as an SSSI as the statutory vehicle for bird protection or by recourse to non-statutory means, namely agreements with the landowners. In my view, for the reasons which I have given, these grounds of objection are not legally tenable. English Nature are statutorily obliged to apply the criteria laid down in s 28 of the 1981 Act. Whether the area satisfies the criteria of an SSSI cannot be affected, still less determined, by the existence (let alone the possible future existence) of what may appear more attractive alternative courses of action (e g classification as an SPA) nor can their existence lawfully deflect English Nature, if satisfied that the criteria are satisfied, from the course of notification and confirmation.

CHALLENGES TO DECISION

[23] It is clear from the minutes of its meetings and beyond dispute that the reason for the resolutions of English Nature to notify and to confirm the notification was the internationally important population of stone curlews: on both occasions English Nature stated this was the reason for their resolution. It is accordingly incumbent on the claimants to establish grounds of challenge to what on the face of it is a valid decision to confirm for this reason.

[24] Before I consider in turn each of the grounds for which the claimants were granted permission to apply for judicial review, I must consider two matters on which the claimants addressed me at the hearing. The first was that the members of the council who made the decision were unaware of the terms of the guidelines or failed to have in mind those provisions. No such allegation was made in the application to the court and no evidence was adduced in support of it. None the less the claimants in the course of the hearing made submissions to the effect that the failure of English Nature to have regard to provisions of the guidelines vitiated the decision. In my judgment it is not open to the claimants to advance such a case. If the claimants had included such a case in their application to the court, English Nature would have been placed on notice of this fact when they prepared their evidence. They could have put forward evidence by the members on this issue. There was no occasion to do so as this was not part of the case which they had to address. I should add that I am fully satisfied that, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, I should assume that in accordance with their duty the members familiarised themselves with the guidelines.

[25] The second is that on the day prior to this hearing the claimants gave notice of intention to apply for permission to rely on an additional ground, namely that in deciding to confirm the notification English Nature took no account of serious concerns about the SSSI expressed by the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (MAFF). The claimants explained that they had only just received from English Nature a letter disclosing the existence of such concerns on the part of MAFF and accordingly the possibility of challenge on this ground. English Nature opposed the application. They told me that the anxieties expressed at one stage by MAFF had been allayed at a meeting with English Nature prior to the decision and that they had so informed the claimants by letter prior to the hearing. English Nature contended that there was no evidence to the contrary; that there was nothing in the point; that there was no relevant correspondence with MAFF on this issue to be disclosed; and that it was far too late to raise the matter at the hearing. On the material before me no reasonable grounds exist for the belief that there is any substance in this ground of complaint. (I may add that the claimants should surely have pursued inquiries with MAFF prior to the hearing if they wished to challenge or question English Nature's statement in its letter regarding its meeting with MAFF.) The issue could not be explored further without an adjournment; I do not think that the adjournment would serve any useful purpose; and in the circumstances justice does not require or justify allowing the claimants to pursue this objection on this application.

IRRATIONALITY

[26] The challenge to the decision on grounds of irrationality rests on a number of separate grounds. The first is that English Nature departed from previous practice between 1994 and 2000 of not granting SSSI status in case of extensive areas of conventional plantation or to habitats for migratory birds or birds who nested in areas only sporadically. But English Nature decided in February 2000 not to be bound in future by this practice and rightly so, for their duty required them to accept no such constraints on the exercise of the judgment committed to them. This decision in February 2000 has never been challenged in judicial review proceedings, no doubt because any such challenge was doomed to failure. I cannot see how the earlier (later abandoned) practice is of any assistance.

[27] The second is that English Nature departed from the guidelines. I have already held that English Nature, far from being legally bound by the guidelines, was legally bound to depart from the guidelines if they went beyond informing, and placed any constraint upon, the exercise of their judgment. But, going beyond this, I can find no departure from the guidelines. The guidelines advised care and caution before deciding to notify or confirm largely artificial habitats for the reason of the presence of rare birds and that croplands should not normally be selected, but in no way precluded the decision, and the evidence reveals that all due care was exercised (and in any event should be presumed to have been exercised) by English Nature in reaching the decision.

[28] The third (which is the most serious allegation) is that English Nature decided to confirm the notification, not on its merits, but to give effect to the wishes of the Secretary of State and to underpin the proposed SPA in this way and to improve the prospects that the Secretary of State would classify the SPA.

[29] This challenge requires consideration of two matters: (1) the relationship of designations or classifications as SPAs and SSSIs; and (2) the approach adopted by English Nature to designating the SSSI and the statements made by, on behalf of and to English Nature up to and including the meeting at which the decision was made.

(1) The relationship of designations as SPAs and SSSIs

This application is not the occasion for any detailed examination of or exegesis on the relevant legislation (and in particular European legislation) relating to SPAs. In this context it is important to bear in mind that there is as yet no SPA and (in particular in the absence of an SSSI) there may never be, and the performance of the duty of English Nature under s 28 of the 1981 Act cannot lawfully be deferred to await the exercise of jurisdiction by the Secretary of State to classify an SPA. It is sufficient for the purpose of this application to have in mind two matters. The first matter is that there are close links between the two statutory schemes. In this context it is relevant to note: (1) reg 3 of the Conservation (Natural Habitats) Regulations 1994, SI 1994/2716 provides that English Nature shall exercise their powers under s 28 so as to secure compliance with the Habitats Directive; (2) the guidelines, after referring to the international obligation to nature conservation in terms of site protection under (amongst other treaties) the Birds Directive and the Habitats Directive (transposed into English law by the 1994 regulations), go on at p 560 (para 3.2) to say:

> 'It seems axiomatic that, if an area, feature or species is of international importance, it must be of special interest in its total national occurrence. In these cases it is necessary to select all sites above a critical standard, and not to [rely] on choosing only exemplary areas, in order to meet the international conservation obligation. This can apply to habitats which are extensive (e g blanket bog) and to species which are numerous ... as well as to habitats and species which are localised and rare.'

and (3) in R (on the application of Aggregate Industries UK Ltd) v English Nature [2003] Env LR 83 at [125] Forbes J held that English Nature were to take into account 'the site's function as part of a larger area of European importance'.

[30] The second matter is the government's views on the relationship between the two schemes. By letter dated 19 June 2003, the Treasury Solicitor confirmed to this court: (1) that 'the Government takes the view that the provisions of the Birds Directive with respect to SPAs, as adapted by the Habitats Directive, are transposed in part by the provisions of the 1981 Act relating to SSSIs, as supplemented and adapted by the provisions of the Habitats Regulations 1994'; (2) that 'the Government's view on the interrelationship of sites of international importance (such as SPAs) and SSSIs is as recorded by Forbes J in para 25 of his judgment in [the Aggregate Industries case]; and (3) that the government's view on the question whether an area should not be classified as an SPA unless it has also been notified as an SSSI was reflected in the same paragraph.

> 'The Government would expect, as a matter of logic, a site appropriate for SPA designation to fulfil the criteria for SSSI notification. If a site being considered for SPA designation were to be regarded as not fulfilling the SSSI selection criteria, the Government would wish to reconsider the evidence supporting SPA candidature.'

These clearly have been the thrust of the government's views for some time and were correctly understood as such by English Nature when the decision was made.

(2) English Nature's approach to designating the SSSI

[31] I have already traced the history of the current approach adopted by English Nature to notifying and confirming SSSIs. At no time between 1994 and 2000 did English Nature (or its statutory predecessors) regard the present site or indeed any transitory habitats as satisfying the requirements for an SSSI, and the guidelines stated that care should be exercised if the presence of rare birds is the only reason for considering a largely artificial habitat and that croplands should not normally be selected. In a word, caution was advocated in these cases. In February 2000 however English Nature's approach to determining the threshold for what counts as a 'site of special scientific interest' changed fundamentally in relation to artificial habitats with transitory populations of birds. The decision of English Nature of that date to this effect has never been judicially challenged and for this reason (as well as its accord with s 28 of the 1981 Act) plainly is valid and correct. None the less the claimants contend that the reason for this fundamental change and for the decision was that English Nature reluctantly succumbed to pressure from the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions (the DETR) (as it then was) to notify and confirm the SSSI to underpin the proposed SPA and that English Nature notified and confirmed in order to achieve the goal of the designation by the DETR of the Breckland SPA, a precondition for which was that English Nature notify and confirm the SSSI.

[32] In support of this contention the claimants have referred me to letters between English Nature and the DETR and reports and papers to English Nature reflecting the wish of English Nature at one time that there should be an SPA and not an SSSI; the insistence by the DETR that there should be an SSSI before the DETR classified the SPA and that all SPAs are underpinned by SSSI notifications and confirmations; discussions between English Nature and the DETR as to the timing of the SSSI and regard by English Nature as to the wishes of the DETR in this regard; and the expression of view by English Nature that they would not recommend for inclusion in the SPA land which they did not confirm as an SSSI.

[33] Whether the claimants' contention is correct in respect of the decision must be determined by reference to what was said and done at the critical meeting at which the decision was made. The events preceding the meeting put the court on its guard to scrutinise with care whether in their deliberations English Nature asked themselves and decided the right question, namely whether the statutory criteria were satisfied: they do not determine the issue. I approach the issue mindful of the guidance provided by Simplex GE (Holdings) Ltd v Secretary of State for the Environment [1988] 3 PLR 25 that a decision should in general be quashed if by way of error a relevant consideration is not taken into account or an irrelevant consideration is taken into account unless the decision-maker was bound on the facts to have reached the same conclusion if the error had not occurred.

[34] At the meeting of the council held to consider confirmation of the notification: (i) a representative of the claimants, Mr Falcon, addressed the council. He stated that it was not legally necessary to 'designate' and that 'the existence of itself of an SPA does not in itself obligate the United Kingdom Government to create an SSSI'; (ii) the council then received the legal advice given to them by the solicitor they employed for that purpose, Mr Richard Barlow, who stated:

> 'Council members must be satisfied that the land which is being notified is of special interest. Much work has been done to devise this package in a way which properly covers all the issues but also can protect that which is considered to be special. And so the decision for you is to apply the provisions of the Act to this land';

(iii) in the course of the council's discussions, however, one member of the council (Mr Nicholas Woolley) said that he thought that the fact that the land ought to be part of an SPA 'in itself in the light of the English legislation and in the light of quite clear specific government direction to us ... justifies and requires this land to be designated as an SSSI'; (iv) thereupon another member of the council, Mr Stephen Tromans (a well-known barrister who specialises in environmental law), stated his view that, while—

> 'the fact that land may be an SPA is clearly relevant to our decision, I don't think ... [we can] say that ... automatically it must pass the SSSI test, I think that we have to make up our own minds on that on the information available because that's what the legislation requires us to do';

(v) in response to a question by another member of the council about the relationship between SPAs and SSSIs, the chairman stated that Mr Tromans had answered it, but the chairman none the less asked Mr Tromans to say it again as it was an important point; (vi) Mr Tromans then stated:

> 'It seems to me that whatever Government policy may be as to the linkage between SPAs and SSSIs, the question for us this morning as Richard Barlow said is whether the land meets the criteria of the legislation that we are dealing with. We can't regard ourselves as being bound by Government policy to say that something is a SSSI if we don't think in our heart of hearts that it really is, I think that is the key to it';

(vii) the chairman stated that he thought that was 'very clear' and invited Mr Woolley to speak; (viii) Mr Woolley then sought to explain that his view was that—

'if we have an area of land whether it be large or small, if it is of sufficient international importance that it should be declared an SPA. Surely to goodness if it's of such international importance it is very hard to believe that it isn't of sufficient national interest. If the science is there to back up the international interest it surely is there in abundance to back up the national interest';

(ix) the minutes of the meeting record: (a) 'Council discussed the issues noting that a decision was required upon the existence of special interest at the site and concluded that such special interest is in place on the Breckland Farmland site'; (b) the reason for the notification (which the Council of English Nature was invited to, and did, confirm) was that 'this site is notified for its internationally important population of stone curlew ...'

[35] The claimants challenge the decision on the ground that what they describe as the earlier 'mistaken approach' 'was not cured by the comments of Mr Tromans' as: (i) 'the flaws in the decision-making process were by that date so entrenched that they could not have been cured without a fundamental re-evaluation of whether or not it was appropriate to designate'; (ii) there was 'confusion amongst members of the council'; (iii) Mr Woolley treated notification as 'a foregone conclusion' given that the area was part of a proposed SPA; and (iv) even Mr Tromans thought that the fact that the land was within an SPA might be relevant to the decision. I totally reject this challenge.

[36] It is manifest from the transcript and minutes of the meeting that the members of the council were advised and recognised that they had to determine whether the land notified was of special interest as stated in s 28 of the 1981 Act. It was not simply Mr Tromans who gave that advice; he was endorsing the advice provided previously by the council's own solicitor, given after representations made by a representative of some of the landowners affected about the relationship between SPAs and SSSIs. The chairman found Mr Tromans' advice very clear and Mr Woolley did not suggest that in the light of it he remained of the view that there was any legal requirement as such to notify if the land was in an SPA. There is no reason to doubt (and the claimants have not alleged that the minutes are untruthful when they state) that the council noted that 'a decision was required upon the existence of special interest at the site' and that they concluded that there was such a special interest. The council accordingly addressed themselves to, and answered, the correct statutory question and confirmed the reason why the area of land had special interest.

[37] In my judgment it is wrong to suggest that it is legally irrelevant or impermissible for English Nature to take into account, in deciding whether an area is of special interest by reason of the bird population it may support, the fact they consider that that area is (or forms a part) of one of the most suitable territories in number and size for the conservation of birds who are recognised as being of special significance at a European level as well as in national legislation. Indeed (as I have already said) Forbes J held in R (on the application of Aggregate Industries UK Ltd) v English Nature [2003] Env LR 83 at [125] that English Nature were entitled to take into account 'the site's function as part of a larger area of European importance'. I refer also to the matters and the passage in the guidelines set out in [11]–[12], above.

[38] I see no reason to disagree with the government's views as to the relationship between SPAs and SSSIs in terms of the transposition of the Birds Directive but whether or not those views are correct is immaterial. What is clear is that English Nature applied and determined the issue of confirmation by reference to the statutory criteria and for the reason which they gave, namely to protect stone curlews and for no such collateral reason as the claimants allege; and that, so far as they regarded it as a relevant consideration in the exercise of their judgment whether the statutory criteria were satisfied that the area of land in question was appropriate to be classified as an SPA and that they had made a recommendation to this effect to the Secretary of State, that was a view they were fully entitled to take. But even if I am wrong and they were not entitled to treat as a relevant consideration the fact that the site was in their view appropriate to be classified as an SPA, there can be no doubt that, even if English Nature had ignored this consideration, they would have reached (and indeed could only have reached) the same conclusion namely that the statutory criteria under s 28 of the 1981 Act were satisfied.

JURISDICTION

[39] The claimants contend that it was beyond the range of reasonable meanings open to English Nature of the statutory formula 'a site of special interest by reason of its fauna' to designate the entirety of 13,335·7 hectares as an SSSI where the reason for designation was the preservation and protection of the habitat for nesting and breeding of single pairs of stone curlews, which only occupied the habitat from March to October and changed their sites from year to year with the rotation of crops. The claimants sought reinforcement of this argument by praying in aid the fact that the decision contradicted consistent practice to the contrary between 1994 and 2000 and departed from provisions in the guidelines. As I have already held, there were in fact no such departures from the guidelines, but whether or not this is so, as a matter of law none of these considerations could preclude a determination by English Nature that the statutory criteria were satisfied: rather these are at most relevant considerations for English Nature to take into account in the exercise of the jurisdiction committed to them of deciding whether the statutory criteria were satisfied and the area in respect of which it was satisfied. It at all times remained open to English Nature reasonably and sensibly to reach the conclusion which they did that the whole area was of special interest because of the support which it provided for such a significant proportion of such an important and rare bird species recognised as being of European significance (consider the Aggregate Industries case at [132]). English Nature had to decide whether to confirm and (if so) how extensive the SSSI area had to be if it was to provide the requisite protection. The members visited the area between the dates of notification and confirmation and applied their expertise and judgment. There is no basis on which this court can or should substitute its judgment for that of English Nature. As Forbes J said in the Aggregate Industries case at 106: 'English Nature is far better placed and qualified than a court to make the requisite assessments and value judgments'. In this context it is to be noted (as I said earlier) that the claimants, though granted permission to challenge the decision on the ground that English Nature had failed to provide a scientifically justified basis for the land which it notified, did not pursue this ground and there is accordingly no vulnerability or exposure to criticism of the decision on this ground.

ARTICLE 1

[40] Article 1 of the First Protocol to the convention protects a person's right to the peaceful enjoyment of his possessions but it goes on to provide that this protection does not 'in any way impair the right of a State to enforce such laws as it deems necessary to control the use of property in accordance with the general interest ...' Section 6 of the 1998 Act renders it unlawful for English Nature to act in a way which is incompatible with art 1. The claimants accept that protection of stone curlews is a legitimate public interest justifying the imposition of restrictions on the use of their property. But they contend that English Nature's decision to confirm the notification was incompatible with their convention rights because it occasioned a disproportionate interference with the peaceful enjoyment of their possessions. In respect of that submission I fully accept and adopt the answer given by Mr Howell QC in his submissions.

[41] There are four possible matters on which in theory an art 1 complaint might focus. These are: (i) the confirmation of English Nature's opinion, (ii) the confirmation of the specified OLDs, (iii) the effect of being within an SSSI under other statutory regimes, and (iv) being within an SSSI rather than an SPA.

[42] (i) An allegation that the confirmation of English Nature's notified opinion that the area is of special interest was disproportionate (assuming that opinion to be genuinely and not unreasonably held) is plainly unmaintainable because: (1) English Nature were duty bound to confirm the notification if they held that opinion and accordingly their decision to do so could not as such be incompatible with convention rights: only the statutory provisions could be incompatible, and in this case the claimants have disavowed any such challenge to the legislation; and (2) in any event, the claimants do not, and cannot, contend that the mere notification or confirmation of English Nature's opinion would in itself be incompatible with their convention rights. English Nature's opinion of itself does not interfere with the peaceful enjoyment of their possessions in any respect. It simply represents English Nature's opinion.

[43] (ii) A challenge to the confirmation of the specification of OLDs and that the specification of these restrictions imposed disproportionate restrictions on ownership rights has now been disavowed. In any event, it would be unsustainable because: (1) it is not in dispute that the operations specified are likely to damage the stone curlew. All that their specification requires is that consent is obtained for them before they are carried out on pain of committing a criminal offence. If and when the claimants ever propose to carry out such an operation, a fair balance can be struck in determining whether consent should be granted between the acknowledged public interest in protecting the stone curlew and the claimants' interests in carrying out any such operation. Such a regime is not disproportionate nor is it alleged to be. (Moreover in this case multiple consents are not required as suggested by the claimants, even if more than one set of controls are applicable to any particular operation); and (2) furthermore none of the operations specified is likely in any event to have any significant impact on the agricultural use of the claimants' land (nor do the claimants contend otherwise). Any complaint about control of those operations is accordingly manifestly unfounded (see Oerlemans v Netherlands (1989) 62 DR 200 at 204–206).

[44] (iii) A complaint relating to the effect of being within an SSSI under other statutory regimes eg the Town and Country Planning (General Permitted Development) Order 1995 and the Town and Country Planning (General Development Procedure) Order 1995 (the GDO) and to the effect that restrictions imposed under those regimes in respect of land within SSSIs are more than are strictly required is likewise misconceived. For it is irrelevant to English Nature's decision to confirm the notification. At best (from the claimants' point of view) the claimants might show that the effect of being within an SSSI under other statutory regimes is unlawful as being disproportionate. Their complaint in such a case would be that eg the GDO was unlawful as being incompatible with their convention rights. But it does not mean that English Nature's decision that this area is of special interest and that their confirmation of the notification are themselves incompatible with the claimants' rights under art 1.

[45] (iv) Finally, a complaint that the claimants' property should lie within, not an SSSI, but within an SPA is again irrelevant. The only decision for English Nature relates to whether or not to notify, and to confirm the notification of, the area of land as being of special interest. Given that English Nature are duty bound to notify and maintain the notification if in their judgment the statutory criteria are satisfied, any complaint on the part of the claimants must be that the statutory scheme (not the decision) is incompatible with their convention rights if it permits or requires such notification when (a) English Nature think that the land ought to be within an SPA or (b) when it is. Such a case of statutory incompatibility the claimants disavow.

[46] I should add that if the legal merits of any complaint did need to be examined in any more detail, under art 1 of the First Protocol to the convention a fair balance must be struck between the general interest and the interest of any property owner. But in considering questions of proportionality under art 1 the European Court of Human Rights has made it plain that states enjoy a wide 'margin of appreciation' in this area relating to the control of the use of land in the public interest for environmental reasons, and that the controls prescribed or interferences involved must be without any reasonable foundation if the court is to regard them as disproportionate (see Fredin v Sweden (1991) 13 EHRR 784). It is well established that a reasonable relationship of proportionality under art 1 does not import a test of strict necessity (as Mr Holgate QC has argued). The fact that there may be other even better methods of achieving the same ends does not necessarily mean that any particular measure is disproportionate under art 1 (see James v UK (1986) 8 EHRR 123; Tre Traktörer Aktiebolag v Sweden (1991) 13 EHRR 309). That 'margin of appreciation' is properly reflected domestically in the respect that is due: (a) to the choices that the legislature is entitled to make in this area (for which it is democratically accountable); and (b) to any judgment made by English Nature as a specialist regulator, expert in the matters of nature conservation (cf Holder v Law Society [2003] EWCA Civ 39, [2003] 3 All ER 62). As Forbes J stated in R (on the application of Aggregate Industries UK Ltd) v English Nature [2003] Env LR 83, the legislation and decision fall well within the areas of respect to be accorded to the legislature and English Nature. Most particularly the provisions for notification and confirmation are essential parts of a regime: (a) designed by the legislature to ensure that informed decisions are made before potentially damaging (and indeed irreversible) actions are taken; and (b) to be brought into play in appropriate situations by English Nature; but (c) leaving the landowners free at all times to apply to be absolved from the bonds imposed on them. It was a choice which the legislature was entitled to take in this area and it was likewise open to English Nature to make the decision.

[47] I accordingly reject the claimants' challenge under art 1.

CONCLUSION

[48] For the reasons which I have set out in this judgment I accordingly reject this challenge to the decision and dismiss this application. I record with gratitude the immense assistance which I received from counsel throughout this case.

Application dismissed.

Dilys Tausz Barrister.

Waters and another v Welsh Development Agency

[2002] EWCA Civ 924

COURT OF APPEAL, CIVIL DIVISION

SCHIEMANN, LAWS AND CARNWATH LJJ

23, 24 MAY, 28 JUNE 2002

Compulsory purchase – Compensation – Assessment – Development scheme – Compulsory purchase in pursuance of scheme – Construction of barrage in river estuary causing loss of wetlands – Claimants' land acquired for wetlands nature reserve to replace lost habitat – Whether value of compensation including increase in value of land due to necessity to replace lost habitat – Whether scheme consisting of nature reserve only or including barrage – Land Compensation Act 1961.

Planning towards constructing a barrage in Cardiff Bay began in 1985 and work on the barrage started in June 1994. One of the anticipated environmental consequences was the loss of local wetlands and several possible locations were considered for the establishment of a wetlands nature reserve. By October 1995 the United Kingdom government was under pressure from the European Commission to implement mitigating environmental measures. In about November 1995 an area which included land owned by the claimants was selected and eventually acquired using compulsory powers by the predecessor to the defendant authority. The determination of the amount payable by the authority to the claimants was subject to the 'no-scheme' rule, which provided that compensation for compulsory purchase could not include any increase in the value of the land which was entirely due to the scheme underlying the acquisition. The claims for compensation were referred to the Lands Tribunal which directed that there should be a hearing as a preliminary issue of, inter alia, whether the scheme underlying the acquisition was the intended use of the land taken as a nature reserve or the construction of the barrage, and whether or not it was necessary to discount for the purposes of valuation any increase in the value of the land taken as being due to the need to acquire it as a palliative measure necessary as a result of the environmental consequences of the construction of the barrage. The tribunal held that it was immaterial whether the scheme underlying the acquisition was the barrage or the nature reserve proposal itself, since in either event any effect on the value of land acquired arising from the public purpose prompting the acquisition was to be disregarded under the no-scheme rule. Since that did not answer the preliminary issue in the terms in which it had been formed, the tribunal went on to consider whether the 'scheme', for the purposes of the no scheme rule, should be regarded as being confined to the nature reserve on its own, or should be regarded as including the barrage. It concluded that the scheme underlying the acquisition was the barrage. The tribunal raised, as a point of its own motion, whether, even if the scheme did include the barrage, the value could still take that purpose into account, in so far as it would have led a purchaser to offer a higher price in 'friendly negotiations' but discounted it, finding that such an approach, although supported by authority, was 'unquestionably at odds' with the no-scheme rule. The claimants challenged the tribunal's decision on the grounds, inter alia, (i) that it should have held that notwithstanding the no scheme rule the acquiring authority had to pay the price that it would have been willing to pay in friendly negotiations, having regard to the barrage project; and (ii) that as a matter of law it was an essential feature of a 'scheme' that the land in question should be an integral part of it, that the claimants' land could not have been an integral part before November 1995, that by that time the barrage scheme had been approved and work had begun, and that therefore the proposals for the nature reserve could not be regarded as integral to the barrage scheme but were a distinct project and should be so regarded for compensation purposes.

Held – (1) The tribunal had been wrong to treat the approach to the assessment of compensation of having regard to the acquiring authority's purpose in acquiring the land but assuming a friendly negotiation between it and the vendor, rather than one taking place against the background of the authority's pressure to buy under the compulsory acquisition, as at variance with the no-scheme rule and therefore wrong. The case providing authority for 'friendly negotiations' was distinguishable on the facts. However, that did not affect its conclusion, on the facts, as to the nature of the scheme for the purpose of the no-scheme rule (see [95], below); Pointe Gourde Quarrying and Transport Co Ltd v Sub-Intendent of Crown Lands [1947] AC 565 and Sri Raja Vyricharla Narayana Gajapatiraju Bahadur Garu v Revenue Divisional Officer, Vizagapatam [1939] 2 All ER 317 considered.

(2) A prerequisite of a scheme was the identification of the subject land as part of it. That did not impose a temporal limitation on the matters which could be regarded as included in the scheme. The mere fact that the claimants' land had not been identified until a date when the barrage project was already under way did not, as a matter of law, prevent it being treated thereafter as part of the same project. The tribunal had showed no error of law in its conclusion of fact that the nature reserve for which the land was needed was an integral part of the barrage project. Accordingly, the appeal would be dismissed (see [109], [111], [112], [117], [118], below).

Notes

For the general rule as to the assessment of purchase money or compensation in the compulsory acquisition of land, and disregard for the scheme for which the land is taken, see 8(1) Halsbury's Laws (4th edn reissue), paras 242, 268.

For the Land Compensation Act 1961, see 9 Halsbury's Statutes (4th edn) (2000 reissue), 165.

Cases referred to in judgments

Batchelor v Kent CC (1989) 59 P & CR 357, CA.

Bird v Wakefield Metropolitan DC (1978) 37 P & CR 478, CA.

Birmingham DC v Morris and Jacombs Ltd (1976) 33 P & CR 27, CA.

Camrose (Viscount) v Basingstoke Corp [1966] 3 All ER 161, [1966] 1 WLR 1100, CA.

Cedars Rapids Manufacturing and Power Co v Lacoste [1914] AC 569, [1914–15] All ER Rep 571, PC.

Davy v Leeds Corp, Central Freehold Estates (Leeds) Ltd v Leeds Corp [1965] 1 All ER 753, [1965] 1 WLR 445, HL; affg [1964] 3 All ER 390, [1964] 1 WLR 1218, CA.

Director of Buildings and Lands v Shun Fung Ironworks Ltd [1995] 1 All ER 846, [1995] 2 AC 111, [1995] 2 WLR 404, PC.

Fletcher Estates (Harlescott) Ltd v Secretary of State for the Environment, Newell and ors (executors of JV Longmore (decd)) v Secretary of State for the Environment [2000] 1 All ER 929, [2000] 2 AC 307, [2000] 2 WLR 438, HL.

Fraser v Fraserville City [1917] AC 187, PC.

Fraser v R (1963) 40 DLR (2d) 707, Can SC.

Horn v Sunderland Corp [1941] 1 All ER 480, [1941] 2 KB 26, CA.

IRC v Clay, IRC v Buchanan [1914] 3 KB 466, [1914–15] All ER Rep 882, CA.

Kaye v Basingstoke Corp (1968) 20 P & CR 417, LT.

Lambe v Secretary of State for War [1955] 2 All ER 386, [1955] 2 QB 612, [1955] 2 WLR 1127, CA.

Lucas and Chesterfield Gas and Water Board, Re [1909] 1 KB 16, [1908–10] All ER Rep 251; on appeal from [1908] 1 KB 571.

Melwood Units Pty Ltd v Comr of Main Roads [1979] 1 All ER 161, [1979] AC 426, [1978] 3 WLR 520, PC.

Mercury Communications Ltd v London and India Dock Investments Ltd (1993) 69 P & CR 135.

Myers v Milton Keynes Development Corp [1974] 2 All ER 1096, [1974] 1 WLR 696, CA.

Pointe Gourde Quarrying and Transport Co Ltd v Sub-Intendent of Crown Lands [1947] AC 565, PC.

Reid v Bickerstaff [1909] 2 Ch 305, [1908–10] All ER Rep 298, CA.

Rugby Joint Water Board v Foottit [1972] 1 All ER 1057, [1973] AC 202, [1972] 2 WLR 757, HL.

Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs v Charlesworth Pelling & Co [1901] AC 373, PC.

Sidney v North Eastern Railway Co [1914] 3 KB 629, [1914–15] All ER Rep 341.

Stebbing v Metropolitan Board of Works (1870) LR 6 QB 37.

Stokes v Cambridge Corp (1961) 13 P & CR 77.

Vyricharla Narayana Gajapatiraju Bahadur Garu (Sri Raja) v Revenue Divisional Officer, Vizagapatam [1939] 2 All ER 317, [1939] AC 302, PC.

Wilson and anor (personal representatives of FH Wilson (decd)) v Liverpool City Council [1971] 1 All ER 628, sub nom Wilson v Liverpool Corp [1971] 1 WLR 302, CA; affg [1969] RVR 741, LT.

Appeal

The claimants, Melville John Waters, Elizabeth Lillian Waters, William Neville Waters, Henry Dyson Preece, Sarah Preece, Roger Williams and Stephen Waters, appealed from the decision of the Lands Tribunal (George Bartlett QC, President) on 3 January 2001 ([2001] 1 EGLR 185) on preliminary issues arising from their claims to compensation from the defendant, the Welsh Development Agency, following the compulsory acquisition of land at Nash, near Newport, Gwent. The facts are set out in the judgment of Carnwath LJ.

David Holgate QC and Timothy Morshead (instructed by Jacklyn Dawson & Meyrick Williams) for the appellants.

Anthony Porten QC and Adrian Trevelyan Thomas (instructed by Roy Thomas, Cardiff) for the authority.

Cur adv vult

28 June 2002. The following judgments were delivered.

CARNWATH LJ (giving the first judgment at the invitation of Schiemann LJ).

INTRODUCTION

[1] This is an appeal from the decision of the President of the Lands Tribunal (George Bartlett QC) ([2001] 1 EGLR 185) on preliminary issues arising from claims to compensation by landowners at Nash, near Newport, Gwent. It raises difficult questions as to the application of the so-called Pointe Gourde rule (or no-scheme rule), that compensation for compulsory purchase 'cannot include an increase in value which is entirely due to the scheme underlying the acquisition' (see Pointe Gourde Quarrying and Transport Co Ltd v Sub-Intendent of Crown Lands [1947] AC 565 at 572).

BACKGROUND

[2] The subject land is low-lying farmland adjacent to the Severn estuary. The various parcels total about 225 acres. They were included, along with other land, amounting in total to some 1,000 acres, in the Land Authority for Wales (Gwent Levels Wetlands Reserve, Newport) Compulsory Purchase Order 1997. The respondent Welsh Development Agency is the successor to the Land Authority for Wales (LAW).

[3] A general vesting declaration was made on 26 January 1998, vesting the land in LAW on 25 February 1998, upon which it was transferred to the Cardiff Bay Development Corporation (CBDC), who themselves transferred it immediately to the Countryside Council for Wales (CCW). The valuation date is 25 February 1998, when the land vested in the CBDC.

[4] The background history was set out in considerable detail in the President's decision. Even so, the appellants before us have suggested that there were some significant omissions. However, it seems to me that the main points necessary for our decision are not controversial, and can be summarised quite shortly.

[5] Plans for a barrage across the estuary of the Taff and Ely rivers were first supported by government in November 1985. In April 1987 the CDBC was established by order under the Local Government, Planning and Land Act 1980, and the Cardiff Bay area became an 'urban development area' under that Act. After several abortive attempts to promote a parliamentary Bill, the Cardiff Bay Barrage (No 2) Bill was introduced in July 1991 to provide the necessary authorisation for the barrage scheme.

[6] It was apparent from the outset that there would be serious environmental objections arising from the loss of wetlands, and that mitigation measures would be required. The 1991 Bill included provision for a tidal lagoon to be constructed in a coastal area at Wentlooge. That proposal was dropped after it had been strongly criticised by the House of Commons committee, partly because of the financial consequences for the farming families in the area. The Welsh Office, with the support of the conservancy bodies, including the Royal Society for the Protection of Birds (RSPB), established a working group to look for alternatives. Local agents were instructed to report as to the feasibility of acquiring an area of land up to a maximum of 1,000 acres within a defined area of search.

[7] LAW became involved in May 1992. At that time LAW had a special role (not replicated by any similar authority in England), which (under s 103(1) of the 1980 Act) was that of acquiring land in Wales for development, and of disposing of it to other persons for development by them. Under s 102, it was required to comply with directions of the Secretary of State for Wales relating to performance of its functions, but it was not to be regarded as a servant or agent of the Crown. Under s 104(1), it had power to acquire by agreement or, if authorised by the Secretary of State, compulsorily, 'any land which, in the Authority's opinion, is suitable for development'.

[8] In May 1992, the Welsh Office indicated the government's intention that LAW should in due course acquire the land for the reserve once identified, if necessary using their compulsory powers, but that the long-term ownership and management of the site would be entrusted to CCW. In response, LAW made clear that they would reserve their position until approached with a specific proposal.

[9] The attention of the working group was initially directed to an area at Redwick, which is about 2 km east of the subject land at its nearest point. This idea progressed sufficiently for the CCW and RSPB to withdraw their petitions against the Bill, which was enacted on 5 November 1993, with no specific mitigation measures. By June 1994 work had started on the barrage, and a specific request had been made to LAW to consider using its acquisition powers to create a bird reserve on the Redwick land. However the discussions with the landowners at Redwick, and appreciation of the damage that the proposal would do to farming interests in the area, led to the investigation of alternative options.

[10] Matters seem to have come to a head in October 1995. As the President found, the urgency shown by the Secretary of State for Wales at that time was 'substantially due' to the pressure brought by the European Commission. The European Commission had been involved since as early as 1987 when a formal complaint had been made by the RSPB. There had also in the same year been a proposal to include the Cardiff Bay area in a proposed special protection area (SPA) under Council Directive (EEC) 79/409 (on the conservation of wild birds) (1979 OJ L103 p 1). The Commission's position was that the Cardiff Bay proposal could be accepted under the directive as justified by overriding socio-economic reasons, but only if their requirements as to compensatory measures were fully met. This was stated in a letter to the Welsh Office from the Commission dated 11 October 1995. The Commission expressed strong concern that in spite of assurances previously given by the Welsh Office and in spite of the commencement of the barrage project there was no sign of implementation of the mitigation measures.

[11] At about the same time the decision was made not to proceed with the Redwick proposal but to concentrate on an alternative area on the Gwent Levels, including the subject land. On 6 November 1995, LAW and the CBDC entered into a formal agreement for LAW to assist in acquiring the necessary land, on CBDC's undertaking to pay the relevant costs. The agreement identified the intended area, including the subject land. The agreement stated that it did not create any partnership or agency between the parties. Following this agreement the Secretary of State informed the Commission of the new proposals and assured the Commission that the government remained 'committed to implementing appropriate compensation/mitigation measures as soon as practicable'.

[12] On 17 January 1996 the Secretary of State gave a written answer in Parliament, announcing the proposal for the Gwent Levels Wetland Reserve. Since this seems to have been the first formal public announcement of a project including the claimant's land, it is worth recording what Mr Hague said in full (269 HC Official Report (6th series) written answers cols 622–623):

> 'I am pleased to announce my plans to proceed immediately with bird reserve compensation measures at Uskmouth and Goldcliff and the area in between on the Gwent levels. These new proposals have been developed with the assistance of the Countryside Council for Wales, from the conclusions reached by the Cardiff Bay development corporation steering group report on alternative mitigation measures—October 1995—and discussed with the European Commission ... I have asked the Cardiff Bay development corporation to set up immediately a project implementation steering group to oversee the establishment of the new integral reserve of over 375 hectares, with the firm objective of completion before the start of impoundment of the waters in Cardiff bay. The longer term objective is for the reserve to be developed so that it qualifies for special protection area status. The first task of the group will be to provide clear proposals for the management of the site and by the end of May, specific targets for the birds to be attracted to it. The Land Authority for Wales, working on behalf of CBDC, has already secured from National Power 164 hectares of the land required and lodged a planning application for engineering works for the whole of the reserve site.'

On the same day LAW submitted a planning application for the nature reserve to the local planning authority. The Commission indicated that in view of the guarantees given it was satisfied that the requirements of the directive had been met and the complaint file was being closed.

[13] During the following months, LAW began steps to acquire the necessary land by agreement. No decision having been made on the planning application by January 1997, LAW gave notice of appeal to the Welsh Office. At the same time it made the compulsory purchase order which led to the present dispute. Although by then it had acquired some 80% of the relevant interests in the land needed for the reserve, the order covered the whole site. (As I understand it, this was done largely as a precaution to ensure that no interests were overlooked.) The purpose of acquiring the land (as stated in the order) was 'for the purpose of disposing of it for the development and maintenance thereafter of a wetlands reserve involving the creation of saline pools, reedbeds and managed grassland'.

[14] The statement of reasons for making the compulsory purchase order referred to the agreement entered into in 1995 and stated that the proposal for the reserve—

> 'arises from the need for an agreement between the UK Government and the European Commission to provide compensatory measures for the loss occasioned by the construction of the Cardiff Bay Barrage of the site of Special Scientific Interest in the Taff/Ely estuary ...'

That reference to some form of agreement with the European Commission led to exchanges of correspondence between the claimants' solicitors and the Welsh Office and an application for judicial review. The effect of these exchanges, together with the Welsh Office's evidence in the judicial review proceedings, was to confirm that there was no formal agreement with the Commission; and also to assure the claimants that objections to the order would be properly considered, and that, if the proposed reserve was unacceptable, an alternative would be sought, notwithstanding the very tight timescale. On this basis, the judicial review proceedings were withdrawn.

[15] Following a public inquiry, the compulsory purchase order was confirmed and planning permission was granted, by a decision letter of the Secretary of State dated 14 November 1997. The present appellants had originally objected, but they withdrew their objections before the inquiry, because (as they said) they regarded the result as inevitable. The decision letter stated Welsh Office policy that a compulsory purchase order should not be made in the absence of 'a compelling case in the public interest', but considered this test to be satisfied:

> 'The Secretary of State accepts the inspector's conclusion that there is a requirement to provide compensation for the loss of the Cardiff Bay habitat and no better scheme than that proposed by the Land Authority has emerged.' (Paragraph 21.)

This view was amplified under the heading 'the adequacy of the compensation measures':

> 'The Secretary of State ... accepts that in the case presently before him, the provision of a reserve has been proposed because of the need for compensatory measures due to the construction of Cardiff Bay Barrage and the consequent loss of the intertidal mudflats when impoundment of the water in the Bay occurs. However, regardless of the Barrage project and the adequacy of the compensatory measures when considered in the terms of the Birds and Habitats Directives, the Secretary of State is satisfied that the provision of a substantial nature reserve which will aim to qualify for SPA status and which will contribute to meeting the UK's objectives under the Bio-diversity Convention (signed at Rio de Janeiro in June 1992) is, of itself, a project that is in the public interest and, although not a primary reason for seeking the CPO, he nonetheless accepts the view of LAW that it will form a valuable conservation measure in its own right.' (Paragraph 27.)

[16] A general vesting declaration was made on 26 January 1998 and the land constituting the Gwent Level Wetlands Reserve was vested in LAW on 25 February 1998. In due course ownership of the land passed to CBDC and from them to CCW.

[17] Claims were submitted for compensation which were later referred to the Lands Tribunal. The President's decision does not set out the alternative bases of claim in any detail. He simply notes ([2001] 1 EGLR 185 at 186) the claimants' contention that their land had a 'ransom value', in that—

> 'the loss of the habitats in Cardiff Bay has given their land a value in excess of agricultural value, because, together with the rest of the 1,000 acres, it constitutes the most suitable area for the nature reserve that it was necessary to establish as a compensatory measure.'

[18] We have been shown the particulars of the claim, as submitted following a direction of the tribunal. Although it is not material for present purposes to consider the detail, nor the valuation evidence in support, it is helpful in considering the preliminary issues to have some idea of their possible implications in monetary terms. Four alternative bases are put forward by the claimants. The lowest two are not said to be dependent on the preliminary issues. They are (in summary) agricultural value (£4,500 per acre), and

'development hope value' (£9,000 pa). (The authority's valuations are based simply on agricultural value, which they put slightly lower.)

[19] The two higher bases, which are said to be dependent on the preliminary issues, are 'nature reserve value' (£13,000 pa) and (to use Schiemann LJ's suggested shorthand) 'barrage inhibition value' (£28,000 pa). The way the latter is put in the claimants' particulars is instructive:

> 'Upon the premise that the land commands a particular value consequent upon its indispensable status vis-à-vis the Cardiff Development Scheme and upon the premise that the Pointe Gourde principle and s 5, r (3) of the Land Compensation Act 1961 does not preclude such an approach ... the claimants maintain that regard must be had to the extent and importance of the Cardiff Bay Development Scheme ... The best estimate which the claimants can presently give is that the total value element of that scheme would have been of the order of £180,000,000.'

[20] The precise relationship between the latter figure and the claimed figure of £28,000 per acre is not explained, although details are also given of some other transactions in the area, including purchases by LAW. One may infer, though this is not stated, that the claimants have in mind a valuation exercise comparable to that adopted in Stokes v Cambridge Corp (1961) 13 P & CR 77 (where land required for access to unlock the potential of a development site was valued by reference to a share of the development value).

[21] As to the other of the two higher valuations, there is no doubt that the claimants are entitled in principle to 'nature reserve value', if (which is disputed) it is worth more than agricultural value. This is because the Land Compensation Act 1961 allows the claimant the benefit of an actual or assumed permission for the authority's proposed development, whether or not it would have been granted in the absence of the authority's scheme (see ss 14(2) and 15(1)). Accordingly, it is 'barrage inhibition value' which is at the heart of the debate.

[22] The tribunal directed that there should be a hearing of two preliminary issues. The first was whether the case was governed by s 5, r (3) of the 1961 Act. This was determined against the authority, and there is no cross-appeal against that part of the decision. However since the President's findings on that issue are relevant to the other issue it will be necessary to refer to them. The second issue, which was determined against the claimant, and is now subject to appeal, was expressed in these terms ([2001] 1 EGLR 185 at 186):

> 'Whether the scheme underlying the acquisition is the intended use of the land taken as a nature reserve or for the construction of the Cardiff Bay barrage; and whether it is necessary to discount, for the purposes of valuation, any increase in the value of the land taken as being due to the need to acquire it as a palliative measure necessary as a result of the environmental consequences of the construction of the Cardiff Bay barrage: following [Pointe Gourde Quarrying and Transport Co Ltd v Sub-Intendent of Crown Lands [1947] AC 565].'

THE PRESIDENT'S DECISION

[23] Rule (3) provides:

> 'The special suitability or adaptability of the land for any purpose shall not be taken into account if that purpose is a purpose to which it could be applied only in pursuance of statutory powers, or for which there is no market apart from ... the requirements of any authority possessing compulsory purchase powers ...' a

[24] In the context of the present case, two questions arose: first, whether the land had 'special suitability' for the authority's purpose; and, secondly, whether there was any market for that purpose apart from the requirements of an authority possessing compulsory purchase powers. (It was not contended that this was a purpose to which the site 'could be applied only in pursuance of statutory powers'.) The President (at 191) found against the authority on the first question: b

'Whether the subject land has a special suitability or adaptability within the terms of r 3 falls to be judged in relation to the purpose for which the acquiring authority acquired it—that is to say, as part of a nature reserve that would meet the need to provide compensatory measures for the loss of the Taff/Ely SSSI ... The requirement of special suitability is not met by showing that the land is the most suitable land for the purpose. In [Batchelor v Kent CC (1989) 59 P & CR 357 at 362], Mann LJ, having considered the Oxford English Dictionary definition of "special", said: "Most suitable does not correspond with specially suitable." The land must possess some exceptional character in relation to the purpose in question. I am satisfied that the subject land does not have a special suitability or adaptability in this sense. The evidence suggests strongly that there are other areas along the Severn estuary that could have performed the same function.' c d e

[25] He indicated that, had he decided the 'special suitability' question in favour of the authority, he would have found in their favour on the other question:

'Mr David Holgate QC submitted that both the Welsh Office, which did not have compulsory purchase powers, and the RSPB were potential bidders. On this, I accept Mr Porten [QC]'s submissions. The purpose of the acquisition—to create a wetlands reserve to compensate for the loss of the Taff/Ely SSSI—was not one that the RSPB saw, or would ever have seen, as being its function to achieve. Its concern throughout was to bring pressure to bear on the government to provide a compensatory reserve, and it would have been inconsistent with this stance to consider providing a reserve itself. As for the Welsh Office, I can see no evidence that it would ever have pursued land acquisition on its own behalf. LAW was there with the specific function of acquiring land in Wales for development, and the Secretary of State had power to give LAW directions as to the performance of its functions. I can see no reason for thinking that he would ever have acted other than by these means.' f g h

[26] On the Pointe Gourde issue, the President conducted a detailed review of the case law, which led him to state the 'principle' in the following terms (at 193):

'The basis of the Pointe Gourde rule, and the rules contained in sections 5 to 9 of the 1961 Act, appears to be this. The owner is to receive, as compensation, the equivalent in money terms of what he has lost through the compulsory acquisition of his land. He must be put into the position that he would have been in if there had been no compulsory acquisition. Compulsory powers of acquisition are only conferred in the public interest. A compulsory purchase order is only made and confirmed for a public j purpose that the making authority and the confirming authority judge to be sufficiently important to warrant compulsion. The principle is that any effect upon the value of the land acquired arising from the public purpose, or public purposes, prompting the acquisition, whether from their adoption by the authority or from their implementation, is to be disregarded. A scheme or proposal is the embodiment of the public purpose, or public purposes, concerned.'

[27] On that basis, in his view, it was—

'immaterial whether the "scheme underlying the acquisition" is the Cardiff Bay barrage or the nature reserve proposal itself, since there is no suggestion that the barrage had any effect upon demand for the subject land other than for the public purpose so identified. Whichever of the alternatives constitutes the scheme, there must be left out of account such effect upon value as the adoption, or implementation, of the purpose of providing the compensatory nature reserve may have had. Given this conclusion, it becomes unnecessary to seek to identify the scheme underlying the acquisition in the way that is frequently necessary in compensation cases.'

[28] He recognised, however, that this conclusion did not answer the preliminary issue in the terms in which it had been formulated. Accordingly, he went on to consider whether the 'scheme', for the purposes of the Pointe Gourde rule, should be regarded as confined to the nature reserve on its own, or should be regarded as including the barrage. He concluded (at 194):

'Since, in my view, it is the public purpose, or public purposes, of the acquisition upon which the identification of the scheme must depend, the crucial factors are that the nature reserve proposal was made necessary by the barrage scheme and that the barrage scheme proceeded upon the basis that some such compensatory measures would be provided. In the absence of the barrage scheme, there would have been no public purpose for the acquisition, and, in the absence of assurances on the part of government that a compensatory nature reserve would be provided, it is unlikely that the Act would have become law, certainly in its present form. If it had done, I think it probable that action would have been taken by the European Commission to prevent impoundment. Thus, the implementation of the barrage scheme, as regards the permanent inundation of Cardiff Bay, was, I find, dependent upon the acquisition and development of land for the Gwent Levels nature reserve. The fact that the Secretary of State, in confirming the [compulsory purchase order], saw the nature reserve as having an additional, wider justification, and the fact that the Commission sought, and obtained, additional compensatory measures on the part of the government, do not change the essential nature of the acquisition as one element in the barrage scheme. That different agencies were used for the purposes of developing the barrage, and for acquiring and developing the land taken for a nature reserve, does not prevent there being a single scheme. The agencies, the CBDC, LAW and the CCW, acted in concert at the behest of the government, and finance for the nature reserve was channelled through the CBDC. In the light of these factors, if it is necessary to identify the scheme underlying the acquisition, I find that it was the Cardiff Bay barrage.'

[29] Before leaving the President's decision, it is necessary also to mention what he said about the so-called 'Indian case' (Sri Raja Vyricharla Narayana Gajapatiraju Bahadur Garu v Revenue Divisional Officer, Vizagapatam [1939] 2 All ER 317, [1939] AC 302). I understand that it was the President himself, rather than the parties, who introduced the Indian case into the argument. He also noted that it had been approved and applied by the Court of Appeal in Lambe v Secretary of State for War [1955] 2 All ER 386, [1955] 2 QB 612, and in one major Lands Tribunal case. He described its effect as follows (at 193):

> 'The Judicial Committee of the Privy Council decided that the proper approach to the assessment of compensation was to have regard to the authority's purpose in acquiring the land, but to assume a "friendly negotiation" between it and the vendor, rather than one taking place against the background of the authority's pressure to buy under the compulsory acquisition ...'

The suggestion appears to have been that, on this basis, even if the 'scheme' did include the barrage, the value could still take that purpose into account, in so far as it would have led a purchaser to offer a higher price in 'friendly negotiations'. However, having raised the point, the President discounted it, because, as he thought, the approach of the Indian case was 'unquestionably at odds' with the Pointe Gourde rule as stated and applied in later cases in the Court of Appeal and House of Lords.

THE APPELLANTS' CASE

[30] The appellants challenge the President's decision on a number of grounds. They can I think be summarised and reordered in five main points, the first two of general principle, and the others more fact-specific. (i) The President should have treated the Indian case as establishing that, notwithstanding the no-scheme rule, the acquiring authority must pay the price that it would have been willing to pay in friendly negotiations, having regard to the barrage project. (ii) In applying the no-scheme rule, the President applied a 'public interest' test which is not supported by the authorities. (iii) The 'scheme' for the purposes of the no-scheme rule must be a scheme of the acquiring authority itself, or one to which the acquiring authority is a party. (iv) Compulsory acquisition of the claimant's land must form an 'integral part' of the scheme to be disregarded. (v) On the facts, and in the light of its earlier findings, the President was not justified in finding that the inundation of Cardiff Bay was 'dependent' on provision of the Gwent Levels nature reserve.

[31] Like the President, I find it impossible to address these questions satisfactorily, without first considering in some detail the basis of the law relating to disregarding the 'scheme' for compensation purposes.

THE NO-SCHEME RULE

[32] The Pointe Gourde rule (or no-scheme rule) has been recognised in numerous authorities at the highest level. However, for a rule which is so well-established, it is surprisingly difficult to find a clear exposition of its precise ambit. One finds a concise statement of the principle in the recent Privy Council case, Director of Buildings and Lands v Shun Fung Ironworks Ltd [1995] 1 All ER 846 at 861, 862, [1995] 2 AC 111 at 136 (per Lord Nicholls of Birkenhead):

> 'A landowner cannot claim compensation to the extent that the value of his land is increased by the very scheme of which [the compulsory acquisition] forms an integral part ... A loss in value attributable to the scheme is not to enure to the detriment of a claimant ... The underlying reasoning is that if the landowner is to be fairly compensated, scheme losses should attract compensation but scheme gains should not. Had there been no scheme those losses and gains would not have arisen.'

[33] Central to that statement is the word 'scheme'. That raises an immediate question. Compensation is a statutory right to payment for the adverse effects of compulsory acquisition, not for the adverse effects of a 'scheme'. That is not a word which appears in any of the relevant statutes. So, what is the source of the rule? It is sometimes described as a 'common law principle' (see eg Melwood Units Pty Ltd v Comr of Main Roads [1979] 1 All ER 161 at 165, [1979] AC 426 at 435 per Lord Russell of Killowen: '... part of the common law deriving as a matter of principle from the nature of compensation for ... compulsory acquisition'). On the other hand, in Lord Pearson's view (Rugby Joint Water Board v Foottit [1972] 1 All ER 1057 at 1062, [1973] AC 202 at 214–215), it could not be a 'common law principle', because compulsory acquisition and compensation are entirely creations of statute; in his opinion, the rule was one of interpretation of the word 'value' in the relevant statutes. Neither of these explanations gives one any precise assistance as to the ambit of the rule.

[34] There is a further conceptual problem. Apart from any specific statutory provision, the landowner has no inherent right to compensation for the adverse effects of public projects (say, a new motorway blocking the view from his house), any more than the authority has a right to recoupment for their beneficial effects (for example, a new road opening up an area for private development). Compensation for losses due to public works is governed by detailed statutory schemes (such as Pt 1 of the Land Compensation Act 1973). Conversely, under the present law, recoupment of gains is left to general taxation, attempts at more comprehensive solutions (such as in the Town and Country Planning Act 1947 and the Community Land Act 1975) having been abandoned.

[35] Thus, a principle that 'scheme losses should attract compensation but scheme gains should not', attractive as it sounds, is not self-evident. In so far as the word 'scheme' is intended to refer to actions of public authorities going beyond the simple act of compulsory acquisition, it is an exception to the general principle that, under the modern system, the burdens and benefits of the activities of public authorities lie where they fall. The justification for such an exception, and its precise ambit must be found (if Lord Pearson's analysis is accepted) in something to be implied, as a matter of interpretation, in the relevant statutes.

[36] In most areas of the law, having arrived at such a point, one would turn for guidance to the relevant statutes. In this area of the law, unfortunately, that is not a speedy route to enlightenment. The statutory incursions into this field, notably s 5, r (3) of the Land Compensation Act 1961 (originally introduced in 1919), and s 6 with Sch 1 (introduced in 1959), have not had a happy history in the courts. As will be seen, the former has been interpreted so narrowly, that it is hard to find any case in which it has had any practical effect. The drafting of the latter is of such obscurity that it was described by Harman LJ, in a memorable passage, as 'a Slough of Despond' (see Davy v Leeds Corp, Central Freehold Estates (Leeds) Ltd v Leeds Corp [1964] 3 All ER 390 at 394, [1964] 1 WLR 1218 at 1224). Indeed, counsel needed some encouragement from the court in the present case to venture at all into its murky waters.

[37] The case law offers more attractions, taking one on an engrossing historical tour of the jurisdiction of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council from its heyday at the beginning of the last century: railway-building in the jungles of Zanzibar (see Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs v Charlesworth Pelling & Co [1901] AC 373); hydro-electric works in Canada (see Cedars Rapids Manufacturing and Power Co v Lacoste [1914] AC 569, [1914–15] All ER Rep 571 and Fraser v Fraserville City [1917] AC 187); anti-malarial works related to harbour development in India (see the Indian case [1939] 2 All ER 317, [1939] AC 302); a quarry needed to build a US naval base in Trinidad (see the Pointe Gourde case itself [1947] AC 565); a shopping centre in Queensland (see the Melwood Units case [1979] 1 All ER 161, [1979] AC 426); and, most recently, displacement of a steelworks to make way for a new town in Hong Kong (see the Shun Fung case [1995] 1 All ER 846, [1995] 2 AC 111).

[38] Not surprisingly, given the extraordinary variety of subject matter and location, the statements made in these cases are not always easily reconcilable with each other, nor readily transferable to the conditions of post-war Great Britain. Such statements must always be read in the factual context in which they occur. But the very diversity of the contexts encourages the hope that underlying it all is a principle of some robustness and universality.

[39] More surprising, perhaps, is the fact that the problems of reconciliation seem to have gone largely unnoticed in the higher courts. In the more modern cases, it has usually been considered sufficient to refer to the formulation of the rule by the Privy Council in the Pointe Gourde case itself (see eg Davy's case [1965] 1 All ER 753 at 757–758, [1965] 1 WLR 445 at 452–453 per Viscount Dilhorne). Similarly, in Wilson v Liverpool City Council [1971] 1 All ER 628, [1971] 1 WLR 302, in which the Court of Appeal established the modern form of the rule, the only cases cited were the Pointe Gourde case and Fraser's case, which were treated as identical in effect. The difficulty of reconciling the decisions in either case, with that of the Privy Council in the Indian case, seems generally to have escaped notice, until the problem was identified by the President in the present case. In the few cases where the Indian case has been cited, it has been treated as illustrating, and certainly consistent with, the Pointe Gourde principle (see the Rugby Joint Water Board case [1972] 1 All ER 1057 at 1062, [1973] AC 202 at 214; see also Lambe v Secretary of State for War [1955] 2 All ER 386, [1955] 2 QB 612, and, in the Canadian Supreme Court, Fraser v R (1963) 40 DLR (2d) 707 at 723–725).

[40] The government has recently accepted the need to 'consolidate, codify and simplify' the legislation in this area, and has referred certain issues to the Law Commission for consideration, including the rules relating to disregard of changes in value due to the 'scheme' (see the Department for Transport, Local Government and the Regions consultation paper Compulsory Purchase and Compensation: Delivering a Fundamental Change (December 2001)). The Law Commission is expected shortly to issue a consultative report on the law relating to compensation. For that purpose, it has undertaken a detailed historical review of the development of the no-scheme rule. This has been made available in draft to the parties and the court in this case. We, of course, have to decide this case in accordance with what the law is, rather than what it might become in the light of any recommendations made by the Law Commission. The historical analysis can, however, assist in finding a way through the complexities of the case law and statute, and setting the modern Pointe Gourde rule in its proper perspective.

DEFINING THE SCHEME

[41] A sound starting point for consideration of the content of the rule is the classic statement by Fletcher Moulton LJ in 1909, since cited with approval in the House of Lords (see eg the Rugby Joint Water Board case [1972] 1 All ER 1057 at 1061–1062, [1973] AC 202 at 214 per Lord Pearson). Having noted that compensation was based on value to the owner, not value to the purchaser, Fletcher Moulton LJ continued:

> '... hence it has from the first been recognized as an absolute rule that this value is to be estimated as it stood before the grant of the compulsory powers. The owner is only to receive compensation based upon the market value of his lands as they stood before the scheme was authorized by which they are put to public uses. Subject to that he is entitled to be paid the full price for his lands, and any and every element of value which they possess must be taken into consideration in so far as they increase the value to him.' (See Re Lucas and Chesterfield Gas and Water Board [1909] 1 KB 16 at 29–30, [1908–10] All ER Rep 251 at 255.)

In that case, the extent of the 'scheme' was not in doubt; it was established by the scope of the particular Act of 1904, which authorised the construction of the reservoir (the facts are summarised later in this judgment).

[42] The Pointe Gourde case, which was decided in 1947 and gave its name to the rule, purported to be an application of the same principle. It concerned the acquisition of land for construction of a naval base during the war. The land included a quarry, from which stone could be used for the base. It was held that, in valuing the quarry, the extra value given by that potential use had to be disregarded, as part of the 'scheme underlying the acquisition'. (I shall return to the judgment, when discussing the issues raised by the Indian case.)

[43] Subsequent development of the no-scheme rule must be seen against the background of: first, the radical change of the planning system in this country, introduced by the Town and Country Planning Act 1947 and other legislation; and, secondly, (following a period when, under the 1947 Act, all development value had been in effect expropriated by the state) the restoration of 'market value' compensation by the Town and Country Planning Act 1959. In relation to the definition of the 'scheme', the change was explained in one of the more illuminating decisions in this field, that of the Lands Tribunal (under Sir Michael Rowe QC) in Kaye v Basingstoke Corp (1968) 20 P & CR 417. He observed (at 455):

> 'Before the 1939 war it is broadly, perhaps entirely, true to say that the application of the common law rule was comparatively simple in so far as discovering what "the scheme underlying the acquisition" was. There was usually an Act, public but more often private, or an Order which defined the scheme and the area wherein it was to operate. But in the post-war years a new conception of planning led to a series of measures which gave to local authorities, of one kind or another, planning powers of a much less detailed although more far-reaching character.'

(He referred to the 1947 Act itself, the New Towns Act 1949 and the Town Development Act 1952.)

[44] Under the new regime, one could not rely on a particular Act or order, to define the scope of the scheme; one needed to look for other evidence. This is illustrated by Wilson v Liverpool City Council [1971] 1 All ER 628, [1971] 1 WLR 302, which established the no-scheme rule in its modern form. It concerned the acquisition of an area of 74 acres for housing development to meet the expanding needs of the city. The facts emerge most clearly from the Lands Tribunal decision, reported at [1969] RVR 741. The council had in February 1963 adopted a ten-year programme to provide 5,000 houses a year to meet the needs of its area. In March 1963 the development committee resolved to apply for permission for housing development of an area of 391 acres (including the 74 acres belonging to Mr Wilson), and gave authority to negotiate for acquisition of the whole area, using its general housing powers. Planning permission was granted by the minister in November 1963. By February 1964 the council had acquired by agreement all but 86 acres of the site, and it made a compulsory purchase order for the remainder, including Mr Wilson's land. Mr Wilson also owned land outside the council site, which he was able to sell privately for £6,700 per acre. That was taken as a base for valuing the subject land, but the tribunal made a deduction of £1,350 per acre under the Pointe Gourde rule on the basis that, had it not been for the council's scheme, development of this area would have been delayed for two years, and the owners would have had to bear the additional costs, such as for sewers and wayleaves.

[45] The Court of Appeal approved this approach. Having rejected the argument that s 6 of the 1961 Act provided a complete code, it held that the case fell directly within the Pointe Gourde rule. The court also rejected an argument for the claimant that the rule did not apply because the scheme was not sufficiently precise and definite at the valuation date. Widgery LJ ([1971] 1 All ER 628 at 635, [1971] 1 WLR 302 at 310), in a passage which is often cited, said:

> 'Whenever land is to be compulsorily acquired, this must be in consequence of some scheme or undertaking or project. Unless there is some scheme or undertaking or project compulsory powers of acquisition will not arise at all, and it would I think be a great mistake if we tended to focus our attention on the word "scheme" as though it had some magic of its own. It is merely synonymous with the other words to which I have referred, and the purpose of the so-called Pointe Gourde rule is to prevent the acquisition of the land being at a price which is inflated by the very project or scheme which gives rise to the acquisition. The extent of the scheme is a matter of fact in every case, as is shown by the decision of [Fraser v Fraserville City [1917] AC 187 at 194] ... It is for the tribunal of fact to consider just what activities—past, present or future—are properly to be regarded as the scheme within the meaning of this proposition.'

[46] As always, these comments need to be seen in the context of the facts of the case. Widgery LJ's comments on the word 'scheme' were directed to the appellant's argument by analogy with the law on 'building schemes' in relation to restrictive covenants, where the cases require both the area and the obligations of the scheme to be adequately defined (see eg Reid v Bickerstaff [1909] 2 Ch 305 at 319, [1908–10] All ER Rep 298 at 300). Relying on that analogy, the claimant had argued that there was no 'scheme' in the required sense, until January 1968 when the minister gave final clearance to the details of the development. The tribunal had held that the scheme was sufficiently established not later than November 1963, when outline planning permission was granted for the whole area.

[47] More difficult to explain, in the context of the case, and of the previous authorities, is another often-quoted passage in Wilson's case, where Lord Denning MR referred to a scheme as 'a progressive thing' which 'starts vague and known to few ... [but] becomes more precise and better known as time goes on' (see [1971] 1 All ER 628 at 634, [1971] 1 WLR 302 at 309). In so far as this implies that the 'scheme' may come into existence before any formal adoption by the authority concerned, it does not appear to be supported by authority, or consistent with principle. For example, in the Lucas case [1909] 1 KB 16, [1908–10] All ER Rep 251 it was the statutory authorisation of the scheme which was regarded as critical. By analogy, where the acquisition is made under general statutory powers, the scope of the scheme should be apparent from an appropriate resolution or decision which provides the basis for the use of compulsory powers. The first preparatory stages of a proposal may be 'vague and known to few', but they do not make it a 'scheme' of the authority as such. In Wilson's case itself, as one would expect, there was a specific resolution of the relevant committee in March 1963 to authorise acquisitions for a clearly defined project, followed by grant of planning permission. The only argument was whether at that point the project was sufficiently detailed, not whether one should look behind it to the earlier, preliminary stages.

OTHER VALUATION ISSUES

[48] Before returning to the issues raised by the appeal, it is desirable to separate out for discussion the other related elements of the valuation exercise. In this case we are concerned solely with the rule as it applies for the protection of the acquiring authority against increases in value caused by the scheme. It is unnecessary, therefore, to consider, other than by way of analogy, the statutory rules for the protection of the claimant against the effects of the scheme, so far as reflected in decreases in value (see s 9 of the 1961 Act), or loss of planning potential (see s 14ff).

[49] On this footing, there are three tests which require separate discussion: (i) the 'market value' rule; (ii) 'special suitability' and s 5, r (3); (iii) s 6 of the 1961 Act. The first can be regarded as the baseline. The claimants' case ultimately will stand or fall on their being able to establish that, apart from any matters required to be disregarded by statute or judicial rule, 'barrage inhibition value' was part of the 'market value' of the land. The other two tests, and the Pointe Gourde rule itself, are exclusionary rules. They require to be left out of account what would otherwise be elements of market value. They can be seen as hurdles over which the claimants must pass to get back to base.

MARKET VALUE

[50] The starting point for assessing compensation is the market value of the land in question: 'the amount which the land if sold in the open market by a willing seller might be expected to realise' (see s 5, r (2) of the 1961 Act, originally r (2) of the 1919 rules (see the Acquisition of Land (Assessment of Compensation) Act 1919)). That does not mean simply existing use value. The willing seller expects to receive recognition of any additional value due to the potential of the land for development. This may mean a substantial addition, even if there is only one potential purchaser for that potential.

[51] This aspect of 'market value' is explained and illustrated by the Indian case, which, whatever the merits of its treatment of the no-scheme rule (to which I will come), remains authoritative on the interpretation of the 'market value' principle (for the relevant Indian statute of 1894, see [1939] 2 All ER 317 at 320, [1939] AC 302 at 310–311). The case concerned the compulsory acquisition of land, which contained a supply of good drinking water, required for anti-malarial works in connection with development of a new harbour. The main issue was whether the valuation should take into account the potentiality of the site as a water supply, given that the only potential purchaser for that purpose was the harbour authority. One limb of the authority's argument was that, even if it were permissible to take account of the potential bid of the acquiring authority itself, the additional value would be negligible because the bidding would only rise above the existing use value ('the poramboke value') sufficiently to enable the land to be knocked down to that purchaser.

[52] In rejecting this argument, Lord Romer explained the application of 'market value' in the context of compulsory purchase ([1939] 2 All ER 317 at 321, [1939] AC 302 at 312):

> 'The compensation must be determined ... by reference to the price which a willing vendor might reasonably expect to obtain from a willing purchaser. The disinclination of the vendor to part with his land and the urgent necessity of the purchaser to buy must alike be disregarded. Neither must be considered as acting under compulsion. This is implied in the common saying that the value of the land is not to be estimated at its value to the purchaser. This does not mean, however, that the fact that some particular purchaser might desire the land more than others is to be disregarded. The wish of a particular purchaser, though not his compulsion, may always be taken into consideration for what it is worth.'

[53] He explained that the valuation must take account, not only of its existing use, but also of 'the uses to which it is reasonably capable of being put in the future' (see [1939] 2 All ER 317 at 322, [1939] AC 302 at 313). Thus, agricultural land with potential for building use must be valued taking account of the possibility of its being used for building purposes, bearing in mind that 'it is the possibilities of the land, and not its realised possibilities, that must be taken into consideration'. Where the potential arises from unusual or unique features of the land, the arbitrator will have 'no market value to guide him', and he will have to ascertain 'as best he may from the materials before him', what a willing vendor might expect to obtain from a willing purchaser for that potential (see [1939] 2 All ER 317 at 321, [1939] AC 302 at 313). He rejected the authority's argument that, if there were only one potential purchaser for that potential use, the additional value would be negligible:

> '... if the potentiality is of value to the vendor if there happened to be two or more possible purchasers, it is difficult to see why he should be willing to part with it for nothing merely because there was only one purchaser. To compel him to do so is to treat him as a vendor parting with his land under compulsion, and not as a willing vendor. The fact is that the only possible purchaser of a potentiality is usually quite willing to pay for it.' (See [1939] 2 All ER 317 at 324, [1939] AC 302 at 316–317, citing the English Court of Appeal in IRC v Clay, IRC v Buchanan [1914] 3 KB 466, [1914–15] All ER Rep 882.)

[54] The Indian case was unusual, at this level, in that the case was not simply sent back to the tribunal below, but the Privy Council, at the invitation of the parties, undertook the valuation on the correct basis. It is therefore of interest to see how the Privy Council dealt with the facts of the particular case. They agreed with the High Court that the harbour authority was 'the only really possible purchaser' for use as a water supply ([1939] 2 All ER 317 at 331, [1939] AC 302 at 327). The figure had to be set at the sum that the authority 'in a friendly negotiation' would have been willing to pay. The judge had arrived at a figure of (Rs 1,05,000) on the footing that the spring could have been made an income-earning concern from the date of valuation. In the view of Lord Romer, a substantial discount had to be made in view of the fact that the water could not be exploited by the appellant himself and that it would necessarily be some years before the water would become a profit-earning asset. On this basis the appropriate figure was fixed at Rs 40,000, as representing the figure that the harbour authority would have agreed to pay as 'willing purchasers' ([1939] 2 All ER 317 at 333, [1939] AC 302 at 330–331).

[55] It is not strictly correct, in my view, to describe this as a 'ransom' value, since this would imply, contrary to Lord Romer's statement, that the seller was able to exploit the purchaser's 'urgent necessity'. As he made clear, both parties must be regarded as 'willing'.

[56] Applying this approach to the present case, the requirement of land for a nature reserve, in connection with the barrage scheme, is in principle something to be taken into account in fixing the market value. If that requirement would have led any of the authorities involved in the scheme, in 'friendly negotiations' assuming no compulsory purchase, to offer something above agricultural value, then that can be taken into account, subject to overcoming the other hurdles. Clearly, the extent to which the subject land, as in the Indian case, was uniquely suited for that purpose, would be a very material factor in the valuation. To this extent it is difficult to separate this issue from the question under r (3) (see [58], below). On the other hand, the Indian case helps the claimants in establishing that the possibility of such additional value is not ruled out as an element of market value, even if there would have been no potential purchaser other than LAW itself.

[57] How, if it arises, that additional value should be assessed is not an issue before us. A modern application of this aspect of the Indian case, in a statutory context to which the no-scheme rule was not relevant, can be seen in Mercury Communications Ltd v London and India Dock Investments Ltd (1993) 69 P & CR 135 (Judge Hague QC). That judgment contains a useful discussion of the problems of valuation that can arise in such cases, in the absence of clear comparables, and illustrates (at 161) the potential difficulty of applying the Stokes v Cambridge approach, other than in situations where the benefit to the purchaser can be readily quantified.

SPECIAL SUITABILITY AND SECTION 5, RULE (3) OF THE 1961 ACT

[58] The first hurdle for the claimants was r (3). Although they have passed that hurdle, the route by which they did so is material to the other valuation issues. Furthermore Mr Holgate relies on r (3) and its background, as part of his argument against the President's 'public interest' test. It is necessary therefore to set r (3) in its historical context, and to consider the implications of the President's decision in favour of the claimant on this aspect of the case.

[59] The present r (3), set about above, is derived (with some amendment) from the 'rules' originally enacted in the Acquisition of Land (Assessment of Compensation) Act 1919. They followed recommendations of the 1918 Scott Committee (Second Report on the Law and Practice relating to the Acquisition and Valuation of Land for Public Purposes (Cd 9229)). As the chairman later explained (by then, as Scott LJ), the main purpose of the committee's recommendations was—

'to mitigate the evil of excessive compensation which has grown up out of the theory, evolved by the courts, that, because the sale was compulsory, the seller must be treated by the assessing tribunal sympathetically as an unwilling seller selling to a willing buyer.' (See Horn v Sunderland Corp [1941] 1 All ER 480 at 490, [1941] 2 KB 26 at 40.)

[60] As already noted, the 1919 rules established the market value principle on which compensation has since been based, including the rule that the owner should be treated as a 'willing seller' (r (2)).

[61] Rule (3) was directed at the perceived problems caused by the 'special suitability' principle, as established in previous cases. The significance of 'special suitability' or 'special adaptability' is well-illustrated by Re Lucas and Chesterfield Gas and Water Board [1909] 1 KB 16, [1908–10] All ER Rep 251, which I have already mentioned as a leading case on the no-scheme rule. It concerned a proposal by the board to construct a storage reservoir between two existing reservoirs on the Linacre Brook. The proposal for the new storage reservoir was authorised by a local Act of 1904, which gave the board the necessary powers to carry out the necessary works on the brook, and to acquire land compulsorily for the purpose. The umpire had found that the site had 'peculiar natural advantages for a reservoir site', and also that there was 'competition for the supply of water within the district in question' (see [1909] 1 KB 16 at 19).

[62] The main problem which exercised the courts was the extent to which the umpire could take into account, in the valuation, the special suitability of the land for the purpose which the scheme had been designed to serve. At first instance, the judge (Bray J) had decided that he should do so, not only because there might be other possible buyers, but also because the board itself should be regarded as a possible purchaser who might give a special price for the land:

'The fact that they have obtained statutory powers must not be taken into consideration, but before any statutory powers [have] been given or even applied for it may well be that these lands would have a special value owing to the fact that it was likely that sooner or later the board would require another reservoir, and that this would form a most convenient site for one.' (See [1908] 1 KB 571 at 580.)

[63] There was a difference on this issue in the Court of Appeal. Vaughan Williams LJ agreed with the judge on both points. The umpire was required to take into account 'the fact that the board itself might become possible purchasers who would give a special price', regard being had to 'the value of the probability as it existed before the promoters had obtained their powers', but not 'the realized probability' ([1909] 1 KB 16 at 25, 28, [1908–10] All ER Rep 251 at 253, 254, 255). Fletcher Moulton LJ's agreement was more limited; the umpire was entitled to take into account the possibility of 'competition between rival public authorities', but not the interest of the acquiring authority itself, because that would offend the no-scheme rule. The third member of the court, Buckley LJ, agreed with Vaughan Williams LJ and the judge that the interest of the acquiring authority itself had to be taken into account, and indeed was evidence of 'enhanced value':

'The facts here are that not only is there a reasonable possibility of the site coming into the market, but that the site is wanted for the particular purpose, and is being acquired under compulsory powers for that purpose. The land is so situate in proximity to the reservoirs already existing that within a a reasonable time it is reasonably certain that it will be required for this special purpose, with the result that it has acquired an enhanced value. That was a matter for the umpire to take into consideration.' (See [1909] 1 KB 16 at 37, [1908–10] All ER Rep 251 at 259.)

b [64] It is important to emphasise, in the context of the present case, that none of the judges thought it right to exclude altogether the public purpose of providing a water supply for the district, nor the possibility of other public bodies competing for the land for that purpose. The suitability of the land as a reservoir to serve the needs of Chesterfield was a proper element of the valuation. The issue was solely as to whether the board itself was to be treated as a potential purchaser. (On this, the majority's approach was later approved by the Privy c Council in the Indian case—see below). Fletcher Moulton LJ also commented that 'special adaptability' was not a very happy term, 'for special adaptability for some purpose or other is the very basis of the market value of all land ...' ([1909] 1 KB 16 at 30, [1908–10] All ER Rep 251 at 255). (See also, to similar effect, Sidney v North Eastern Railway Co [1914] 3 KB 629 at 640, [1914–15] All ER Rep 341 at 345 d per Shearman J.)

[65] The 'special suitability' principle clearly gave rise to considerable difficulty in practice in the period before the 1919 Act. In Sidney's case, Shearman J complained of the 'the ingenuity of claimants' in finding 'special adaptability of some sort in any kind of land compulsorily taken ...' (see [1914] 3 KB 629 at 640, [1914–15] All ER Rep 341 at 345). It is to be remembered that at e this time, before the introduction of 'official arbitrators' by the 1919 Act, claimants had the right, over a certain figure, to an award by jury (see ss 22, 68 of the Land Clauses Consolidation Act 1845). The Scott Committee were concerned that under this principle 'merely theoretical and often highly speculative elements of value which had no real existence have crept into awards as if they were actual'. (Paragraph 8.)

f [66] The committee's view was that no account should be taken of the possibility of competition between statutory undertakers, which was only possible 'under an imperfect system for the granting of statutory powers'. The assumed market should be limited to those requiring the land for purposes for which statutory powers were not required. Accordingly, the recommendation, g which became the basis of r (3), was that—

> 'The owner should not be entitled to any increased value for his land which could only arise or could only have arisen by reason of the suitability of the land for a purpose to which it could only be applied under statutory powers.'

h [67] The word 'special' was not included in this recommendation. Its inclusion in r (3), as enacted, was presumably intended to provide a clearer link with the previous cases, such as the Lucas case. It is doubtful whether it was intended to do more than indicate a quality which was of particular utility, and therefore value, to a public authority. The natural corollary would be that, if j there were no 'special' suitability in this sense, there would be no additional value, and therefore the issue would not arise (not that the owner should have a more generous basis of valuation).

[68] However, as interpreted in cases binding on the Tribunal and this court, the word 'special' has been given a more restrictive meaning. It has been interpreted as requiring something 'exceptional in character, quality or degree' (see Batchelor v Kent CC (1989) 59 P & CR 357 at 362 per Mann LJ). Thus, the President in the present case concluded that there was nothing 'exceptional' about the subject site, because there were other possibilities (notably the Redwick site) for meeting the need. That decision is not subject to challenge in this court.

[69] Accordingly, the claimants have passed over the r (3) hurdle. Any additional value of the land as part of the barrage scheme cannot be excluded under this rule. However, one cannot sensibly ignore the basis of the conclusion on r (3). It depends on the finding that their land is not unique for bird reservoir purposes. In a rational legal code, one would not expect that lack of uniqueness to lead to the land having greater value for compensation purposes.

SECTION 6 OF THE 1961 ACT

[70] The President in this case mentioned s 6, as one 'manifestation of a single principle', which also underlay the judicial rule, but he did not consider it in detail. As I have said, it has had an unhappy history in the courts, in which, following the lead given by cases such as Davy v Leeds Corp [1965] 1 All ER 753, [1965] 1 WLR 445 and Wilson v Liverpool City Council [1971] 1 All ER 628, [1971] 1 WLR 302, literal application has been abandoned. However, it is not clear by what legal principle we can simply ignore such a statutory regime, merely because it is obscure and, in some respects, flawed in conception. Furthermore, as will be seen, the section was reaffirmed by Parliament, as recently as 1980, in the specific context of urban development areas, such as was Cardiff Bay (and yet again in 1988, in relation to housing action trusts).

[71] In fact, once one finds a way through the obscurities of the language, the general approach of the draftsman is reasonably clear. He attempted to take account of the different circumstances in which compulsory purchase orders might be made under the post-war planning regime. Some would be for single, self-contained projects, others would be related to more extensive statutory designations, such as comprehensive development areas or new towns. Accordingly, different rules were laid down for disregarding the value attributable to development or prospective development on associated land, depending on whether the associated land was: within the same compulsory purchase order (Sch 1, case 1); within the same comprehensive development area (case 2); within an area designated under the New Towns Act 1946 (case 3); or within a town development area (case 4). The Local Government, Planning and Land Act 1980, which provided for the creation of urban development corporations, added, as case 4A, land within an urban development area. The Housing Act 1988 added, as case 4B, land within a housing action trust area (under Pt III of that Act).

[72] Under case 1, a relatively narrow version of the rule was adopted limited to the area of the compulsory purchase order itself. Changes in value, attributable to development (or the prospect of development) for the same purposes on other land within the same order, were to be disregarded, if the development would not have been likely to have been carried out if the authority 'had not acquired and did not propose to acquire any of that land' (see the 1961 Act, s 6(1)(a); Sch 1, case 1). Under the other cases there was in effect a two-stage application of the rule. Thus, for example, where the order was within a designated urban development area there were to be disregarded, not only changes in the value attributable to development for the purposes of the particular order, but also changes attributable to development of other land 'in the course of the development or redevelopment of that area as an urban development area' (see s 6(1)(b); Sch 1, case 4A).

[73] In relation to urban development areas, the 1980 Act introduced by amendment of the 1961 Act (see Sch 1, Pt III) a further refinement, expressed to be 'for the avoidance of doubt'. The effect was that (inter alia) no increase was to be 'excluded from being left out of account', merely because it was attributable to development before the designation of the urban development area, or outside the urban development area, or by a different authority (see Sch 1, para 10). Furthermore, in recognition no doubt of the continued survival of the Pointe Gourde rule (as confirmed by cases such as Wilson's case), the same provision was applied in respect of any increase to be left out of account 'by virtue of any rule of law relating to the assessment of compensation ...' (see Sch 1, para 11).

[74] Unfortunately, although the 1980 Act added to the complexity, it did nothing to address the serious substantive problems of the statutory code. There were two main difficulties. First, s 6 required the prospect of development to be disregarded in relation to 'other land' within the same compulsory purchase order or designation (that is, land other than the 'relevant land' subject to the claim: see s 39(2)); but not, mysteriously, in relation to the relevant land itself. Lord Denning MR offered a possible explanation in Viscount Camrose v Basingstoke Corp [1966] 3 All ER 161 at 164, [1966] 1 WLR 1100 at 1107:

> 'The legislature was aware of the general principle that, in assessing compensation for compulsory acquisition of a defined parcel of land, you do not take into account an increase in value of that parcel of land if the increase is entirely due to the scheme involving the acquisition ... [referring to Pointe Gourde] ... It is left untouched by s. 6(1), but there might be some doubt as to its scope. So the legislature passed s. 6(1) and Sch. 1 in order to make it clear that you were not to take into account any increase due to the development of the other land, i.e., land other than the claimed parcel. I think that the decision in the Pointe Gourde case covers one aspect, and s. 6(1) covers the other ...'

[75] That explanation, with respect, seems to ignore two points. First, the Pointe Gourde case itself (see the facts below) was, in substance, a case about ignoring the development of 'other' land. The quarry was treated (at least for valuation purposes) as a separate parcel, and the issue was whether, in the valuation of that parcel, the prospective development of 'other' land (the naval base) should be disregarded. Thus, it covered the same ground as s 6. Indeed, the draftsman's fault may have been to model the statutory rule too closely on the particular facts of the Pointe Gourde case. Secondly, it assumes that the 'scheme' under the judicial rule is identical to the designations defined by Sch 1. On the facts of Camrose's case itself, where most of the land required for town development was owned by one landowner, it was no doubt reasonable to regard the area of the 'scheme' as identical to the town development area. In other cases, for example, where the particular order is related to a limited project on a small site within an established new town, the answer might be very different.

[76] Section 6 of the 1961 Act cannot therefore be seen as simply an exercise in clarification of the established rule. The two-stage application of the rule, as applied to cases 2 to 4B, was entirely new. The section, as the Lord Chancellor explained at the time, was intended to enunciate and extend the judicial rule in the modern planning context (see 215 HL Official Report (5th series) col 582).

[77] The other substantive problem relates to the scope of the s 6 regime. It is in some respects too narrow and in others too wide. Case 1 is too narrow, in that it confines attention to the area of the particular compulsory purchase order. This makes sense in a case where all the land required for a particular project is included in one order; but not in a case (like Wilson's case) where most of the land has been acquired by agreement, before the compulsory purchase order comes to be made. In such a case the order may relate to only a small part of the 'project' or 'scheme' as it would be defined by the Pointe Gourde rule. There is no obvious reason why the compensation rules applied to the remaining interests should be materially different, merely because the owners have held out for longer.

[78] Conversely, in relation to the other cases, the regime can be unrealistically wide, and unconfined in time. Where the original designation, say of a new town, has been made some years before the particular acquisition, the valuer is apparently required to conduct an exercise of rewriting history in a hypothetical world in which there was no new town. He must let his imagination 'take flight to the clouds' (see Myers v Milton Keynes Development Corp [1974] 2 All ER 1096 at 1102, [1974] 1 WLR 696 at 704 per Lord Denning MR). 'Reconstruction' of planning history in this way was not favoured by the House of Lords, in the analogous context of s 17 of the 1961 Act (certificates of alternative development), because of the impossibly speculative nature of the exercise (see Fletcher Estates (Harlescott) Ltd v Secretary of State for the Environment, Newell and ors (executors of JV Longmore (decd)) v Secretary of State for the Environment [2000] 1 All ER 929 at 940, [2000] 2 AC 307 at 323–324 per Lord Hope of Craighead). However, at least until the matter is revisited by the House of Lords in the present context, the difficulty remains.

[79] In this case, as I have said, neither party has relied specifically on the terms of s 6 or Sch 1. However, they cannot simply be ignored. Apart from r (3), they are the only available indications of Parliament's intentions in relation to what is essentially an issue of policy: that is, in what circumstances does the public interest in promoting particular categories of development justify a departure from strict market value principles? Even if the judicial rule is needed to fill the gaps, and mitigate the anomalies, in a flawed statutory regime, it may still be appropriate to look to the statute for guidance as to the underlying policy.

[80] Thus, in the case of a self-contained compulsory purchase order, under case 1, s 6 can be seen as raising, at least, a presumption that the matters to be disregarded in such a case are confined to the area of the order. Wilson's case itself is a necessary extension of the rule, to deal with circumstances (not apparently contemplated by the draftsman) where the order is not self-contained, but is an integral part of a larger project. On the other hand, where, as in the present case, the order arises out of development within case 4A, the presumption is in favour of a wide application of the rule. Part III, in particular, indicates a policy objective that land required for the purposes of an urban development area should be acquired at values which are not inflated by the designation.

THE ISSUES IN THE APPEAL

[81] I now return to the issues raised by the appeal, following the summary already given. The first raises the most fundamental issue, that is the President's view that the Indian case should not be regarded as good law.

THE INDIAN CASE

[82] I have already referred to the facts of the Indian case, in the context of the discussion of 'market value'. That part is, I think, uncontroversial. The more difficult aspect of the case is in Lord Romer's treatment of the no-scheme rule. The claimants' argument, as I understand it, is that, applying the approach of the Privy Council in the Indian case, the valuer can still take added value given by the barrage project into account, regardless of the no-scheme rule.

[83] As has been seen, the President, having raised the Indian case in argument, decided that it was inconsistent with later cases. The cases to which he referred have been mentioned earlier in this judgment. Mr Holgate fairly submits, however, that in none of them was the Indian case or Lambe v Secretary of State for War [1955] 2 All ER 386, [1955] 2 QB 612 expressly disapproved. Where the Indian case has been mentioned (as by the House of Lords in Rugby Joint Water Board v Foottit [1972] 1 All ER 1057, [1973] AC 202), it has been cited without comment as an illustration of the Pointe Gourde rule.

[84] The relationship of the Indian case with the no-scheme rule as stated in other cases is one of the many unresolved puzzles in this area of the law. It is helpful, in my view, to consider it in the context of the other two leading Privy Council cases, decided before and after it: Fraser v Fraserville City [1917] AC 187 and Pointe Gourde Quarrying and Transport Co Ltd v Sub-Intendent of Crown Lands [1947] AC 565. In doing so, it is essential to see the judgments in the factual contexts in which they were given. It is also necessary to bear in mind that, where in the past cases have come by way of case stated to the Privy Council, the factual context may not always have been as clear as one might expect in a modern case. As it happens, the issue in each of the cases has some parallels with the present case, in that each involved the relationship of a major development (a reservoir in Fraser's case; a harbour in the other two cases) with a linked acquisition (a waterfall in Fraser's case, a water supply in the Indian case, a quarry in the Pointe Gourde case.) By analogy, in this case the barrage is the major development, the nature reserve is the linked acquisition.

[85] In Fraser's case the acquisition in question was of certain river falls (the Grand Falls), authorised by a byelaw of 1909. The authority had in 1907 adopted a byelaw authorising the construction of a reservoir higher up river, which was under construction at the time of the second acquisition. The arbitrator had apparently arrived at his award for the falls, by taking a proportion of the capitalised profits which would result from the extra power generated by the completion of both schemes (that is, a total of 1,200 hp, rather than the 300 hp attributable to the falls on their own: see the French text [1917] AC 187 at 193). The authority (at 188) argued the approach was flawed, first, because it was based on the value to the authority of the completed scheme, and, secondly, that in any event any enhanced value due to the reservoir project should be left out of account altogether, since '[t]he reservoir and the works upon the appellants' land were all one scheme, not two separate schemes' (see at 188). The Privy Council agreed with the court below that the matter had to be remitted on the first ground, because the arbitrator's approach was wholly erroneous. On the second issue, Lord Buckmaster (at 194) summarised the principle arising from Re Lucas and Chesterfield Gas and Water Board [1909] 1 KB 16, [1908–10] All ER Rep 251 and subsequent cases as follows:

> '... the value to be ascertained is the value to the seller of the property in its actual condition at the time of expropriation with all its existing advantages and with all its possibilities, excluding any advantage due to the carrying out of the scheme for which the property is compulsorily acquired, the question of what is the scheme being a question of fact for the arbitrator in each case.' (My emphasis.)

[86] Unfortunately, the Privy Council did not itself indicate how the question was to be answered, nor give any further guidance to the arbitrator. The words in emphasis have been relied on in subsequent cases, including Wilson v Liverpool City Council [1971] 1 All ER 628, [1971] 1 WLR 302 (see above), as indicating that defining the scheme is an issue of pure fact. However, the context is important. The question was not an open-ended one, but simply as to whether two defined schemes, linked in purpose but authorised by separate statutory instruments, were to be regarded as one. However, the mere fact that the two instruments were separated in time was clearly not regarded as fatal to the argument that they were one scheme. As will be seen, this point is of some relevance in the present case.

[87] Passing over the Indian case for the moment, one comes to the Pointe Gourde case itself. The background was an agreement between the United Kingdom and the United States governments in March 1941, for leasing to the United States land required for naval and military bases. The particular land at Pointe Gourde in Trinidad was acquired for a naval base under powers in the Land Acquisition Ordinance 1941. Part of the land so acquired included a quarry with a large quantity of good limestone. As far as one can infer from the facts as stated (at 566), the quarry and the land for the base were included in the same compulsory acquisition. (Since the hearing I have obtained the Privy Council records of the case. They show that the acquisition from the company included 'two several parcels of land' one of 141 acres, and one of 10 acres, the latter being the quarry. The case stated does not reveal in terms what the 141 acres was to be used for, but, referring to the two parcels, states merely that the said lands were 'required by the United States for the establishment of a naval base'.)

[88] The stated case showed that the land had 'a special suitability or adaptability' for producing quarry products and had a market value for that purpose before the acquisition. A figure of $86,000 was awarded for the value of the quarry as a going concern. The issue which came to the Privy Council concerned an additional sum of $15,000 explained in the case as follows (at 567):

> 'The tribunal considered that the market value of the quarry land and business would be increased if the United States needs were supplied from this quarry land on a commercial basis as greater prospective profits might be expected.'

The figure of $15,000 represented (at 568) 'the measure of the loss of that element of prospective extra profit'. The only issue raised by the case stated was whether this additional value should be excluded under the equivalent of r (3). On this the Crown failed, the Privy Council holding that the rule was directed to the quality of the land itself, not the products of the land.

[89] However, they succeeded under the no-scheme rule, even though it seems not to have been discussed in any detail in argument (at 571). Lord MacDermott (at 572) restated the rule in the words which have become its most familiar formulation:

> 'It is well settled that compensation for a compulsory acquisition of land cannot include an increase in value which is entirely due to the scheme underlying the acquisition.'

The words 'scheme underlying the acquisition' were new; but it is clear from the context that they were not intended to differ from Fraser's case ('the scheme for which the property is compulsorily acquired'). Lord MacDermott rejected the company's argument that the relevant scheme was simply the acquisition of the quarry land. He said (at 573):

> 'The case stated finds that the lands acquired were "required by the United States for the establishment of a naval base in Trinidad." That being so, the nature of the scheme of this acquisition is clear ...'

As I understand it, this is not to be read as implying that, simply because the quarry itself was being acquired for the purposes connected with the construction of the base, that was sufficient to justify exclusion of the additional value. The 'lands' to which he was referring were the whole of the lands comprised in the acquisition, which, as appeared from the case, included the land required for the base itself, as well as the quarry. Thus, both were included in a single act of acquisition.

[90] Historically, the Indian case comes between these two cases. I have already outlined the facts. The difficulty arises because, in one passage ([1939] 2 All ER 317 at 326–327, [1939] AC 302 at 319–320), Lord Romer seems to have adopted a very narrow interpretation of the 'scheme'. He was criticising the judgment of Fletcher Moulton LJ in the Lucas case on the issue of 'special suitability' (see above); and, in particular, his suggestion that, where special value existed only for the acquiring authority, it should be left out of account, because 'to do otherwise would ... allow the existence of the scheme to enhance the value of the land to be purchased under it'. Lord Romer regarded that contention as unsupported by authority. He continued:

> 'It must, of course, be conceded that the existence of the scheme must not be allowed to enhance the price, if by "scheme" is meant the fact that compulsory powers of acquisition have been obtained for the purpose of carrying into effect a particular scheme for the profitable use of the potentiality. The valuation must always be made as though no such powers had been acquired, and the only use that can be made of the scheme is as evidence that the acquiring authority can properly be regarded as possible purchasers. Their Lordships have some difficulty, however, in seeing why the taking into consideration of the fact that the special value exists for those purchasers only should be said to be allowing the existence of the scheme to enhance the value of the lands. The only difference which the scheme has made is that the acquiring authority, who before the scheme were possible purchasers only, have become purchasers who are under a pressing need to acquire the land, and that is a circumstance that is never allowed to enhance the value.' (My emphasis.)

On the other hand, Lord Romer rejected the use of the word 'scheme' to connote 'the intention formed by the acquiring authority of exploiting the potentiality of the land', since that would mean that, even if there were more than one potential purchaser, all their intentions would equally have to be disregarded.

[91] At first sight, this passage suggests a very narrow definition of the word 'scheme', as meaning no more than the obtaining of compulsory powers. If this was intended as a general statement, it would indeed, as the President said, be impossible to reconcile with other cases, before and since. Even if one goes back to one of the earliest cases on the no-scheme rule, Stebbing v Metropolitan Board of Works (1870) LR 6 QB 37, it was not the compulsory acquisition itself which gave added value, but the authority's statutory power, having acquired the land, to convert it from a burial ground to secular use. Similarly, in more recent cases, the added value resulted from the project as a whole, not just the existence of compulsory powers: in the Pointe Gourde case, it was the potential use of the quarry products for the naval base; in Wilson's case it was the authority's investment in infrastructure.

[92] In responding to the President's comment on the case, the first point to note is that, although Fraser v Fraserville City [1917] AC 187 was cited in the Indian case, and both were cited in the Pointe Gourde case, there was no suggestion in any of them that the Privy Council thought that it was applying a different principle. On the contrary, in the Indian case, Lord Romer cited Lord Buckmaster's statement (in Fraser's case) of the no-scheme principle without comment, but observed ([1939] 2 All ER 317 at 327, [1939] AC 302 at 321) that there was 'no reference whatsoever to the present question'. The 'present question' was, not the scope of the no-scheme rule as such, but the difference of view between the majority and minority in the Lucas case over the application of the 'special suitability' principle.

[93] Secondly, on the facts of the Indian case itself, it was understandable that a very narrow view was taken of the 'scheme'. The harbour project had begun six years before the emergence of the malaria problems, which led in due course to the acquisition of the subject land to provide a fresh supply of water. As appears from the reported arguments ([1939] AC 302 at 306–307), the authority claimed that the scheme was the harbour project or the malarial scheme, while the claimant relied on the acquisition of the subject land as a separate scheme. Although Lord Romer did not in terms address that difference, he described the 'scheme' with some precision ('the acquisition ... of the shallow basin forming the catchment area of the spring, the site of the spring itself, and a narrow strip of land below the spring'); he distinguished that from the 'public purpose for which the land was needed', which was identified in the notification as 'the execution of anti-malarial works' ([1939] 2 All ER 317 at 320, [1939] AC 302 at 310). The implication, therefore, is that he accepted the claimant's case. It was reasonable, on the facts of that case, to speak of the 'scheme' being limited to the fact of compulsory acquisition, since, as his description makes clear, little else was needed to bring the water supply into use.

[94] In the Pointe Gourde case, by contrast, the quarry and the land for the naval base were acquired at the same time, as part of the same act of compulsory acquisition, and only a month after the agreement between the United States and United Kingdom governments. On those facts, it was not surprising that they were regarded as part of one scheme. Fraser's case, on the facts, comes somewhere between the two, in that there were two separate acquisitions, separated in time, but the gap was much shorter than in the Indian case. It was a question of fact for the tribunal to determine whether they were to be treated as a single scheme for the purpose of the rule.

[95] In conclusion, it is not in my view necessary to follow the President along the unattractive course of treating a fully-argued Privy Council judgment, which has stood without dissent for more than 60 years, as simply wrong. The statements must be taken in context. The cases can be reconciled, if they are seen as turning on their particular facts. This conclusion does not help the appellants in this case. Although I agree with them that the President went too far in treating the Indian case as no longer authoritative, it still leaves them on the wrong side of their highest hurdle, which is the President's conclusion as to the nature of the scheme on the facts of this case.

[96] Before leaving the Indian case, I should mention one further point raised by the respondents in this case. They suggest that, on the facts of the Indian case, a different decision would have been reached in this country by virtue of r (3) (which was not part of the Indian legislation). It is true that r (3) did not apply in India. However, assuming the narrow interpretation given to that rule by the Privy Council in the Pointe Gourde case (see above), it would not have assisted the Crown, since in both cases the suitability in question was that of a product of the land (in one, the quarry stone; in the other, the water), rather than of the land itself. (I should also add that I have not thought it necessary to refer in any detail to Lambe v Secretary of State for War [1955] 2 All ER 386, [1955] 2 QB 612, in which the Indian case was expressly followed by the Court of Appeal, because the facts were so different.)

PUBLIC INTEREST TEST

[97] The other issues raised by the appeal can be dealt with more shortly. First, the appellants criticise the President's formulation of a 'public interest' test which they say is not supported by authority. As I read the relevant passage of this part of the President's reasoning (quoted above in full), the test is better described as a 'public purpose' test, than a 'public interest' test. He said:

> 'The principle is that any effect upon the value of the land acquired arising from the public purpose, or public purposes, prompting the acquisition, whether from their adoption by the authority or from their implementation, is to be disregarded. A scheme or proposal is the embodiment of the public purpose, or public purposes, concerned.'

The public purpose which he identified was 'the purpose of providing the compensatory nature reserve'.

[98] On this point, I see some force in the appellants' criticism. Although, as the President later recognised, the 'public purpose' may be relevant in defining the scheme, it does not provide a substitute for the conventional test. The 'purpose' of any project may be defined at different levels. In the Lucas case [1909] 1 KB 16, [1908–10] All ER Rep 251, the immediate purpose of the acquisition was the authority's scheme to construct a reservoir; the ultimate purpose was to provide an improved water supply for the Chesterfield area. The immediate purpose was required to be left out of consideration, but not the ultimate purpose. Additional value attributable to the possibility of using the land to improve the water supply was held to be a proper consideration.

[99] So, in this case, the insertion of the word 'compensatory', in the President's definition of the purpose, seems to beg the relevant question. Clearly, if one has to ignore the use of the nature reserve for a 'compensatory' purpose, then it could be of no relevance to the barrage project, since that is the only purpose for which it is required. On the same approach, the purpose in the Lucas case might have been defined as that of 'providing a water-supply reservoir', with the result that the water needs of the area would have had to be left out of account. However, that is not how the court dealt with the matter. As we have seen above, r (3) was intended to go further than the no-scheme rule itself, in that, where it applied, the public purpose would be excluded altogether. As Mr Holgate submitted, on the President's interpretation there would have been no need for r (3) at all.

[100] Thus, although identifying the purpose of the acquisition may be relevant to the definition of the 'scheme', it is not a substitute for it. However, since the President went on to consider the scope of the 'scheme', the criticism of the first part of his reasoning is not enough to get the appellants home.

NOT A SCHEME OF THE ACQUIRING AUTHORITY

[101] The argument here is that the only scheme which could be relevant is one of LAW itself, or one to which it is 'a party'.

[102] In considering this argument, it is necessary to bear in mind the somewhat unusual role of LAW, mentioned above, as a body whose main function was to acquire land. Thus, unlike most compulsory acquisitions, which are by public authorities for their own substantive purposes (such as provision of roads or housing), LAW's function was normally to acquire the land for the purpose of development projects initiated by others.

[103] It would be odd if this special role, which had more to do with the mechanics of acquisition than its substance, were to affect materially the basis on which compensation is assessed. One must also bear in mind that the Pointe Gourde principle works in reverse. If the value of land had been diminished by a public scheme for which LAW was acquiring the land, it would be unfair if the owner could be forced to sell at the blighted value, merely because the scheme was not that of LAW itself.

[104] The high-point of the appellant's case on this point seems to be the definition of the scheme, in one of the cases, as 'a project on the part of the authority concerned to acquire land ...' (see Birmingham DC v Morris & Jacombs Ltd (1976) 33 P & CR 27 at 33). This was cited with approval by the Court of Appeal in Bird v Wakefield Metropolitan DC (1978) 37 P & CR 478 at 487 per Browne LJ, where two authorities were involved, but the test was held to be satisfied because—

> 'although [the county council's project] was originally in form a scheme by an authority different from the acquiring authority, which also had a scheme of its own, it became, by what the tribunal calls "merger", though possibly that is not the right word, a scheme to which the acquiring authority was party and not a scheme by a different authority.' (My emphasis.)

[105] Here, it is said, the statute, and the agreement with the CBDC, made clear that LAW was neither a partner nor an agent of the Welsh Office or the CBDC. LAW was at pains, throughout the procedure, to preserve its independence from the other authorities involved. Accordingly, it could not be said have been a 'party' to the barrage scheme in any relevant sense.

[106] The President ([2001] 1 EGLR 185 at 194) rejected this submission:

> 'In neither of the cases relied upon by Mr Holgate was the court, in my judgment, holding that a project could only be a scheme for the purposes of the Pointe Gourde rule if it were the project of the acquiring authority alone.'

[107] As he observed, even in the Pointe Gourde case itself the acquisition was by the United Kingdom government, not for its own purposes, but for those of the United States Navy. He also gave the example of a large development proposal, for which land assembly was carried out partly by the planning authority, and partly (in respect of the proposed roads) by the highway authority:

> 'I cannot see that whether the road element of the development is, or is not, a separate scheme must, as a matter of law, depend upon the particular acquisition route that is followed.'

[108] I agree. Mr Holgate submits that the tribunal has—

> 'disregarded the true nature of the relationship between the various bodies involved ...' including the extent to which the acquiring authority was anxious to preserve its independence from the other bodies.'

However, I do not see this as raising any question of law. As the President said, such issues were simply part of 'the considerations to be taken into account in the factual exercise of defining the scheme.'

INTEGRAL PART

[109] This seems to me the appellants' strongest point. The President's decision rested on his view of 'the essential nature of the acquisition as one element in the barrage scheme.' In so far as this was a conclusion of fact, it is not open to challenge in this court. However, Mr Holgate's submission is simple. If, as a matter of law, an essential feature of the 'scheme' is that the subject land should be 'an integral part' of it (see Director of Buildings and Lands v Shun Fung Ironworks Ltd [1995] 1 All ER 846, [1995] 2 AC 111), this could not have occurred before November 1995. That was when the decision was first made to proceed with a nature reserve which included the claimant's land. By that time, the barrage scheme had been approved by Parliament, and work had begun. The proposals for the nature reserve on the Gwent Levels site could not therefore be regarded as in any way 'integral' to that scheme. Although they arose out of the barrage scheme, they were a distinct project, and should be so regarded for compensation purposes.

[110] He also emphasises the unfairness of treating this as part of the original scheme, since the claimants were not involved in any way in that process, and therefore had no opportunity to object. He contrasts their position with the owners of farmland respectively at Wentlooge and Redwick, whose objections resulted in the proposals in those areas being abandoned. Although the claimants had a theoretical right to object at the inquiry in 1997, they did not pursue it, because by that time LAW had acquired 80% of the site, and the barrage scheme was too far advanced for there to be any realistic alternative. I should say immediately that this point, though attracting sympathy for the claimants, does not in my view have any relevance to the principles on which compensation is to be assessed.

[111] I agree with the submission that a prerequisite of the 'scheme' is the identification of the subject land as part of it. However, this does not, I think, impose a temporal limitation on the matters which can be regarded as included in the scheme. So to hold would be inconsistent with the decision in Fraser's case. In that case, the acquisition of land for the reservoir had been authorised in 1907, and it was already under construction when the subject land was acquired under a separate instrument two years later. However, that fact was not held, as a matter of law, to exclude the possibility of their being treated as a single scheme when the second acquisition was made. Although the combined scheme cannot have come into existence until the subject land was identified as part of it in 1909, it was open to the arbitrator thereafter to treat it as a single scheme for the purposes of the rule.

[112] Applying that thinking to the present case, the mere fact that the claimant's land was not identified until October 1995, when the barrage project was already under way, does not as a matter of law prevent it being treated thereafter as part of the same project. That being so, the decision on the facts was one for the President, and the appellant can show no error of law in his approach.

DEPENDENCY

[113] The passage of the President's decision to which this ground of appeal is directed is as follows:

> '... the implementation of the barrage scheme, as regards the permanent inundation of Cardiff Bay, was, I find, dependent upon the acquisition and development of land for the Gwent Levels nature reserve.'

[114] Mr Holgate says that this finding is inconsistent with the evidence. He refers for example to a statement made by the Secretary of State for Wales (Mr Hague) in the House of Commons on 6 December 1995 that the impoundment of the Bay was 'not conditional upon completion of [a bird reserve, although] the intention [was to bring about that result]' (see 268 HC Official Report (6th series) written answers col 276; Mr Holgate's emphasis). He also submits that 'dependency' is not a relevant test.

[115] Mr Holgate's submission on this point seems to sit rather oddly with the assertion (in the particulars of the claims) of the land's 'indispensable status vis-à-vis the Cardiff Development Scheme'. In any event, I see no error of law in the President's approach. Mr Hague's statement was only one of many pieces of evidence as to the thinking of the various parties at this time. Taken overall, there was ample material on which the President could reasonably conclude that, if the United Kingdom government had defaulted on its commitment to provide compensatory land (for which by the end of 1995 Gwent Levels was the most likely contender), the Commission would have been expected to take enforcement action, which could well have included delaying impoundment. In any event, as I understand it, he was not using 'dependency' in any precise legal sense, but simply as emphasising the close factual link between the Gwent Levels project and the barrage.

CONCLUSION

[116] The right to compensation for compulsory acquisition is a basic property right. It is unfortunate that ascertaining the rules upon which compensation is to be assessed can involve such a tortuous journey, through obscure statutes and apparently conflicting case law, as has been necessary in this case. There can be few stronger candidates on the statute book for urgent reform, or simple repeal, than s 6 of and Sch 1 to the 1961 Act. The Human Rights Act 1998 does not impinge directly on the issues in this case, but it underlines the importance of coherence and certainty in this area of the law.

[117] However, in most cases, identifying the 'scheme' or 'project' should involve no particular difficulty if one bears in mind the analogy of the statutory authorisations in the early cases. Normally the nature and scope of the project will be evident from the formal resolution or decision of the authority responsible. This case is rather more complex, because of the different authorities involved, and the delays in identifying the relevant land. However, by the time of Mr Hague's statement to the House in January 1996, the role of the claimants' land was clearly identified. It was open to the President to find on the facts that the nature reserve for which that land was needed was an integral part of the barrage project. Further, although the President did not rely on this point, the result is consistent with the policy of the 1961 Act. The project for the nature reserve is directly linked to the purposes of the urban development area, which is a case specifically selected by the Act for a wide application of the rule. The claimants accordingly are entitled to 'nature reserve value', but not to 'barrage inhibition value'.

[118] For all these reasons, the appeal fails.

LAWS LJ.

[119] I agree.

SCHIEMANN LJ.

[120] I also agree.

Appeal dismissed.

Kate O'Hanlon Barrister.

Knight v Rochdale Healthcare NHS Trust and others

[2003] EWHC 1831 (QB)

QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION

CRANE J

9, 23 JULY 2003

Limitation of action – When time begins to run – Contribution proceedings – Patient bringing action against surgeon – Parties settling proceedings and subsequently embodying settlement agreement in consent order – Surgeon bringing contribution proceedings in respect of liability to patient – Whether time running for limitation purposes from date of agreement or date of consent order – Civil Liability (Contribution) Act 1978 – Limitation Act 1980, s 10.

The claimant surgeon had been the defendant to proceedings for negligence brought against him by a former patient. Those proceedings were settled by an agreement, reached on 24 October 2000, under which the surgeon agreed to pay a sum of money to the former patient. Although the agreement did not require a consent order to be made before it took effect, the agreement was embodied in such an order on 8 November 2000. On 1 November 2002 the surgeon issued contribution proceedings under the Civil Liability (Contribution) Act 1978 against various defendants, seeking an indemnity in respect of his liability to the former patient. Section 10(1)[a] of the Limitation Act 1980 provided that, 'Where [under the 1978 Act] any person becomes entitled' to recover contribution in respect of any damage from any other person, there was a limitation period of two years from the date on which that right accrued. If the person in question were held liable in respect of that damage by a 'judgment' given in any civil proceedings, s 10(3) provided that the right had accrued on the date on which the judgment was given. Section 10(4) provided that if, in any case not within sub-s (3), the person in question agreed to make any payment to one or more persons in compensation for that damage, the date on which the right accrued was the 'earliest date on which the amount ... is agreed' between him and the person to whom the payment was to be made. On the hearing of a preliminary issue, the court was required to determine whether the limitation period ran from the date of the agreement, in which case the contribution proceedings would have been time-barred, or from the date of the consent order, in which case the proceedings would have been brought in time.

Held – Where a firm agreement was made time started to run, for the purposes of s 10 of the 1980 Act, at that moment unless the agreement required the making of a consent order before it took effect. Although Parliament could have decided that a consent order should restart the clock, there were insufficiently clear words to indicate that it had done so. Indeed, the words in sub-s (1), 'Where ... any person becomes entitled', and the words in sub-s (4), 'the earliest date on which the amount ... is agreed', suggested that the crucial moment was the first moment when liability arose. It was tidy to conclude that sub-ss (3) and (4) dealt separately with cases decided by a court and cases of agreement. Accordingly, the relevant date for any liability under the 1978 Act was the date of the agreement on 24 October 2000 (see [24], [26], below).

a Section 10 is set out at [15], below

Notes

For the time limit for claiming contribution, see 28 Halsbury's Laws (4th edn reissue) paras 912–913.

For the Civil Liability (Contribution) Act 1978, see 13 Halsbury's Statutes (4th edn) (2000 reissue) 604.

For the Limitation Act 1980, s 10, see 24 Halsbury's Statutes (4th edn) (1998 reissue) 707.

Case referred to in judgment

Onslow v IRC (1890) 25 QBD 465, CA.

Case referred to in skeleton arguments

Financial Services Authority v Rourke [2001] All ER (D) 266 (Oct), [2001] 46 LS Gaz R 36.

Applications

Martin Knight, the claimant in proceedings brought against the defendants, Rochdale Healthcare NHS Trust, the National Health Service Litigation Authority and the Secretary of State for Health, under the Civil Liability (Contribution) Act 1978, applied for permission to amend his particulars of claim by abandoning the claim against the third defendant and by pleading a claim for breach of contract against the first defendant. The first and second defendants, supported by the claimant, applied for an order to try as a preliminary issue the question whether the claim under the 1978 Act was barred by the Limitation Act 1980. The second defendant applied to strike out the claim against it. The facts are set out in the judgment.

George Thomas (instructed by the Medical Defence Union) for the claimant.
Angus McCullough (instructed by Capsticks) for the first and second defendants.

Cur adv vult

23 July 2003. The following judgment was delivered.

CRANE J.

GENERAL

[1] In this action the claimant, a consultant orthopaedic surgeon, seeks an indemnity in respect of his liability to a former patient, Mrs Smettem-Minson. In previous proceedings she claimed damages for negligence from the claimant. That action was settled for a figure of £700,000 plus costs.

[2] The first application before me was an application by the claimant for permission to amend the particulars of claim. By that amendment the claim against the third defendant is abandoned. The claim for damages against the second defendant is abandoned. The other principal change is to plead a breach of contract by the first defendant as an alternative to his claim under the Civil Liability (Contribution) Act 1978. The defendants neither consented to nor opposed the amendments. I gave permission, since the claimant should be able to put his claim in the alternative way.

[3] The second application was an application by the defendants, supported by the claimant, for an order that there be tried as a preliminary issue the question whether the claim under the 1978 Act is barred by the Limitation Act 1980. Although the amendment of the particulars of claim would leave the claimant with a claim not barred by the 1980 Act, the proposed issue is both important and eminently capable of separate resolution. I agreed with the parties that it should be tried as a preliminary issue and that I should try it forthwith, as both parties wished.

[4] The third application was that of the defendants to strike out the claim against the second defendant. I deal with that straight away.

[5] The claim against the second defendant is now, as a result of the amendment, simply one for a declaration that the treatment of Mrs Smettem-Minson fell within the category of treatment covered by the NHS Indemnity Scheme. Mr George Thomas, counsel for the claimant, explained that the claimant wished to establish for the future that the interpretation of the indemnity arrangements asserted by the second defendant was wrong. That would not offer any advantage to the claimant in the present action, but would be of potential benefit to him and perhaps other consultants in connection with other claims. I accept the arguments of Mr Angus McCullough, counsel for the defendants, in making this application. I agree that it is very difficult to discern a cause of action against the second defendant. Moreover, even if the court can in principle allow the action to continue and has a discretion to grant a declaration, I see no advantage to the claimant, or indeed anyone else, in the second defendant remaining a party. They will in any event continue to handle the litigation on behalf of the first defendant. The court will consider the availability of an indemnity in the circumstances of this case. In so far as the arrangements for the treatment of this patient were typical, the conclusions of the court will be available. To embody those conclusions in a declaration against the second defendant assists no one.

[6] Subject to any submissions of counsel as to the form of the order, I propose to strike out the statement of case as against the second defendant under CPR 3.4(2)(a) as disclosing no reasonable grounds for bringing a claim against the second defendant.

THE PRELIMINARY ISSUE

[7] An agreement to settle the original action was reached on 24 October 2000. A consent order was made, embodying the agreement, on 8 November 2000. The limitation period for claims under the 1978 Act is two years, by virtue of s 10 of the 1980 Act. The present claim was issued on 1 November 2002. It is therefore of crucial importance whether the limitation period runs from the date of the agreement or the date of the consent order.

[8] The agreement was recorded in a letter from Mrs Smettem-Minson's solicitors, which read:

> 'The claimant accepts your offer of settlement of £700,000 plus costs. The Certificate of Total Benefits shows that there are no deductible benefits. We have this morning notified the Court, Counsel and witnesses that the action has been settled. We enclose a draft Consent Order, which is based on a lump sum payment of damages. In the event that our client would be interested in a Structured Settlement (the matter in respect of which we are not competent to advise her) would your clients be prepared to pay the whole or part of the damages in that way? We have arranged for our client to have independent advice and we await hearing from you further therefore.'

[9] The offer is not before me and it is not suggested that it is necessary to look at it. The suggestion of a structured settlement went no further. The consent order read:

'CONSENT ORDER

Upon reading the consent of solicitors for the claimant and solicitors for the defendant, it is hereby ordered, by consent as follows: 1. That the defendant do pay to the claimant's solicitors, within 21 days, the figure of £700,000 in full settlement of the claimant's claim for damages against the defendant. 2. That in addition, the defendant do pay the claimant's costs, to be agreed or made the subject of a detailed assessment on the standard basis. 3. That there be legal aid taxation of the client's costs. 4. That upon payment of the above written sums the defendant be discharged in respect of the claimant's claim herein.'

There follow the signatures of both solicitors. The order was duly initialled, presumably by the district judge. It is not suggested that the order as submitted differed from the draft enclosed with the letter (which I have not seen), but in any event Mr Thomas did not rely on any difference between the agreement as embodied in the letter and the precise terms of the consent order.

[10] The history of the legislation is of interest.

[11] Section 4(2) of the Limitation Act 1963, dealing with the time limit for contribution between tortfeasors, read:

'For the purposes of this section the date on which a right to recover contribution in respect of any damage accrues to a tortfeasor (in this subsection referred to as "the relevant date") shall be ascertained as follows, that is to say—(a) if the tortfeasor is held liable in respect of that damage by a judgment given in any civil proceedings, or an award made on any arbitration, the relevant date shall be the date on which the judgment is given, or the date of the award, as the case may be; (b) if, in any case not falling within the preceding paragraph, the tortfeasor admits liability in favour of one or more persons in respect of that damage, the relevant date shall be the earliest date on which the amount to be paid by him in discharge of that liability is agreed by or on behalf of the tortfeasor and that person, or each of those persons, as the case may be; and for the purposes of this subsection no account shall be taken of any judgment or award given or made on appeal in so far as it varies the amount of damages awarded against the tortfeasor.'

[12] The 1978 Act made new provision for contribution 'from any other person liable in respect of the same damage' (see s 1(1)). Section 1 provided for liability arising from an agreement and for liability arising from a judgment, in the following terms:

'(4) A person who has made or agreed to make any payment in bona fide settlement or compromise of any claim made against him in respect of any damage (including a payment into court which has been accepted) shall be entitled to recover contribution in accordance with this section without regard to whether or not he himself is or ever was liable in respect of that damage, provided, however, that he would have been liable assuming that the factual basis of the claim against him could be established.

(5) A judgment given in any action brought in any part of the United Kingdom by or on behalf of the person who suffered the damage in question against any person from whom contribution is sought under this section shall be conclusive in the proceedings for contribution as to any issue determined by that judgment in favour of the person from whom the contribution is sought.'

[13] Mr Thomas accepted that the inclusion of the word 'determined' in sub-s (5) implies a decision of a court. Thus a judgment entered by consent would not be within sub-s (5). Although at first sight there would be as much reason for such a judgment to be conclusive as there would be for a judgment resulting from a court's decision, it is understandable that cases of consent should fall within sub-s (4) because of the requirement in that subsection of bona fides.

[14] Schedule 1, para 6 of the 1978 Act, substituted a new s 4 for s 4 of the 1963 Act. The new s 4 was in most respects identical for present purposes with s 10 of the 1980 Act.

[15] Section 10 of the 1980 Act is headed 'Special time limit for claiming contribution'. It reads (my emphases):

'(1) Where under section 1 of the Civil Liability (Contribution) Act 1978 any person becomes entitled to a right to recover contribution in respect of any damage from any other person, no action to recover contribution by virtue of that right shall be brought after the expiration of two years from the date on which that right accrued.

(2) For the purposes of this section the date on which a right to recover contribution in respect of any damage accrues to any person (referred to below in this section as "the relevant date") shall be ascertained as provided in subsections (3) and (4) below.

(3) If the person in question is held liable in respect of that damage—(a) by a judgment given in any civil proceedings; or (b) by an award on any arbitration; the relevant date shall be the date on which the judgment is given, or the date of the award (as the case may be). For the purposes of this subsection no account shall be taken of any judgment or award given or made on appeal in so far as it varies the amount of damages awarded against the person in question.

(4) If, in any case not within subsection (3) above, the person in question makes or agrees to make any payment to one or more persons in compensation for that damage (whether he admits any liability in respect of the damage or not), the relevant date shall be the earliest date on which the amount to be paid by him is agreed between him (or his representative) and the person (or each of the persons, as the case may be) to whom the payment is to be made.

(5) An action to recover contribution shall be one to which sections 28, 32 and 35 of this Act apply, but otherwise Parts II and III of this Act (except sections 34, 37 and 38) shall not apply for the purposes of this section.'

[16] Mr McCullough submitted that this consent order was not a 'judgment' within the meaning of sub-s (3). Mr Thomas submitted the contrary. I shall return to this issue.

[17] Mr McCullough also relied on wording within the section. He pointed out that sub-s (1) speaks of a person becoming entitled and both sub-ss (1) and (2) speak of the right accruing. He submitted that this requires the court to concentrate on the first moment that the right accrues. He relied particularly on the words 'held liable' and 'a judgment given' as suggesting a decision of a court. Although he conceded that a default judgment might fall within the subsection, such a judgment would rest not on the consent of the parties, but on a conclusion of the court, albeit one based on a failure by one party to comply with the rules. The same may well apply in my view to a judgment entered under CPR 14.4. Although the reference to an award does not include equivalent words to 'a judgment given', the words 'held liable' apply to awards.

[18] Mr Thomas relied particularly on the words in sub-s (4) 'in any case not within subsection (3) above'. He argued that the court must ask itself whether there was an agreement within the remainder of sub-s (4). If there was, the court must ask itself whether the case is nevertheless one that falls within sub-s (3); if it does, the case is taken out of sub-s (4). Mr McCullough submitted that the initial words of sub-s (4) simply mean 'in all other cases'.

[19] I must consider first whether this was a 'judgment' within the meaning of s 10(3). I was referred to Supreme Court Practice (1979 edn) vol I, p 659 (para 42/1/5) and the equivalent passage in the current White Book (Civil Procedure (April 2003 edn)) vol I, pp 919–920 (para 40.1.1). In both those paragraphs the suggestion appears to be made that even by about 1890 it was doubtful whether there was still a distinction between a judgment and an order. However, the judgment of Lord Esher MR in Onslow v IRC (1890) 25 QBD 465 seems to me to maintain the distinction. In the recent White Book, it is stated that the definitions in the Supreme Court Act 1981 and the County Courts Act 1984 tended to maintain the distinction, but the actual definitions do not appear to do so. It is true, however, that the RSC maintained the distinction, although not entirely systematically, and that the different words have been carried over into the CPR. I accept that this has been done 'apparently unthinkingly', as the White Book suggests.

[20] I was referred to Stroud's Judicial Dictionary of Words and Phrases (6th edn, 2000) and to Words and Phrases Legally Defined (3rd edn, 1988), but it was not suggested that the relevant entries are of much assistance. Neither counsel referred me to any authority or textbook, apart from these and the passages in the editions of the White Book.

[21] One important reason for distinguishing a judgment from an order disappeared when the definition of 'judgment' for the purposes of enforcement came to include 'any judgment or order' (see s 12(1) of the Administration of Justice Act 1920). However, that definition does not assist the claimant here, precisely because it was inserted to ensure that the problem was circumvented.

[22] I accept that in 1978, when the section from which the present s 10 of the 1980 Act was derived was passed, a 'judgment' in such an Act would not necessarily include any court order. The use of the word, especially in conjunction with the words 'held liable' and 'given', clearly points to the kind of order by which liability is imposed. However, that conclusion does not dispose of the matter because it is accepted by both counsel that the description 'consent order' is not necessarily conclusive. In other words, if this was in reality a 'judgment', it would not cease to be so by calling it an 'order'. Although a consent order in the form used here is the usual form in such circumstances, the parties could have agreed that judgment be entered by consent and so drafted the document placed before the court. In my view this consent order, a final order in the litigation, could properly described as a 'judgment' for the purposes of sub-s (3). a

[23] Thus while I place some weight on the words 'held liable' and 'given' I do not, for the reasons I have given, regard the use of the word 'judgment' as in itself conclusive. At one stage of the hearing I was impressed by the argument based on the words 'in any case not within subsection (3) above' and not wholly convinced by Mr McCullough's suggested meaning, since that suggestion seemed to give rise to the same problem. If sub-ss (3) and (4) are mutually exclusive, there seems to be little need for the words 'in any case not within subsection (3) above'. b

[24] However, in the end I prefer Mr McCullough's interpretation of s 10. My principal reason for doing so is if a firm agreement is made, as here, time undoubtedly starts to run at that moment. It would be different if the agreement required the making of a consent order before it took effect. Neither party so contends here. Although Parliament could have decided that a consent order should restart the clock, there are insufficiently clear words to indicate that. Indeed the words in sub-s (1) 'Where ... any person becomes entitled' and the words in sub-s (4) 'the earliest date on which the amount ... is agreed' suggest that the crucial moment is the first moment when liability arises. It is tidy to conclude that sub-ss (3) and (4) deal separately with cases decided by a court (or arbitrator) and cases of agreement. c d

[25] This conclusion produces the result that in most circumstances the contrast between sub-ss 1(4) and (5) of the 1978 Act is mirrored in what are now sub-ss 10(3) and (4) of the 1980 Act. e

[26] My conclusion on the preliminary issue is that the relevant date for any liability under the 1978 Act was the date of the agreement on 24 October 2000. I invite agreement or submissions from counsel as to the form of the orders required. f

Order accordingly.

James Wilson Barrister (NZ).

Adamson v Halifax plc

[2002] EWCA Civ 1134

COURT OF APPEAL, CIVIL DIVISION

POTTER LJ AND SIR MURRAY STUART-SMITH

16, 30 JULY 2002

Damages – Measure of damages – Breach of statutory duty – Mortgage – Duty of building society mortgagee to exercise power of sale with reasonable care ensuring best price reasonably obtainable – Sale at undervalue by first mortgagee – Mortgagor awarded damages for breach of statutory duty – Whether amount of damages including secured sum owed by mortgagor to second incumbrancer but unclaimed by second incumbrancer.

The claimant took out a mortgage on her flat with the building society predecessor of the defendant bank. Another bank obtained judgment against her for a debt of some £5,000 and obtained a charging order on the flat. The claimant fell into arrears with her mortgage payments and the defendant took possession of the flat and sold it for £17,000. It accounted to the bank for £22, which was all that was left from the proceeds of sale after satisfying its own claim. In the exercise of its power of sale the defendant had a duty under para 1(1)(a)[a] of Sch 4 to the Building Societies Act 1986 to take reasonable care to ensure that the price at which the flat was sold was the best price that could reasonably be obtained. The claimant considered that the defendant had sold the flat at an undervalue and brought proceedings against it in the county court. The judge held that the defendant had been in breach of its statutory duty and that the true value of the flat, at the time of sale, had been £23,000. However, he awarded the claimant only £1,000 on the basis that had the flat been sold for its true value the defendant would have had to satisfy the bank, as second incumbrancer, before accounting to the claimant. The bank had not made any attempt to enforce its judgment against the claimant nor had it made any claim against the defendant for damage to its own interest in consequence of the sale at an undervalue. At the date of the county court judgment some five months of the limitation period during which the bank could claim against the defendant remained unexpired. The period expired on 24 November 2001. The claimant appealed against the measure of damage, and before the date of the hearing the limitation period expired. She submitted that if for any reason a second incumbrancer chose not to sue a first mortgagee for breach of its statutory duty, the mortgagor was entitled to sue and recover all the loss caused by the first mortgagee's breach; that a first mortgagee could recover no more than its own debt; and that it was not right that the defendant could retain £5,000 to meet a claim by the bank that had not been made, had been very unlikely to be made, and could no longer be made.

Held – The prima facie measure of damage for breach of a building society mortgagee's statutory duty on the exercise of its power of sale to take reasonable care to obtain the best price that it reasonably could was the reduction in value of the equity of redemption. The assessment of damages was to be made at the time of trial with the benefit of the knowledge of what had happened up to that point.

a Paragraph 1, so far as material, provides

In the instant case, although there had been a theoretical possibility at the date of the judgment in the county court that the bank might have sued the defendant, the judge might well have concluded that the likelihood of it doing so was so small that it could be ignored. Alternatively, if he had considered that the possibility could not be discounted he could have ordered £5,000 to be paid into court and paid out to the claimant on the expiry of the limitation period. There was no longer any risk of the defendant being sued by the bank and the claimant was entitled to recover all the loss caused by the defendant's breach of duty. Accordingly, the appeal would be allowed (see [9], [11], [19], [20], below).

Notes

For a mortgagee's duty to obtain best price, see 4(3) Halsbury's Laws (4th edn reissue) para 564.

The Building Societies Act 1986, Sch 4 was repealed by virtue of the Building Societies Act 1997, ss 12(1)(a), 46(2), Sch 9.

Cases referred to in judgments

Downsview Nominees Ltd v First City Corp Ltd [1993] 3 All ER 626, [1993] AC 295, [1993] 2 WLR 86, PC.

Phonographic Performance Ltd v AEI Rediffusion Music Ltd [1999] 2 All ER 299, [1999] 1 WLR 1507, CA.

Roache v News Group Newspapers Ltd [1998] EMLR 161, CA.

Appeal

The claimant, Janet Adamson, appealed with permission granted by Kay LJ on 23 April 2001, from the decision of District Judge Freeman in the Manchester County Court on 14 June 2001 awarding her damages of £1,000 against the defendant, Halifax plc, for breach of statutory duty (by its building society predecessor) under the Building Societies Act 1986, Sch 4, para 1(1)(a). The facts are set out in the judgment of Sir Murray Stuart-Smith.

Michael Mulholland (instructed by CP Morley, Manchester) for the claimant.

Katherine McQuail (instructed by Walker Morris, Leeds) for the defendant.

Cur adv vult

30 July 2002. The following judgments were delivered.

SIR MURRAY STUART-SMITH (giving the first judgment at the invitation of Potter LJ).

INTRODUCTION

[1] This is an appeal from the judgment of District Judge Freeman sitting in the Manchester County Court and given on 14 June 2001.

[2] The claimant Janet Adamson entered into a mortgage deed with the defendant, Halifax plc, then a building society, in September 1991 in order to purchase her flat, Flat 3 Manor Park, Manor Avenue, Urmston. She fell into arrears with the payments and on 31 August 1995 the defendant took possession of the flat. It did so without a court order. One of the claims made by the claimant was that the defendant had wrongfully taken possession; she alleged that she was still in possession. She claimed that the defendant had wrongfully disposed of her possessions valued at £2,000 and she claimed aggravated damages. The judge dismissed this claim; he did not accept the evidence of the claimant or her mother. He accepted the evidence of Mr Delaney, called on behalf of the defence, which was corroborated by the contemporaneous documents, to the effect that she had vacated the flat. There is no appeal on this issue; but it has relevance to the question of interest and costs, the judge's award on these matters being subject to appeal and an application for permission to cross-appeal.

DAMAGES

[3] The main issue in the appeal related to the claimant's claim that the defendant, after repossessing the property, sold at a substantial undervalue. The flat was sold for £17,000. The judge held that the true value of the property in the condition it was, which was a poor one, was £23,000. Again there is no dispute on this aspect of the case, or as to the judge's finding that the defendant was in breach of the duty to take reasonable care to ensure the best price that can reasonably be obtained (imposed by Sch 4, para 1(1)(a) to the Building Societies Act 1986, but subsequently repealed in s 12 of the Building Societies Act 1997).

[4] The judge did not award the claimant £6,000, the difference between the sale price and the proper price, but only £1,000. That came about in this way. The claimant was indebted to the Royal Bank of Scotland (the bank) in the sum of £4,736·27. It appears to have been an unsecured debt. On 17 December 1993 the bank obtained a judgment for this sum. On 4 May 1994 the bank entered a caution on the register of title. On 14 February 1995 the bank obtained a charging order nisi on the flat, which was made absolute on 3 April. The charging order is not recorded on the office copy of the register of title before the court; but this is because the copy is dated 6 February 1995. It existed as a subsequent incumbrance to the defendant's mortgage and the defendant was aware of it. What is now clear is that, after the sale, the defendant accounted to the bank for £22, which was all that was left from the proceeds of sale after the satisfaction of the defendant's claim.

[5] It is common ground that if the defendant had sold the property at £23,000 shortly after 24 November 1995 (when contracts were exchanged) it would have accounted to the bank as a subsequent incumbrancer for £5,000 (the amount of the judgment plus costs rounded up to £5,000) and to the claimant as mortgagor (see s 105 of the Law of Property Act 1925) for £1,000. However, the situation was that the bank had never made any attempt to enforce its judgment (beyond the £22) against the claimant, no doubt for the very good reason that it did not consider that she had any money. Neither had it made any claim against the defendant for damage to its own interest as a subsequent incumbrancer by selling at an undervalue. In the light of the judge's judgment, it is clear that it could have done so. But it can do so no longer, because its claim is now barred by limitation, six years having elapsed since 24 November 1995. At the time the district judge gave judgment, namely on 14 June 2001, the six years had not yet expired; but the bank had shown no signs whatever of making a claim against the defendant. So far as the claimant was concerned she gave evidence that the bank had 'written off' the debt. It is probable that by this she meant no more than that the bank had not pursued her. There was certainly no formal release and nothing that could give rise to an estoppel. No action can now be brought to enforce the bank's judgment against the claimant (see s 24 of the Limitation Act 1980). But a writ of execution to enforce the judgment can be issued with the permission of the court, even though six years has elapsed from the date of judgment (see RSC Ord 46, r 2 and similar provisions for warrants of execution in the county court (CCR Ord 26, r 5)).

[6] The judge decided that the claimant should recover no more than £1,000 because he considered that that was the extent of her loss. Had the defendant sold for the full market value it would have had to satisfy the bank, before accounting to her. That being so, the judge considered that she should not obtain a 'windfall' of £5,000 because the bank had taken no steps to recover its money.

[7] Mr Mulholland who appeared in this court on behalf of the claimant, but not in the court below, submitted that the judge was in error. He submitted that the claimant's damage consisted in the diminution in value of the equity of redemption; damage should be assessed at the time of trial. If the full £6,000 is paid to the claimant, she remains at risk of enforcement proceedings at the suit of the bank. Mr Mulholland recognised that, at the time the judge gave judgment, there was a possibility of a claim being made by the bank against the defendant; in these circumstances he submitted that a possible alternative course would have been for the judge to have ordered £5,000 to be paid in to court to abide any claim by the bank. If it made no claim against the defendant before 24 November 2001, the money then should be paid out of court to the claimant.

[8] In support of his submission Mr Mulholland referred the court to the advice of Lord Templeman to the Privy Council in Downsview Nominees Ltd v First City Corp Ltd [1993] 3 All ER 626 at 634, [1993] AC 295 at 311–312:

> 'The owner of property entering into a mortgage does not by entering in to that mortgage cease to be the owner of that property any further than is necessary to give effect to the security he has created. The mortgagor can mortgage the property again and again. A second or subsequent mortgage is a complete security on the mortgagor's interests subject only to the rights of prior incumbrancers. If a first mortgagee commits a breach of his duties to the mortgagor, the damage inflicted by that breach of duty will be suffered by the second mortgagee, subsequent incumbrancers and the mortgagor, depending on the extent of the damage and the amount of each security. Thus if a first mortgagee in breach of duty sells property worth £500,000 for £300,000, he is liable at the suit of any subsequent incumbrancer or the mortgagor. Damages of £200,000 will be ordered to be taken into the accounts of the first mortgagee or paid into court or to the second mortgagee who, after satisfying, as far as he can, the amount of any debt outstanding under his mortgage, will pay over any balance remaining to the next incumbrancer—or to the mortgagor if there is no subsequent incumbrancer. In practice the incumbrancer who first suffers from the breach of duty by the first mortgagee and needs the damages payable by the first mortgagee to obtain repayment of his own debt will sue the first mortgagee. If the incumbrancers do not suffer because they have been able to obtain repayment of their debts without recourse to the damages, then it will be the mortgagor who will sue.'

[9] Mr Mulholland submitted that if for any reason the second incumbrancer chooses not to sue the first mortgagee, the mortgagor is entitled to sue and recover all the loss caused by the first mortgagee's breach of duty. The first mortgagee can recover no more than its debt. It is not right that it can retain £5,000, the amount of its liability for its own breach of duty, to meet a claim that has not been made, is very unlikely to be made, and now cannot be made, by the bank.

[10] Miss McQuail disputed these submissions. She contended that if the defendant had done what it ought to have done, the claimant would have recovered no more than £1,000. On the sale at the proper valuation of £23,000, the defendant would have satisfied its own debt, paid £5,000 to the bank and accounted to the claimant for £1,000; she could get no more now.

[11] In my judgment Mr Mulholland's submissions are to be preferred. The court had to award damages for breach of statutory duty, the prima facie measure of damage being the reduction in the value of the equity of redemption. The assessment of damages is to be made at the time of trial with the benefit of the knowledge of what has happened theretofore. Although theoretically at the time the judge gave judgment, there was a possibility that the bank might have sued the defendant, I think the judge might well have concluded that the chance of it doing so before the limitation period expired was so small that such chance could be ignored. The bank had shown no interest in the litigation and probably considered that it was not worthwhile pursuing a claim. Alternatively, if the judge considered that the possibility could not be discounted, he could have ordered the £5,000 to be paid into court. If no claim was made against the defendant by 24 November 2001, the money should be paid out to the claimant. The claimant still remains vulnerable to an application by the bank for permission to issue a warrant of execution. But, so far as the defendant is concerned, there is no longer any risk of it being sued by the bank.

INTEREST

[12] The judge awarded no interest to the claimant. Unhappily there is no official transcript of this part of the judgment or that on costs. The two solicitors' notes do not agree as to the reason given by the judge for depriving the claimant of all interest. The defendant's solicitor's note records that it was 'the enormous delay in bringing the evidence as to the charging order nisi'. The claimant's solicitor's note indicates that is was 'the delay in issuing the proceedings and counsel did not object'. The former is not a good reason. Both parties knew of the charging order, neither saw fit to include the relevant documentation in the bundle. It was only after the judge had decided as a matter of principle that the amount of the bank's judgment should not be recoverable, that the order was produced. In my judgment it was an irrelevant consideration, and if the judge based his decision upon it, he was wrong.

[13] Delay in issuing the proceedings can be a valid reason for reducing the period for which interest is awarded, though rarely, if at all, for depriving a successful party of all interest. The proceedings were not issued until nearly four-and-a-half years after the cause of action arose; it came on for trial about a year later. Although the action was started well within the limitation period, four-and-a-half years was a long delay for which there was no satisfactory explanation. It had the incidental effect that the claimant is, in my judgment, very likely to obtain the full £6,000 without accounting to the bank for its 1993 judgment. There was no delay in prosecuting the action; but the delay in starting it justifies some reduction in the interest awarded. Mr Mulholland concedes that the claimant should not be awarded interest on the £5,000 until 24 November 2001. In my judgment the claimant is entitled to interest on her damages as to £1,000 from 24 November 1997 (two years after the cause of action arose) and as to £5,000 from 24 November 2001.

COSTS

[14] Cross-appeal. The judge's order for costs was that—

> 'the defendant should pay half of the claimant's costs save that it should pay the entirety of such sum in respect of the claimant's surveyor's fees as shall be found reasonable, such costs and fee to be subject to a detailed assessment in default of agreement'.

The judge refused permission to appeal on costs, and the single Lord Justice adjourned the question of permission to the full court.

[15] Miss McQuail submits that the proper order for costs is that there should be no order for costs. That is because the defendant was successful on the issue of wrongful eviction which took half of the volume of the pleadings, preparation for trial and the time for the hearing. The defendant she submitted should have been entitled to the costs on this issue; but that would effectively equal the costs on the undervalue claim, so the proper order is that the court should make no order for costs. She also submitted that the court should make an adverse order to the claimant to mark her conduct in bringing a mendacious claim on the wrongful eviction issue.

[16] Costs are in the discretion of the trial judge and this court will only interfere with the exercise of that discretion on well-defined principles. As I said in Roache v News Group Newspapers Ltd [1998] EMLR 161 at 172:

> 'Before the court can interfere it must be shown that the judge has either erred in principle in his approach, or has left out of account, or taken into account, some feature that he should, or should not, have considered, or that his decision is wholly wrong because the court is forced to the conclusion that he has not balanced the various factors fairly in the scale.'

That statement was approved in Phonographic Performance Ltd v AEI Rediffusion Music Ltd [1999] 2 All ER 299 at 314, [1999] 1 WLR 1507 at 1523 per Lord Woolf MR. Although that decision was before the Civil Procedure Rules came into force, it is clear that the court applied the same principle in relation to interfering with the trial judge's discretion.

[17] The claimant was the successful party in the litigation in the sense she had to come to court to recover anything. It may be that the defendant could not have made a payment into court because of the problem of the bank's judgment; but it could have made a written offer; and if the offer had equalled or bettered the judgment, then the defendant would have been the successful party.

[18] It is clear that the judge did take into account the fact that the claimant had failed on the wrongful eviction claim. He also took into account the fact that he had 'severe doubts about her credibility'; though he did not go so far as to say that the whole of that claim was a knowingly fraudulent one. In my view he took into account the relevant considerations and exercised his discretion in accordance with CPR 44.3 (see particularly r 44.3(2)(a) and (4)(b)). Even if this court were inclined to make an order that would be somewhat more favourable to the defendant, I am clear that we should not do so. Moreover since we are allowing the appeal, I see no reason to think now that the order for costs was too favourable to the claimant. I would refuse permission to cross-appeal.

[19] In the result I would allow the appeal, the judgment should be varied in that judgment be given for the claimant for £6,000; interest at the appropriate rate should be awarded on £1,000 from 24 November 1997 and on £5,000 as from 24 November 2001. The order for costs below is not varied.

POTTER LJ.

[20] I agree.

Appeal allowed.

Melanie Martyn Barrister.

R (on the application of Giles) v Parole Board

[2003] UKHL 42

HOUSE OF LORDS

LORD BINGHAM OF CORNHILL, LORD STEYN, LORD HOPE OF CRAIGHEAD, LORD HUTTON AND LORD SCOTT OF FOSCOTE

18–19 JUNE, 31 JULY 2003

Sentence – Custodial sentence – Imposition of custodial sentence longer than that commensurate with seriousness of offence – Lawfulness of detention – Whether convention right requiring periodic review of lawfulness of continued detention of offender who had served commensurate element of sentence – Criminal Justice Act 1991, s 2(2)(b) – Powers of Criminal Courts (Sentencing) Act 2000, s 80(2)(b) – Human Rights Act 1998, Sch 1, Pt I, art 5(1)(a), (4).

The claimant was sentenced to a total of seven years' imprisonment for two violent offences. When imposing sentence, the judge exercised the power conferred upon him by s 2(2)(b)[a] of the Criminal Justice Act 1991, subsequently re-enacted in identical terms in s 80(2)(b) of the Powers of Criminal Courts (Sentencing) Act 2000. Under those provisions, which applied where the court was passing a custodial sentence, not fixed by law, for a violent or sexual offence, the sentence was to be for such term longer than that commensurate with the seriousness of the offence (but not exceeding the permitted maximum) as was necessary in the opinion of the court to protect the public from serious harm from the offender. The claimant was refused permission to appeal against the sentence. After serving half of his sentence, the claimant became eligible for release on the recommendation of the Parole Board. When the review of his sentence was approaching, the claimant asked the board to confirm that he would be treated at the review in the same way as a discretionary life prisoner in being granted an oral hearing, and in the application of the same test to decide whether he should continue to be detained. The board gave no such confirmation, and the claimant applied for judicial review. Drawing an analogy with discretionary life prisoners, he contended that, once the commensurate term had been served, public protection was the only ground for the continued detention of those sentenced under s 2(2)(b) of the 1991 Act or s 80(2)(b) of the 2000 Act, and that such detention should be the subject of review, with their participation, to ensure that they were no longer detained on that ground when they had ceased to be a danger to the public. In so contending, the claimant relied on art 5(4)[b] of the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms 1950 (as set out in Sch 1 to the Human Rights Act 1998) which provided that everyone who was deprived of his liberty by detention was entitled to take proceedings by which the lawfulness of his detention would be decided speedily by a court. The judge granted the application, but his decision was reversed by the Court of Appeal. On the claimant's appeal to the House of a Section 2, so far as material, is set out at [2], below

b Article 5, so far as material, is set out at [3], below

Lords, their Lordships considered whether, having regard to the jurisprudence of the European Court of Human Rights, a sentence imposed under s 2(2)(b) of the 1991 Act was subject to the general rule that detention in accordance with a determinate sentence imposed by a court was justified, as lawful detention, under art 5(1)(a) of the convention, without the need for further reviews of detention under art 5(4) (the general rule).

Held – The general rule applied to determinate sentences imposed under s 2(2)(b) of the 1991 Act, and accordingly there was no requirement in such cases for further reviews of detention under art 5(4) of the convention. There was a distinction between detention for a period whose length was embodied in the sentence of the court on the one hand and the transfer of decisions about a prisoner's release to the Executive. In the latter case, there was a risk that the factors which informed the original decision would change with the passage of time, and the review which art 5(4) required could not be said to be incorporated in the original decision by the court. A further review in judicial proceedings was needed at reasonable intervals if the detention was not to be at risk of becoming arbitrary. Where, however, the prisoner had been lawfully detained within the meaning of art 5(1)(a) following the imposition of a determinate sentence after his conviction by a competent court, the review required by art 5(4) was incorporated in the original sentence passed by the sentencing court. Once the appeal process had been exhausted, there was no right to have the lawfulness of the sentence reviewed by another court. In the instant case, the review required by art 5(4) had been incorporated in the sentence imposed by the judge because he had fixed the period of the sentence which was needed to protect the public from serious harm. He had been able to take that decision in the light of the information before him and, in the exercise of his ordinary sentencing powers, to decide on the total length of the sentence which was appropriate in all the circumstances. As he had been able to take that decision at the outset, there was no risk that detention for the minimum period fixed by the sentence would become arbitrary. The claimant had no further right under art 5(4) to have his detention for the minimum period fixed by that sentence judicially reviewed. Accordingly, the appeal would be dismissed (see [10]–[13], [40], [51]–[53], [70]–[72], [74], [80], [81], below).

De Wilde v Belgium (No 1) (1971) 1 EHRR 373 followed.

Van Droogenbroeck v Belgium (1982) 4 EHRR 443, E v Norway (1990) 17 EHRR 30 and Thynne, Wilson and Gunnell v UK (1990) 13 EHRR 666 not followed.

Decision of the Court of Appeal [2002] 3 All ER 1123 affirmed.

Notes

For the right to take proceedings to determine the lawfulness of detention and for criteria for determining the length of custodial sentences, see respectively 8(2) Halsbury's Laws (4th edn reissue) para 127 and Supp to 11(2) Halsbury's Laws (4th edn reissue) para 1202A.

For the Criminal Justice Act 1991, s 2, see 12 Halsbury's Statutes (4th edn) (1997 reissue) 1287. Section 2 was replaced, with effect from 25 August 2000, by s 80 of the Powers of Criminal Courts (Sentencing) Act 2000.

For the Human Rights Act 1998, Sch 1, Pt I, art 5, see 7 Halsbury's Statutes (4th edn) (2002 reissue) 553.

Cases referred to in opinions

De Wilde v Belgium (No 1) (1971) 1 EHRR 373, [1971] ECHR 2832/66, ECt HR.
E v Norway (1990) 17 EHRR 30, [1990] ECHR 11701/85, ECt HR.
Hussain v UK (1996) 22 EHRR 1, [1996] ECHR 21928/93, ECt HR.
Iribarne Perez v France (1995) 22 EHRR 153, [1995] ECHR 16462/90, ECt HR.
Mansell v UK App No 32072/96 (2 July 1997, unreported), E Com HR.
McLeod v UK [1999] 1 FCR 193, [1998] ECHR 24755/94, ECt HR.
R v Barker [2002] EWCA Crim 1508, [2003] 1 Cr App R (S) 212, CA.
R v Chapman [2000] 1 Cr App R 77, CA.
R v Governor of Brockhill Prison, ex p Evans (No 2) [2000] 4 All ER 15, [2001] 2 AC 19, [2000] 3 WLR 843, HL.
R v King, R v Simpkins (1973) 57 Cr App R 696, CA.
R v Sargeant (1974) 60 Cr App R 74, CA.
R v Smith [2001] 2 Cr App R (S) 160, CA.
R v Wilson [2000] Crim LR 503, CA.
Silva Rocha v Portugal (1996) 32 EHRR 333, [1996] ECHR 18165/91, ECt HR.
Stafford v UK (2002) 13 BHRC 260, ECt HR.
Thynne, Wilson and Gunnell v UK (1990) 13 EHRR 666, [1990] ECHR 11787/85. ECt HR.
Torbet v HM Advocate 1999 SLT 113, HC of Just.
Van Droogenbroeck v Belgium (1982) 4 EHRR 443, [1982] ECHR 7906/77, ECt HR.
Veen v The Queen (No 2) (1988) 164 CLR 465, Aust HC.
Weeks v UK (1988) 10 EHRR 293, [1987] ECHR 9787/82, ECt HR.
Winterwerp v Netherlands (1979) 2 EHRR 387, [1979] ECHR 6301/73, ECt HR.
Wynne v UK (1995) 19 EHRR 333, [1994] ECHR 15484/89, ECt HR.
X v UK (1981) 4 EHRR 188, [1981] ECHR 7215/75, ECt HR.

Cases referred to in list of authorities

Bezicheri v Italy (1990) 12 EHRR 210, [1989] ECHR 11400/85, ECt HR.
DPP v Ottewell [1968] 3 All ER 153, [1970] AC 642, [1968] 3 WLR 621, HL.
Pereira v Portugal (2003) 36 EHRR 865, [2002] ECHR 44872/98, ECt HR.
R (on the application of Alconbury Developments Ltd) v Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions [2001] UKHL 23, [2001] 2 All ER 929, [2001] 2 WLR 1389.
R (on the application of Anderson) v Secretary of State for the Home Dept [2002] UKHL 46, [2002] 4 All ER 1089, [2003] 1 AC 837, [2002] 3 WLR 1800; rvsg [2001] EWCA Civ 1698, [2002] 2 WLR 1143.
R v Billam [1986] 1 All ER 985, [1986] 1 WLR 349, CA.
R v Coull [1993] Crim LR 978, CA.
R v Crow, R v Pennington (1994) 16 Cr App R (S) 409, CA.
R v De Silva [2000] 2 Cr App R (S) 408, CA.
R v Hodgson (1967) 52 Cr App R 113, CA.
R v Jones [1999] 1 Cr App R (S) 427, CA.
R v Mansell (1994) 15 Cr App R (S) 771, CA.
R v Moore (1992) 13 Cr App R (S) 130, CA.
R v Parole Board, ex p Bradley [1990] 3 All ER 828, [1991] 1 WLR 134, DC.
R v Parole Board, ex p Lodomez (1994) 26 BMLR 162, DC.
R v Parole Board, ex p Mansell (1996) Times, 21 March, DC.
R v Richardson (1990) 12 Cr App R (S) 311, CA.
R v Secretary of State for the Home Dept, ex p Furber [1998] 1 All ER 23, DC.

R v Secretary of State for the Home Dept, ex p Stafford [1998] 4 All ER 7, [1999] 2 AC 38, [1998] 3 WLR 372, HL.

R v Secretary of State for the Home Dept, ex p Benson (1988) Times, 21 November, DC.

R v Secretary of State for the Home Dept, ex p Handscomb (1987) 86 Cr App R 59, DC.

S (children: care plan), Re, Re W (children: care plan) [2002] UKHL 10, [2002] 2 All ER 192, [2002] 2 WLR 720.

Appeal

Terry Giles appealed with permission of the Court of Appeal (Kennedy, May and Tuckey LJJ) from its decision on 4 July 2002 ([2002] EWCA Civ 951, [2002] 3 All ER 1123, [2003] 2 WLR 196) allowing an appeal by the respondents, the Parole Board and the Secretary of State for the Home Department, from the order of Elias J on 5 October 2001 ([2001] EWHC Admin 834, [2002] 1 WLR 654) whereby, in granting an application for judicial review brought by the appellant against the respondents, he made the following declaration: 'Where a person has been sentenced pursuant to s 80(2)(b) of the Powers of Criminal Courts (Sentencing) Act 2000 (or its statutory predecessor), once he is detained in circumstances where he would have been released but for the imposition of the additional element of the sentence imposed by virtue of that subsection, his continuing period of detention shall be subject to art 5(4) of [the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms 1950 (as set out in Sch 1 to the Human Rights Act 1998)] such that it will need to be reviewed periodically at reasonable intervals by a procedure compliant with art 5(4) to determine whether the continued detention remains necessary to protect the public from serious harm.' The facts are set out in the opinion of Lord Bingham of Cornhill.

Edward Fitzgerald QC and Phillippa Kaufmann (instructed by Irwin Mitchell, Sheffield) for the appellant.

David Pannick QC and Eleanor Grey (instructed by the Treasury Solicitor) for the respondents.

Their Lordships took time for consideration.

31 July 2003. The following opinions were delivered.

LORD BINGHAM OF CORNHILL.

[1] My Lords, at issue in this appeal is the impact of art 5(4) of the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms 1950 (as set out in Sch 1 to the Human Rights Act 1998) on a sentence imposed under s 2(2)(b) of the Criminal Justice Act 1991 (since re-enacted as s 80(2)(b) of the Powers of Criminal Courts (Sentencing) Act 2000).

[2] The appellant pleaded guilty in the Crown Court at Nottingham to two offences, committed on different occasions, against ss 20 and 47 of the Offences against the Person Act 1861. On 10 January 1997 he was sentenced to consecutive terms of four and three years' imprisonment. In passing that sentence the judge expressed the opinion that it was necessary to pass a custodial sentence which was longer than the sentence which would be commensurate with the seriousness of the offences in order to protect the public and one of the appellant's victims in particular from serious harm from him. The judge was exercising the power conferred by s 2(2)(b) of the 1991 Act and following the procedure laid down by that section which, so far as relevant, provided:

> 2. Length of custodial sentences.—(1) This section applies where a court passes a custodial sentence other than one fixed by law.
>
> (2) The custodial sentence shall be—(a) for such term (not exceeding the permitted maximum) as in the opinion of the court is commensurate with the seriousness of the offence, or the combination of the offence and one or more offences associated with it; or (b) where the offence is a violent or sexual offence, for such longer term (not exceeding that maximum) as in the opinion of the court is necessary to protect the public from serious harm from the offender.
>
> (3) Where the court passes a custodial sentence for a term longer than is commensurate with the seriousness of the offence, or the combination of the offence and one or more offences associated with it, the court shall—(a) state in open court that it is of the opinion that subsection (2)(b) above applies and why it is of that opinion; and (b) explain to the offender in open court and in ordinary language why the sentence is for such a term.'

The appellant sought leave to challenge that sentence but was refused leave to do so by the single judge and, on 13 June 1997, by the Court of Appeal for detailed reasons which give rise to no issue before the House. On 17 May 2001 the appellant was released on licence.

[3] Article 5(4) of the convention provides:

> 'Everyone who is deprived of his liberty by arrest or detention shall be entitled to take proceedings by which the lawfulness of his detention shall be decided speedily by a court and his release ordered if the detention is not lawful.'

This provision, part of a very important article directed to protection of the right to liberty and security, reflects principles long cherished in this country by lawyers and the public alike: that no one shall be deprived of his liberty save on lawful authority; that anyone challenging the lawfulness of his detention shall have access to a court with power to decide whether his detention is lawful or not; and that if his detention is not held to be lawful his release shall be ordered. No one is to be detained arbitrarily or (other than very temporarily) at the direction of the Executive. Article 5(4) must be read with art 5(1), which begins:

> 'Everyone has the right to liberty and security of person. No one shall be deprived of his liberty save in the following cases and in accordance with a procedure prescribed by law: (a) the lawful detention of a person after conviction by a competent court ...'

[4] The appellant does not challenge the imposition upon him of punitive sentences of imprisonment. Nor does he challenge in principle the extension of a sentence beyond the term necessary to punish an offender where such extension is properly directed towards protection of the public against serious harm caused by a violent or sexual offender. His contention, based on art 5(4), is in essence this: that once a defendant sentenced under s 2(2)(b) of the 1991 Act or s 80(2)(b) of the 2000 Act has served the part of his sentence imposed purely for purposes of punishment (that is, the term 'commensurate with the seriousness of the offence, or the combination of the offence and one or more offences associated with it') and is about to begin serving the balance of the sentence imposed for purposes of public protection ('such longer term ... as in the opinion of the court is necessary to protect the public from serious harm from the offender') he should enjoy the substantive and procedural rights held to be necessary where discretionary life sentence prisoners have served the punitive (or tariff) term imposed by the trial judge or, on appeal, by the Court of Appeal. The underlying rationale of this argument is clear. The sentence passed on a discretionary life sentence prisoner has two components, the first punitive, the second protective. The only justification for continued detention of a prisoner who has served the punitive part of his sentence is the need to protect the public. But a prisoner's danger to the public, however evident at the time of sentence, may diminish or disappear. Thus his danger to the public, and the justification for continued detention, should be the subject of periodic review (in which the prisoner should have the right to participate) to ensure that a prisoner is not detained on the ground of his danger to the public when he is no longer such a danger. A similar regime, it is argued, should apply to those sentenced under s 2(2)(b) of the 1991 Act or s 80(2)(b) of the 2000 Act: once the commensurate term has been served, the only ground for continued detention is public protection; but by the end of the commensurate term the prisoner may no longer be a danger to the public; therefore his continued detention should be the subject of review, with his participation, to ensure that he is no longer detained on the ground of his danger to the public when he is no longer such a danger.

[5] In December 2000, with the first review of his case approaching, the appellant's solicitors sought confirmation from the Parole Board that at the review he would be treated in the same way as a discretionary life sentence prisoner (a) in being granted an oral hearing, and (b) in application of the same test to decide whether he should continue to be detained. The board gave no such confirmation and the appellant applied for permission to seek judicial review, basing his application on the argument summarised in [4], above. On 23 May 2001 ([2001] EWHC Admin 463) Sir Oliver Popplewell granted the appellant permission, giving detailed reasons favourable to the appellant for doing so. By this time the application was strictly moot, since the appellant had already been released on licence, but the application was rightly held to raise an important point of principle. At the substantive hearing of the application in October 2001 ([2001] EWHC Admin 834, [2002] 1 WLR 654), Elias J granted the application, accepting the appellant's argument based on the convention. On the Secretary of State's appeal, the Court of Appeal ([2002] EWCA Civ 951, [2002] 3 All ER 1123, [2003] 2 WLR 196) (Kennedy, May and Tuckey LJJ) reached a different conclusion.

[6] In domestic law the sentences imposed on the appellant took effect as a single composite term of seven years' imprisonment (see s 51(2) of the 1991 Act). He was a 'long-term' prisoner within the meaning of s 33(5) of the 1991 Act, since he was serving a sentence of four years or more. As a long-term prisoner the appellant was eligible for release on the recommendation of the Parole Board after serving one-half of his sentence (see s 35(1) of the 1991 Act) and was entitled to release on licence after serving two-thirds of his sentence (see s 33(2) of the 1991 Act). There is no provision in domestic law for release of a long-term prisoner, save on compassionate grounds, before half of the single composite term has been served. If effect were given to the appellant's contention that release of a long-term prisoner should be considered at the end of the commensurate term which would have been imposed under s 2(2)(a) of the 1991 Act or s 80(2)(a) of the 2000 Act, this would plainly conflict with the domestic regime described above in any case where the protective extension ordered under ss 2(2)(b) or 80(2)(b) exceeds the commensurate term which would have been ordered under ss 2(2)(a) or 80(2)(a). There is nothing in any statute which indicates that the protective extension should not be longer than the commensurate term, and there are reported cases in which the Court of Appeal has approved longer terms (see R v Chapman [2000] 1 Cr App R 77; R v Smith [2001] 2 Cr App R (S) 160; R v Wilson [2000] Crim LR 503; R v Barker [2002] EWCA Crim 1508, [2003] 1 Cr App R (S) 212). In a case where the index offence does not merit the imposition of a life sentence but the offender is recognised to represent a serious risk to the public, imposition of a protective extension longer than the commensurate term may well represent the best means of reconciling the need to protect the public with the need to do justice to the individual offender.

[7] Section 34 of the 1991 Act, since repealed and replaced by s 28 of the Crime (Sentences) Act 1997, required the sentencing judge, when imposing a discretionary life sentence, to specify the period to be served before the prisoner might require the Secretary of State to refer his case to the Parole Board. This was the punitive or tariff term of the sentence. Thus in such a case there could never be doubt when the punitive phase of the prisoner's detention had come to an end. From that time onwards the continued detention of the prisoner could be justified on grounds of public protection alone. By contrast, a judge who imposes a longer than commensurate sentence under s 2(2)(b) of the 1991 Act or s 80(2)(b) of the 2000 Act is not required by either statute to indicate what part of the total sentence or sentences is commensurate within ss 2(2)(a) or 80(2)(a) and what part represents the protective extension. The Court of Appeal has not required sentencing judges to disclose the make-up of the sentence in that way. While in practice some judges have chosen to disclose the basis on which they have calculated the length of the sentence or sentences imposed, others have not, as the judge in this case did not, and it may be doubted whether sentencing judges necessarily base their overall sentence or sentences on a detailed calculation of the length of the component parts. It follows that in any case in which the commensurate term had not been expressly identified, the Parole Board and the Prison Service would have difficulty in knowing when the commensurate term ended. There would not, as in the case of discretionary life sentence prisoners, be a precise date on which the first phase of the sentence would end and the second begin.

[8] These considerations make plain, in my opinion, not only that our domestic sentencing and release regime does not envisage the process of review for which the appellant contends, but that it is inconsistent with it. Mr Fitzgerald QC, representing the appellant, did not suggest otherwise. He founded his argument on art 5(4) of the convention as interpreted and applied by the Strasbourg institutions. It is of course the duty of the House under s 2(1) of the 1998 Act to take account of judgments, decisions and opinions given or made by the Strasbourg institutions (so far as they are relevant) and to give effect to convention rights (see s 6(1) of the 1998 Act) unless precluded from doing so by primary legislation, in which case a declaration of incompatibility may be made (see s 4 of the 1998 Act).

[9] I need not repeat the detailed account which my noble and learned friend Lord Hope of Craighead has given of the Strasbourg jurisprudence to which the House was referred. I agree with his analysis and I fully share his conclusions. As May LJ pithily put it in his judgment in the Court of Appeal ([2002] EWCA Civ 951 at [18], [2002] 3 All ER 1123 at [18], [2003] 2 WLR 196):

> 'All the European authorities to which Kennedy LJ has referred, which conclude that art 5(4) of the (convention) requires an appropriate procedure allowing a court to determine the continued lawfulness of detention, concern sentences which were indeterminate and where otherwise the decision whether to release the prisoner lay with the executive. Neither applies to sentences under section 2(2)(b) of the 1991 Act.'

Mr Fitzgerald accepted the accuracy of that summary. To conclude that the Strasbourg decisions have only applied art 5(4) to cases having features different from the present does not, however, conclude the issue which the appellant raises unless those differences are such as should lead to a different result.

[10] That brings one back to consideration of the core rights which art 5(4), read with art 5(1), is framed to protect. Its primary target is deprivation of liberty which is arbitrary, or directed or controlled by the Executive. In the present case there was nothing arbitrary about the sentence, which was announced and explained in open court and upheld by the Court of Appeal when refusing leave to appeal against sentence. Since the first offence involved what the sentencing judge described as 'a savage attack' and the appellant had threatened further violence against his first victim, the term imposed does not appear in any way excessive. The sentence left nothing to the executive, since the Parole Board, whose duty it is to consider release at the half-way stage of the sentence, is accepted to be a judicial body. Again, May LJ put the point succinctly ([2002] 3 All ER 1123 at [18], [2003] 2 WLR 196 at [19]):

> 'Although the sentence is longer than it otherwise would have been because the sentencing judge is of the opinion that it is necessary to protect the public from serious harm from the offender, (i) the length of the sentence is, and is intended to be, determined by the judge at the time of sentence; (ii) it is not intended to be reviewed, other than on appeal; and (iii) in particular, it is not intended to confer on the executive the responsibility for determining when the public interest permits the prisoner's release ...'

[11] I conclude that the sentence passed on the appellant fell squarely within art 5(1) of the convention and did not attract the operation of art 5(4). On the review of his case by the Parole Board he was entitled to the same rights as any other long-term prisoner serving a determinate sentence, but no other or greater rights. In considering his release at the half-way stage the board was bound to apply the same criteria to him as to any other long-term prisoner serving a determinate sentence. The suggested analogy between prisoners sentenced under s 2(2)(b) of the 1991 Act or s 80(2)(b) of the 2000 Act and discretionary life sentence prisoners is in my opinion false.

[12] For these reasons as well as for those given by Lord Hope of Craighead and Lord Hutton I would dismiss this appeal.

LORD STEYN.

[13] My Lords, I have read the opinions of Lord Bingham of Cornhill, Lord Hope of Craighead and Lord Hutton. For the reasons they have given I would also dismiss the appeal.

LORD HOPE OF CRAIGHEAD.

[14] My Lords, as my noble and learned friend Lord Bingham of Cornhill has explained, the appellant was sentenced by the judge in the Crown Court at Nottingham to a total of seven years' imprisonment. He had pleaded guilty to two violent offences, for which he received sentences of four and three years' imprisonment respectively. The total of seven years' imprisonment resulted from the fact that the judge ordered that these two periods of imprisonment were to be served consecutively.

[15] When he was giving his reasons for imposing this sentence the judge said that he was of the opinion that it was necessary to pass a custodial sentence which was longer than the sentence which would be commensurate with the seriousness of the offences in order to protect the public and one of the appellant's victims from serious harm from him. He said that he had formed that opinion on the basis of all the matters disclosed in reports which were before him, which he directed should go to the prison authorities. It appears from the judge's remarks that the appellant's attitude to re-offending was governed by his personality disorder for which he required treatment if that was possible. Although he did not say so in terms, it is plain that in passing this sentence the judge was exercising the power conferred on him by s 2(2)(b) of the Criminal Justice Act 1991.

[16] Section 2(2) of the 1991 Act, which has now been re-enacted as s 80(2) of the Powers of Criminal Courts (Sentencing) Act 2000, was designed to provide a statutory basis for determining the length of a custodial sentence other than one fixed by law. The primary rule is that set out in s 2(2)(a) of the 1991 Act. It provides that the custodial sentence shall be for such term (not exceeding the permitted maximum) as in the opinion of the court is commensurate with the seriousness of the offence, or the combination of the offence and other offences associated with it. This is the principle of 'just desserts' referred to in the White Paper published in February 1990, Crime, Justice and Protecting the Public (Cm 965) p 5 (para 2.3), which requires the court to pass a sentence which is in proportion to the seriousness of the offence. Section 2(2)(b) of the 1991 Act provides an alternative approach which the court may adopt where the offence is a violent or sexual offence. In such a case the custodial sentence shall be for such longer term (not exceeding the permitted maximum) as in the opinion of the court is necessary to protect the public from serious harm from the offender. Under this paragraph the court is required to apply its mind to the question whether sufficient grounds exist for passing a sentence which is longer than a sentence which would be proportionate to the offence. As Kennedy LJ said in the Court of Appeal ([2002] EWCA Civ 951 at [5], [2002] 3 All ER 1123 at [5], [2003] 2 WLR 1965)), a sentence which is passed under this paragraph is in substitution for, not additional to, the sentence which would otherwise have been passed under sub-s (2)(a).

[17] Although s 2(2) of the 1991 Act divided the sentencing exercise into these two parts, every custodial sentence which a judge imposes shares the following characteristics irrespective of the part of the subsection under which it is passed.

These are: (a) the decision as to the length of the sentence is taken by a judge as part of the overall sentencing exercise; (b) the judge's decision as to the length of the sentence is based on all the information before him at the time when he imposes it; (c) unless the judge decides to impose a discretionary life sentence under sub-s (2)(b), the length of the sentence is fixed by him at the time when he imposes it; and (d) his decision is subject to appeal, but the minimum period of detention that results from a determinate sentence is not open to review by the executive. Where the judge decides to sentence the offender to a term which is longer than one which is commensurate with the seriousness of the offence or the combination of the offence with one or more offences associated with it, he must give his reasons for doing so in open court (see s 2(3) of the 1991 Act; see now s 80(3) of the 2000 Act).

[18] The approach to sentencing which the statute lays down is therefore, from start to finish, a judicial exercise. It is subject to all the guarantees which are afforded by art 6(1) of the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms 1950 (as set out in Sch 1 to the Human Rights Act 1998).

[19] The advantages which flow from this structured approach to the sentencing exercise should not be allowed to conceal the fact that the need to protect the public from serious harm had always been regarded as a factor to which a judge could have regard when he was arriving at a custodial sentence which was appropriate to the circumstances. This can be illustrated by reference to the practice which is still followed in Scotland, where there are no statutory rules about the general approach which is to be taken to the length of custodial sentences. The matter is regulated by the practice of the court and by the common law. The need to protect the public from harm caused by further offending is a factor that can legitimately be taken into account by the judge as part of the sentencing exercise, if there are sufficient grounds for doing so in the information which is before the court.

[20] In Torbet v HM Advocate 1999 SLT 113, the appellant had committed offences while released on licence from a life sentence for murder. When he was sentencing him for these offences the trial judge took into account the fact that he posed a moderate risk of future violence to women with whom he had had an intimate relationship. The length of the sentence was held to be excessive on appeal by the High Court of Justiciary. But the judge's approach to the matter was approved, as the Lord Justice General (Rodger) explained (at 115–116):

> 'Although a court will be aware that a particular offender has been recalled by the Secretary of State, who will need to bear in mind the safety of the public in considering his future release from custody under the life sentence, the duty of the court in sentencing him for the particular offence of which he has been convicted is to approach the matter in the usual way. The court will therefore choose the sentence which is appropriate, having regard to the nature of the offence, the previous convictions of the offender and all the other factors which a judge normally takes into account. Among those factors may be the need to choose a period which the court considers will give the public appropriate protection from any risk of reoffending.'

THE ISSUE

[21] The question is whether a decision by a judge to take account of the factor mentioned in s 2(2)(b) of the 1991 Act when he imposes a determinate sentence is compatible with art 5(4) of the convention read together with art 5(1)(a). If he selects a discretionary life sentence, he is required by s 28(2)(b) of the Crime (Sentences) Act 1997 to specify the period for which the offender will have to remain in prison before becoming eligible for consideration for release on parole by the board. The period which the judge selects for this purpose is a period which is commensurate with the seriousness of the offence or the combination of the offence and other offences associated with it. The question whether the offender should then be released, bearing mind the need to protect the public, is for the board. It must direct release when it is satisfied that it is no longer necessary for the protection of the public that the prisoner should be confined (see s 28(6)(b) of the 1997 Act). But if the judge selects a determinate sentence, as the judge did in this case, there is no such requirement. The date when the offender becomes eligible for consideration by the board is fixed by statute. Section 35 of the 1991 Act provides that, after a prisoner who is serving a sentence of imprisonment for a term of four years or more (a 'long-term prisoner') has served half his sentence, the Secretary of State may, if recommended to do so by the board, release him on licence.

[22] For the appellant Mr Fitzgerald QC submits that a longer than commensurate sentence which is imposed under s 2(2)(b) of the 1991 Act contains two distinct components. The first is the punitive component. The second is, as he put it, the preventative one. On his analysis the second part commences when the punitive part of the sentence expires. His argument is that the lawfulness of the preventative part of the sentence depends on whether the prisoner continues to present an unacceptable risk to the public throughout this period. He submits that, as dangerousness is liable to change over time, this is not something that a judge can predict at the time of sentencing. So, if the sentence is not to be regarded as arbitrary during the preventative part, its lawfulness requires to be re-determined by the Parole Board periodically in accordance with art 5(4) of the convention as soon as the punitive part of it has been served.

[23] For the Parole Board Mr Pannick QC submits that the requirements of art 5(4) are fully satisfied where the prisoner is serving a determinate sentence which has been fixed by the judge at the time of sentencing. According to his argument there is nothing arbitrary about a sentence which has been imposed for a fixed period by a judge even if the period has been selected partly by reference to factors that may change over time. This is because the decision about the length of the sentence is a judicial decision which is taken in open court in the light of all the information available to the judge at the time of sentencing. It is the judicial nature of the decision which distinguishes these cases from those where decisions as to the length of the detention are in the hands of the Executive.

ARTICLE 5

[24] The relevant provisions of art 5 of the convention are the following:

'1. Everyone has the right to liberty and security of person. No one shall be deprived of his liberty save in the following cases and in accordance with a procedure prescribed by law: (a) the lawful detention of a person after conviction by a competent court ...

4. Everyone who is deprived of his liberty by arrest or detention shall be entitled to take proceedings by which the lawfulness of his detention shall be decided speedily by a court and his release ordered if the detention is not lawful.' a

[25] The general rule is that detention in accordance with a determinate sentence imposed by a court is justified under art 5(1)(a), without the need for further reviews of detention under art 5(4) (see David Feldman Civil Liberties and Human Rights in England and Wales (2nd edn, 2002) p 446). Article 5(1)(a) is concerned with the question whether the detention is permissible. Its object and purpose is to ensure that no one should be dispossessed of his liberty in an arbitrary fashion, and its provisions call for a narrow interpretation (see Winterwerp v Netherlands (1979) 2 EHRR 387 at 402 (para 37)). The conviction does not have to be lawful in order to satisfy this requirement, but the detention must be. This means (i) that it must be lawful under domestic law, (ii) that it must conform to the general requirements of the convention as to the quality of the law in question—its accessibility and the precision with which it is formulated and (iii) that it must not be arbitrary because, for example, it was resorted to in bad faith or was not proportionate (see R v Governor of Brockhill Prison, ex p Evans (No 2) [2000] 4 All ER 15 at 29–30, [2001] 2 AC 19 at 38; McLeod v UK [1999] 1 FCR 193 at 105 (para 41)). Detention in accordance with a lawful sentence of imprisonment imposed by a judge on the prisoner for an offence of which he has been convicted satisfied these requirements. b c d

[26] Article 5(4), on the other hand, is concerned with the need for the detention to be reviewed in order that it may be determined whether it is lawful both in terms of domestic law and in terms of the convention. Its purpose is to ensure that a system is in place for the lawfulness of the detention to be decided speedily by a court and for release of the detainee to be ordered if it is not lawful. The general rule, as I have said, is that detention in accordance with a determinate sentence imposed by a court is regarded as justified under art 5(1)(a) without the need for any further reviews of the detention to be carried out under art 5(4). The question which Mr Fitzgerald has raised is whether that rule, which undoubtedly applies to determinate sentences imposed under s 2(2)(a), can be applied also to determinate sentences imposed under s 2(2)(b) of the 1991 Act. It was agreed that the answer to it is to be found in the jurisprudence of the European Court of Human Rights, to which I now turn. e f

THE STRASBOURG JURISPRUDENCE g

[27] The European Court of Human Rights has made it clear from the earliest days that a clear distinction exists between decisions depriving a person of his liberty which are made by an administrative body on the one hand and by a court on the other. In De Wilde v Belgium (No 1) (1971) 1 EHRR 373 at 407 (para 76) the court said: h

> 'At first sight, the wording of Article 5 (4) might make one think that it guarantees the right of the detainee always to have supervised by a court the lawfulness of a previous decision which has deprived him of his liberty ... Where the decision depriving a person of his liberty is one taken by an administrative body, there is no doubt that Article 5 (4) obliges the Contracting States to make available to the person detained a right of recourse to a court; but there is nothing to indicate that the same applies when the decision is made by a court at the close of judicial proceedings. In the latter case, the supervision required by Article 5 (4) is incorporated in the decision; this is so, for example, where a sentence of imprisonment is j pronounced after "conviction by a competent court" (Art. 5 (1) (a) of the Convention).'

[28] In Winterwerp v Netherlands (1979) 2 EHRR 387 at 408 (para 55), the court observed that the European Commission of Human Rights (the Commission), citing its own case law, had put forward the view that, as it stood, the conclusion by the court in De Wilde's case could not be sustained in the case of confinement of persons of unsound mind, at any rate when the confinement was for an indefinite period. This was because the reasons initially warranting confinement of persons on the ground of unsound mind might cease to exist. Consequently, it would be contrary to the object and purpose of art 5 to interpret para 4 of that article as making this category of confinement immune from subsequent review of lawfulness merely provided the initial decision issued from a court. The very nature of the deprivation of liberty under consideration appeared to require a review of lawfulness to be available at reasonable intervals. The Commission's views were upheld by the court in that case. But it was made clear (at 408 (para 57)) that the detention of persons of unsound mind constituted a special category. By virtue of art 5(4) therefore a person of unsound mind who is compulsorily detained in a psychiatric institution for an indefinite or lengthy period is in principle entitled, at any rate where there is no automatic periodic review of a judicial character, to take proceedings at reasonable intervals before a court for the determination of the lawfulness of his detention (see X v UK (1981) 4 EHRR 188 at 207 (para 52)).

[29] The European Court of Human Rights has recognised that offenders sentenced to discretionary life imprisonment also fall into a special category. In Weeks v UK (1988) 10 EHRR 293 the applicant, who was aged 17, had been convicted of armed robbery and sentenced to life imprisonment in the interests of public safety because he was considered both by the trial judge and the Court of Appeal to be dangerous. The court said (at 310 (para 46)):

> 'The Court agrees with the Commission and the applicant that the clearly stated purpose for which [the] sentence was imposed, taken together with the particular facts pertaining to the offence for which he was convicted, places the sentence in a special category.'

Later in the same paragraph (at 311) the court observed that, in substance, Mr Weeks was being put at the disposal of the state because he needed continued supervision in custody for an unforeseeable length of time and, as a corollary, periodic reassessment in order to ascertain the most appropriate way of dealing with him, and added:

> 'The grounds expressly relied on by the sentencing courts for ordering this form of deprivation of liberty against Mr. Weeks are by their very nature susceptible of change with the passage of time, whereas the measure will remain in force for the whole of his life. In this, his sentence differs from a life sentence imposed on a person because of the gravity of the offence.'

In Wynne v UK (1995) 19 EHRR 333 at 347 (para 35) the court held that the mandatory life sentence belonged to a different category because it is imposed automatically as punishment for the offence of murder irrespective of conditions pertaining to the dangerousness of the offender. It saw this as an essential distinction between the two types of sentence.

[30] In Thynne, Wilson and Gunnell v UK (1990) 13 EHRR 666 the applicants had each received discretionary life sentences. They complained about the lack of a regular judicial scrutiny of the lawfulness of their detention and, in the case of the second and third applicants, their re-detention. The court said (at 693 (para 73)) that it was not persuaded that it was impossible to disentangle the punitive and security components of such sentences:

> 'Although the dividing line may be difficult to draw in particular cases, it seems clear that the principles underlying such sentences, unlike mandatory life sentences, have developed in the sense that they are composed of a punitive element and subsequently of a security element designed to confer on the Secretary of State the responsibility for determining when the public interest permits the prisoner's release.'

Having examined the judgments of the sentencing courts in each case the court concluded (at 694 (para 76)) that in each of them the punitive period of the discretionary life sentence had expired.

> 'Having regard to the foregoing, the Court finds that the detention of the applicants after the expiry of the punitive periods of their sentences is comparable to that at issue in Van Droogenbroeck v Belgium ((1982) 4 EHRR 443) and Weeks v UK ((1988) 10 EHRR 293): the factors of mental instability and dangerousness are susceptible to change over the passage of time and new issues of lawfulness may thus arise in the course of detention. It follows that at this phase in the execution of their sentences, the applicants are entitled under Article 5(4) to take proceedings to have the lawfulness of their continued detention decided by a court at reasonable intervals and to have the lawfulness of any re-detention determined by a court.'

[31] There is an obvious link between the analysis of the discretionary life sentence which was undertaken in that case and a determinate sentence which is longer than one which is commensurate with the offence passed under s 2(2)(b) of the 1991 Act. In both cases, it can be said, there is a punitive element and a protective or security element. In both cases, it can be said, the factors which justified the protective or security element are susceptible to change with the passage of time. That, in essence, is the basis of Mr Fitzgerald's argument. As he puts it, determinate sentences which are partly punitive and partly preventative are in the same category. He says that they too require a determination, once the preventative phase is entered, as to whether that characteristic is still there and a review of that question thereafter at reasonable intervals.

[32] But there is one other point about the discretionary life sentence which emerges from these judgments which a determinate custodial sentence does not share. As the court observed, the effect of a discretionary life sentence was to put the prisoner at the disposal of the state (see Weeks v UK (1988) 10 EHRR 293 at 311 (para 46)). This was because it conferred on the Secretary of State the responsibility of determining when the public interest permitted the prisoner's release (see Thynne, Wilson and Gunnell v UK (1990) 13 EHRR 666 at 693 (para 73)).

[33] The procedure for periodic review of the public safety element has now been changed, following the decision of the European Court of Human Rights in Hussain v UK (1996) 22 EHRR 1, in which it was held that there had been a violation of art 5(4) because the applicant who had been detained at Her Majesty's pleasure was unable, after the expiry of his punitive period, to bring the case of his continued detention before a court. The court said (at 25 (para 54)) that he was entitled under art 5(4) to have the issue of his dangerousness to society, a characteristic susceptible to change with the passage of time, decided by a court at reasonable intervals (see also Stafford v UK (2002) 13 BHRC 260 at 282 (para 87)). A review of the protective element at reasonable intervals conducted by a judicial body at an oral hearing under the rules of the Parole Board satisfies the requirement which these decisions of the European Court identified. But does art 5(4) give rise to the same requirement where, as happens in the case of a determinate sentence, the length of the sentence is determined by the sentencing court at the outset—where, in other words, the length of time that is needed to satisfy the protective element is incorporated in the court's decision and is not left to the Executive?

[34] In order to find an answer to this question it is necessary to go back in time to Van Droogenbroeck v Belgium (1982) 4 EHRR 443 and E v Norway (1990) 17 EHRR 30, as these decisions formed an important part of the jurisprudence which the court examined in Thynne's case and in Weeks' case.

[35] In Van Droogenbroeck's case the applicant was sentenced by the criminal court to two years' imprisonment for theft and attempted theft. He had a previous conviction for aggravated theft and he was thought to have manifested a persistent tendency to crime. So he was ordered to be placed at the government's disposal for ten years on the ground that he was a recidivist. Under Belgian law this disposal, which was provided for by the Social Protection Act 1964 in the case of recidivists and habitual offenders and was subject to appeal, was classified not as a security measure but as a penalty which formed an inseparable whole together with the principal penalty. But it also conferred a wide measure of discretion on the Minister of Justice in deciding how the penalty should be implemented. The measures which were at his discretion under the statute included the offender's conditional release either at the end of the principal sentence or during the course of his detention.

[36] Before the Commission it was argued for the respondent government under reference to De Wilde v Belgium (No 1) (1971) 1 EHRR 373 that the applicant's detention, which was imposed by virtue of a court sentence, was simply an execution of that sentence and that it could not form the subject of proceedings under art 5(4) distinct from those which were embodied in the court's conviction and sentence. As the Commission noted (see report of the Commission, 9 July 1980, p 26 (para 62)), this raised the question whether the principle stated by the court 'of the incorporation of the control' provided for in art 5(4) in the original court decision can be applied in circumstances where neither the law nor the court specified a minimum or normal duration for the deprivation of liberty. Having regard to the nature of the deprivation of liberty and to factors which might affect its lawfulness subsequent to the original court decision, the Commission upheld the complaint. The key to its reasoning, for present purposes, is to found at p 27 (para 64):

> 'The most significant feature of detention ordered in connection with placing at the government's disposal is, as has already been pointed out, the relative indetermination of its duration. Depending on the case and the relevant administrative decisions, it may vary from nothing to ten years. No minimum duration is fixed by the law or the court; the detention may continue for a maximum period of ten years, without the court which ordered the measure exercising the least control over it. In fact, the administration is responsible for adjusting the penalty to the circumstances of the individual.' (My emphasis.)

[37] The approach which the court adopted ((1982) 4 EHRR 443 at 456 (para 38)) was to look beyond the appearances and the language used and concentrate on the realities of the situation. Considering first the question whether there had been a violation of art 5(1)(a), the conclusion which it drew, adopting the language used by the Commission's delegate, was that the court decision does not 'order' the detention of recidivists and habitual offenders but 'authorises' it. The task which it then set itself was to consider whether there was a sufficient connection between that decision and the deprivation of liberty. It answered this question in the affirmative, since the minister's discretion was exercised within a framework set both by the statute and by the sentence pronounced by the court. So there was no violation of art 5(1)(a). But it took a different view of the question whether there had been a violation of art 5(4). It noted that, in practice, the court's decision provided the Minister of Justice with initial authority for detention for a period whose actual duration was striking for its relatively indeterminate character and could vary, in principle, according to the treatment required by the offender and the demands of the protection of society. This system, it held (at 460 (para 47)), was fundamentally different from that of the conditional release of prisoners 'sentenced by a court to a period of imprisonment imposed by the court as being appropriate to the case' (my emphasis).

[38] Turning to the complaint under art 5(4), the court pointed out (at 458 (para 45)) that when it referred in its judgment in De Wilde's case to 'the decision depriving a person of his liberty' it did not purport to deal with an ensuing period of detention in which new issues affecting the lawfulness of the detention might subsequently arise. It recalled (at 461 (para 48)) that for the purposes of art 5(4) the lawfulness of an arrest or detention had to be determined in the light not only of domestic law but also of the text of the convention, the general principles embodied in it and the aim of the restrictions permitted by art 5(1).

> 'Quite apart from conformity with domestic law, "no detention that is arbitrary can ever be regarded as 'lawful'" for the purposes of paragraph 1. This is the limit which the Minister of Justice must not exceed in the exercise of the wide discretion he enjoys in executing, or implementing, the initial court decision. This requirement is rendered all the more compelling by the seriousness of what is at stake, namely the possibility that the individual may be deprived of his liberty for up to 10 years ... or even longer ... This type of detention would no longer be in conformity with the Convention if it ceased to be based on reasons that are plausible and consistent with the objectives of the Social Protection Act; for the purposes of Article 5, it would become "unlawful".'

The court concluded (at 462 (para 49)) that the convention required an appropriate procedure allowing a court to determine speedily, on the prisoner's application, whether the Minister of Justice was entitled to hold that detention was still consistent with the object and purpose of the 1964 Act. This was not just a question of expediency. It bore on the very 'lawfulness' of the deprivation of liberty.

[39] In E v Norway (1990) 17 EHRR 30 the applicant had suffered serious brain damage and was an untreatable psychopath. He was convicted of numerous violent offences and sentenced to a period of imprisonment. He was also sentenced to preventive detention under the Norwegian Penal Code, as result of which he was detained in mental hospitals. The effect of this sentence was to enable the Ministry of Justice to monitor his progress and to release or detain him when this would prove appropriate. It gave the ministry a wide discretion in deciding which of various possible security measures was to be imposed and for how long. The court observed (at 51 (para 52)) that this system shared a number of features with the Belgian system in regard to recidivists and habitual offenders which was at issue in Van Droogenbroeck's case:

> 'Under such systems the courts cannot at the time of their decisions do more than assess how the person concerned will develop in the future. The authorities, on the other hand, through and with the assistance of their officers, can monitor that development more closely and at frequent intervals.'

However, there was a risk, as in Van Droogenbroeck's case, that with the passage of time the link between the ministry's decision not to release or to re-detain and the initial judgment might be broken with the result that it would be transformed into a deprivation of liberty that was arbitrary.

[40] The important point which emerges from these two decisions for present purposes is that a distinction is drawn between detention for a period whose length is embodied in the sentence of the court on the one hand and the transfer of decisions about the prisoner's release or re-detention to the executive. The first requirement that must be satisfied is that according to art 5(1) the detention must be 'lawful'. That is to say, it must be in accordance with domestic law and not arbitrary. The review under art 5(4) must then be wide enough to bear on the conditions which are essential for a determination of this issue. Where the decision about the length of the period of detention is made by a court at the close of judicial proceedings, the requirements of art 5(1) are satisfied and the supervision required by art 5(4) is incorporated in the decision itself. That is the principle which was established in De Wilde v Belgium (No 1) (1971) 1 EHRR 373. But where the responsibility for decisions about the length of the period of detention is passed by the court to the Executive, the lawfulness of the detention requires a process which enables the basis for it to be reviewed judicially at reasonable intervals. This is because there is a risk that the link between continued detention and the original justification for it will be lost as conditions change with the passage of time. If this happens there is a risk that decisions which are taken by the Executive will be arbitrary. That risk is absent where the length of the period of detention is fixed as part of its original decision by the court.

[41] Elias J ([2002] 1 WLR 654 at [19], [28]) understood the effect of the Strasbourg jurisprudence to be that the detention was lawful only if it continues to achieve the object for which it was imposed, and that no distinction was to be drawn in this respect between sentences which were determinate and indeterminate. In my opinion however that is not the decisive factor. The critical distinction is that which the European Court of Human Rights has made between cases where the length of the detention is fixed by the court and those where decisions about its length are left to the Executive. It is in the latter case only that new issues of lawfulness may arise in the course of the detention which were not incorporated in the original decision by the court.

[42] In Mansell v UK App No 32072/96 (2 July 1997, unreported), the judge imposed a longer than commensurate sentence in an indecent assault case to protect the public under s 2(2)(b) of the 1991 Act. The applicant complained that he should have been entitled to a review of the lawfulness of his detention as he was in the same position as a discretionary life prisoner because his sentence contained a preventative part as well as a punitive part. The Commission held that the application was manifestly unfounded. It recalled that the supervision required by art 5(4) is normally incorporated in the decision where a sentence of imprisonment is pronounced after conviction by a competent court (see De Wilde v Belgium (No 1) (1971) 1 EHRR 373 at 407 (para 76)). It then said that there was no question of the sentence being imposed because of the presence of factors which 'were susceptible to change with the passage of time, namely mental instability and dangerousness' (see Thynne, Wilson and Gunnell v UK (1990) 13 EHRR 666 at 692 (para 70)). So the case did not fall into that special category. Rather there was, it said, 'an element of "simple" punishment as well as an element of deterrence'. The fact that what it described as 'the latter part' of the sentence had been imposed to protect the public from serious harm was accepted. But it did not affect the basic point which the Commission then sought to identify:

> 'Such an "increased" sentence is, however, no more than the usual exercise by the sentencing court of its ordinary sentencing powers, even if the "increase" has a statutory basis. In particular, nothing in the sentencing procedure indicates that the fixed term sentence of five years' imprisonment was anything other than a sentence which was imposed as punishment for the offences committed.'

[43] Mr Fitzgerald said that the Commission had misunderstood the nature of the sentence which the judge had passed in that case. It was also a decision by the Commission and not by the court. He submitted that, as it was not part of the clear and constant part of the court's jurisprudence, it should be treated with caution especially as there was no avenue for redressing what he said was its erroneous understanding of the nature and rationale of the sentence.

[44] It is true that it was a decision by the Commission only, and I note that in the Court of Appeal Kennedy LJ ([2002] 3 All ER 1123 at [17], [2003] 2 WLR 196 at [18]) said that he had difficulty in following some of the reasoning. But it seems to me that on all the essential points its reasoning was consistent with the court's jurisprudence. The Commission's observation that there was no question of the sentence being imposed because of factors that were susceptible to change has to be read in the light of the previous sentence in which the sentence is described as a 'fixed term sentence' and the discussion in the previous paragraph of the cases to which the normal rule in De Wilde's case does not apply. The point is then made that what the Commission described as 'the increased sentence' was no more than the usual exercise by the sentencing court of its ordinary sentencing powers. That provides the context for the final observation that there was nothing to indicate that the fixed-term sentence was anything other than a sentence which was imposed as punishment for the offences committed. It was to be contrasted, in other words, with an indeterminate sentence where the circumstances which were thought by the court initially to warrant detention might cease to exist. As Kennedy LJ said, the case was one where a period of time was fixed precisely because the sentencing judge considered that he was in a position to fix it.

[45] I do not accept Mr Fitzgerald's criticism of this decision, although I agree that it might have been better expressed. Properly understood, it seems to me to fit in well with the other cases and to be consistent with what I take from the court's jurisprudence to be the guiding principles.

[46] In Silva Rocha v Portugal (1996) 32 EHRR 333 the applicant went to trial on charges of aggravated homicide and illegal possession of weapons. The facts were found to have been established, but the court also found that his mentally disturbed state prevented a finding of criminal responsibility. It held that he was a dangerous person who could not be responsible for his actions and ordered him to be detained in a psychiatric asylum. In accordance with the Portuguese Criminal Code this security measure was to remain in force for a minimum period of three years. The Portuguese government said that this period had been fixed for general deterrence reasons. The applicant challenged the lawfulness of his detention under art 5(1) and maintained that there had been a violation of art 5(4) because there was no provision for judicial supervision of his confinement. The Commission held that the case could not be distinguished from the cases of Winterwerp v Netherlands (1979) 2 EHRR 387 and X v UK (1981) 4 EHRR 188 and declared his complaint admissible. But the court held, by six votes to three, that there was no violation.

[47] The court held that the applicant had been lawfully detained within the meaning of art 5(1). It gave the following reasons for its decision that there had been no violation of art 5(4) ((1996) 32 EHRR 333 at 344):

> '28 The case involved a homicide committed by a person who could not be held responsible for his actions and who was at the same time dangerous. The seriousness of the offences together with the risk that he represented for himself as well as for others could reasonably justify his being removed from society for at least three years.
>
> 29 For that period the review required by Article 5(4) of the Convention was incorporated in the detention decision taken in this instance by the Oporto Criminal Court.
>
> 30 It was therefore not until those three years had elapsed that the applicant's right to "take proceedings by which the lawfulness of his detention shall be decided ... by a court" at reasonable intervals took effect. In this respect the Court notes that the legislation applied to Mr Silva Rocha (Article 93 of the Criminal Code), provided for a periodic and automatic judicial review after two years and made it possible for the person detained to apply to the court at any moment to have the detention measure lifted.'

The court concluded (at 344 (para 31)) that the intervals between the reviews were not excessive in these circumstances and noted that Mr Silva Rocha was discharged as soon as he had ceased to be dangerous.

[48] Mr Pannick said that this judgment recognised that, where a person had been detained by a judicial decision for a fixed period, the fact that this was by reason of a factor which might change over time did not give rise to a right for the sentence to be further reviewed by a court during that period. Mr Fitzgerald, on the other hand, submitted that the ratio of the case was concerned solely with the length of time which could elapse between reviews. The court's finding, he said, was simply that it was not unreasonable in the case of a person who had committed such a serious offence for the first review to be delayed for at least two years from the actual time of sentence. The context was that of a period which had been selected for reasons of general deterrence, not the characteristics of the offender.

[49] I think that it would be unwise to draw any firm conclusions from this judgment other than that the court was seeking to find an answer to the question raised by the unusual facts of the case which was in keeping with the jurisprudence established by the earlier cases. The reasons for the decision in the court's judgment are far from elaborate. Three of the judges in the majority took the unusual step of annexing concurring opinions to the court's judgment, and a dissenting opinion by the minority was also annexed to it. The President, Judge Ryssdal, who was in the majority, said (at 345) that the facts as assessed by the competent domestic courts showed that the applicant's mental disorder and his danger to society persisted throughout the period of three years and that on the facts there had been no violation. It was indeed the fact that there had been a series of reviews at reasonable intervals, and the applicant was discharged as soon as he had ceased to be considered dangerous. The case is best seen as a decision on its own facts which does not add to or detract from the guidance which is to be obtained from the other cases.

[50] A convenient summary of the guidance which is to be obtained from the Strasbourg jurisprudence is to be found in Iribarne Perez v France (1995) 22 EHRR 153. The applicant's complaint in that case was that, having been convicted and sentenced in Andorra, no provision had been made for the lawfulness of his detention to be reviewed in France where he had chosen to serve his sentence. The court, holding that there had been no violation, said (at 173–174 (para 30)):

> 'The Court refers to its case law on this question. The review required by Article 5(4) is incorporated in the decision depriving a person of his liberty when that decision is made by a court at the close of judicial proceedings; this is so, for example, where a sentence of imprisonment is pronounced after "conviction by a competent court" within the meaning of Article 5(1)(a) of the Convention. Only the "initial decision" is contemplated, not "an ensuing period of detention in which new issues affecting the lawfulness of the detention might subsequently arise". [Reference is made in footnotes to De Wilde v Belgium (No 1) (1971) 1 EHRR 373 and X v UK (1981) 4 EHRR 188 at 206 (para 51).] However, Article 5(4) sometimes requires the possibility of subsequent review of the lawfulness of detention by a court. This usually applies to the detention of persons of unsound mind within the meaning of paragraph 1(e), where the reasons initially warranting confinement may cease to exist: "... it would be contrary to the object and purpose of Article 5 ... to interpret paragraph 4 thereof ... as making this category of confinement immune from subsequent review of lawfulness merely provided that the initial decision issued from a court". [Reference is made in a footnote to Winterwerp v Netherlands (1979) 2 EHRR 387 at 407–408 (para 55) and to X v UK (1981) 4 EHRR 188 at 206–207 (para 52).] The same principle applies to the detention "after conviction by a competent court" mentioned in paragraph 1(a), but only in certain quite specific circumstances. These include, for example, the placing of a recidivist at the Government's disposal in Belgium, the continuing detention of a person sentenced to an "indeterminate" or "discretionary" life sentence in Great Britain and the detention for security reasons of a person with an underdeveloped or permanently impaired mental capacity in Norway.' [Reference is made in footnotes to Van Droogenbroeck v Belgium (1982) 4 EHRR 443; Weeks v UK (1988) 10 EHRR 293; Thynne, Wilson and Gunnell v UK (1990) 13 EHRR 666; and E v Norway (1990) 17 EHRR 30.]

CONCLUSION

[51] It is plain from this summary that the basic rule which the court laid down in De Wilde's case continues to apply. Where the prisoner has been lawfully detained within the meaning of art 5(1)(a) following the imposition of a determinate sentence after his conviction by a competent court, the review which art 5(4) requires is incorporated in the original sentence passed by the sentencing court. Once the appeal process has been exhausted there is no right to have the lawfulness of the detention under that sentence reviewed by another court. The principle which underlies these propositions is that detention in accordance with a lawful sentence passed after conviction by a competent court cannot be described as arbitrary. The cases where the basic rule has been departed from are cases where decisions as to the length of the detention have passed from the court to the Executive and there is a risk that the factors which informed the original decision will change with the passage of time. In those cases the review which art 5(4) requires cannot be said to be incorporated in the original decision by the court. A further review in judicial proceedings is needed at reasonable intervals if the detention is not to be at risk of becoming arbitrary.

[52] I would hold that the present case falls within the basic rule. The review which art 5(4) requires was incorporated in the sentence which the judge passed under s 2(2)(b) of the 1991 Act. This is because he fixed the period of the sentence which was needed to protect the public from serious harm. He was able to take this decision in the light of the information before him and, in the exercise of his ordinary powers of sentencing, to decide on the total length of the sentence which in all the circumstances was appropriate. As he was able to take this decision at the outset there is no risk that detention for the minimum period fixed by the sentence will become arbitrary. The appellant has no further right under art 5(4) to have his detention for the minimum period fixed by that sentence reviewed judicially.

[53] For these reasons, and for those given by my noble and learned friend Lord Bingham of Cornhill, I would dismiss the appeal.

LORD HUTTON.

[54] My Lords, on 10 January 1997, following pleas of guilty, the appellant was sentenced to four years' imprisonment for an offence of unlawful wounding and, consecutively, to a period of three years' imprisonment for an offence of assault occasioning actual bodily harm. The total sentence of seven years' imprisonment was imposed pursuant to the powers contained in s 2 of the Criminal Justice Act 1991 which provides:

'(1) This section applies where a court passes a custodial sentence other than one fixed by law.

(2) The custodial sentence shall be—(a) for such term (not exceeding the permitted maximum) as in the opinion of the court is commensurate with the seriousness of the offence, or the combination of the offence and one or more offences associated with it; or (b) where the offence is a violent or sexual offence, for such longer term (not exceeding that maximum) as in the opinion of the court is necessary to protect the public from serious harm from the offender.

(3) Where the court passes a custodial sentence for a term longer than is commensurate with the seriousness of the offence, or the combination of the offence and one or more offences associated with it, the court shall—(a) state in open court that it is of the opinion that subsection (2)(b) above applies and why it is of that opinion; and (b) explain to the offender in open court and in ordinary language why the sentence is for such a term.

(4) A custodial sentence for an indeterminate period shall be regarded for the purposes of subsections (2) and (3) above as a custodial sentence for a term longer than any actual term.'

[55] In passing sentence in the Crown Court at Nottingham Judge Bennett stated:

'I am satisfied that the offences that you have committed led to physical injury to persons and are, accordingly, offences of violence within the law and I am of the opinion that it is necessary to pass a custodial sentence which is longer than the sentence which would be commensurate with the seriousness of the offences in order to protect the public and Mr Johnson in particular from serious harm from you.'

[56] In his judgment on the appeal by the Secretary of State to the Court of Appeal from the decision of Elias J ([2001] EWHC Admin 834, [2002] 1 WLR 654), May LJ accurately summarised the nature of the sentence imposed on the appellant as follows (omitting sub-para (c) which refers to judgments of the European Court of Human Rights) ([2002] EWCA Civ 951 at [18], [2002] 3 All ER 1123 at [18], [2003] 2 WLR 196):

'(a) A sentence under s 2(2)(b) of the Criminal Justice Act 1991—now s 80(2)(b) of the Powers of Criminal Courts (Sentencing) Act 2000—is a single determinate sentence, the product of a judicial decision. (b) Although the sentence is longer than it otherwise would have been because the sentencing judge is of the opinion that it is necessary to protect the public from serious harm from the offender, (i) the length of the sentence is, and is intended to be, determined by the judge at the time of sentence; (ii) it is not intended to be reviewed, other than on appeal; and (iii) in particular, it is not intended to confer on the executive the responsibility for determining when the public interest permits the prisoner's release ... (d) Section 2(2)(b) applies to violent or sexual offences where the court is of the opinion that it is necessary to protect the public from serious harm from the offender. In some such combined circumstances, an indeterminate sentence may be an available alternative. Even if that is not so, and although the sentence requires an element of judicial prediction, the choice of sentence is a judicial decision that a longer term necessary to protect the public should be determined at the time of sentence.'

[57] The appellant submits that his continued detention under the sentence passed upon him after the punitive period of the sentence had expired constituted an infringement of his rights under art 5(4) of the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms 1950 (as set out in Sch 1 to the Human Rights Act 1998) which provides:

> 'Everyone who is deprived of his liberty by arrest or detention shall be entitled to take proceedings by which the lawfulness of his detention shall be decided speedily by a court and his release ordered if the detention is not lawful.'

The appellant contends that the period of his sentence imposed to protect the public and not for the purpose of punishment constituted arbitrary detention because he did not have the right, after he had served the punitive part of his sentence, to apply to a court to decide whether it was still necessary to detain him in order to protect the public.

[58] At first sight this would seem to be a difficult argument to advance because the sentence of seven years which the appellant served would appear to fall squarely within sub-para (a) of art 5(1) of the convention which provides:

> 'Everyone has the right to liberty and security of person. No one shall be deprived of his liberty save in the following cases and in accordance with a procedure prescribed by law: (a) the lawful detention of a person after conviction by a competent court …'

Moreover in De Wilde v Belgium (No 1) (1971) 1 EHRR 373 at 407 (para 76) the European Court of Human Rights stated:

> 'Where the decision depriving a person of his liberty is one taken by an administrative body, there is no doubt that Article 5 (4) obliges the Contracting States to make available to the person detained a right of recourse to a court; but there is nothing to indicate that the same applies when the decision is made by a court at the close of judicial proceedings. In the latter case, the supervision required by Article 5 (4) is incorporated in the decision; this is so, for example, where a sentence of imprisonment is pronounced after "conviction by a competent court" (Art. 5(1)(a) of the Convention).'

[59] However Mr Fitzgerald QC, for the appellant, submits that the jurisprudence of the European Court establishes that where a sentence of imprisonment consists of a punitive period at the outset followed by a further period designed to protect the public from the danger arising from the defendant's propensity to violence, the factor of the defendant's propensity to violence which influenced the sentencing judge to impose the additional period of imprisonment may change over the passage of time, and therefore the defendant is entitled to require a court to decide whether he should continue to be detained, and the denial of such a right makes the second period of his detention arbitrary.

[60] This argument is set out in the appellant's written case:

> 'A longer than commensurate determinate sentence comprises two distinct components. The first is punitive and on the expiration of this part the second, preventative phase of the sentence commences. The lawfulness of detention in this phase depends on whether the prisoner continues to pose an unacceptable risk. Dangerousness is a characteristic susceptible to change over time. The pronouncement of sentence by the sentencing judge is not, and is not capable of being, decisive as to the lawfulness of detention throughout the preventative phase. This is because the court can do no more than estimate for how long the offender may continue to pose an unacceptable risk. To prevent arbitrary detention the court can only authorise detention in the preventative phase as long as the offender continues to pose a danger. The lawfulness of detention falls to be re-determined in accordance with art 5(4) by reference to the question of ongoing dangerousness as soon as the punitive phase ceases to govern detention, and by reason of the changeable quality of dangerousness, at reasonable intervals thereafter ...'

[61] In courts throughout the United Kingdom it has been common for a sentencing judge, where he or she thinks it right to do so, to increase within reasonable bounds a sentence for a crime of violence in order to protect the public against the violent propensities of the accused. In R v Sargeant (1974) 60 Cr App R 74 at 77–78, Lawton LJ, a judge of great experience in the sphere of criminal law, stated:

'What ought the proper penalty to be? We have thought it necessary not only to analyse the facts, but to apply to those facts the classical principles of sentencing. Those classical principles are summed up in four words: retribution, deterrence, prevention and rehabilitation. Any judge who comes to sentence ought always to have those four classical principles in mind and to apply them to the facts of the case to see which of them has the greatest importance in the case with which he is dealing ... We come now to the element of prevention. Unfortunately it is one of the facts of life that there are some offenders for whom neither deterrence nor rehabilitation works. They will go on committing crimes as long as they are able to do so. In those cases the only protection which the public has is that such persons should be locked up for a long period.'

[62] One year earlier the same judge delivered the judgment of the Court of Appeal in R v King, R v Simpkins (1973) 57 Cr App R 696. In that case two men carried out a number of offences, including going equipped for stealing, burglary, possessing an imitation pistol, and carrying offensive weapons, which included an unloaded revolver for which they had no ammunition. They pleaded guilty to the charges against them. Their counsel read out a statement by them expressing anarchical views which included the passage (at 700–701):

'The police uphold the laws, which in turn ensure the safety of the capitalist exploiters and their system. Therefore the police, police stations and Courts are legitimate targets for acts of violence which are necessary to bring about badly needed changes in the structure of our society. Other legitimate targets are government ministers, officials and buildings, prisons and prison staff and troops.'

The judge was clearly influenced very considerably by this statement and it led him to impose the maximum sentence on each count to which the defendants had pleaded. In the Court of Appeal Lawton LJ observed that the offences for which the judge had passed these sentences were clearly not the worst of their kind and that therefore the maximum sentences should not have been imposed. He then said (at 702–703):

'The learned judge increased the sentences because of the statement read to the Court, and because of his view, for which there was ample evidence, that these young men were enemies of society. But the Court has to bear in mind that in our system of jurisprudence there is no offence known as being an enemy of society. The Court is concerned with the offences charged in the indictment. It may well be that at a trial the evidence establishes that those who have committed the offences charged are dangerous men. When the evidence establishes that the Court has no reason for mitigating the penalties in any way. If the evidence does establish that the accused are dangerous men, then it is no good their saying that they have no previous convictions, or that they are still young men. The evidence cancels out such mitigation as there is. But the fact remains that the correct principle for sentencing is to sentence for the offences charged and on the facts proved or admitted. In those circumstances the Court adjudges that these sentences will have to be altered.'

[63] In R v King, R v Simpkins the accused had not committed crimes of violence against other persons and the sentences imposed upon them by the judge were, in reality, sentences of preventive detention. Therefore I consider that the observations of Lawton LJ in that case and in R v Sargeant were not in conflict but were reflecting the distinction referred to by Mason CJ in Veen v The Queen (No 2) (1988) 164 CLR 465 at 473:

'It is one thing to say that the principle of proportionality precludes the imposition of a sentence extended beyond what is appropriate to the crime merely to protect society; it is another thing to say that the protection of society is not a material factor in fixing an appropriate sentence. The distinction in principle is clear between an extension merely by way of preventive detention, which is impermissible, and an exercise of the sentencing discretion having regard to the protection of society among other factors, which is permissible.'

[64] The question to be determined in the present case is whether the effect of art 5 of the convention, interpreted in accordance with the jurisprudence of the European Court, is that the appellant's post-punitive period of imprisonment pursuant to the determinate sentence passed upon him under s 2(2)(b) of the 1991 Act constituted detention which violated his rights under art 5(4).

[65] Mr Fitzgerald relies on the judgments of the European Court in Van Droogenbroeck v Belgium (1982) 4 EHRR 443, E v Norway (1990) 17 EHRR 30 and Thynne, Wilson and Gunnell v UK (1990) 13 EHRR 666. In the former case the applicant was sentenced to two years' imprisonment for theft and attempted theft and the court also ordered that he be 'placed at the Government's disposal' for ten years pursuant to s 23 of the Social Protection Act of 1 July 1964, the court noting that the applicant was a recidivist who had been sentenced by a criminal court on 9 April 1968 to two years' imprisonment for aggravated theft and who manifested a persistent tendency to crime. The court held that there had been a violation of art 5(4) because the applicant was entitled to a review of his detention once he had served his sentence of two years' imprisonment and had been placed at the government's disposal. An important part of the reasoning of the court is set out at 457 (para 40):

'In fact, sight must not be lost of what the title and general structure of the 1964 Act, the drafting history and Belgian case law show to be the objectives of this statute, that is to say not only "to protect society against the danger presented by recidivists and habitual offenders" but also "to provide [the Government] with the possibility of endeavouring to reform [them]". Attempting to achieve these objectives requires that account be taken of circumstances that, by their nature, differ from case to case and are susceptible of modification. At the time of its decision, the court can, in the nature of things, do no more than estimate how the individual will develop in the future. The Minister of Justice, for his part, is able, through and with the assistance of his officials, to monitor that development more closely and at frequent intervals but this very fact means that with the passage of time the link between his decisions not to release or to re-detain and the initial judgment gradually becomes less strong. The link might eventually be broken if a position were reached in which those decisions were based on grounds that had no connection with the objectives of the legislature and the court or on an assessment that was unreasonable in terms of those objectives. In those circumstances, a detention that was lawful at the outset would be transformed into a deprivation of liberty that was arbitrary and, hence, incompatible with Article 5.'

[66] The court also stated (at 460–461 (paras 47–48)):

'In practice, the court's decision provides the Minister of Justice "with initial authority for detention for a period ... whose actual duration"—"from nothing to 10 years"—is striking for its relatively indeterminate character and will vary, in principle, according to the treatment required by the offender and the demands of the protection of society ... As the Commission pointed out in paragraph 66 of its report, this system is fundamentally different from that—on which the Court does not have to express an opinion on this occasion—of the conditional release of prisoners sentenced by a court to a period of imprisonment imposed by the court as being appropriate to the case. The discretion enjoyed by the Minister of Justice under the 1964 Act implies that he should, throughout the period of application of the measure, direct his mind to the need to deprive or continue to deprive the person concerned of his liberty or to the absence or disappearance of such a need. "Persistent tendency to crime" and "danger to society" are essentially relative concepts and they involve monitoring the development of the offender's personality and behaviour in order to adapt his situation to favourable or unfavourable changes in his circumstances. To a certain extent this was recognised both by the Belgian legislature when it made it possible for the Court of Appeal to grant release from the effects of the initial judgment and by the Government when they set up the Recidivists Board and associated "medical officers specialised in psychology" with the decisions taken by the Minister. It must therefore be asked whether the very logic of the Belgian system does not require subsequent judicial review, at reasonable intervals, of the justification for the deprivation of liberty. If one were to consider such justification to have been established once and for all at the moment of conviction, this would amount, in a way, to a presumption that the detention would produce no useful result ... Quite apart from conformity with domestic law, "no detention that is arbitrary can ever be regarded as 'lawful'" for the purposes of paragraph 1. This is the limit which the Minister of Justice must not exceed in the exercise of the wide discretion he enjoys in executing, or implementing, the initial court decision. This requirement is rendered all the more compelling by the seriousness of what is at stake, namely the possibility that the individual may be deprived of his liberty for up to 10 years (s. 23 of the Act) or even longer (s. 22). This type of detention would no longer be in conformity with the Convention if it ceased to be based on reasons that are plausible and consistent with the objectives of the Social Protection Act; for the purposes of Article 5, it would become "unlawful".'

[67] In E v Norway (1990) 17 EHRR 30 at 40–41 (para 34) the applicant was an untreatable psychopath who had been convicted of numerous offences of violence. He was sentenced to a term of imprisonment and the court also made an order under art 39 of the Penal Code which provided:

'1. If an otherwise punishable act is committed ... by someone with an underdeveloped or permanently impaired mental capacity and there is a danger that the offender, because of his condition, will repeat such an act, the court may authorise the prosecuting authority, as a security measure, to ... (e) place him, whenever this is possible, in a mental hospital, sanatorium, nursing home or security ward, in accordance with the general provisions promulgated by the King; (f) keep him in detention in prison.'

Pursuant to this order the applicant had been detained in various mental hospitals and prisons for a considerable number of years. He alleged a breach of art 5(4) in that, while in detention, he had not had access to a court as required by para (4). The European Court applied the principle it had stated in Van Droogenbroeck's case and held that art 5(4) was applicable to the applicant's detention under art 39 of the Penal Code. The court stated (at 51 (para 52)):

'Under Article 39 of the Penal Code the Ministry of Justice has a wide discretion in deciding which security measure is to be imposed and for how long. In fact, this system shares a number of features with the Belgian system in regard to recidivists and habitual offenders which was at issue in the Van Droogenbroeck case.'

[68] In Thynne, Wilson and Gunnell v UK (1990) 13 EHRR 666 discretionary life sentences had been imposed on the applicants because, in addition to the need for punishment, they had each been considered by the court as dangerous and suffering from a mental or personality disorder which required treatment. Therefore their sentences each contained a punitive element and a preventative element, and the final decision on the prisoner's release rested with the Home Secretary. The court held that as the punitive period of detention had expired in each case the applicants were entitled to subsequent judicial control of their detention by virtue of art 5(4) and that there had been a violation of that paragraph of the article in the case of all three applicants. The court stated (at 693 (para 73)):

'it seems clear that the principles underlying such sentences, unlike mandatory life sentences, have developed in the sense that they are composed of a punitive element and subsequently of a security element designed to confer on the Secretary of State the responsibility for determining when the public interest permits the prisoner's release.'

And at 694 (para 76):

'Having regard to the foregoing, the Court finds that the detention of the applicants after the expiry of the punitive periods of their sentences is comparable to that at issue in (Van Droogenbroeck v Belgium (1982) 4 EHRR 443) and (Weeks v UK (1988) 10 EHRR 293): the factors of mental instability and dangerousness are susceptible to change over the passage of time and new issues of lawfulness may thus arise in the course of detention. It follows that at this phase in the execution of their sentences, the applicants are entitled under Article 5(4) to take proceedings to have the lawfulness of their continued detention decided by a court at reasonable intervals and to have the lawfulness of any re-detention determined by a court.'

[69] Mr Fitzgerald submits that as stated by the European Court in Van Droogenbroeck v Belgium (1982) 4 EHRR 443 at 461 (para 48): 'no detention that is arbitrary can ever be regarded as "lawful" for the purposes of paragraph 1 [of art 5]', and that detention under the post-punitive part of a determinate sentence passed pursuant to s 2(2)(b) of the 1991 Act is arbitrary because the dangerous propensity of the prisoner which existed at the time of the sentence may have changed with the passage of time and may require reassessment.

[70] I am unable to accept this submission because I consider that the judgments of the European Court on which Mr Fitzgerald relies do not support it and are distinguishable from the present case. I am further of opinion that there are decisions of the European Commission of Human Rights (the Commission) and of the European Court which are directly contrary to the submission. I consider that the essential element in the reasoning in Van Droogenbroeck's case, in E's case and in Thynne's case is that after the expiration of the period of detention for punishment the decision as to the further period for which the prisoner should be detained was handed over to the government. It is expressly stated in Van Droogenbroeck's case (at 444 (para 9)) that the applicant was 'placed at the Government's disposal'. The applicant submitted (at 455 (para 36)) that 'the deprivations of liberty complained of stemmed not from a sentence imposed by a "competent court" but from decisions taken by the Minister of Justice' and it is clear that the court accepted this submission. It was for this reason that the court stated (at 457 (para 40)) that because the Minister of Justice could monitor how the prisoner was developing—

'with the passage of time the link between his decisions not to release or to re-detain and the initial judgment gradually becomes less strong. The link might eventually be broken if a position were reached in which those decisions were based on grounds that had no connection with the objectives of the legislature and the court or on an assessment that was unreasonable in terms of those objectives.'

[71] The same reasoning informs the judgment of the European Court in Thynne, Wilson and Gunnell v UK (1990) 13 EHRR 666 at 693 (para 73). The court stated in relation to a life sentence that, after the punitive period, there is 'a security element designed to confer on the Secretary of State the responsibility for determining when the public interest permits the prisoner's release'. Making a clear reference to this responsibility conferred on the Secretary of State, the court then states (at 694 (para 76)):

'Having regard to the foregoing, the Court finds that the detention of the applicants after the expiry of the punitive periods of their sentences is comparable to that at issue in the Van Droogenbroeck and Weeks cases: the factors of mental instability and dangerousness are susceptible to change over the passage of time and new issues of lawfulness may thus arise in the course of detention.'

[72] The present case is distinguishable from Van Droogenbroeck's case, E's case and Thynne's case because here no discretion or responsibility was given to a government minister to decide when the prisoner should be released after he had served the punitive part of his sentence. The time when a prisoner serving a sentence of imprisonment for a term of four years or more becomes eligible for release (after having served one-half of his sentence) is fixed by s 35 of the 1991 Act, and he may only be released after that time on the recommendation of the Parole Board which acts as a judicial body. At all times the appellant was detained pursuant to the single sentence of the court and there was no breaking of the link between the initial judgment of the court and the continued detention of the appellant.

[73] It is also relevant to observe, as Mr Pannick QC for the respondents submitted, that there are a number of factors as to a defendant's future prospects, intentions and circumstances, such as his employment prospects or his family circumstances, in addition to his dangerous propensities, which a judge may properly take into account in deciding on the appropriate length of sentence, but the fact that those factors may change during the course of the sentence does not make the sentence arbitrary.

[74] In my opinion the jurisprudence of the Commission and the European Court has recognised that art 5(4) has no application where a prisoner is serving or has served a fixed-term sentence such as a sentence passed pursuant to s 2(2)(b) of the 1991 Act. In Mansell v UK App No 32072/96 (2 July 1997, unreported)) the applicant had served a determinate sentence imposed under s 2(2)(b) of the 1991 Act and he was thus in the same position as the appellant. He had been convicted on 17 December 1992 on three counts of indecent assaults on men, and he had been previously convicted in 1986 for an indecent assault and kidnapping of another man. In sentencing the applicant the judge stated that although a sentence of two-and-a-half years would normally be appropriate for an act of indecent assault, in his judgment, for reasons of protection of the public, the proper sentence was five years' imprisonment. The applicant claimed that there had been a violation of his rights under art 5(4) because his 'longer than normal' sentence should have attracted a special form of parole review from the moment that he served the period he would have served under a normal punitive sentence. The Commission held that the application was manifestly ill founded and declared it inadmissible. In its decision the Commission stated:

'In the present case, the Commission must determine whether the applicant was entitled, under art 5(4) of the convention, to a further review of the lawfulness of his detention after the expiry of the first two-and-a-half years of his sentence. The sentence imposed on the applicant was a fixed-term sentence of five years. There is no question of the sentence being imposed because of the presence of factors which "were susceptible to change with the passage of time, namely mental instability and dangerousness" (above mentioned Thynne, Wilson and Gunnell v UK (1990) 13 EHRR 666 at 692 (para 70)). Rather, there was an element of "simple" punishment as well as an element of deterrence. It is true that the latter part of the sentence was imposed pursuant to s 2 of the 1991 Act, which provides for sentences in the case of violent or sexual offences to be longer than "normal" in order to protect the public from serious harm. Such an "increased" sentence is, however, no more than the usual exercise by the sentencing court of its ordinary sentencing powers, even if the "increase" has a statutory basis. In particular, nothing in the sentencing procedure indicates that the fixed-term sentence of five years' imprisonment was anything other than a sentence which was imposed as punishment for the offences committed. It follows that the judicial control required by art 5(4) of the convention was incorporated in the original conviction and sentence, and that art 5(4) of the convention does not apply to the parole proceedings in which the applicant was denied an oral hearing.'

[75] Mr Fitzgerald contends that this decision was erroneous because the Commission made no reference to the judgments in Van Droogenbroeck's case and E's case, but I consider, for the reasons which I have given, that those decisions are clearly distinguishable and that the Commission did not err in omitting any reference to them.

[76] Counsel further submitted that the Commission erred in stating that there was no question of the sentence being imposed because of a factor such as dangerousness which was susceptible to change with the passage of time and that the sentence merely contained an element of 'simple' punishment. However the words 'It is true' in the relevant passage show that the Commission was fully aware that a sentence imposed under s 2(2)(b) of the 1991 Act is longer than a normal punitive sentence, and whilst the Commission's statement that there was nothing to indicate that the five-year sentence 'was anything other than a sentence which was imposed as punishment for the offences committed' can be criticised as less than fully accurate, I consider (as did Kennedy LJ in the Court of Appeal ([2002] 3 All ER 1123 at [17], [2003] 2 WLR 196 at [18]) that what the Commission was stressing was that the 'increased' sentence was 'no more than the usual exercise by the sentencing court of its ordinary sentencing powers'; in other words the Commission was recognising, as did Lawton LJ in R v Sargeant (1974) 60 Cr App R 74, that protecting the public from a violent criminal is a proper part of the ordinary process of sentencing.

[77] In my opinion the decision in Silva Rocha v Portugal (1996) 32 EHRR 333 also supports the respondents' submission that art 5(4) does not apply to a determinate sentence passed under s 2(2)(b) of the 1991 Act. In that case the applicant had killed a neighbour and was charged with aggravated homicide and illegal possession of weapons. The Oporto Criminal Court found that on account of his mentally disturbed state the applicant was criminally irresponsible and dangerous and ordered his detention in a psychiatric institution for the minimum period of three years which was expressly required by art 91(2) of the Portuguese Criminal Code. The European Court, by a majority, rejected the applicant's allegation that there had been a violation of art 5(4) because he had been unable to have the lawfulness of his continued detention reviewed by a court at reasonable intervals. The court stated (at 344):

'28 The case involved a homicide committed by a person who could not be held responsible for his actions and who was at the same time dangerous. The seriousness of the offences together with the risk that he represented for himself as well as for others could reasonably justify his being removed from society for at least three years.

29 For that period the review required by Article 5(4) of the Convention was incorporated in the detention decision taken in this instance by the Oporto Criminal Court.

30 It was therefore not until those three years had elapsed that the applicant's right to "take proceedings by which the lawfulness of his detention shall be decided ... by a court" at reasonable intervals took effect. In this respect the Court notes that the legislation applied to Mr Silva Rocha (Article 93 of the Criminal Code), provided for a periodic and automatic judicial review after two years and made it possible for the person detained to apply to the court at any moment to have the detention measure lifted.

31 In the present case, after the judgment of 13 July 1990 judicial reviews took place between 21 March and 29 June 1992 in February 1993 between 19 March and 3 May 1993 and over a period from the summer of 1993 to 9 January 1994. The Court considers that the intervals between the different reviews were not excessive. It notes that Mr Silva Rocha was discharged as soon as he had ceased to be regarded as dangerous.'

[78] Mr Fitzgerald submits that the ratio of the decision was not that art 5(4) does not apply to a fixed-term sentence imposed by a criminal court on a dangerous offender. He contends that the essential reasoning in the judgment was that in the case of a dangerous and mentally disordered offender who had taken another person's life, it was not unreasonable to delay the first judicial review for two years (the three-year period having commenced on remand and not with the order of the criminal court). He relies on paras 30 and 31 of the judgment. I am unable to accept that submission. Paragraph 23 of the court's judgment expressly records (at 342):

'The applicant complained that in any event he could be discharged only after three years even if it was established before the expiry of that period that he was no longer dangerous. Under the rules in issue there was therefore, he argued, no judicial review of the lawfulness of the detention before the expiry of the period, and that could not be regarded as reasonable under the Court's case law.'

This complaint was clearly rejected in paras 28 and 29 of the judgment and I consider that the second sentence in paras 30 and 31 on which Mr Fitzgerald relies relate to the period of detention after the three-year period required by art 91(2) of the Portugal Criminal Code had expired.

[79] Mr Fitzgerald submits in the alternative that the case is distinguishable from the present one because under Portuguese law the issue of general deterrence would justify the postponement of the first judicial review required by art 5(4) for a period of three years even though the object of the detention measure was primarily preventive. However, whilst this is a point of distinction from the present case, I consider that paras 28 and 29 constitute the central part of the reasoning of the judgment and support the respondents' case.

[80] Accordingly, I am of opinion that the decisions of the Commission and the European Court lead to the conclusion that there was no violation of art 5(4) in the present case and for the reasons which I have given, and also for those given by my noble and learned friends Lord Bingham of Cornhill and Lord Hope of Craighead, I would dismiss this appeal.

LORD SCOTT OF FOSCOTE.

[81] My Lords, I have had the advantage of reading the opinions of my noble and learned friends Lord Bingham of Cornhill, Lord Hope of Craighead and Lord Hutton. For the reasons they have given, with which I agree, I too would dismiss this appeal. a

Appeal dismissed.

Dilys Tausz Barrister.

Harrow London Borough Council v Qazi

[2003] UKHL 43

HOUSE OF LORDS

LORD BINGHAM OF CORNHILL, LORD STEYN, LORD HOPE OF CRAIGHEAD, LORD MILLETT AND LORD SCOTT OF FOSCOTE

9, 10 JUNE, 31 JULY 2003

Housing – Local authority – Possession – Local authority bringing automatic possession proceedings after secure tenancy terminated by operation of law – Whether automatic possession proceedings in breach of right to respect for home – Human Rights Act 1998, Sch 1, Pt I, art 8.

The appellant housing authority let one of its houses under a secure tenancy to the respondent tenant and his then wife as joint tenants. The wife moved out of the house and served on the authority a valid notice to quit, which had the effect in law of bringing the tenancy to an end. The respondent did not vacate the premises, in which he had lived for eight years, and the housing authority brought automatic possession proceedings in the county court. The respondent defended the proceedings, contending that in seeking a possession order the housing authority had failed to give effect to his right to respect for his home as required by art 8[a] of the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms 1950 (as set out in Sch 1 to the Human Rights Act 1998), that the housing authority's interference with his right had not been justified under art 8(2) of the convention; and that making a possession order would therefore be contrary to art 8. The judge, making the possession order, held that the effect of the notice to quit had been to determine the secure tenancy; that the tenancy had come to an end by the act of one of the joint tenants; that after the expiry of the notice period the respondent had no legal or equitable right or interest in the house and that accordingly the house had not been his home within the meaning of art 8(1) of the convention so that art 8 was not engaged. The respondent's appeal, on the basis that the judge had adopted too restrictive a definition of the word 'home', was successful in the Court of Appeal. The housing authority appealed to the House of Lords. The central question before the court was whether, having regard to the provisions of art 8(1), it was unlawful for a public authority landlord to recover possession from a former tenant by a procedure which led to possession being granted automatically when a tenancy had been terminated by operation of law. The respondent contended that the premises had not ceased to be his 'home' within art 8(1) simply because it had become unlawful for him to reside in it; that art 8(1) was therefore engaged; and that the appellants had therefore to justify their claim for possession.

Held – (1) The concept of 'home' for the purposes of art 8 was not limited to premises which were lawfully occupied; it depended on the existence of sufficient and continuous links with the premises. In the instant case those links existed so the fact that the respondent's tenancy had come to an end did not mean that the premises had ceased to be his home. The effect of an order for possession would be to require the respondent to leave the premises which were his home and art 8 was therefore engaged (see [11], [29], [63], [66], [68], [70], [71], [95], [99], [147], below); Buckley v UK (1996) 23 EHRR 101 applied.

a Article 8 is set out at [35], below

(2) (Lord Bingham of Cornhill and Lord Steyn dissenting) Such interference with the right to respect for the home as flowed from the application of the law which enabled a public authority landlord to exercise its unqualified right to recover possession, following service of a notice to quit which terminated the tenancy, with a view to making the premises available for letting to others on its housing list, did not violate the essence of the right to respect for the home under art 8(1). In the instant case the appellants' right to immediate possession was unqualified in domestic law and the premises, once recovered, would be available for letting to others who were in need of housing in the appellants' area. Accordingly, the appeal would be allowed (see [77], [83], [84], [110], [152], below); Ure v UK App No 28027/95 (27 November 1996, unreported) applied.

Notes

For the right to respect for private and family life, home and correspondence generally, for respect for home in particular, and for what consitutes respect and interference, see 8(2) Halsbury's Laws (4th edn reissue) paras 149, 152, 154, 155.

For the Human Rights Act 1998, Sch 1 Pt I, art 8, see 7 Halsbury's Statutes (4th edn) (2002 reissue).

Cases referred to in opinions

Belgian Linguistic Case (No 2) (1968) 1 EHRR 252, [1968] ECHR 1474/62, ECt HR.
Buckley v UK (1996) 23 EHRR 101, [1996] ECHR 20348/92, ECt HR and E Com HR.
Chapman v UK (2001) 10 BHRC 48, ECt HR.
Di Palma v UK (1988) 10 EHRR 149, E Com HR.
Di Palma v Victoria Square Property Co Ltd [1984] 2 All ER 92, [1984] Ch 346, [1984] 2 WLR 761; affd [1985] 2 All ER 676, [1986] Ch 150, [1985] 3 WLR 207, CA.
Gillow v UK (1986) 11 EHRR 335, [1986] ECHR 9063/80, ECt HR.
Hatton v UK [2003] All ER (D) 122 (Jul), ECt HR.
Hunter v Canary Wharf Ltd [1997] 2 All ER 426, [1997] AC 655, [1997] 2 WLR 684, HL.
JA Pye (Oxford) Ltd v Graham [2002] UKHL 30, [2002] 3 All ER 865, [2003] 1 AC 419, [2002] 3 WLR 221; rvsg [2001] EWCA Civ 117, [2001] Ch 804, [2001] 2 WLR 1293.
James v UK (1986) 8 EHRR 123, [1986] ECHR 8793/79, ECt HR.
Khatun v UK (1998) 26 EHRR CD 212, E Com HR.
Lambeth London BC v Howard [2001] EWCA Civ 468, (2001) 33 HLR 636.
Larkos v Cyprus (1999) 7 BHRC 244, ECt HR.
Mabey v UK (1996) 22 EHRR CD 123, E Com HR.
Marckx v Belgium (1979) 2 EHRR 330, [1979] ECHR 6833/74, ECt HR.
Marzari v Italy (1999) 28 EHRR CD 175, E Com HR.
Minister of Home Affairs v Fisher [1979] 3 All ER 21, [1980] AC 319, [1979] 2 WLR 889, PC.
O'Rourke v UK App No 39022/97 (26 June 2001, unreported), ECt HR.
P v UK App No 14751/89 (12 December 1990, unreported), E Com HR.
Poplar Housing and Regeneration Community Association Ltd v Donoghue [2001] EWCA Civ 595, [2001] 4 All ER 604, [2002] QB 48, [2001] 3 WLR 183.

R (on the application of Gangera) v Hounslow London BC [2003] EWHC 794 (Admin), [2003] All ER (D) 200 (Apr).

R (on the application of McLellan) v Bracknell Forest BC, Reigate and Banstead BC v Benfield [2001] EWCA Civ 1510, [2002] 1 All ER 899, [2002] QB 1129, [2002] 2 WLR 1448.

Runa Begum v Tower Hamlets London BC [2003] UKHL 5, [2003] 1 All ER 731, [2003] 2 WLR 388.

S v UK (1986) 47 DR 274, E Com HR.

Sheffield City Council v Smart, Central Sunderland Housing Co Ltd v Wilson [2002] EWCA Civ 4, [2002] LGR 467.

South Bucks DC v Porter, Chichester DC v Searle, Wrexham County BC v Berry [2003] UKHL 26, [2003] 3 All ER 1, [2003] 2 WLR 1547.

Stretch v UK [2003] All ER (D) 306 (Jun), ECt HR.

Uratemp Ventures Ltd v Collins [2001] UKHL 43, [2002] 1 All ER 46, [2002] 1 AC 301, [2001] 3 WLR 806.

Ure v UK App No 28027/95 (27 November 1996, unreported), E Com HR.

Wandsworth London BC v Michalak [2002] EWCA Civ 271, [2002] 4 All ER 1136, [2003] 1 WLR 617.

Wood v UK (1997) 24 EHRR CD 69, E Com HR.

Cases also referred to in list of authorities

Akdivar v Turkey (1996) 23 EHRR 143, ECt HR.

Brent London BC v Sharp [2003] All ER (D) 238 (Apr), CA.

Bristol DC v Clark [1975] 3 All ER 976, [1975] 1 WLR 1443, CA.

Burrows v Brent London BC [1996] 4 All ER 577, [1996] 1 WLR 1448, HL.

Cannock Chase DC v Kelly [1978] 1 All ER 152, [1978] 1 WLR 1, CA.

Crawley BC v Ure [1996] 1 All ER 724, [1996] QB 13, [1995] 3 WLR 95, CA.

Cyprus v Turkey (1976) 4 EHRR 482, ECt HR.

Gallagher v Castle Vale Action Trust Ltd [2001] EWCA Civ 944, (2001) 33 HLR 810.

Guerra v Italy (1998) 4 BHRC 63, ECt HR.

Harrogate BC v Simpson (1984) 17 HLR 205, CA.

Howard v UK (1985) 52 DR 215, E Com HR.

Karner v Austria App No 40016/98 (11 September 2001, unreported), ECt HR.

Kensington and Chelsea Royal London Borough v O'Sullivan [2003] EWCA Civ 371, [2003] 1 FCR 687.

Lloyd v Sadler [1978] 2 All ER 529, [1978] QB 774, [1978] 2 WLR 721, CA.

Mentes v Turkey (1997) 26 EHRR 595, ECt HR.

North Hertfordshire DC v Carthy [2003] EWCA Civ 20, [2003] All ER (D) 93 (Jan).

R (on the application of Bempoa) v Southwark London BC [2002] EWHC 153 (Admin), [2002] All ER (D) 178 (Feb).

R (on the application of Mays) v Brent London BC [2003] EWHC 481 (Admin), [2003] All ER (D) 12 (Mar).

Southwark London BC v St Brice [2001] EWCA Civ 1138, [2002] 1 WLR 1537

Wandsworth London BC v A [2000] LGR 81, [2000] 1 WLR 1246, CA.

Wandsworth London BC v Winder [1984] 3 All ER 976, [1985] AC 461, [1984] 3 WLR 1254, HL.

Wiggins v UK (1978) 13 DR 40, E Com HR.

X v Germany (1956) 1 Yearbook 202.

Appeal

The appellants, Harrow London Borough Council, the freehold owners of land and premises known as 31 Hutton Lane, Harrow Weald, Middlesex, HA3 6RE (the property), appealed with permission of the Appeal Committee given on 10 June 2002 from the order of the Court of Appeal (Peter Gibson, Mantell and Arden LJJ) on 3 December 2001 ([2001] EWCA Civ 1834) allowing in part the appeal of the respondent, Tarik Mahmood Qazi, the occupier of the property, from the order of Mr Recorder Williamson on 8 June 2001 in the Watford County Court granting possession of the property to the appellants. The facts are set out in the opinion of Lord Hope of Craighead.

Anthony Arden QC and David Matthias (instructed by Gerald Balabanoff, Harrow) for the appellants.

Jan Luba QC and Edward Fitzpatrick (instructed by Sweetman Burke & Sinker) for the respondent.

Their Lordships took time for consideration.

31 July 2003. The following opinions were delivered.

LORD BINGHAM OF CORNHILL.

[1] My Lords, by art 8(1) of the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms 1950 (as set out in Sch 1 to the Human Rights Act 1998) 'Everyone has the right to respect for ... his home'. This appeal concerns the meaning of that provision and its application to the facts of this case.

[2] Those facts are simple. The respondent, Mr Qazi, lived with his then wife Mrs Saman Qazi and their daughter in a two-bedroomed house at 31 Hutton Lane, Harrow Weald, Middlesex. The London Borough of Harrow, the appellants, were (as they still are) freehold owners of the house, and let it to Mr Qazi and Mrs Saman Qazi as joint tenants under a secure tenancy beginning in January 1992. In 1998 Mrs Saman Qazi and their daughter went to live elsewhere, and in February 1999 Mrs Qazi gave the council four weeks' written notice to quit in accordance with the express terms of the tenancy agreement. This notice, it is common ground, had the effect of bringing the tenancy to an end on 22 March 1999. The council informed Mr Qazi that the tenancy had come to an end and invited him, if he wished, to apply for a sole tenancy of the house, making it clear that the application might not succeed. He did apply, but his application was refused by the council in July 1999 on the ground that he was not, as a single person, entitled to family-sized accommodation. In November 1999 the council again told Mr Qazi that he would not be granted a tenancy of the house, and he was further told that possession proceedings would be begun if he failed to vacate the house.

[3] Mr Qazi did not vacate the house and in March 2000 the council issued proceedings seeking possession. In the course of the proceedings Mr Qazi made it known that he had lived in the house with Mrs Abida Qazi and her five-year old son since June or July 2000, that they had been married in an Islamic ceremony in October 1999 and that the marriage had been solemnised in a civil ceremony in July 2000. Mr Qazi sought a review by the council of its decision not to grant him a sole tenancy of the house, but unsuccessfully. Mrs Abida Qazi, pregnant with another child born in December 2000, applied to the council for the grant of a new tenancy to herself and Mr Qazi, but no such grant was made.

[4] In the possession proceedings Mr Qazi based his defence (so far as now relevant) on the contentions that (a) in seeking a possession order the council had failed to give effect to his right to respect for his home as required by art 8 of the convention; (b) the council's interference with his right was not justified under art 8(2) of the convention; and (c) the making of a possession order would be a breach of art 8. The action came on for trial in the Watford County Court sitting at Luton before Mr Recorder Williamson. He held that the effect of Mrs Saman Qazi's notice to quit had been to determine the whole of the previous joint tenancy; that the tenancy had not come to an end because of any decision made by a public authority but by the act of one of the joint tenants; that since expiry of the notice Mr Qazi had had no legal or equitable right or interest in the house and thus had none at the time when action had been brought; and that accordingly the house was not Mr Qazi's home within the meaning of art 8(1) of the convention and that article was not engaged. The recorder did not therefore consider the issue of justification raised under art 8(2) of the convention and made the possession order sought.

[5] Mr Qazi challenged the recorder's decision successfully in the Court of Appeal, where Arden LJ gave the leading judgment, Peter Gibson LJ agreed giving brief reasons of his own and Mantell LJ concurred: [2001] EWCA Civ 1834, [2002] HLR 276. Arden LJ (at [47]) defined the question of law before the court as being 'whether a former tenant whose tenancy has come to an end by operation of law can, after that time, have a right to a home for the purposes of Article 8 of the convention'. After a close examination of the Strasbourg jurisprudence she gave an affirmative answer to that question, rejecting the argument that art 8 is not engaged where a former tenant lacks any legal or equitable right or interest in the house. She concluded (at [57]) that Mr Qazi 'did have a right to a home for the purposes of Article 8 when the possession proceedings were served on him'.

[6] I would respectfully question whether Arden LJ was quite right to define the issue in terms of 'a right to a home', since the European Court of Human Rights has made clear that art 8 does not in terms give a right to be provided with a home and does not guarantee the right to have one's housing problem solved by the authorities: see Chapman v UK (2001) 10 BHRC 48 at 72 (para 99); Marzari v Italy (1999) 28 EHRR CD 175 at 179; O'Rourke v UK App No 39022/97 (26 June 2001, unreported). Thus in the present case the two questions which in my opinion arise are (1) whether (when proceedings were issued and possession was ordered) the house at 31 Hutton Lane was Mr Qazi's home within the meaning of that expression as used in art 8 of the convention; and, if so, (2) whether what the council or the court did or proposed to do infringed his right to respect for his home. If both questions are answered in Mr Qazi's favour there arises the issue of justification, which the recorder did not have to address and which the Court of Appeal remitted to the county court. If that stage is reached, the issue of justification turns on the application of art 8(2) of the convention:

> 'There shall be no interference by a public authority with the exercise of this right [here, the right to respect for one's home] except such as is in accordance with the law and is necessary in a democratic society in the interests of national security, public safety or the economic well-being of the country, for the prevention of disorder or crime, for the protection of health or morals, or for the protection of the rights and freedoms of others.' a [7] It is convenient to begin by considering the two questions as formulated above.

THE FIRST QUESTION

[8] The European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms was an attempt to identify the rights and freedoms most central to the enjoyment of human life in civil society and to give those rights and freedoms an appropriate measure of protection among member states of the Council of Europe. Not surprisingly, the need for some protection of the home was recognised in the convention, since few things are more central to the enjoyment of human life than having somewhere to live. On a straightforward reading of the convention, its use of the expression 'home' appears to invite a down-to-earth and pragmatic consideration whether (as Lord Millett put it in Uratemp Ventures Ltd v Collins [2001] UKHL 43 at [31], [2002] 1 All ER 46 at [31], [2002] 1 AC 301) the place in question is that where a person 'lives and to which he returns and which forms the centre of his existence', since 'home' is not a legal term of art and art 8 is not directed to the protection of property interests or contractual rights. b c d

[9] This approach to the meaning of 'home' is, I think, fortified by consideration of art 8(1) as expressed in other languages: 'son domicile', 'proprio domicilio', 'su domicilio' and 'seiner Wohnung', for example, all direct attention to the place where a person lives. Save in one case mentioned below (at [10]) this has been the approach of the Strasbourg institutions also. In Gillow v UK (1986) 11 EHRR 335 at 348–349 (para 46), the court held that the house in question was the applicants' home because although they had been absent from Guernsey for many years they had not established any other home elsewhere in the United Kingdom and had retained 'sufficient continuing links' with the house for it to be considered their home for the purposes of art 8. This test was repeated and elaborated by the Commission in Buckley v UK (1996) 23 EHRR 101 at 115 (para 63): e f

> '"Home" is an autonomous concept which does not depend on classification under domestic law. Whether or not a particular habitation constitutes a "home" which attracts the protection of Article 8(1) will depend on the factual circumstances, namely, the existence of sufficient and continuous links. The factor of "unlawfulness" is relevant rather to considerations under paragraph 2 of that provision of "in accordance with law" and to the balancing exercise undertaken between the interests of the community and those of the individual in assessing the necessity of any interference.' g h

The Commission repeated the substance of this passage in Mabey v UK (1996) 22 EHRR CD 123 at 124, and in O'Rourke v UK App No 39022/97 (26 June 2001, unreported) the court once again insisted on an individual's need to show sufficient and continuing links with a place in order to establish that it is his home for purposes of art 8. j

[10] In none of these cases, as Mr Arden QC for the council correctly submitted, were the facts indistinguishable from those of this case. In some the applicant had a proprietary interest in a house (Gillow v UK) or land (Buckley v UK, Mabey v UK), but could not lawfully live in the house or on the land. In O'Rourke v UK the applicant claimed as his home a hotel room which he had occupied for less than a month at the discretion of the proprietors before being evicted: in this case the court had 'significant doubts over whether or not the applicant's links with the hotel room were sufficient and continuous enough to make it his "home" at the time of his eviction'. The general approach of the Strasbourg institutions has however been to apply a simple, factual and untechnical test, taking full account of the factual circumstances but very little of legal niceties. The exception, properly relied on by the council, is S v UK (1986) 47 DR 274. In this case, where the applicant was not entitled in domestic law to succeed to a tenancy on the death of her partner, the Commission attached importance to this fact and ruled in para 4 of its opinion:

> 'The Commission notes that the applicant was occupying the house, of which her partner had been the tenant, without any legal title whatsoever. Contractual relations were established between the local authority and the deceased partner and that contractual agreement may or may not have permitted long-term visitors. The fact remains, however, that on the death of the partner, under the ordinary law, the applicant was no longer entitled to remain in the house, and the local authority was entitled to possession so that the house could no longer be regarded as "home" for the applicant within the meaning of Article 8.'

It is, however, noteworthy that this ruling was made before formulation of the sufficient continuing links test in Gillow v UK, that it has not been relied on by the court or the Commission in any of the later cases I have cited, and that after the passage quoted above the Commission went on to review the issue of justification under art 8(2) on the assumption that the applicant's right to respect for her home had been the subject of interference. Arden LJ ([2002] HLR 276 at [55]) concluded that S v UK no longer offered guidance to be taken into account in deciding the issue before the Court of Appeal.

[11] I agree with that conclusion. When the possession proceedings were issued Mr Qazi had lived at 31 Hutton Lane continuously for eight years. The house had been his home and he had no other. The expiry of his wife's notice to quit brought his right to occupy the house as a tenant to an end, but it did not bring his occupation to an end. The house continued to be the place where he lived and so his home. Any other conclusion would not, in my opinion, reflect the clear thrust of Strasbourg authority. I would accordingly give an affirmative answer to this first question.

THE SECOND QUESTION

[12] Mr Arden submitted, in a written summary of his argument, that—

> 'art 8 is not engaged at all [where rights either have never existed at all (ie squatters) or have ended other than by the action of the public authority (eg notice to quit by tenant)] and when the landlord asks the tenant to leave what was let as a qualified or limited home, whether for an identified period or in some other way, eg employment-related, short life use pending development, homelessness accommodation, sub-leasing arrangements, accommodation during works, ie there is no disrespect inherent in declining to grant, continue or extend what was not let as an indefinite or unqualified right to use premises as a home (as opposed to taking away what would otherwise be an indefinite or unqualified right, such as that enjoyed by a secure tenant).' a

My initial reaction to this submission is, I must acknowledge, one of resistance. The simple, untechnical test of 'home' which I have described above is easily understood and easily applied to facts arising in the different member states. I would expect a similarly simple and untechnical test to be applied to 'respect' and 'interference'. Details of the bargain made between owner and occupier, and the provisions of national law governing that bargain, are likely to be crucial in deciding the issue of justification under art 8(2) if that stage is reached, but it would seem to me to undermine the broad international application at which the convention aims if matters of this kind are treated as determinative when considering whether there has been interference or a lack of respect. b c

[13] Initial reactions are not however a safe guide to resolution of an important issue such as this, and regard must be paid to the Strasbourg jurisprudence for such help as it can give. Both parties to the appeal accept (as is indeed clear) that no conclusive answer is to be found. But both seek to derive support from it. d

[14] In Di Palma v UK (1988) 10 EHRR 149 the applicant's lease was forfeited on her non-payment of a service charge and possession was ordered. Her primary claim was made (unsuccessfully) under art 1 of the First Protocol to the convention. But she also complained that her eviction from her home constituted an unjustified interference with the right to respect for her home protected by art 8. The Commission held this complaint to be manifestly ill-founded because (at 155) 'any interference with [her] right to respect for her home which the forfeiture of her lease engendered was in conformity with Article 8(2)'. The Commission did not expressly rule whether the forfeiture or eviction were an interference. e

[15] In P v UK App No 14751/89 (12 December 1990, unreported) the applicants had been evicted, following the service of notice to quit, from a caravan site where they had lived for many years. Her Majesty's government admitted that the eviction constituted an interference with the applicants' right to respect for their home (although they had by that stage no rights in relation to it) but the Commission made no ruling: f

> 'The Commission has considered whether the termination of the applicants' occupation of the site in accordance with the tenancy agreement can be considered as an interference with their rights under art 8(1) ... of the convention. Even assuming that it could constitute an interference, however, the commission finds that it would be justified under art 8(2) ... of the convention ...' g h

The Commission pointed out that the applicants could not derive from art 8 an unconditional right to remain on the site.

[16] The application in Ure v UK App No 28027/95 (27 November 1996, unreported) was founded on facts legally indistinguishable from the present. The applicant's tenancy came to an end on expiry of a notice to quit given by his wife, formerly a joint tenant with him, and possession was ordered. The Commission held that his complaint under art 8 was manifestly ill-founded because the alleged interference with the applicant's rights under the article was justified under para (2) of the article. j

[17] Wood v UK (1997) 24 EHRR CD 69 arose from the repossession of the applicant's house by a mortgagee when she defaulted on her payments due under the mortgage. The Commission held the application to be manifestly ill-founded, observing (at 70–71):

> 'In so far as the repossession constituted an interference with the applicant's home, the Commission finds that this was in accordance with the terms of the loan and the domestic law and was necessary for the protection of the rights and freedoms of others, namely the lender. To the extent that the applicant is deprived of her possessions by the repossession, the Commission considers that this deprivation is in the public interest, that is the public interest in ensuring payment of contractual debts, and is also in accordance with the rules provided for by law.'

[18] In Larkos v Cyprus (1999) 7 BHRC 244 a tenant who had lived for many years in a house rented from the government was ordered to vacate the house following revocation of his tenancy. Because he had been a tenant of the government he was not, under domestic law, entitled to the security which he would have enjoyed against a private landlord. His complaint was made under art 14 of the convention in conjunction with art 8, not under art 8 alone: it related to the manner in which the alleged difference in treatment adversely affected the enjoyment of his right to respect for his home guaranteed under art 8. The court observed (at 251):

> 'Mr Larkos has not contended that there has been a breach of art 8 on account of the fact that, being a government tenant, he is faced with the threat of eviction from his home. However, it suffices for the purposes of the application of art 14 that the facts relied on in the instant case fall within the ambit of art 8 and the relevance of that Article cannot be denied in view of the judgment of the District Court of Nicosia ordering Mr Larkos to leave his home.'

It was, it seems, that order, which under domestic law the national court was bound to make, which constituted the required interference or lack of respect.

[19] The applicant in Marzari v Italy (1999) 28 EHRR CD 175 was evicted by court order on the application of his public authority landlord following his failure to pay rent. It appears that his complaint under art 8 may well have been based on lack of respect for his private life, but it is not clear that such was his only complaint under the article. The court ruled (at 180):

> '... that the applicant's eviction from his apartment interfered with his rights under Article 8(1). The Court therefore has to examine whether the interference was justified under the terms of paragraph 2 of Article 8.'

In the result, the court did not find 'any appearance of a breach' of art 8 on account of the authorities' decision to proceed with the applicant's eviction from his apartment.

[20] It seems to me that these authorities, although inconclusive, give somewhat more help to Mr Qazi than to the council. They reveal a tendency to assume an interference or lack of respect and then to consider justification, an issue decided against the applicant in all the cases except Larkos's case, where the complaint was of discrimination in conjunction with art 8. It is noteworthy that although, in all the five cases held to be manifestly ill-founded, the applicant had, under domestic law, no arguable legal right to remain in the property from which he or she had been evicted, the adverse decision was never based on that short (and, if correct, obvious) ground.

[21] Strasbourg authority is of course the primary source of guidance on the interpretation and application of the convention. But the House was helpfully referred to three recent decisions of the Court of Appeal of which mention should be made. Poplar Housing and Regeneration Community Association Ltd v Donoghue [2001] EWCA Civ 595, [2001] 4 All ER 604, [2002] QB 48 concerned a possession order made against an assured shorthold tenant. Under the Housing Act 1988 the landlord could not obtain possession without an order of the court, but the court was bound to make an order if the tenancy was subject to s 21(4) of that Act and proper notice had been served. Both these conditions were satisfied. The argument turned on art 8, coupled with art 6, of the convention. The Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions exercised his right to intervene, and counsel instructed on his behalf submitted that although the possession proceedings constituted an interference with the tenant's home, the interference was justified under art 8(2). The court (Lord Woolf CJ, May and Jonathan Parker LJJ) held (at [67]) that eviction from her home would impact on the tenant's family life. But it found (at [67]–[72]) that the interference was justified.

[22] R (on the application of McLellan) v Bracknell Forest BC, Reigate and Banstead BC v Benfield [2001] EWCA Civ 1510, [2002] 1 All ER 899, [2002] QB 1129 concerned the termination of introductory tenancies in accordance with procedures introduced under the Housing Act 1996. In both of these appeals, heard together, the Secretary of State was again represented by counsel who asserted that art 8 was engaged (see [36]). The submission made by Mr Arden QC, then representing the Reigate and Banstead Borough Council, was recorded in the leading judgment of Waller LJ (with whom Latham and Kay LJJ agreed) at [37]:

> 'Mr Arden's argument in short was this. He suggested that since a tenant would know the basis on which he or she had become a tenant, ie on the basis that the statutory provisions and procedures of the introductory tenancy scheme applied to it, the rights of the tenant to occupy the premises were simply in accordance with that scheme. Thus if the council complied with the provisions of the introductory tenancy scheme in order to bring the tenancy to an end, that involved no want of respect for the tenant's home. So it is argued the question whether the scheme had been complied with would be the first question which, if answered in favour of the council, would lead to the conclusion that art 8(1) was not engaged. It would then follow that the question whether the eviction could be justified under art 8(2) would not arise.'

The argument was rejected:

> '[42] In my view the terms of art 8(2) demonstrate that Mr Arden's approach is not a proper approach to art 8. It is not a preliminary question whether the tenancy has been properly terminated in accordance with its terms. It is under art 8(2) that the question to be considered is whether an eviction was in accordance with the law, and whether it was necessary for the protection of the rights and freedoms of others. In Poplar Housing and Regeneration Community Association Ltd v Donoghue the Court of Appeal decided that Poplar was a public authority and thus that art 8(2) was directly applicable, but it seems to me that even if it had been a private landlord seeking to evict a tenant under an assured shorthold tenancy, the court as a public authority would have had to approach s 21(4) of the Housing Act 1988 (the section under consideration in that case) in much the same way. It would have concluded that s 21(4) did not infringe any art 8 right but not because art 8 did not apply at all, but because the eviction was in accordance with the law and because it was not disproportionate to allow the tenancy to be brought to an end in accordance with the rights of the landlord. The wording of art 8(2) is apposite to allow consideration not only of the tenant's rights, and not only the rights of persons other than the landlord and the tenant, ie other tenants for example, but the rights of the landlord as well. In S v UK (1986) 47 DR 274 at 278 the commission put their conclusion in these terms:

> "Further, even if the applicant's right to respect for her home, as guaranteed by article 8, could be regarded as having been interfered with by order of the county court for possession against her, the Commission considers that such interference was clearly in accordance with the law and was also necessary for the protection of the contractual rights of the landlord to have the property back at the end of the tenancy."

[43] I would accordingly reject Mr Arden's argument that art 8 has no application.'

[23] The third decision of the Court of Appeal, in Sheffield City Council v Smart, Central Sunderland Housing Co Ltd v Wilson [2002] EWCA Civ 4, [2002] LGR 467, was made after, and followed, the decision now under appeal. The appeals arose from possession orders made on the application of housing authorities following the termination of non-secure tenancies. Laws LJ, giving the leading judgment with which Thorpe and Kay LJJ agreed, did not accept the argument advanced by counsel for the housing authorities summarised (at [24]) in this way:

> 'Mr Underwood submitted that there is no prima facie violation of art 8(1) by action taken for possession in cases such as these. Essentially the argument (if I may venture to summarise it in my own words) runs as follows. The Convention recognises that there is a balance to be struck between public interest and private right; and all these considerations which I have enumerated, taken together, lead to the conclusion that the statutory regime for the accommodation of homeless persons, including the right of the local authority to serve and act on a notice to quit relating to such a person's non-secure tenancy, involves no actual or potential violation of art 8(1) because the necessary balance has effectively been struck by the legislation itself. So long as the council's decision to seek possession, and the decision's implementation, comply with conventional public law standards, and the legal process undertaken to obtain possession complies with the relevant private law requirements, there can be no interference with the tenant's art 8(1) right to respect for his or her home.'

Having referred to the Commission's ruling on the meaning of 'home' in para 63 of the decision in Buckley v UK (1996) 23 EHRR 101 and to the Court of Appeal's decision in this case, Laws LJ continued ([2002] LGR 467 at [26]–[27]):

'Clearly the present cases are not concerned with any issues of legal or equitable interest. But the approach taken in Buckley, and approved as a matter of domestic human rights law in Qazi goes some distance to support my view that there is prima facie a violation of art 8(1) in these cases. "Home" is an autonomous concept for the purpose of ECHR, and does not depend on any legal status as owner. Thus in these cases, the premises in Sheffield and Sunderland were without question the women's homes. Since the effect of the possession orders would be to throw them out, I think it inescapable that those orders amounted to an interference with the appellants' right of respect of their homes. I have said that the case is all about art 8; more precisely, it is all about art 8(2).

Before proceeding to the issues arising under art 8(2), I should make it clear that I entertain what is perhaps a deeper reason for my view that the case cannot be concluded by a judgment that there is no violation of art 8(1). It concerns the relationship between the two paragraphs of art 8. I have held that eviction of these appellants would constitute a prima facie violation of their right to respect for their homes. But this conclusion is not simply an instance of that everyday judicial process, the application of a statute's correct construction (here, art 8(1)) to a particular set of facts. Rather it has a purposive quality. The court has to arrive at a judicial choice between two possibilities, a choice which transcends the business of finding out what the legislation's words mean. The first choice (accepting Mr Underwood's submission) would entail a judgment that the Convention requirement was met at the art 8(1) stage: on balance, taking into account all the factors which I have listed in para 23, there was no want of respect for the appellants' homes. The second choice (accepting a prima facie violation of art 8(1)), which I prefer, entails a judgment that the more rigorous and specific standards set out in art 8(2) have to be met if the court is to hold that the evictions are compatible with the appellants' Convention rights. The Convention is, as it were, much more remotely engaged in the fabric of our domestic law if the first, rather than the second, choice is taken. Part of the court's task is to decide how close that engagement should be in the context in hand. Thus I do not eschew the first choice merely because I take the view that the second more naturally reflects the ordinary sense of the words used in art 8(1). I consider as a matter of substance that the vindication and fulfilment of the Convention rights, for which purpose HRA was enacted, require that the domestic law procedures involved in these appeals should be subjected to scrutiny for conformity with the art 8(2) standards. Such a process is demanded by the fullness of our municipal law of human rights.'

This reasoning, like that of Arden LJ in the present case, reflects the tenor of the Strasbourg jurisprudence and, in my opinion, gives effect to the purpose of the convention. I agree with it. In South Bucks DC v Porter, Chichester DC v Searle, Wrexham County BC v Berry [2003] UKHL 26 at [37], [2003] 3 All ER 1 at [37], [2003] 2 WLR 1547, I wished to leave open the question whether 'any action by a public authority seeking possession of residential property occupied by a defendant engages the operation of art 8'. Now that the question has been fully explored, I am satisfied that such actions will ordinarily do so if the residential property is occupied by the defendant as his home. But nothing I have said in this opinion should be understood as applying to any landlord or owner which is not a public authority.

[24] For these reasons and those given by Lord Steyn I would uphold the decision of the Court of Appeal and affirm its order that the issue of justification raised under art 8(2) be remitted to the county court.

[25] Mr Arden submitted that this outcome would impose a large burden of expense and delay on housing authorities. I do not accept this. The House has made it very plain, most recently in Runa Begum v Tower Hamlets London BC [2003] UKHL 5, [2003] 1 All ER 731, [2003] 2 WLR 388, particularly in paras [9] and [49], that the administration of public housing under various statutory schemes is entrusted to local housing authorities. It is not for the court to second-guess allocation decisions. The Strasbourg authorities have adopted a very pragmatic and realistic approach to the issue of justification. Counsel were agreed that even if the argument for Mr Qazi were accepted, the occasions on which a court would be justified in declining to make a possession order would be very highly exceptional. This is so. It would not be proper to comment on the present case, since I share the Court of Appeal's view that the issue of justification should be considered by the county court. If (contrary to the ruling of the majority of the House) effect were to be given to my opinion, I am confident that housing authorities acting in good faith in implementation of schemes prescribed by statute and administered by them need apprehend no significant increase in their litigious burden.

LORD STEYN.

[26] My Lords, given that I am in complete agreement with the opinion of my noble and learned friend Lord Bingham of Cornhill I can explain my view shortly.

[27] It would be surprising if the views of the majority on the interpretation and application of art 8 of the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms 1950, as incorporated into our legal system by the Human Rights Act 1998, withstood European scrutiny. It is contrary to a purposive interpretation of art 8 read against the structure of the convention. It is inconsistent with the general thrust of the decisions of the European Court of Human Rights, and of the Commission. It is contrary to the position adopted by the United Kingdom government on more than one occasion before the European Court of Human Rights. It does not accord to individuals 'the full measure of the [protection] referred to': Minister of Home Affairs v Fisher [1979] 3 All ER 21 at 25, [1980] AC 319 at 328. On the contrary, it empties art 8(1) of any or virtually any meaningful content. The basic fallacy in the approach is that it allows domestic notions of title, legal and equitable rights, and interests, to colour the interpretation of art 8(1). The decision of today does not fit into the new landscape created by the 1998 Act.

[28] Lord Bingham has formulated the issues as follows: (a) whether (when proceedings were issued and possession was ordered) the house at 31 Hutton Lane was Mr Qazi's home within the meaning of that expression as used in art 8 of the convention; and, if so, (b) whether what the council or the court did or proposed to do infringed his right to respect for his home. Such differences of opinion as exist in this case do not extend to this formulation of the issues.

[29] The first question was the main focus of the debate below and in the House. All members of the Appellate Committee are now apparently agreed that this question can only be answered in the affirmative. Given this unanimity I have nothing to add to the reasons given by Lord Bingham, on the principal point in the case.

[30] On the second question the House is divided. While I accept that according to English conceptions of stare decisis there is in the European jurisprudence no decision directly in point, the thrust of the approach in Larkos v Cyprus (1999) 7 BHRC 244 and Marzari v Italy (1999) 28 EHRR CD 175 supports the view that when proceedings to recover possession of the defendant's home were issued and possession was ordered there was an interference with Mr Qazi's right to respect for his home. If it had been sufficient to say that when an applicant has no arguable legal right to remain in a property art 8(1) is not engaged, such an obvious ground would inevitably have formed part of European exposition and reasoning.

[31] Moreover, I found the trilogy of Court of Appeal decisions which Lord Bingham discussed in [21], [22] and [23], above instructive.

[32] In Sheffield City Council v Smart, Central Sunderland Housing Co Ltd v Wilson [2002] EWCA Civ 4, [2002] LGR 467, Laws LJ (speaking for a united Court of Appeal) analysed the position (at [26]–[27]) as follows:

> '... in these cases, the premises in Sheffield and Sunderland were without question the women's homes. Since the effect of the possession orders would be to throw them out, I think it inescapable that those orders amounted to an interference with the appellants' right of respect of their homes I have said that the case is all about article 8; more precisely, it is all about art 8(2).
>
> Before proceeding to the issues arising under art 8(2), I should make it clear that I entertain what is perhaps a deeper reason for my view that the case cannot be concluded by a judgment that there is no violation of art 8(1). It concerns the relationship between the two paragraphs of art 8. I have held that eviction of these appellants would constitute a prima facie violation of their right to respect for their homes. But this conclusion is not simply an instance of that everyday judicial process, the application of a statute's correct construction (here, art 8(1)) to a particular set of facts. Rather it has a purposive quality. The court has to arrive at a judicial choice between two possibilities, a choice which transcends the business of finding out what the legislation's words mean. The first choice ... would entail a judgment that the Convention requirement was met at the art 8(1) stage ... The second choice (accepting a prima facie violation of art 8(1)), which I prefer, entails a judgment that the more rigorous and specific standards set out in art 8(2) have to be met if the court is to hold that the evictions are compatible with the appellants' Convention rights. The Convention is, as it were, much more remotely engaged in the fabric of our domestic law if the first, rather than the second, choice is taken. Part of the court's task is to decide how close that engagement should be in the context in hand. Thus I do not eschew the first choice merely because I take the view that the second more naturally reflects the ordinary sense of the words used in art 8(1). I consider as a matter of substance that the vindication and fulfilment of the Convention rights, for which purpose HRA was enacted, require that the domestic law procedures involved in these appeals should be subjected to scrutiny for conformity with the art 8(2) standards. 'Such a process is demanded by the fullness of our municipal law of human rights.'

This statement admirably reflects the meaning of art 8 and the European approach to its application. It is in accord with the new landscape created by the 1998 Act.

[33] In agreement with the reasoning of Arden LJ in the Court of Appeal I would make the order proposed by Lord Bingham of Cornhill.

LORD HOPE OF CRAIGHEAD.

[34] My Lords, the issues which have been raised in this case relate to the impact of the Human Rights Act 1998 on the procedure by which a public authority landlord recovers possession of residential accommodation from a former tenant whose tenancy has come to an end by operation of law. Section 6(1) of the Act provides that it is unlawful for a public authority to act in a way which is incompatible with a convention right. It follows that any procedure by which a public authority recovers possession of the accommodation must be compatible with the former tenant's convention rights. That essential point is not in dispute. What is in dispute is whether the procedure by which the appellants, the local housing authority, seek to recover possession from the respondent, Mr Qazi, satisfies this requirement.

[35] The convention right which has been invoked in this case is set out in art 8 of the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms 1950 (as set out in Sch 1 to the 1998 Act). It provides:

> '1. Everyone has the right to respect for his private and family life, his home and his correspondence.
>
> 2. There shall be no interference by a public authority with the exercise of this right except such as is in accordance with the law and is necessary in a democratic society in the interests of national security, public safety or the economic well-being of the country, for the prevention of disorder or crime, for the protection of health or morals, or for the protection of the rights and freedoms of others.'

[36] The question which lies at the heart of the case is whether, having regard to the provisions of art 8(1) of the convention, it is unlawful for a public authority to recover possession from a former tenant by a procedure which leads to possession being granted automatically, or whether the court must always be given an opportunity to consider whether the making of an order for possession would be proportionate. If the answer to that question is that the court must always be given that opportunity, it will be in the discretion of the court in all cases to decide whether or not an order for possession should be made. This will be so not only in those cases where there are statutory safeguards that must be satisfied. The court will have a discretion to exercise even in those cases where the tenancy has come to an end by the operation of law, there is an absolute right to possession and there are no statutory safeguards other than the basic rule that possession cannot be taken without an order from the court: see the Protection from Eviction Act 1977, s 3.

[37] It has not been easy to grasp the true significance of this issue from the way in which the argument has been developed in the Court of Appeal and in the appeal to your Lordships. But the background to it has been carefully and tactfully set out in the Law Commission's Consultation Paper Renting Homes 1: Status and Security (Consultation Paper No 162) Pt V, The Impact of Human Rights Law. As the author explains in para 5.1, none of the challenges to substantive housing provisions that have been made since the coming into force of the 1998 Act have been successful in the sense that the provisions in question have been declared incompatible or have required the deployment of the special interpretative obligation under s 3(1) of the 1998 Act. But a series of cases have raised important issues about the procedures within which housing laws must operate. Among these are the issues raised by art 8 of the convention with which this case is concerned.

[38] As the author explains in para 5.76 of the consultation paper, the approach which has been taken up to the Court of Appeal is based on the conclusion that art 8(1) is always 'engaged' by an eviction. The implication of this conclusion in practice, he suggests, is that a procedure which enables the court to consider the issue of proportionality will become a necessity in respect of any use by a public authority landlord of a procedure under which, by the operation of law, it would previously have been entitled to recover possession automatically: see para 5.74. If so, this result will affect housing associations and other registered social landlords as well as local housing authorities. The point of automatic possession proceedings is generally to provide a quick and reliable way of evicting tenants whose leases have by the operation of law been terminated. A procedure which gives a discretion to the court by requiring it to consider whether having regard to art 8(2) the making of the order would be proportionate is inimical to that purpose, as para 5.74 of the consultation paper points out. Therein lies the importance in domestic law of the issues which your Lordships have been asked to consider in this appeal.

[39] These issues fall naturally into two parts. The first is whether residential accommodation occupied by a former tenant whose tenancy has come to an end by the operation of law is that person's 'home' within the meaning of art 8(1). The second is whether every claim by a public authority for possession of such residential accommodation 'engages' art 8, as it is put in para B3 of the statement of facts and issues. I shall have something to say later about the use of the word 'engage' in this context (see [47], below), and about the significance of its use in regard to art 8 when read as a whole.

THE FACTS

[40] The appellants seek possession in these proceedings of a two-bedroom dwelling house of which they are and have been at all material times the freehold owners. On 15 January 1992 the premises were let to the respondent and his then wife, Saman Qazi, as joint tenants with effect from 20 January 1992. By the operation of Pt IV of the Housing Act 1985 this was a joint secure tenancy: see ss 79 and 81. As it was a joint tenancy it was capable of being terminated by either one of the joint tenants by a notice to quit served on the landlord. It is to be noted that s 82 of the 1985 Act, which provides for security of tenure, only prevents termination of the tenancy by the landlord. A secure tenancy cannot be brought to an end by the landlord until a date when the tenant is ordered to give up possession by the court. But the tenant may terminate the tenancy in the usual way by serving a notice to quit or by surrender.

[41] The respondent and his wife lived in the house together with their daughter until 1998. In that year Saman Qazi moved out with their daughter and went to stay with her mother. The tenancy agreement provided that either tenant could terminate the tenancy by serving a written notice to quit on the appellants giving four weeks' notice and expiring on a Monday which was the start of a new period of the tenancy. On 19 February 1999 Saman Qazi served on the appellants a valid written notice to quit which expired on 22 March 1999: see the Protection from Eviction Act 1977, s 5. This had the effect in law of bringing the tenancy to an end on that date.

[42] On 26 May 1999 a housing management officer of the appellants informed the respondent by letter that the tenancy had come to an end. She enclosed an application form for the respondent to complete if he wished to apply for a sole tenancy of the house. She told him that if he applied a decision would be taken as soon as possible, but she also told him that she could not guarantee that he would be granted a tenancy of it or of any other premises. The respondent completed and returned the application form. On 16 July 1999 he was informed by the housing management officer that his application had been refused because, as he was a single person, he was not entitled to family-sized accommodation.

[43] On 16 November 1999 the appellants' housing manager wrote to the respondent confirming that it had been decided that he should not be granted a tenancy of the house and that possession proceedings would be commenced against him. He also informed the respondent that he was entitled to apply for accommodation through the housing register. He asked him to vacate the premises immediately and return the keys to the housing department. The respondent did not do so. The appellants commenced these proceedings against him on 13 March 2000.

[44] Events did not then stand still. At a preliminary court hearing on 6 June 2000 the respondent told the appellants that he had remarried in October 1999 and that he was now living in the house with his new wife, Abida Qazi, and her five-year old child. In October 2000 he applied for accommodation through the housing register. He was told that no action would be taken on his application as the number of households on the register was already far in excess of the houses with two bedrooms which were available. On 17 November 2000 Mrs Abida Qazi, who was now expecting another child, applied for a new joint tenancy to be granted to herself and the respondent if his application was unsuccessful. No action was taken on her application either. On 23 December 2000 she gave birth to her child. The respondent, Mrs Abida Qazi and her two children were still living in the premises when the appellants' action for possession came to trial.

[45] On 8 June 2001, following a trial in Luton County Court, Mr Recorder Williamson held that a notice to quit by one tenant was sufficient in law to determine the joint tenancy and that since 22 March 1999 the respondent no longer had any legal or equitable right in the premises. He also held that the premises did not constitute the respondent's 'home' within the meaning of art 8(1) and that art 8 was not 'engaged'. He ordered the respondent to give up possession of the premises on 11 July 2001. On 3 December 2001 the respondent was given permission to appeal against this decision on the basis that the recorder had adopted too restrictive a definition of the word 'home'. There was and is no challenge to the recorder's decision that the respondent no longer had any legal or equitable right or interest in the premises. On 3 December 2001 the Court of Appeal (Peter Gibson, Mantell and Arden LJJ) allowed the appeal and remitted the case to the county court to determine whether interference with the respondent's 'right to a home', as Arden LJ put it ([2002] HLR 276 at [58]) was permitted by art 8(2) of the convention.

ARTICLE 8: WHAT IT PROTECTS

[46] In Marckx v Belgium (1979) 2 EHRR 330 the European Court of Human Rights took the opportunity, in a case where the complaint was about the effect on family life of certain aspects of the Belgian illegitimacy laws, to make some general observations about art 8 of the convention. The court said (at 342):

> 'By proclaiming in paragraph 1 the right to respect for family life, article 8 signifies first that the State cannot interfere with the exercise of that right otherwise than in accordance with the strict conditions set out in paragraph 2. As the Court stated in the Belgian Linguistic Case [(1968) 1 EHRR 252 at 282 (para 7)], the object of the Article is "essentially" that of protecting the individual against arbitrary interference by the public authorities. Nevertheless, it does not merely compel the State to abstain from such interference: in addition to this primarily negative undertaking, there may be positive obligations inherent in an effective "respect" for family life.
>
> This means, amongst other things, that when the State determines in its domestic legal system the regime applicable to certain family ties such as those between an unmarried mother and her child, it must act in a manner calculated to allow those concerned to lead a normal family life. As envisaged by article 8, respect for family life implies in particular, in the Court's view, the existence in domestic law of legal safeguards that render possible, as from the moment of birth, the child's integration in its family. In this connection, the State has a choice of various means, but a law that fails to satisfy this requirement violates paragraph 1 of article 8 without there being any call to examine it under paragraph 2.'

[47] Sir Gerald Fitzmaurice, in a dissenting opinion, also made some helpful observations on the scope of art 8. Two passages in his opinion are worth mentioning in the present context. The first is his discussion of what he described as the issue of 'applicability' in general. As he put it in para 2 of his opinion (at 364), this issue relates to the applicability or relevance in any way at all to the particular complaints that the applicants have made. It has become the practice in our jurisdiction to use the verb 'engage' to describe this concept. This word does not form part of the vocabulary of the European Commission or of European Court, and as Laws LJ observed in Sheffield City Council v Smart, Central Sunderland Housing Co Ltd v Wilson [2002] EWCA Civ 4 at [22], [2002] LGR 467 at [22] its use is liable to be misleading and unhelpful. But I would not for my part regard its use as objectionable, so long as there is no doubt as to what it means in this context. In my opinion the issue to which it is directed is whether, in the words of Sir Gerald Fitzmaurice, the provision in question is 'applicable'. What he had to say about this appears in para 3 of his opinion ((1979) 2 EHRR 330 at 364):

> 'The question of the applicability of a legal provision—it should hardly be necessary to say so—is quite distinct juridically from that of whether there has been a breach of that provision in any particular instance. Issues of applicability or scope are therefore strictly preliminary ones. A provision (rule, section, clause, article, etc) is applicable in any given case, at least prima facie, if it relates to the class, category, order, type or kind of subject-matter to which the claim or complaint itself, as made in that case, relates, and/or is concerned with the facts, events or circumstances involved in such a case. If it does not—if it deals with something different or not so comprised—then clearly it is irrelevant to the claim or complaint, and the question of a possible breach of the Convention does not arise.'

[48] The second passage in his opinion which is worth mentioning appears in para 7 of his opinion, where he said (at 366):

> 'It is abundantly clear (at least it is to me)—and the nature of the whole background against which the idea of the European Convention on Human Rights was conceived bears out this view—that the main, if not indeed the sole, object and intended sphere of application of article 8 was that of what I will call the "domiciliary protection" of the individual. He and his family were not longer to be subjected to the four o'clock in the morning rat-a-tat on the door; to domestic intrusions, searches and questionings; to examinations, delayings and confiscation of correspondence; to the planting of listening devices (bugging); to restrictions on the use of radio and television; to telephone-tapping or disconnection; to measures of coercion such as cutting off the electricity or water supply; to such abominations as children being required to report upon the activities of their parents, and even sometimes the same for one spouse against another—in short, the whole gamut of fascist and communist inquisitorial practices such as had scarcely been known, at least in Western Europe, since the eras of religious intolerance and oppression, until (ideology replacing religion) they became prevalent again in many countries between the two world wars and subsequently.'

[49] Most international human rights instruments recognise a right to privacy. That is the concept which underlies art 8 of the convention, as the language of art 8(1) shows. But, as Professor David Feldman Civil Liberties and Human Rights in England and Wales (2nd edn, 2002) p 524, has explained, art 8 is unique in the way in which the rights that are expressed in it are conceived in relation to private life. Instead of giving a right to be free of arbitrary or unlawful interference with privacy, it provides for a right to 'respect' for it. It has been suggested that the move from a right to freedom from interference with privacy to respect for it tends to weaken the right: JES Fawcett The Application of the European Convention on Human Rights (2nd edn, 1987) p 211. But I believe that Professor Feldman was right to point out, at pp 524–525, that this potential limitation on the negative aspects of the right to privacy should not blind us to the considerable extension of the right which the notion of respect may entail, bearing in mind the fact that a right to respect is capable of imposing positive duties on public authorities.

[50] It seems to me that the following conclusions can be drawn from the language of art 8(1) in the light of the observations in Marckx v Belgium. The right to respect referred to in this paragraph extends to the person's home. But the essence of this right lies in the concept of respect for the home as one among various things that affect a person's right to privacy. The context in which the reference to the person's 'home' must be understood is indicated by the references in the same paragraph to his private and family life and to his correspondence. The emphasis is on the person's home as a place where he is entitled to be free from arbitrary interference by the public authorities. Article 8(1) does not concern itself with the person's right to the peaceful enjoyment of his home as a possession or as a property right. Rights of that kind are protected by art 1 of the First Protocol.

[51] The article must be read as a whole, and the wording of art 8(2) helps to explain art 8(1). It refers to 'interference' by a public authority 'with the exercise of the right described in art 8(1). The circumstances in which such interference is permissible indicate the limits within which the article as a whole was designed to operate. Any interference with the right to respect for the person's privacy has to be measured against what is in accordance with the law and, in certain strictly defined respects, is necessary in a democratic society. Here too the emphasis is on the balance between the right to privacy on the one hand and the wider interests of the community in a democratic society on the other, rather than with issues about a person's right to own or occupy his home as an item of property.

[52] The right described in art 8 is not isolated from the other rights guaranteed by the convention. As I have already mentioned, art 1 of the First Protocol guarantees a right to property. For example, in Stretch v UK [2003] All ER (D) 306 (Jun) the European Court held that there had been a violation of art 1 of the First Protocol where the applicant had been deprived of the benefit of a renewal of a lease granted to him by a local authority. The protection extends to rights of occupation as well as rights of ownership. Then there is art 6, which may be described as the key procedural provision of the convention: Law Commission Consultation Paper, para 5.17. Article 6(1) guarantees to everyone in the determination of his civil rights and obligations a right to a fair and public hearing within a reasonable time by an independent and impartial tribunal established by law. The protection extends to the procedure by which landlords can recover possession of residential property, as possession cannot be taken without an order from the court. But neither art 6 nor art 1 of the First Protocol are in issue in this case. We are concerned only with art 8.

[53] As the jurisprudence of the European Court of Human Rights and of the European Commission of Human Rights has developed, it has tended to reinforce the impression which is conveyed by Marckx v Belgium that the object of art 8 is to protect the individual against arbitrary interference by the public authorities with his right to privacy and that it is not concerned, as such, with the protection of his right to own or to occupy property.

[54] In P v UK App No 14751/89 (12 December 1990, unreported), the applicants' complaint that their eviction from a municipal caravan site which had been designed for the accommodation of gypsies was a breach of their rights under art 8 was held to be manifestly unfounded. The Commission considered whether the termination of their occupation of the site in accordance with the tenancy agreement which they had entered into with the local authority, which had been held to entitle the council to obtain an order for possession, could be considered as an interference with their rights under art 8(1). Its conclusion was that, 'even assuming that it could constitute an interference', it would be justified under art 8(2) of the convention (p 7). Among the reasons given was the following (p 8): 'The Commission considers that the applicants cannot derive from art 8 of the convention an unconditional right to remain on the Thistlebrook site.'

[55] In O'Rourke v UK App No 39022/97 (26 June 2001, unreported), the applicant complained that, among other things, his eviction from a hotel room where he had been given temporary accommodation by the local authority was an interference with his right to respect for his home under art 8 of the convention. In his case too the allegation was found by the court to be manifestly ill-founded. The court said that it had significant doubts over whether or not the applicant's links with the hotel room were sufficient and continuous enough to make it his 'home' at the time of his eviction but that, 'even if they were', the eviction was in accordance with law and proportionate in pursuit of the legitimate aims of preventing disorder or crime at the hotel and protecting the rights and freedoms of the proprietors, their staff and other guests (p 6). The reasons for the decision include the following (p 5):

> 'The court recalls that art 8 does not in terms give a right to be provided with a home (see, for example, Chapman v UK (2001) 10 BHRC 48 at para 99). It considers therefore that the scope of any positive obligation to house the homeless must be limited.'

[56] In Chapman v UK (2001) 10 BHRC 48 the applicant was a gypsy who lived with her family in a caravan on her own land. She was refused the planning permission which she needed if she was to be allowed to live there. When enforcement measures were taken against her she complained that her rights under arts 6, 8 and 14 and art 1 of the First Protocol had been violated. The government accepted, adopting the language of art 8(2), that there had been 'an interference by a public authority' with her right to respect for her home which had been disclosed by the refusal of planning permission to allow her to live in her caravan on her own land and the pursuit of enforcement measures against her (at 67 (para 75)). The court too was satisfied on this point (at 68 (para 78)). It was not contested by the applicant that the measures to which she was subjected were in accordance with the law. In the course of its discussion of the question whether the interference pursued a legitimate aim and was necessary in a democratic society the court said (at 72 (para 99)):

> 'It is important to recall that art 8 does not in terms give a right to be provided with a home. Nor does any of the jurisprudence of the court acknowledge such a right. While it is clearly desirable that every human being has a place where he or she can live in dignity and which he or she can call home, there are unfortunately in the contracting states many persons who have no home. Whether the state provides funds to enable everyone to have a home is a matter for political not judicial decision.'

[57] Further guidance as to how the court approaches this article is to be found in Marzari v Italy (1999) 28 EHRR CD 175. The applicant, who was suffering from metabolic myopathy and had been recognised as 100% disabled, was allocated an apartment which he considered to be inadequate to his needs. He ceased paying rent for it, demanding that certain works be carried out to make it suitable for him to live in. He was served with a notice to quit and proceedings were taken against him for his eviction. He complained that his rights under art 8 has been violated. The court found that his eviction from his apartment interfered with his rights under art 8(1). Its reasons for doing so were explained in this passage (at 179–180):

> 'The Court must first examine whether the applicant's rights under article 8 were violated on account of the decision of the authorities to evict him despite his medical condition. It further has to examine whether the applicant's rights were violated on account of the authorities' alleged failure to provide him with adequate accommodation. The Court considers that, although article 8 does not guarantee a right to have one's housing problems solved by the authorities, a refusal of the authorities to provide assistance in this respect to an individual suffering from a severe disease might in certain circumstances raise an issue under article 8 of the Convention because of the impact of such refusal on the private life of the individual. The Court recalls in this respect that, while the essential object of article 8 is to protect the individual against arbitrary interference by public authorities, this provision does not merely compel the State to abstain from such interference; in addition to this negative undertaking, there may be positive obligations inherent in effective respect for private life. A State has obligations of this type where there is a direct and immediate link between the measures sought by an applicant and the latter's private life.'

[58] In Larkos v Cyprus the applicant complained that as a government tenant he had been unlawfully discriminated against in the enjoyment of his home as, unlike a private tenant renting from a private landlord, he was not protected from eviction on the expiry of his lease. He relied on art 14 of the convention and art 1 of the First Protocol in conjunction with art 8 of the convention. The Commission held that there had been a violation of art 14 taken in conjunction with art 8. In the course of its opinion the Commission said:

'The Commission considers that, although art 8 of the Convention gives rise to positive obligations for states, it might not necessarily require states to take measures to protect tenants from expulsion after the termination of the contracts by virtue of which they occupied their "homes". However, Cyprus has taken such measures by enacting the Rent Control Law (Law 23/1983). Since this law regulates "the right to respect for one's home" under art 8 of the Convention, it must apply in a non-discriminatory manner in accordance with art 14 thereof.'

The court too held that there had been a violation of art 14 taken in conjunction with art 8. Of particular interest are the following observations ((1999) 7 BHRC 244 at 251 (para 28)):

'...the court notes that it has not been disputed that Mr Larkos can rely on the guarantee against unlawful discrimination contained in art 14 of the convention and it sees no reason to hold otherwise. It observes in this respect that the applicant's complaint relates to the manner in which the alleged difference in treatment adversely affects the enjoyment of his right to respect for his home guaranteed under art 8 of the convention. Mr Larkos has not contended that there has been a breach of art 8 on account of the fact that, being a government tenant, he is faced with the threat of eviction from his home. However, it suffices for the purposes of the application of art 14 that the facts relied on in the instant case fall within the ambit of art 8 and the relevance of that article cannot be denied in view of the judgment of the District Court of Nicosia ordering Mr Larkos to leave his home ... Furthermore, even if the applicant has not yet been evicted from his home it is nevertheless the case that the 1983 Law has actually been applied to him to his detriment since he and his family have been living under the threat of eviction ever since the instigation of the eviction proceedings and that threat has become even more real following the judgment of the Supreme Court.'

[59] In the light of that background it is important to note what the respondent does and does not claim in this case. He does not base his claim that he is threatened with a violation of his convention rights on art 1 of the First Protocol or on art 14 of the convention read with art 8. Nor does he claim that his rights under art 6(1) have been violated. His claim is based on the proposition that the appellants acted in breach of art 8 in seeking a possession order against him. He contends that the premises where he is living have not ceased to be his 'home' within the meaning of art 8(1) just because it has become unlawful for him to reside in it. He submits that art 8(1) is 'engaged', so the appellants must justify their claim for possession under art 8(2).

[60] It is to be noted that the respondent does not contend that there has been an interference with his right to respect for his private and family life or his correspondence. The argument is directed entirely to his right to respect for his home. So the first issue that has to be resolved is whether the house which he has been occupying continuously since 20 January 1992 is his home within the meaning of art 8(1), having regard to the fact that his tenancy of it has been terminated.

'HOME'

[61] The word 'home' in art 8(1) has an autonomous meaning in the law relating to convention rights. Its meaning cannot be defined by reference to domestic law. This is because it has to be determined in a way that will enable the expression to be applied uniformly irrespective of the contracting state from which the case comes. This is a concept which was already familiar in EC law, as words used in Community legislation must receive uniform application in all jurisdictions throughout the European Union. But it is a necessary part of the jurisprudence relating to the convention also. Although its provisions do not all have to be applied uniformly as a margin of appreciation is given to the contracting states in some contexts, the meaning which they take from the words used in each article of the convention has to be the same.

[62] The critical question is whether an individual has to have a lawful interest in the premises before they can be regarded as his home within the meaning of art 8(1). The jurisprudence of the European Court and the European Commission does not appear to have been entirely consistent on this issue. In S v UK (1986) 47 DR 274 at 278 (para 4) the Commission noted that the applicant was occupying the house, of which her partner had been the tenant, without any legal title whatsoever:

> 'Contractual relations were established between the local authority and the deceased partner and that contractual agreement may or may not have permitted long-term visitors. The fact remains, however, that on the death of the partner, under the ordinary law, the applicant was no longer entitled to remain in the house, and the local authority was entitled to possession so that the house could no longer be regarded as "home" for the applicant within the meaning of article 8.
>
> Further, even if the applicant's right to respect for her home, as guaranteed by article 8, could be regarded as having been interfered with by order of the county court for possession against her, the Commission considers that such interference was clearly in accordance with the law and was also necessary for the protection of the contractual rights of the landlord to have the property back at the end of the tenancy.'

[63] On the other hand in Buckley v UK (1996) 23 EHRR 101, where the applicant's occupation had never been lawful because she did not have permission to station her caravans on the land which she had purchased, the following views were expressed (at 115 (para 63)):

'The Commission considers ... that the concept of "home" within the meaning of article 8 is not limited to those which are lawfully occupied or which have been lawfully established. "Home" is an autonomous concept which does not depend on classification under domestic law. Whether or not a particular habitation constitutes a "home" which attracts the protection of article 8(1) will depend on the factual circumstances, namely the existence of sufficient and continuous links. The factor of "unlawfulness" is relevant rather to considerations under paragraph 2 of that provision of "in accordance with law" and to the balancing exercise undertaken between the interests of the community and those of the individual in assessing the necessity of any interference.'

The Commission found that the applicant's complaint that she was prevented from living with her family in her caravans on her land fell within the scope of art 8 as relating to her right to respect for her family life, private life and home (at 115 (para 65)).

[64] The factual test which the Commission identified in Buckley v UK had been adopted by the court in at least one previous case. In Gillow v UK (1986) 11 EHRR 335 at 348–349 (para 46) the court observed that, although the applicants had been absent from the house in Guernsey of which they had retained ownership for almost 19 years, they had not established any other home elsewhere in the United Kingdom. It held that they had in the circumstances retained sufficient continuing links with the house for it to be considered their home for the purposes of art 8. The links which they had retained were the ownership of the house, their intention always to return to it and the keeping of their furniture there. The test was essentially a factual one. Although the applicants had a legal title to the house, this factor was not identified as a necessary part of it.

[65] In Khatun v UK (1998) 26 EHRR CD 212 at 215 (para 1) the Commission noted that in the domestic proceedings (see Hunter v Canary Wharf Ltd [1997] 2 All ER 426, [1997] AC 655) a distinction had been made between those applicants with a proprietary interest in the land and those without such an interest. It added this comment:

'For the purposes of article 8 of the Convention, there is no such distinction. "Home" is an autonomous concept which does not depend on classification under domestic law. Whether or not a particular habitation constitutes a "home" which attracts the protection of article 8(1) of the Convention will depend on the factual circumstances, namely the existence of sufficient and continuous links (see Gillow v UK (1986) 11 EHRR 335). Even where occupation of the property is illegal, this will not necessarily prevent that occupation from being that person's "home" within the meaning of article 8 of the Convention (see Buckley v UK (1996) 23 EHRR 101). The Commission considers that article 8(1) applies to all the applicants in the present case whether they are the owners of the property or merely occupiers living on the property, for example the children of the owner of the property.'

[66] The observations by the Commission in Khatun v UK seem to me to be conclusive on this issue. The violation of the right to respect for their homes and family and private lives which was alleged by the applicants in that case was said to have arisen because of the pollution of the area by dust caused by building works in the Docklands area. Their right to occupy the premises was not in issue, so the question whether the accommodation in which they were each living was their 'home' for the purposes of art 8(1) did not have to concern itself with the question of their legal title to the premises. The approach which the commission took is entirely consistent with the view that the object of art 8 is to protect the individual against arbitrary invasion by the public authorities of his privacy.

[67] Where an individual's right to respect for his private and family life is in issue, the application of a narrow or technical test as to what this part of his life comprises would plainly be inappropriate. The same is true of the word 'home' when it is used in the same context. It cannot be right that the word should take on a different meaning according to the nature of the interference which is alleged by the applicant. The fact that the European Commission had to alter its approach to this issue from that indicated by a literal reading of the first paragraph of the passage which I have quoted from S v UK underlines, if I may say so, the importance of keeping the purpose of art 8 firmly in mind when one is considering these concepts.

[68] In my opinion therefore the test which was identified in Buckley v UK and applied again in Khatun v UK is the test which should be applied in this case. I think that there is no doubt that the respondent's links with the premises are sufficient and continuous, so they must be regarded as his 'home' for the purposes of art 8(1). I would hold, in agreement with all your Lordships, that the fact that the respondent's tenancy has come to an end does not mean that the premises ceased to be his 'home' for these purposes.

[69] The more difficult question, to which I now turn, is where that conclusion leads to in the present case. The Court of Appeal held that art 8(1) is engaged by the making of an order for possession. So it remitted the case to the county court to determine whether 'interference with Mr Qazi's right to a home' is permitted by art 8(2) ([2002] HLR 276 at [58]). The description of the right in issue in this case as a 'right to a home' must, I think, be taken to have been a slip of the pen. Article 8(1), as the Strasbourg court has repeatedly said, does not guarantee a right to a home. What it guarantees to the individual is respect for his home, which is an entirely different concept. The question is whether the Court of Appeal was right to remit the case to the county court to determine whether the interference with the respondent's right to respect for his home which will result from the making of an order for possession is permitted by art 8(2).

IS ARTICLE 8(1) 'ENGAGED'?

[70] I mention this question merely to say that I consider that it can receive only one answer in the circumstances. The effect of an order for possession will be to require the respondent to leave the premises which are his 'home' for the purposes of art 8(1). Regarding the question of respect for his home as one which is directed in essence to his right to be respected by the public authorities in the enjoyment of his privacy, his removal from his home is bound to interfere with his enjoyment of that right at least to some extent. As Sedley LJ said in Lambeth London BC v Howard [2001] EWCA Civ 468 at [30], (2001) 33 HLR 636 at [30], any attempt to evict a person, whether directly or indirectly or by process of law, from his or her home is on the face of it a derogation from the respect to which the home is prima facie entitled. In Poplar Housing and Regeneration Community Association Ltd v Donoghue [2001] EWCA Civ 595 at [67], [2001] 4 All ER 604 at [67], [2002] QB 48 Lord Woolf CJ observed that to evict the defendant from her home would impact on her family life. The same might be said of the impact on the respondent in this case, although I am conscious of the fact that this was not how Mr Luba QC for the respondent has presented his argument.

[71] It follows, to adopt the language of Sir Gerald Fitzmaurice in Marckx v Belgium (1979) 2 EHRR 330 at 364, that art 8 is 'applicable'. The issue which the respondent has raised is within the scope of that article. It is not irrelevant to his case. In that sense the article is 'engaged'. But in my opinion it does not follow that, on the facts of this case, there is an issue which must be decided within the domestic legal order by remitting the question whether any interference is permitted by art 8(2) for decision by the county court.

IS THE INTERFERENCE PERMITTED BY ARTICLE 8(2)?

[72] The issue to which I now turn, as the Law Commission Consultation Paper, para 5.1, points out, raises a question of procedure as well as one of substance. It is a domestic problem. It is not one which troubles the European Court, as it has full jurisdiction to decide all the issues which are remitted to it by art 41 of the convention. This, no doubt, is why the questions arising under art 8(1) and 8(2) are so often run together at the admissibility stage with the result that the Commission or the court, as the case may be, is content to address art 8(2) on the assumption that the right to respect for the home has been interfered with: see, eg, S v UK (1986) 47 DR 274 at 278 (para 4); O'Rourke v UK App No 39022/97 (26 June 2001, unreported) p 6. In the domestic legal order however the county court, which is the court in which actions for possession are brought, does not have unlimited jurisdiction. It does not have jurisdiction in judicial review. The question whether, and if so to what extent, it has a discretion to make or withhold an order for possession depends on the law which has to be applied to the tenancy.

[73] The legislation relating to housing which has been enacted by Parliament is complex and much of it is designed to give statutory protection to tenants. It is necessary only to mention, by way of illustration, the discretionary grounds on which possession may be given which are set out in Sch 2 to the Housing Act 1985 and the protection which is given to introductory tenancies in Pt V of the Housing Act 1996. Where provisions of that kind are in issue, their application to the case where an order for possession is sought must be determined by the county court. In these cases the reasonableness or proportionality of making the order will arise because a decision on this point is required by the statute.

[74] The present case, however, is not a case of that kind. The joint tenancy has been brought to an end by the service of a tenant's notice to quit. The position in domestic law is that in these circumstances, as a result of the joint tenant's action and in terms of the lease, the whole of the joint tenancy is terminated. So neither joint tenant has any longer any right to remain in the premises. The county court has no discretion as to whether or not it should grant an order for possession in these circumstances. In domestic law the making of an order for possession follows automatically. It has not been suggested that the fact that this is what the law provides is itself a violation of art 8. That proposition would not be sustainable in view of the fundamentally subsidiary role of the convention, which gives special weight to the role of the domestic policy maker: see Hatton v UK [2003] All ER (D) 122 (Jul) at para 97. The only question is whether it is a violation of the respondent's art 8 rights for the law to be applied as it stands to his case.

[75] Some guidance as to what the European Court would make of this issue is provided by Ure v UK App No 28027/95 (27 November 1996, unreported), as the facts in that case are very similar to the facts in this appeal. The applicant had become, with his wife, a joint secure tenant of a flat belonging to the housing authority. His wife then left the flat and, having been advised that she could terminate the tenancy by serving a notice to quit, did so. The housing authority then applied for a possession order on the ground that the notice had terminated the joint tenancy. An order for possession was granted by the county court and upheld on appeal. The applicant submitted that the legislation which provided for the termination of a joint tenancy by a unilateral notice by one of the joint tenants operated in a manner which was incompatible with the other tenant's convention rights. He invoked various articles including art 8 of the convention, as to which his complaint was that his right to respect for his home had been breached. The Commission's response to this argument was as follows (at p 4):

> 'In the present case the Commission notes that the applicant and his wife were joint tenants and that, therefore, the right to use the apartment was to be exercised by them jointly. The applicant apparently was not entitled, under the tenancy agreement, to use the flat as a sole tenant. It was therefore clear at the outset that in the case one of the joint tenants decided to leave, the other could not claim a right to become the sole tenant. This was the legal situation as regards joint tenancies on all types of property, and not only on residential property.
>
> Furthermore, it does not appear that the manner in which the authorities balanced the various interests involved, such as the interest of the leaving co-tenant, of those in need of accommodation and of the applicant, was arbitrary or unreasonable. Thus, the applicant's housing need apparently changed as he was not living with his wife and child any more. Moreover, replacement housing accommodation had been obtained for the applicant.'

[76] It is true, as Mr Luba pointed out, that the commission did not base its decision in that case on the simple answer that the flat was no longer the applicant's home once the lease had been terminated. But it is plain that the legal situation in domestic law was an important factor. The observations about balancing the various interests involved were directed to a passage in the judgment of the Court of Appeal setting out its reasons for dismissing the applicant's argument that the housing authority, having allegedly instigated and assisted the wife to serve a notice to quit, was not entitled to rely on its own wrongdoing in seeking possession of the flat. They were also directed to an observation by the county court judge that there was nothing in itself either improper, unlawful or unfair in a local authority assisting a tenant in terminating a tenancy so that a person who might be entitled to other accommodation is able to obtain it. That has not formed any part of the respondent's argument in this case. It has not been suggested that there has been any wrongdoing on the appellants' part. The respondent did not seek judicial review of the decision to refuse his application in October 2000 for accommodation through the housing register.

[77] In Wood v UK (1997) 24 EHRR CD 69 the applicant had obtained a loan on the security of her house. It was repossessed when she was unable to meet the repayments on the loan. She complained that her rights under art 8 and art 1 of the First Protocol had been breached. The Commission's response to the complaint under art 8 is set out at 70–71:

> 'In so far as the repossession constituted an interference with the applicant's home, the Commission finds that this was in accordance with the terms of the loan and domestic law and was necessary for the protection of the rights and freedoms of others, namely the lender.'

In this case the point which was taken in the first paragraph which I have quoted from Ure v UK was decisive. Reading these two cases together with the second paragraph of the passage which I have quoted from the decision of the Commission in S v UK, I would expect the European Court to attach much importance to the fact that it was clear from the outset of the respondent's joint tenancy that it could be terminated by a notice to quit by one of the joint tenants, that the appellants' right to immediate possession is in these circumstances unqualified in domestic law and that the premises, once recovered, will be available for letting to others who are in need of housing in their area. The conclusion which I would draw is that on these facts the proposition that there was a violation of art 8 was unarguable.

[78] In Lambeth London BC v Howard [2001] EWCA Civ 468 at [32], (2001) 33 HLR 636 at [32] where possession was sought against a secure tenant on the grounds of nuisance under ground 2 of Pt I of Sch 2 to the Housing Act 1985, Sedley LJ said:

> 'A legal threat to a secure home will, in the ordinary way, engage article 8(1). In situations where the law affords an unqualified right to possession on proof of entitlement, it may be that article 8(2) is met, but that is not the present class of case and nothing in this judgment should be taken as impinging on it.'

As I have already indicated, I respectfully agree with the opinion which he has expressed in the first sentence of this quotation. But I think that the point which he makes at the outset of the second sentence can be expressed more strongly. My understanding of the European jurisprudence leads me to the conclusion that art 8(2) is met where the law affords an unqualified right to possession on proof that the tenancy has been terminated.

[79] In Sheffield City Council v Smart, Central Sunderland Housing Co Ltd v Wilson [2002] EWCA Civ 4, [2002] LGR 467 the defendant had been granted a non-secure tenancy of a residential property as a homeless person under s 193 of the Housing Act 1996. Complaints that she was causing a nuisance were received from neighbours, so the housing authority served her with a notice to quit. When it had taken effect the authority applied for a possession order. The Court of Appeal held that there was a prima facie violation of art 8(1) but, after examining of the scheme laid down by Parliament, that there had been no breach of the defendant's art 8(1) right in that case. It was also held, following R (on the application of McLellan) v Bracknell Forest BC, Reigate and Banstead BC v Benfield [2001] EWCA Civ 1510, [2002] 1 All ER 899, [2002] QB 1129 that a challenge to the decision to serve a notice to quit could be made in judicial review within the appropriate time limits, and that in the rare situation where something wholly exceptional happened after service of the notice to quit which fundamentally altered the rights and wrongs of the proposed eviction the judge in the county court who was hearing the claim for possession might be obliged to address it in deciding whether the making of a possession order could be justified: see [2002] LGR 467 at [40] and [44]–[45] per Laws LJ. I wish to reserve my opinion as to whether it would be open to the tenant, in a wholly exceptional case, to raise these issues in the county court where proceedings for possession were being taken following the service of a notice to quit by the housing authority, bearing in mind as Lord Millett points out that its decision to serve the notice to quit would be judicially reviewable in the High Court so long as the application was made within the relevant time limit. The situation in the present case is different, as it was a notice to quit served by one of the joint tenants that terminated the tenancy.

[80] In Wandsworth London BC v Michalak [2002] EWCA Civ 271, [2002] 4 All ER 1136, [2003] 1 WLR 617 the tenant of a secure tenancy had died. An order for possession was sought against the defendant, who had been living with the deceased but was not a member of the deceased's family as defined by the statute. In this case too it was held that there was a prima facie violation of his rights under art 8(1) but, following a consideration of the statutory scheme, that there had been no violation. As Mance LJ explained, at [82], that case belongs to a different category of case from this one as it was a statutory scheme that terminated the tenancy. He observed that the question whether there might prove in the county court to be short answers to the question raised by art 8(2) was not before the Court of Appeal in this case. That is not the position now, as your Lordships gave permission for argument to be presented on the question whether every claim for possession of a home engages art 8. In the course of that argument submissions were made as to whether, in a case of this kind, the right to respect for a home had been violated.

CONCLUSION

[81] In the second paragraph of his speech, which I have had the opportunity of reading in draft, my noble and learned friend Lord Steyn says that the approach of the majority empties art 8(1) of any or virtually any meaningful content and that it allows domestic notions of title, legal and equitable rights to colour its interpretation.

[82] I hope that I have been able to show that this is not so. I believe that the key to a proper understanding of the issues in this case lies in an appreciation of the fact that art 8 regards a person's home as an aspect of his right to privacy. The interpretation which I would give to the concept of a person's home in this context is broad enough to give a full measure of protection in a wide range of circumstances that may be envisaged where a person's right to respect for his home is interfered with by the public authorities. The issue which arises in this case is, by way of contrast, a very narrow one which has much more to do with the law relating to property rights than respect for a person's privacy.

[83] I do not say that the right to respect for the home is irrelevant. But I consider that such interference with it as flows from the application of the law which enables the public authority landlord to exercise its unqualified right to recover possession, following service of a notice to quit which has terminated the tenancy, with a view to making the premises available for letting to others on its housing list does not violate the essence of the right to respect for the home under art 8(1). That is a conclusion which can be applied now to all cases of this type generally.

[84] I agree with my noble and learned friends Lord Millett and Lord Scott of Foscote that the Strasbourg jurisprudence has shown that contractual and proprietary rights to possession cannot be defeated by a defence based on art 8. It follows that the question whether any interference is permitted by art 8(2) does not require, in this case, to be considered by the county court. I would allow the appeal and restore the order of Mr Recorder Williamson.

LORD MILLETT.

[85] My Lords, I have had the advantage of reading in draft the speeches of my noble and learned friends Lord Hope of Craighead and Lord Scott of Foscote. They have subjected the case law of the Strasbourg Court to close analysis and there is no need for me to repeat the exercise. I can therefore be relatively brief in explaining the reasons why I agree with them that the appeal should be allowed. In doing so I wish to make it clear that the difference which divides the majority from the minority is a very narrow one. This should not, however, obscure the fact that it is nevertheless of great practical importance, since it goes to the question whether the county court has discretion to refuse an order for possession in a straightforward situation of daily occurrence.

[86] It used to be an Englishman's proud boast that 'an Englishman's home is his castle'. The idea was given expression in stirring language by William Pitt the Elder (Lord Chatham) as recorded in Brougham's Statesmen in the Time of George III (First Series) (1839) pp 41–42:

> 'The poorest man may in his cottage bid defiance to all the forces of the Crown. It may be frail—its roof may shake—the wind may blow through it— the storm may enter—the rain may enter—but the King of England cannot enter! —all his force dares not cross the threshold of the ruined tenement!'

[87] Although not unrelated to his rights of property, the poor man's defiance of the King was not based on his title. The common law protects possession as well as title. A person who is in actual possession of land is entitled to remain in peaceful enjoyment of the property without disturbance by anyone except a person with a better right to possession. It does not matter that he has no title. A squatter can maintain a claim of trespass. His want of title does not justify the authorities in searching his premises without a search warrant. He cannot be evicted save at the suit of someone with a better right to possession, and even then that person must rely on the strength of his own title and not the weakness of the squatter's.

[88] The same idea is now enshrined, in suitably restrained and less colourful language, in art 8 of the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms 1950 (as set out in Sch 1 to the Human Rights Act 1998):

> 'Right to respect for private and family life
>
> 1. Everyone has the right to respect for his private and family life, his home and his correspondence.
>
> 2. There shall be no interference by a public authority with the exercise of this right except such as is in accordance with the law and is necessary in a democratic society in the interests of national security, public safety or the economic well-being of the country, for the prevention of disorder or crime, a for the protection of health or morals, or the protection of the rights and freedoms of others.'

The reference in art 8(2) to 'interference with ... the exercise of this right' is somewhat clumsily expressed in relation to the right in question. It is to be interpreted as forbidding interference with the enjoyment of the right in b question.

[89] Rights of property are protected by the First Protocol to the convention, not by art 8. Although added by a later Protocol the heading to art 8 indicates its essential thrust. It is not directed to the individual's rights of property but to his right to be left alone to live a normal family life without arbitrary interference by the public authorities: see Marckx v Belgium (1979) 2 EHRR 330 at 342. In art 8 an c individual's 'home' is not defined by the particular building which he owns or occupies. The Strasbourg court has repeatedly stated that art 8 does not give anyone a right to a home or 'an unconditional right to remain' in any particular home: see P v UK App No 14751/89 (12 December 1990, unreported). A person's 'home' is rather the place where he and his family are entitled to be left in peace d free from interference by the state or agents of the state. It is an important aspect of his dignity as a human being, and it is protected as such and not as an item of property.

[90] The facts of the present case are in small compass. Mr and Mrs Qazi were council tenants. They had a joint tenancy of a two-bedroomed house and lived there with their daughter. The marriage broke up and Mrs Qazi and her e daughter went to live elsewhere, leaving her husband alone in the house. She divorced him and he has remarried. She gave the council written notice to determine the tenancy in accordance with the terms of the tenancy agreement. This brought the tenancy to an end and with it Mr Qazi's right to go on living in the house. He applied to the council for a new tenancy, but his application was f refused on the legitimate ground that he was now a single person and that acceding to his application would result in under-occupation of a house which should be made available to accommodate a family with greater priority need in an area of acute housing shortage.

[91] Mr Qazi did not vacate the house and the council brought possession proceedings against him in the county court. The council is a public authority, g and Mr Qazi could, if so minded, have challenged its decisions to refuse his application for a new tenancy and to bring proceedings to recover possession on the grounds that they were 'arbitrary', that is to say not objectively justifiable but unreasonable or disproportionate. Such proceedings would have to be brought in the High Court; but the county court could have been asked to stay the h possession proceedings in order to permit them to be brought, though he would have had to show that they would have at least some prospect of success.

[92] Mr Qazi did not take this course. Instead he resisted the possession proceedings on the ground that by bringing them the council was interfering with the enjoyment of his right to respect for his home contrary to art 8. Absent a j timely challenge to the lawfulness of the council's decisions to refuse a new tenancy and seek possession, Mr Qazi had no defence under domestic law. The question to be decided in this appeal is whether he had any arguable defence by reference to art 8.

[93] The recorder held that art 8 was not 'engaged', that is to say was not applicable, because the premises were not Mr Qazi's 'home' within the meaning of art 8. It was not his 'home' because he had no legal or equitable right or interest in the premises. a [94] It is not disputed that, once his tenancy was determined, Mr Qazi no longer had any legal or equitable proprietary right in the premises. But the recorder's conclusion that Mr Qazi had no sufficient interest in the premises to support his claim to be left to enjoy them in peace was untenable even as a matter of domestic law. He was in actual possession, and this was enough to enable him b to claim the protection of the law against anyone who did not have an immediate right to possession.

[95] The Court of Appeal allowed Mr Qazi's appeal, and after a review of the case law of the Strasbourg court held that the premises were Mr Qazi's 'home' for the purposes of art 8. I agree with all your Lordships that they were right to do c so. The word 'home' has an 'autonomous' meaning in the Strasbourg jurisprudence, that is to say one which is independent of any particular meaning which may be attributed to it in the law of an individual contracting state. It does not, however, bear a special legal meaning developed by the case law of the Strasbourg court, as does the expression 'civil rights' for example. It bears its natural and ordinary meaning as popularly understood throughout the d contracting states. Whether premises constitute a person's 'home' for the purposes of art 8 is therefore a question of fact, and the Strasbourg court will examine the facts for itself in order to determine whether they do so.

[96] Considered as a question of fact, the premises were Mr Qazi's home at all material times. They were his home when he lived there with his former wife, e and they continued to be his home after she left him. They did not cease to be his home when his tenancy came to an end. The most that can be said is that he no longer had a legal right to remain in occupation which he could maintain against the council, though he could maintain it against anyone else. He was liable to be evicted at the suit of the council; but while he lived there it was still his home. It was his home when the council brought proceedings against him, f and it was still his home when the recorder made a possession order against him. It would not have ceased to be his home until he left possession or was evicted by the bailiffs. This has not happened. He lives there to this day, now with his second wife and two children. It is still his home.

[97] This is the approach which has been adopted by the Strasbourg court. Its g case law has been consistent in treating the question as one of fact. It is neither necessary nor sufficient that the applicant should have a proprietary interest in the premises which are alleged to constitute his 'home'. A person may make his home where he has no right to be; and a person may choose not to make his home where he has a right to live. I agree with my noble and learned friend Lord h Scott that S v UK (1986) 47 DR 274 has been misinterpreted, and that properly understood it remains authority for what it decided. Although clumsily expressed, the Commission's decision was clearly based on the fact that the local authority was entitled to possession. This was the basis of the Commission's conclusion that the house could 'no longer be regarded as "home" for the applicant within the meaning of article 8'. The Commission cannot have meant j this literally, for it would emasculate art 8. Its protection would entirely fall away as soon as the applicant's tenancy came to an end. The police could search his house without a warrant; the applicant and his family would be liable to immediate and arbitrary eviction by anyone with or without a shadow of a legal right without the protection of the convention. Not only is this indefensible in human rights terms, it does not follow (as the Commission thought the local authority's compliance with its obligations under art 8 did) as a logical consequence of the determination of the applicant's tenancy. I think that the Commission was saying that the house could no longer be regarded as attracting the protection of art 8 so as to afford a defence to the local authority's claim to possession. So understood the decision is both internally logical and consistent with the later jurisprudence of the Strasbourg court.

[98] The only other case to which I would refer at this stage is Gillow v UK (1986) 11 EHRR 335. This was a decision of the Strasbourg court and was concerned with the converse case where the applicant owns the premises but does not live there. The court held that, although the applicants had not lived in the premises for 19 years, they had not established any other home elsewhere in the United Kingdom and had 'retained sufficient continuing links' with the subject premises for them to be considered their 'home' for the purposes of art 8. I do not think that this undermined the decision in S v UK in any way. It did not substitute a new test of 'sufficient and continuous links' for a former test of legal or equitable title, for this test, if it be one at all, was satisfied. It merely showed that, whether or not title was necessary to bring premises within the protection of art 8, it might not be sufficient.

[99] Accordingly I am satisfied that, when the local authority's claim for possession came before the recorder, and contrary to his decision, the premises did constitute Mr Qazi's 'home' for the purposes of art 8.

[100] It necessarily follows that art 8 was applicable. But it does not follow that it was even arguably infringed. In my opinion art 8 is not ordinarily infringed by enforcing the terms on which the applicant occupies premises as his home. Article 8(1) does not give a right to a home, but only to 'respect' for the home. This meaning of 'respect' for the home cannot be understood in isolation; it can be understood only if art 8(1) is read together with art 8(2). This forbids interference with the right conferred by art 8(1) except in the circumstances specified. By explaining the circumstances in which there may be lawful interference with the right to 'respect', art 8(2) gives meaning to that concept and limits the scope of the article.

[101] Article 8(2) stipulates that interference with the right must not be arbitrary; it must be in accordance with law. This requirement is satisfied in the present case, and it need not be examined further. But this is not sufficient. The interference must also be justified. In most cases art 8(2) calls for a balance to be struck between the applicant's right to 'respect' for his home and some competing public interest, such as national security, public safety, the prevention of disorder or crime, the protection of health or morals, and so on. But art 8(2) also permits interference with the right where it is necessary 'for the protection of the rights and freedoms of others'. Those others include but are not limited to private citizens. They include landowners whether they are private citizens or public authorities.

[102] Consideration of the question whether interference with the right is 'necessary for the protection of the rights and freedoms of others' may also call for a balance to be struck, but it need not do so. A person's right to respect for his home includes his right to listen to music, but not to music so loud that it disturbs his neighbour's sleep at 3 am. Our ordinary law of nuisance requires the court to conduct a balancing exercise between the competing rights of neighbours to enjoy their respective properties. By carrying out that exercise the court will inevitably be concluding, whether consciously or not, whether its interference with one party's right to respect for his home is necessary to protect his neighbour's rights and freedoms. Provided that it carries out the exercise properly and in accordance with the ordinary law, there is no need to give separate consideration to art 8.

[103] But no such balancing exercise need be conducted where its outcome is a foregone conclusion. In the present case, as in S v UK, the local authority had an immediate right to possession. The premises were Mr Qazi's home, and evicting him would obviously amount to an interference with his enjoyment of the premises as his home. But his right to occupy them as such was circumscribed by the terms of his tenancy and had come to an end. Eviction was plainly necessary to protect the rights of the local authority as landowner. Its obligation to 'respect' Mr Qazi's home was not infringed by its requirement that he vacate the premises at the expiry of the period during which it had agreed that he might occupy them. There was simply no balance to be struck.

[104] This conclusion too is in accordance with Strasbourg jurisprudence. I have already referred to S v UK, where in very similar circumstances the Commission declared the complaint to be manifestly ill-founded. Another such case is Wood v UK (1997) 24 EHRR CD 69 where the Commission rejected a complaint by a mortgagor who was in default that her art 8 rights had been infringed by the making of a possession order at the suit of the mortgagee. The Commission held that even if the repossession constituted an interference with the applicant's home, it was in accordance with the terms of the loan and domestic law and was necessary for the protection of the rights and freedoms of others, namely the mortgagee. There was thus no infringement of the art 8 right. There is no relevant distinction between that case and the present. It is true that the mortgagee in Wood v UK was not a public authority whereas the council in the present case is; but the council's conduct as a public authority was not challenged, as it could have been by proceedings for judicial review in the High Court, and in bringing its claim for possession it relied on its ordinary rights, shared by everyone, as the owner of the premises and not on its rights as a public authority. Its status as a public authority was simply irrelevant to its claim.

[105] An instructive case which demonstrates the limits of the protection afforded by art 8 is Larkos v Cyprus (1999) 7 BHRC 244. As in the present case, the applicant was a tenant whose tenancy had come to an end and whose landlord sought possession. The applicant was a tenant of government-owned premises, and as such was not entitled to the security of tenure which he would have enjoyed if he had held his tenancy from a private landlord. He did not complain of an infringement of art 8 alone, and it is clear that neither the Commission nor the court would have found one. They found a breach of art 14 taken in conjunction with art 8. Article 14 secures the enjoyment of convention rights without discrimination. The convention right in question was the right to respect for the applicant's home. That had been secured to tenants, but on a discriminatory basis which infringed art 14.

[106] The Commission expressly acknowledged that art 8 does not require states to take measures to protect tenants from eviction after the termination of the contracts under which they occupy their homes. But the state concerned had done so. Since the law by which it had done so 'regulates the right to respect for one's home' it must apply in a non-discriminatory manner in accordance with art 14. The importance of Larkos v Cyprus for present purposes lies in the fact that, if national law had not discriminated against government tenants by withholding the security of tenure which it granted to tenants of private landlords, the eviction would not have amounted to a breach of the applicant's art 8 rights.

[107] It follows that I do not accept without qualification the suggestion of Laws LJ in Sheffield City Council v Smart, Central Sunderland Housing Co Ltd v Wilson [2002] EWCA Civ 4, [2002] LGR 467 that, once it is established that the premises in question are the applicant's home, an order for possession amounts to an interference with (and prima facie an infringement of) his art 8 right of respect for his home. The qualification, which is built into the provisions of art 8 itself, is that save in wholly exceptional circumstances (which it has not been suggested exist in the present case and with which I shall deal below) there is no lack of respect, and no infringement of art 8, where the order is made in favour of the person entitled to possession by national law.

[108] I would also wish to dissociate myself from the dictum of Waller LJ in R (on the application of McLellan) v Bracknell Forest BC, Reigate and Banstead BC v Benfield [2001] EWCA Civ 1510, [2002] 1 All ER 899, [2002] QB 1129 that, even in a case where a private landlord is seeking possession, the court, as a public authority, must consider whether the order is justified under art 8(2) before making an order. The fact that a person cannot be evicted without a court order does not mean that the court, as a public authority, is bound in each case to consider whether an order for possession would be disproportionate and infringe art 8 rights. The court is merely the forum for the determination of the civil right in dispute between the parties: see Di Palma v UK (1988) 10 EHRR 149. Its task is to resolve the dispute according to law. In doing so it would, of course, have to consider whether the landlord was entitled to possession as a matter of our ordinary domestic law (ie apart from the Human Rights Act 1998), taking into account the various statutory provisions which operate in this field. But once it concludes that the landlord is entitled to an order for possession, there is nothing further to investigate. The order is necessary to protect the rights of the landlord; and making or enforcing it does not show a want of appropriate respect for the applicant's home.

[109] I would accordingly endorse the observations of Moses J in R (on the application of Gangera) v Hounslow London BC [2003] EWHC 794 (Admin), [2003] All ER (D) 200 (Apr) that in proceedings between private parties the court does not act incompatibly with art 8 by making or enforcing a possession order without considering questions of proportionality. I also agree with him that it makes no difference that the landlord is a public authority. In most cases the statutory scheme established by Parliament will provide the objective justification for the council's decision to seek possession, which need not be demonstrated on a case-by-case basis: see Wandsworth London BC v Michalak [2002] EWCA Civ 271 at [46], [2002] 4 All ER 1136 at [46], [2003] 1 WLR 617. In the exceptional case where the applicant believes that the local authority is acting unfairly or from improper or ulterior motives, he can apply to the High Court for judicial review. The availability of this remedy, coupled with the fact that an occupier cannot be evicted without a court order, so that the court can consider whether the claimant is entitled as of right to possession, is sufficient to supply the necessary and appropriate degree of respect for the applicant's home.

[110] In my opinion the Court of Appeal were right to determine that the premises constituted Mr Qazi's home at the material time, but wrong to remit the case to the county court for further consideration. In my opinion there was nothing further for the county court to consider. There was no arguable breach of art 8, and the Court of Appeal ought to have dismissed Mr Qazi's appeal, albeit on grounds which differ from those of the recorder.

LORD SCOTT OF FOSCOTE.

INTRODUCTION

[111] My Lords, the issue before your Lordships turns on the view to be taken of the effect of art 8 of the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms 1950 (as set out in Sch 1 to the Human Rights Act 1998) on a case where the owner of property is seeking to recover possession from the occupier whose home it has become but who has no right, as against the owner, to remain there. The facts of the case have been fully set out in the opinions given by my noble and learned friends Lord Bingham of Cornhill and Lord Hope of Craighead, as well as in the courts below, and I can deal with them briefly.

[112] The property is a two-bedroom house at 31 Hutton Lane, Harrow. The owner is the appellant, the London Borough of Harrow (the council). The house forms part of the council's housing stock. The respondent, Mr Qazi and his then wife, Mrs Saman Qazi, became joint tenants of the house under a secure tenancy granted by the council in 1992. They lived there with their daughter. It was their home. In 1998 their relationship broke up. Mrs Qazi left the home with their daughter to live elsewhere and served notice to quit on the council. It may safely be assumed that the service of the notice to quit was contrary to Mr Qazi's wishes. He wanted to continue to occupy the house as his home.

[113] It is accepted, however, that the effect in law of the service of a notice to quit by one joint tenant who jointly with another holds a tenancy of property terminates the tenancy. The effect, therefore, of the service by Mrs Qazi of the notice to quit terminated the secure tenancy under which Mr Qazi was occupying the house. He had, thereafter, no property right that entitled him, as against the council, to remain in occupation.

[114] Mr Qazi applied to the council for a new tenancy. His application was refused in July 1999. The council took the view that, as a single occupant, the accommodation was more than he needed. They wanted to allocate the house to one of the families on their lengthy housing list. In November 1999, in response to a repeated request from Mr Qazi, the council repeated their refusal to grant him a new tenancy. They asked him to vacate the house. Mr Qazi refused to vacate the house and, in March 2000, the council commenced possession proceedings in the county court. It is those proceedings that, via the Court of Appeal, have led to this appeal to your Lordships' House.

[115] Mr Qazi could have tried to challenge, by judicial review, the council's decision to refuse to grant him a new tenancy of the house. But he did not do so. It may be he took the view that, in the circumstances pertaining in July and November 1999, the challenge would have been a hopeless one.

[116] In 2000, however, a change in circumstances had occurred. Mr Qazi formed a relationship with a lady whom he married in October 1999 in an Islamic ceremony. She had a five-year-old son. Their marriage was later solemnised in a civil ceremony. By July 2000 they were all living together as a family in the house. The family was increased when Mr Qazi's new wife, Mrs Abida Qazi, gave birth to their child in December 2000. She applied to the council for the grant of a tenancy of the house to herself and Mr Qazi. The council's previous objection to Mr Qazi's application, namely, that the accommodation was more than a single occupant required, no longer applied. But the council refused her application. They placed her and Mr Qazi on their housing list but pointed out that there were many families above them on the list. They were not willing to accord Mr and Mrs Qazi priority over those other families. This decision, too, was not challenged in any judicial review application.

[117] Meanwhile the possession proceedings brought by the council were continuing. Mr Qazi's defence has been throughout, and remains, that the council's claim for possession, and any possession order made by the court acceding to that claim, would be in breach of his rights under art 8 of the convention. On 8 June 2001 Mr Recorder Williamson, sitting in the Watford County Court, rejected this defence and made an order for possession in favour of the council. He did so because, in his view, property in which a claimant had no legal or equitable right or interest could not constitute the claimant's 'home' for art 8 purposes. On appeal, the Court of Appeal disagreed with this view. They held that the factual links between the claimant and the property sufficient or necessary for it to constitute his 'home' for art 8 purposes did not include a legal or equitable right or interest in the property. They held that the possession proceedings constituted an interference with Mr Qazi's 'home' so that art 8, contrary to Mr Recorder Williamson's view, was applicable. They therefore allowed Mr Qazi's appeal and remitted the case to the county court in order for the county court to decide whether the interference could be justified under art 8(2).

[118] There appear, therefore, to be two issues for your Lordships. The first is whether the house, 31 Hutton Lane, Harrow, constituted Mr Qazi's 'home' for art 8 purposes notwithstanding that he had no legal or equitable right or interest in the property. The second issue is whether, if the house did constitute Mr Qazi's 'home', Mr Qazi can raise an art 8 defence to the council's claim for possession notwithstanding that, as against the council, he has no right under the ordinary law to remain in possession. In other words, can art 8 ever constitute a defence to a claim by an owner of property to recover the property where, art 8 apart, the defendant has no right to remain there?

ARTICLE 8

[119] Article 8 says:

> '1. Everyone has the right to respect for his private and family life, his home and his correspondence.
>
> 2. There shall be no interference by a public authority with the exercise of this right except such as is in accordance with the law and is necessary in a democratic society in the interests of national security, public safety or the economic well-being of the country, for the prevention of disorder or crime, for the protection of health or morals, or for the protection of the rights and freedoms of others.'

[120] The structure of art 8 is, in my opinion, very important. Paragraph 1 expresses a general principle, rather than a precise legal right: the words 'the right to respect' are indicative of this. The object of the 'right to respect' is home life in all its aspects: privacy, family, home, correspondence. Paragraph 2, on the other hand, expresses, with precision, the gateways through which a public authority that interferes, or proposes to interfere, with the para 1 'right to respect' for home life must pass if the interference is to be permissible. The interference must always be in accordance with the law. But it must also be necessary in a democratic society for one or other of the specified reasons. The obviously pertinent reason for the purposes of the present case is 'for the protection of the rights and freedoms of others'. But, of course, one never gets to a consideration of the gateways unless the interference complained of is capable of constituting interference with the 'right to respect' for home life.

[121] Before turning to the Strasbourg and domestic case law relevant to the issues before the House, it is helpful to reflect on the intended purpose of the convention. It was the progeny in a European context of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights (Paris, 10 December 1948; UN TS 2 (1949); Cmd 7226) proclaimed by the General Assembly of the United Nations. It (the convention) recited that '[the Universal] Declaration aims at securing the universal and effective recognition and observance of the Rights therein declared' and that the signatory governments (to the convention) were resolved 'to take the first steps for the collective enforcement of certain of the rights stated in the Universal Declaration'. I have referred to these recitals as a preliminary to making the point that not one of the rights declared in the Universal Declaration and not one of the rights and freedoms enshrined in the convention involves, in express terms at least, any diminution of (or encroachment on) the property rights of others. The reverse is the case. Article 17(2) of the Universal Declaration says that 'No one shall be arbitrarily deprived of his property'. This is reflected in art 1 of the First Protocol to the convention which secures the right of every 'natural or legal person' to the peaceful enjoyment of his possessions. Any interference with this right must be 'in the public interest and subject to the conditions provided for by law'.

[122] As to the right to respect for home life provided by art 8 of the convention, its progenitor is art 12 of the Universal Declaration which says that 'No one shall be subjected to arbitrary interference with his privacy, family, home or correspondence'. Neither this language, nor the language of art 8 can, in my opinion, be read as authorising any deprivation of the property rights of others.

[123] The Universal Declaration and the convention were the product of the horrors of fascism which led to World War II and the Holocaust. One of the recitals to the former records that 'disregard and contempt for human rights have resulted in barbarous acts which have outraged the conscience of mankind'. The intention of these instruments was to enshrine fundamental rights and freedoms. It was not the intention to engage in social engineering in the housing field. It was, in 1948 and 1950, when these instruments came into being, and it still remains, the province of individual signatory states to decide for themselves what social housing legislation to introduce. Thus, if a signatory state chose not to provide any security of tenure to residential tenants, so that on the expiry of every tenancy the landlord would become entitled to recover possession, this state of affairs would offend neither art 12 of the Universal Declaration nor art 8 of the convention. The recovery by the landlord of possession of his property, the ex-tenant having no right to remain there, would not be 'arbitrary' (see art 12) nor would it be indicative of any lack of respect for the tenant's home life. It would simply be the recovery by the landlord of his property. The tenant's home life at the property would throughout have been subject to the possibility of having to move out on the expiry of the tenancy. Article 8 would not alter the position.

[124] Nor would recovery by a property owner of his property from a squatter/occupier who had made it his home be in any different state. If the occupier had been in adverse possession for 12 years, he would have acquired a title by adverse possession and be entitled to remain. Article 8 would not be relevant. The disentitled owner might make a complaint under art 1 of the First Protocol but would fail. The divesting operation of the Statutes of Limitation would be justifiable as being in the public interest etc (see JA Pye (Oxford) Ltd v Graham [2002] UKHL 30, [2002] 3 All ER 865, [2003] 1 AC 419 and, in the Court of Appeal [2001] EWCA Civ 117, [2001] Ch 804). But if the home occupier had been in possession for less than 12 years he would have no right as against the owner to remain. The recovery by the owner of his property would not be arbitrary nor would it evidence any lack of respect for the occupier's home life. His home life at the property would have always been subject to the possibility of eviction by the owner.

[125] It is, of course, the case that the United Kingdom, in common, I expect, with all other signatories to the convention has enacted elaborate social housing legislation. The degree of security of tenure provided to tenants of residential property on the expiry of their tenancies is highly complex. There are assured shorthold tenancies, secure tenancies, non-secure tenancies, introductory tenancies, service tenancies, furnished tenancies and, no doubt, others. The manner in which these tenancies can be brought to an end varies and depends on the contents of the relevant legislation. The respective rights of landlord and tenant, after termination of the tenancy, similarly depend on the content of the legislation. If, under the relevant provisions of the relevant legislation, the tenant has no right to remain in possession, the case is no different from that in which there is no relevant legislation at all. If, pursuant to the provisions of the relevant legislation, the tenant is entitled to remain in possession after the termination of his tenancy, there will have been a corresponding diminution of the landlord's property rights. This diminution will put art 1 of the First Protocol into play. But social housing legislation of this character is well justifiable on the public interest grounds provided for by the article (c/f James v UK (1986) 8 EHRR 123). If, on the other hand, the tenant has no right to remain in possession as against the landlord he cannot claim such right under art 8. To hold otherwise, to hold that art 8 can vest property rights in the tenant and diminish the landlord's contractual and property rights, would be to attribute to art 8 an effect that it was never intended to have. Article 8 was intended to deal with the arbitrary intrusion by state or public authorities into a citizen's home life. It was not intended to operate as an amendment or improvement of whatever social housing legislation the signatory state had chosen to enact. There is nothing in Strasbourg case law to suggest the contrary.

STRASBOURG CASE LAW

[126] I start with S v UK (1986) 47 DR 274. The case concerned a homosexual couple living together in a house of which one of them was the tenant under a secure tenancy. The tenant died. The local authority landlord sought to recover possession from the survivor. The survivor's defence in the domestic courts was that she was entitled under s 30 of the Housing Act 1980 to succeed to her deceased partner's secure tenancy. Section 30 gives a right of succession to a surviving occupier where the survivor is a spouse or member of the family of the deceased tenant. But the contention that a homosexual partner could be a spouse or a member of the family of the deceased tenant for s 30 purposes was not accepted, a possession order was made and she was evicted. She then applied to Strasbourg on the ground of a breach of her convention rights. She claimed first, that 'respect for her private and family life has been denied' and that her 'eviction was not necessary on any ground enumerated within article 8(2)' (at 277). She claimed also under art 14, that she had been discriminated against in relation to her rights under art 8. The Commission said (at 278) that 'any interference which there may have been with the applicant's private life falls to be considered in the context of her home' and then said:

> 'The Commission notes that the applicant was occupying the house, of which her partner had been the tenant, without any legal title whatsoever. Contractual relations were established between the local authority and the deceased partner and that contractual agreement may or may not have permitted long-term visitors. The fact remains, however, that on the death of the partner, under the ordinary law, the applicant was no longer entitled to remain in the house, and the local authority was entitled to possession so that the house could no longer be regarded as 'home' for the applicant within the meaning of article 8.'

[127] The cited passage has been much criticised, but I think it has been misunderstood. The Commission were not, in my view, seeking to prescribe the features of occupation of premises that would enable the premises to constitute an individual's 'home' for art 8 purposes. S had been lawfully occupying the house as her 'home' by permission of and with her deceased partner. But after the death of the partner the local authority owner wanted to recover possession and S could not as against the owner, invoke art 8 rights. This, I think, is what the Commission meant in saying 'the local authority was entitled to possession so that the house could no longer be regarded as 'home' for the applicant within the meaning of article 8'. The Commission cannot be taken to have meant that the applicant could not, after the death of her partner, have asserted art 8 rights against any bugging of her telephone, any intrusion on her privacy by long range photography or any like invasions of her home life by third parties or, indeed, by the local authority itself. The Commission was commenting on a recovery of possession by an owner entitled to possession. Unless it could have been said that art 8 conferred some countervailing property rights on S and correspondingly diminished the local authority's property rights, thereby amending in favour of S the relevant housing legislation, art 8 was simply irrelevant to the local authority's right to recover possession. No such argument was addressed to the Commission. If it had been it should, in my opinion, have failed for the reasons I have already given.

[128] The correctness of the Commission's approach to S's art 8 objection to the local authority's right to recover possession can be tested by considering the position if the deceased tenant in her lifetime had asked S to leave. Assume that S had no contractual or equitable rights under the ordinary law. Could she have contended that her partner's request that she leave offended her 'right to respect' for her home? In my opinion, plainly not, unless it were to be said that art 8 had given S some interest in the house and correspondingly diminished the partner-tenant's proprietary interest. If art 8 can be raised against the landlord by an occupier with no proprietary or contractual right as against the landlord, it must equally be capable of being raised against the tenant by an occupier with no proprietary or contractual right against the tenant.

[129] Immediately after the passage I have cited, the Commission went on (at 278):

> 'Further, even if the applicant's right to respect for her home, as guaranteed by article 8, could be regarded as having been interfered with by order of the county court for possession against her, the Commission considers that such interference was clearly in accordance with the law and was also necessary for the protection of the contractual rights of the landlord to have the property back at the end of the tenancy.'

Just so, but what the Commission was saying, in effect, was that the landlord's legal right to recover possession of its property at the end of the tenancy prevented art 8 from providing any assistance to S. A possession order was necessary in order to give effect to, 'for the protection of', that right to possession. How else could it have been protected?

[130] Di Palma v UK (1988) 10 EHRR 149 was a case in which the landlord (a private landlord, not a local authority) had forfeited the tenant's lease on account of her failure to pay a service charge. The landlord then brought possession proceedings in the county court. Subject to the question of relief from forfeiture the tenant had no defence to the action. The issue was whether either the county court or the High Court had jurisdiction to grant that relief. If there had been jurisdiction to grant relief, relief would, on the facts, have been granted. But the county court's jurisdiction to grant relief from forfeiture was statutory and was very limited. On the facts of the case it was not exercisable. The High Court's jurisdiction to grant relief had been removed by the statute which had conferred the limited jurisdiction on the county court (see s 191, County Courts Act 1959). So the tenant fell in a black hole, was unable to obtain relief from forfeiture and lost her flat, notwithstanding that the forfeiture was a disproportionate penalty for her failure to pay the service charge: (see Di Palma v Victoria Square Property Co Ltd [1984] 2 All ER 92 at 100, 104–105, [1984] Ch 346 at 362, 368–369). The tenant applied to Strasbourg complaining, inter alia, that the possession order was in breach of her art 8 rights. She said that 'her eviction from her home constitutes an unjustified interference with the right to respect for her home protected by article 8' ((1988) 10 EHRR 149 at 155). But the Commission held (at 155–156) that—> 'any interference with the applicant's right to respect for her home which the forfeiture of her lease engendered was in conformity with article 8(2) as a measure which was in accordance with the law and necessary in a democratic society for the protection of the rights of others.'

They held her art 8 complaint to be manifestly ill-founded. It is important to notice that this was not a conclusion to which the Commission came on grounds of proportionality. Otherwise they must have found in favour of the applicant. They held in effect, as they had done in S v UK, that art 8 rights could not suffice against an owner of property with an otherwise unimpeachable right to possession.

[131] It is said that the approach of the Strasbourg tribunals in cases such as Gillow v UK (1986) 11 EHRR 335, Buckley v UK (1996) 23 EHRR 101, Mabey v UK

(1996) 22 EHRR CD 123 and Chapman v UK (2001) 10 BHRC 48 is inconsistent with that of the Commission in S v UK and Di Palma v UK. My Lords, I think not. None of these cases involved a claim by the owner of the premises in question against an occupier who, vis-à-vis the owner, had no right to remain. Gillow v UK was a case in which the premises were in Guernsey and the owner, Mr Gillow, needed a licence in order to be allowed to reside there. He applied for the necessary licence but was refused. The refusal, he contended, interfered with his art 8 right to respect for his home. One of the issues was whether the premises did constitute his home. He had lived there at one time but for a long period had lived abroad. The court held that he had 'retained sufficient continuing links' with the premises for it still to constitute his home for art 8 purposes (see para 46). The court found (para 58) that the interference that the refusal of the licence and the consequent prosecution of Mr Gillow for unlawful occupation constituted was disproportionate to the legitimate aim pursued and consequently was not justifiable under art 8(2). This conclusion was reached after a careful consideration of the purposes of the Guernsey legislation requiring certain people to obtain residence licences and of the various factors taken into account by the Guernsey authorities in deciding whether or not to grant Mr Gillow a licence. There is a very striking contrast between this balancing process that the court undertook and the absence of any such balancing process in S v UK or in Di Palma v UK. The contrast does not indicate that the commission's approach was wrong. It indicates that the art 8(2) balancing process is inappropriate where possession is being claimed by the owner of the property against whom the occupier has no right to remain.

[132] Buckley v UK, Mabey v UK and Chapman v UK were cases where gipsies had acquired land on which to stand the caravans in which they lived. They began using the land, their own land, for that purpose, but the standing of caravans on the land was unlawful under the planning laws. The planning authorities brought proceedings to prevent these breaches of the planning laws. The land/caravan owners contended that to bring these proceedings was an interference with their art 8 rights to respect for their homes. It was contended, in answer, that because the establishing of their homes was in breach of the planning law and therefore unlawful art 8 could not apply. This contention was rejected. In Buckley v UK (1996) 23 EHRR 101 the European Court quoted the Commission which said (at 115 (para 63)):

> '... the concept of "home" within the meaning of article 8 is not limited to those which are lawfully occupied or which have been lawfully established. "Home" is an autonomous concept which does not depend on classification under domestic law. Whether or not a particular habitation constitutes a "home" which attracts the protection of article 8(1) will depend on the factual circumstances, namely, the existence of sufficient and continuous links.'

[133] It has been suggested that this test of what constitutes a 'home' for art 8 purposes invalidates what the Commission had said in S v UK. My Lords, I do not think so. In S v UK the Commission was concentrating on the question whether the recovery by a landlord of possession of premises after the expiry or determination of the tenancy under which the premises had been occupied as a home constituted an interference with the right to respect for the occupier's home guaranteed by art 8. The Commission held it did not and, in explaining why not, said ((1986) 47 DR 274 at 278 (para 4)) that 'the local authority was entitled to possession so that the house could no longer be regarded as a home' (my emphasis). In Buckley v UK, by way of contrast, as in the other gypsy cases, the issue was whether the unlawfulness under the planning laws of the applicant-owner's occupation of the property in question disqualified the occupation from being occupation of a 'home' for art 8 purposes. The Commission formulated the test in the way it did in order to eliminate the unlawfulness of the occupation as a relevant factor, let alone a determinative factor, in deciding whether the occupation was of a 'home'. There was no suggestion, however, by the European Court in Buckley v UK that the Commission's approach in S v UK needed to be re-considered or was wrong. Buckley v UK does not constitute any authority at all for the proposition that a home-occupier can resist a possession action by the owner of the property on art 8 grounds.

[134] For my part I think that the first passage I cited from the Commission's judgment in S v UK should, in the light of Buckley v UK, be re-worded. I think the Commission should have said, simply, that the claim by the local authority landlord to recover possession of the house after the death of the tenant did not constitute an interference with S's right to respect for her home since she no longer had, vis-à-vis the landlord, any right to remain there. This, I think, is what the Commission meant.

[135] In Wood v UK (1997) 24 EHRR CD 69 the Commission adopted an approach to art 8 consistent with their approach in S v UK. The case was one in which the applicant was a mortgagor who had fallen into arrears with her mortgage payments. The mortgagee, exercising its powers under the mortgage, had taken possession of the house, the mortgaged property. The applicant complained that the repossession constituted a breach of her art 8 right to respect for her home. The Commission rejected her claim. It said (at 70–71) that the re-possession 'was in accordance with the terms of the loan and the domestic law and was necessary for the protection of the rights and freedoms of others, namely the lender'. There is no suggestion that this decision was reached by weighing up the applicant's interest in retaining her home against the mortgagee's interest in enforcing its security. The Commission's conclusion makes it clear, in my opinion, that a mortgagor cannot invoke art 8 in order to diminish the contractual and proprietary rights of the mortgagee under the mortgage. Article 8 is simply not applicable.

[136] Similarly art 8 could never be successfully prayed in aid by a vendor to prevent a contractual purchaser from obtaining specific performance of a contract for the purchase of the house which was the vendor's home. This must be so unless it be said that art 8 diminishes the contractual and proprietary rights of the mortgagee in the case of a mortgage of residential property or of a purchaser in the case of a contract to purchase residential property.

[137] Marzari v Italy (1999) 28 EHRR CD 175 was, like Wood v UK and Di Palma v UK, a case where no attempt was made to strike a balance between the interests of the applicant and those of the person responsible for the eviction of the applicant from his home. The applicant, a council tenant was evicted following service of a notice to quit for non-payment of rent. The Strasbourg court found the undoubted interference with the applicant's home that the eviction constituted to be justified under art 8(2) but without any attempt to address the proportionality of the eviction. As in Wood v UK and Di Palma v UK the failure of the art 8 complaint was inevitable in view of the absence of any answer under the ordinary law to the landlord's, or mortgagee's, contractual and proprietary right to possession. It could be said that in these cases art 8 is simply not applicable. Or it could be said, applying art 8(2), that the recovery of possession by the person entitled to possession is in accordance with the law and is necessary to protect that right to possession. It comes to the same thing. Article 8 does not attack the owner's legal right to possession.

[138] Larkos v Cyprus (1999) 7 BHRC 244 was a decision of the Strasbourg court. The applicant was tenant of a house. It was his home. His landlord was the government. The tenancy was terminated by the government and an eviction order was made against the tenant by the domestic court. Under the local law, the tenant would have had security of tenure if his landlord had been a private landlord; but as his landlord was the government he had had no security of tenure. His complaint to the Strasbourg court was not that his art 8 right of respect for his home had been infringed. It was that he had suffered discrimination in that as a government tenant he had had no security of tenure. His complaint was of a breach of art 14. The eviction order, sought by the government and made by the domestic court, had certainly interfered with his home. He had been evicted. The absence in such a case of any claim by the tenant that his art 8 rights had been infringed or of any suggestion by the Strasbourg court that he might have so claimed seems to me highly significant. The reason, surely, is that the recovery of possession by a landlord entitled to possession could not have sustained such a claim. The discriminatory element, enabling a claim under art 14 to be made, was essential.

[139] I have referred to these Strasbourg decisions in order to try and demonstrate the consistency with which the principle which, to my mind, underlies art 8 has been applied. In no case has art 8 been applied so as to diminish or detract from the contractual and proprietary rights of the person entitled to possession.

DOMESTIC CASE LAW

[140] Your Lordships have been referred to three Court of Appeal cases in which art 8 was in issue in proceedings for possession brought by a landlord against a tenant whose tenancy had expired. In none did the landlord fail to recover possession. In each the case was decided on the ground that the interference was justified under art 8(2). In my respectful opinion, however, the approach by the court in each of these cases is open to criticism.

[141] The first of these cases was Poplar Housing and Regeneration Community Association Ltd v Donoghue [2001] EWCA Civ 595, [2001] 4 All ER 604, [2002] QB 48. The landlord sought a possession order against an assured shorthold tenant. The relevant legislation bars recovery of possession by the landlord otherwise than under an order of the court but requires the court to make the order if the requisite statutory conditions are met. In this case they had been met. But art 8 was relied on by the tenant. It was accepted, of course, that an order for possession would constitute an interference with the tenant's home. Whether it would have constituted an interference with the tenant's 'right to respect' for the home was not considered. Argument centred on whether justification for the interference under art 8(2) could be shown. The Court of Appeal attributed weight to the impact that eviction would have on the tenant's family life but held, on balance, that the interference was justified. It is implicit in this approach that, if the facts had been different, the balance might have come down the other way, in favour of the tenant. This would, in effect, have amended in favour of the tenant the relevant housing legislation. It would have given the tenant possessory rights in respect of the house and correspondingly diminished the landlord's proprietary rights. It would, in my opinion, have given art 8 an effect it was never intended to have and ought not to have. It would have denied the landlord the necessary protection for its contractual and proprietary right to possession. In my respectful opinion the court, having noted that the eviction would have constituted an interference with the tenant's home, should have held that in view of the landlord's right to possession art 8 was not applicable. The case was, in my view, correctly decided but for the wrong reason.

[142] R (on the application of McLellan) v Bracknell Forest BC, Reigate and Banstead BC v Benfield [2001] EWCA Civ 1510, [2002] 1 All ER 899, [2002] QB 1129 concerned an introductory tenancy. The tenancy had been duly terminated by the local authority landlord in accordance with the procedures prescribed by the relevant legislation. The tenant had no contractual or proprietary right, as against the landlord, to remain in possession. Counsel for the landlord submitted that 'the rights of the tenant to occupy the premises were simply in accordance with [the introductory tenancy] scheme' (at [37]) and that art 8 had no application. But the Court of Appeal disagreed and held that 'the question to be considered is whether an eviction was in accordance with the law, and whether it was necessary for the protection of the rights and freedoms of others' (at [42] per Waller LJ). Waller LJ went on to say that even in a case where the landlord was a private landlord, in which case art 8(2) would appear to have no application, the court, as a 'public authority', would have to consider, before making a possession order, whether an art 8(2) justification was established.

[143] My Lords, the remarks of Waller LJ to which I have just referred, which follow with inescapable logic from the proposition that in all cases where possession is sought of property which constitutes the defendant's home an art 8(2) justification must be shown, demonstrate, in my respectful submission, why the proposition cannot be right. Waller LJ's remarks have the effect that the words in art 8(2) 'by a public authority' are deleted from the article for the purpose of its application in domestic law. A court, being a public authority, cannot, it is said, give a private owner of residential property the possession order to which under the ordinary law he would be entitled against a person occupying the property as his home but who has no contractual or proprietary right to remain there, unless the making of the order can be justified under art 8(2). If this is right, it would give art 8 a significantly broader scope in its application than its language justifies. The words 'by a public authority' become otiose.

[144] The error is not in Waller LJ's logic, but in the proposition itself. If art 8 does not vest in the home-occupier any contractual or proprietary right that he would not otherwise have, and does not diminish or detract from the contractual or proprietary rights of the owner who is seeking possession, the problem identified by Waller LJ does not arise. The fate of every possession application will be determined by the respective contractual and proprietary rights of the parties. Article 8 can never constitute an answer. In my opinion McLellan's case, like Donoghue's case, was correctly decided but for the wrong reason.

[145] The third of these cases is Sheffield City Council v Smart, Central Sunderland Housing Co Ltd v Wilson [2002] EWCA Civ 4, [2002] LGR 467. This case concerned non-secure tenancies. The tenancies had been duly determined by the local authority landlords. Possession was sought. Laws LJ, with whose judgment the other two members of the Court of Appeal agreed, said (at [26]):

> 'the premises ... were without question the women's homes. Since the effect of the possession orders would be to throw them out, I think it inescapable that those orders amounted to an interference with the appellants' right of respect of their homes ...'

and (at [27]) that 'eviction of these appellants would constitute a prima facie violation of their right to respect for their homes'. I respectfully disagree. Each home had been established on the basis of a proprietary interest in the premises obtained under the contractual tenancy granted by the landlord. How could the termination of that tenancy in a manner consistent with its contractual and proprietary incidents be held to constitute a lack of respect for the home that had been thus established? The home was always subject to those contractual and proprietary incidents. The contrary view seems to me to treat a 'home' as something ethereal, floating in the air, unconnected to bricks and mortar and land.

[146] I need not set out the whole of Laws LJ's reasoning. It has already been extensively set out in the opinions of my noble and learned friends Lord Bingham of Cornhill and Lord Steyn. Lord Bingham comments that the reasoning, like that of Arden LJ in the present case, reflected the tenor of the Strasbourg jurisprudence. But nowhere in the Strasbourg case law is there to be found any case in which a landlord's claim to possession has failed on art 8(2) grounds. In each case, of course, the landlord has had to show that his claim is 'in accordance with the [ordinary] law'. So what is left? If the landlord is entitled to possession under the ordinary law, how can it be otherwise than 'necessary in a democratic society' to make a possession order 'for the protection of' and to give effect to his right to possession? It is true that in a number of cases the Strasbourg tribunal (whether court or Commission) has held art 8 to be prima facie applicable but has held the 'interference' constituted by the claim or the order for possession to be justified under art 8(2). But there is no case in which this conclusion has been reached by considering the degree of impact on the tenant's home life of the eviction. There is no case in which a balance has been struck between the tenant's interests and the landlord's rights. In every case the landlord's success has been automatic. And so it must be unless art 8 is to be allowed to diminish or detract from the landlord's contractual and proprietary rights. In my opinion, the Strasbourg jurisprudence has shown, in effect, that art 8 has no relevance to these landlord/tenant possession cases.

THIS CASE

[147] As I have said, in the present case Mr Qazi failed at trial because the judge held that in order to have an art 8 home the occupier must have a legal or equitable interest in the premises. I agree with Arden LJ in the Court of Appeal and with your Lordships that that bald proposition cannot be supported. If the judge had held that an occupier with no legal or equitable interest enabling him to resist the landlord's possession claim could not resist the claim by relying on art 8 rights to respect for his 'home', I would have agreed with him.

[148] In the Court of Appeal, Arden LJ held, following the test prescribed in Buckley v UK, that Mr Qazi did, for art 8 purposes, have a 'home' at 31 Hutton Lane. I agree with that conclusion. But she then went on to propose that the case be remitted to the county court 'to determine whether interference with Mr Qazi's right to a home is permitted by art 8(2), and the Court of Appeal made that order.

[149] In my opinion, the Court of Appeal, having correctly held that Mr Qazi had an art 8 'home', should have held that his rights under art 8 could not prevail against the council's admitted and undoubted right to possession under the ordinary housing law. I would, for my part, have said that art 8 was not, in these circumstances, applicable. But it could also be said that a possession order was 'in accordance with the law' and was necessary in order to protect and give effect to the council's right to possession. To express the point in that way would be to follow the Strasbourg tribunals in S v UK, in Di Palma v UK and in Wood v UK. But it comes to the same thing. Article 8 cannot be raised to defeat contractual and proprietary rights to possession.

[150] In arguing the case for Mr Qazi, Mr Luba QC seemed to me to be in an impossible quandary. He conceded that art 8 did not vest in the home-occupier any contractual or proprietary rights in the property. He accepted that the expectation in every case would be that the owner entitled under the ordinary law to possession would succeed in establishing an art 8(2) justification for the possession claim. But he insisted that art 8 did allow for the special case where the possession claim could be resisted or the possession order denounced on the ground that the recovery of possession by the owner otherwise entitled thereto constituted an unlawful interference with the home-occupier's right to respect for his home. The circumstances, he accepted, would have to be exceptional but the possibility had to be kept open. Naturally he said that, in due course, on the remission to the county court, he would contend that the circumstances of Mr Qazi brought the case within that exceptional category so as to prevent the council from justifying under art 8(2) their recovery of possession.

[151] In my opinion, your Lordships should reject these arguments. They seem to me inconsistent. If Mr Qazi has no contractual or proprietary right under the ordinary law to resist the council's claim for possession, and it is accepted he has not, the acceptance by the court of a defence based on art 8 would give him a possessory right over 31 Hutton Lane that he would not otherwise have. It would deprive the council of its right under the ordinary law to immediate possession. It would constitute an amendment of the domestic social housing legislation. It would give art 8 an effect it was never intended to have and which it has never been given by the Strasbourg tribunals responsible for implementing the convention.

[152] If the reality of the matter is, as I believe it is, that an art 8 defence can never prevail against an owner entitled under the ordinary law to possession, your Lordships should, in my opinion, say so. Remission of the case to the county court for the county court to say so would be pointless. I would, therefore, allow the appeal. The reasons I have given for allowing the appeal are, I believe, essentially the same as those given by my noble and learned friends Lord Hope of Craighead and Lord Millett, whose opinions I have had the opportunity of reading in advance and with which I agree.

Appeal allowed.

Kate O'Hanlon Barrister.

Re Claims Direct Test Cases

[2003] EWCA Civ 136

COURT OF APPEAL, CIVIL DIVISION

BROOKE, LAWS LJJ AND SIR ANTHONY EVANS

18, 19 DECEMBER 2002, 12 FEBRUARY 2003

Costs – Order for costs – Jurisdiction – After-the-event (ATE) insurance premium – Claims handling service – Claimants paying claims handling service ATE premium in respect risk of incurring liability in proceedings – Successful claimants seeking to recover amount of ATE premium in costs – Whether claimants entitled to recover whole amount – Access to Justice Act 1999, s 29.

Claims Direct provided a claims handling service to claimants with personal injury claims. The service included finance arrangements for claimants to take out a loan to pay a premium for an 'after-the-event' insurance policy providing cover, in the event that legal proceedings were unsuccessful or discontinued, for both costs and the amount of the premium. The premium was identified as such in the arrangement (the authority) between the underwriters of the scheme and an insurance intermediary which authorised the intermediary to issue insurance certificates to Claims Direct's customers and process claims on their behalf. Section 29[a] of the Access to Justice Act 1999 provided that where in any proceedings a costs order was made in favour of any party who had taken out an insurance policy against the risk of incurring a liability in those proceedings, the costs payable to him included costs in respect of the premium of the policy. Various claimants who had been successful in litigation sought to recover as costs the amount of the 'premium' paid and a number of liability insurers challenged these attempts. Test cases were selected for the trial of preliminary issues, including the question of whether the sum paid by a claimant was properly to be regarded as a premium within the meaning of s 29 of the 1999 Act. The judge found that part of what was provided by Claims Direct was claims handling and part was insurance services, the premium for which was recoverable under s 29, in so far as it was reasonable. He analysed the way the total had been made up and specified the amounts he considered were properly to be regarded as premium, which he defined as the true consideration for which the insurer was undertaking his obligation under the contract of insurance. The claimants appealed, contending, inter alia, that the judge had been wrong in not accepting that the amount identified as 'premium' in the authority must be automatically equated with the 'premium' referred to in s 29 and that allowing the deconstruction of a premium liability would raise endless difficulties in the assessment of costs.

Held – In considering whether the 'premium' payable by a claimant was properly to be regarded as a premium within the meaning of s 29 of the 1999 Act the judge had been entitled to adopt the approach of lifting the veil and considering what was actually being provided for the payment in order to identify what should truly be treated as the premium. It had not been the intention of Parliament

a Section 29 is set out at [22], below

when it enacted s 29 of the 1999 Act to overload the recoverable premium by adding to the costs customarily embraced by such a premium, the costs, which a company providing personal injury claims handling services (including a costs indemnity in the event that a claimant's compensation claim was dismissed or discontinued), had to incur if insurers were to accept the risk at all. Accordingly, the judge had been entitled to come to the conclusion that he had and the appeal would therefore be dismissed (see [86]–[88], [90], [102], [103], below).

Notes

For after the event insurance, see 25 Halsbury's Laws (4th edn) (2003 reissue) para 807.

For the Access to Justice Act 1999, s 29, see 11 Halsbury's Statutes (4th edn) (2000 reissue) 1514.

Cases referred to in judgments

Callery v Gray (No 2) [2001] EWCA Civ 1246, [2001] 4 All ER 1, [2001] 1 WLR 2142; affd sub nom Callery v Gray (Nos 1 and 2) [2002] UKHL 28, [2002] 3 All ER 417, [2002] 1 WLR 2000.

Callery v Gray, Russell v Pal Pak Corrugated Ltd [2001] EWCA Civ 1117, [2001] 3 All ER 833, [2001] 1 WLR 2112; affd sub nom Callery v Gray (Nos 1 and 2) [2002] UKHL 28, [2002] 3 All ER 417, [2002] 1 WLR 2000.

Dimond v Lovell [2000] 2 All ER 897, [2002] 1 AC 384, [2000] 2 WLR 1121, HL; affg [1999] 3 All ER 1, [2000] QB 216, [1999] 3 WLR 561, CA.

Halloran v Delaney [2002] EWCA Civ 1258, [2003] 1 All ER 775, [2003] 1 WLR 28.

Hunt v RM Douglas (Roofing) Ltd (1987) Times, 23 November, CA.

Hunt v RM Douglas (Roofing) Ltd [1988] 3 All ER 823, [1990] 1 AC 398, [1988] 3 WLR 975, HL.

Lewis Ltd v Norwich Union Fire Ins Co Ltd [1916] SALR App D 509.

Lownds v Home Office [2002] EWCA Civ 365, [2002] 4 All ER 775, [2002] 1 WLR 2450.

Sarwar v Alam [2001] EWCA Civ 1401, [2001] 4 All ER 541, [2002] 1 WLR 125.

Snook v London & West Riding Investments Ltd [1967] 1 All ER 518, [1967] 2 QB 786, [1967] 2 WLR 1020, CA.

Street v Mountford [1985] 2 All ER 289, [1985] AC 809, [1985] 2 WLR 877, HL.

Appeal

Sixteen claimants in test cases in costs-only proceedings between the claimants and three insurers (the first, second and third defendants) appealed from an order of Senior Costs Judge Hurst on 19 July 2002 ([2003] Lloyd's Rep IR 69) determining preliminary issues, set out at [20], below. The facts are set out in the judgment of Brooke LJ.

Timothy Charlton QC and Nicholas Bacon (instructed by Colman Coyle) for the claimants.

Anna Guggenheim QC and Alexander Hutton (instructed by Vizards Wyeth, Lamport Bassitt, Southampton and Carters, Peterborough) for the first and third defendants.

Alan Newman QC and Andrew Neish (instructed by Beachcroft Wansbroughs) for the second defendants.

Cur adv vult

12 February 2003. The following judgments were delivered.

INDEX

| | | Para no |
|---|---|---|
| (1) | INTRODUCTORY | [1] |
| (2) | THE FACTS | [3] |
| (3) | THE ISSUES | [20] |
| (4) | THE APPLICABLE LAW | [22] |
| (5) | ISSUE 2: THE MASTER'S JUDGMENT | [35] |
| (6) | THE MASTER'S JUDGMENT: CLAIMS DIRECT'S COMMISSION | [47] |
| (7) | THE MASTER'S JUDGMENT: THE PAYMENT TO MLSS | [49] |
| (8) | THE MASTER'S JUDGMENT: INITIAL INSURANCE SERVICES | [52] |
| (9) | THE MASTER'S JUDGMENT: CONTINUING INSURANCE SERVICES | [53] |
| (10) | THE MASTER'S JUDGMENT: ISSUE 4 | [60] |
| (11) | ISSUE 2: CONCLUSION | [68] |
| (12) | ISSUE 4 AND THE REASONABLENESS OF THE PREMIUM | [91] |

BROOKE LJ.

(1) INTRODUCTORY

[1] This is an appeal by 16 claimants in test cases concerned with what became known as the Claims Direct Protect Scheme against an order made by Master Hurst, the senior costs judge, whereby he directed judgment to be entered in costs-only proceedings for each claimant in respect of recoverable premium in the sum of £621·13 inclusive of insurance premium tax (IPT) ([2003] Lloyd's Rep IR 69). The test cases which have been taken to appeal are those numbered 1–3, 6–12, 14, 16, and 18–21 in the schedule to the master's judgment. I will describe the nature of the claimants' challenge to the master's order in [20] and [21], below. Master O'Hare sat with us as an assessor on this appeal, and we have benefited from his advice.

[2] The issue Master Hurst had to decide in these test cases was whether the money a claimant paid for the right to be included within the scheme (which was started by Claims Incorporated plc (Claims Direct) in August 1999) was a premium within the meaning of s 29 of the Access to Justice Act 1999, and to the extent that it was such a premium, whether or not it was reasonable in amount.

(2) THE FACTS

[3] It is possible to summarise the facts more briefly than was necessary for the purposes of the master's judgment. In 1990 Mr Tony Sullman launched a claims management company which specialised in pursuing uninsured loss claims on behalf of taxi drivers. The company's business involved the use of franchised claims managers working alongside panels of solicitors, doctors and accountants.

In 1995 the use of conditional fee agreements was permitted for the first time. Mr Sullman then joined forces with Mr Colin Poole, who is a practising solicitor, and the two men started running Claims Direct. The following year they caused a company called Medical Legal Support Services Ltd (MLSS) to be incorporated as a wholly-owned subsidiary of Claims Direct.

[4] Between 1996 and 1999 these two companies, acting in association, provided claims handling services to claimants with personal injury claims through a network of franchise claims managers along the lines previously established by Mr Sullman. The arrangements they made were known as the Portfolio Scheme. The companies' operations were based in Telford, where Mr Poole conducted his solicitor's practice. They attracted clients through national advertising. Claims managers visited likely clients in their homes in order to obtain instructions and to complete the contract with Claims Direct. The services embraced by the scheme included helping claimants to have access to members of the panels of solicitors, and medical experts; obtaining advice from counsel (in a single set of chambers) who provided opinions on liability and quantum for a standard fee; taking witness statements; and generally guiding them through to the conclusion of their claims. This package of services did not include any insurance element. If a claim was successful, Claims Direct would receive 30% of the damages recovered, together with VAT. If the claim failed, Claims Direct would discharge the defendants' costs themselves. The scheme appears to have been a great success.

[5] It was an important feature of the scheme that the claims managers undertook a lot of the work that would customarily be undertaken by a firm of solicitors. Mr Doona, who was the finance director of the Claims Direct group between December 1999 and September 2001, told the master that a claims manager originally paid £1,000–£2,000 for a franchise, but the price then went up to about £5,000–£6,000, and possibly as high as £20,000. In return, once a case was accepted by MLSS a claims manager would be paid a minimum fee, whatever the value of the claim (the minimum fee was £425 during the period with which this appeal was concerned). This fee would be liable to increase in proportion to the amount of work required of him in a particular case.

[6] MLSS therefore had to put in place an administrative structure capable of handling the recruitment and training of claims managers, and of acting in a liaison role between them and the others whose services were essential for the smooth running of the scheme. Mr Doona said that in his time 12 members of MLSS's staff performed these functions, although this number was liable to increase. MLSS also had a legal section comprised of about 30 members of staff who dealt with the claims handling process. Their role was to ensure that the panel solicitors complied with the requirements of the operations manual. We have been shown a copy of the operations manual which was current in the days of the Portfolio Scheme. We have also been shown a copy of the manual which was issued after the Protect Scheme came into force. The differences in the text of these two documents are insignificant. This is hardly surprising, since the basic structure of the scheme remained the same.

[7] By March 1999 Mr Sullman and Mr Poole wished to float their company on the Stock Exchange, and for this purpose they wished to abandon the 30% contingency scheme and move to an insurance-backed model. Their original reasons for wanting to make this change were not connected with the new opportunity afforded by the 1999 Act for recovering an 'after-the-event' (ATE) insurance premium from the other side as part of a successful claimant's costs. They had been advised that the success of a flotation would be prejudiced by the existence of the contingent liability of an uncertain size. This liability arose out of the costs indemnity provided under the Portfolio Scheme.

[8] Mr Sullman therefore approached an insurance intermediary called Litigation Protection Ltd (LPL) to discuss the possibility of using an insurance-backed model, and during the spring and summer of 1999 representatives of LPL held bilateral meetings with Lloyd's underwriters on the one hand and Claims Direct on the other. The way in which the negotiations developed is apparent from an early memorandum. This memorandum, dated 22 March 1999, was prepared for underwriters by Mr Raincock, who handled this matter on behalf of LPL and who was subsequently to give evidence to the master. It includes this passage:

> 'Claims Direct has also considered the concept advanced by LPL ... that the indemnity in losing cases should include £1,000 in respect of the Claims Managers services and that in readiness for the Access to Justice Act when the premium will be recoverable, we should increase the notional premium to £1,190 plus IPT. Please note that the premium payable to Underwriters will remain based upon £190.'

[9] Although the expression 'notional premium' was to disappear, the idea that a claimant would pay a large 'premium' for an insurance policy, very little of which would be payable to underwriters as a premium for the risk they were undertaking to cover, remained an essential element of the arrangements that were to evolve. It was clear from the evidence that underwriters attached particular importance to the effectiveness of the group's control over the claims handling procedures. Mr Primer, whose underwriting agency was involved in the original discussions with Mr Raincock, told the master that the risk was presented to underwriters on the basis that more than 97% of the claims would be successful, and that they would only have to pay out (both defendants' costs and claimants' costs, including the full cost of the premium) in less than 3% of the cases. They carried out their premium calculations, however, on the basis of a 4–6% overall failure rate, and they reserved the right to demand a different premium once they had some experience of how the policy operated in practice.

[10] On 5 May 1999 Mr Raincock sent a memorandum to underwriters in which he explained the current state of Claims Direct's proposal. He recommended that underwriters should proceed on the basis set out in his paper. Under the heading 'New Information' he referred underwriters to 'the comprehensive and protective Operations Manual issued to all Panel Solicitors'. The memorandum was returned to him with the following manuscript endorsement initialled by an underwriter: 'Warranted: Claims Direct/Poole & Co maintain existing underwriting guidelines (all amendments to be agreed) and rejection rates consistent with their historical numbers.'

[11] On 12 May, following further discussions, Mr Raincock sent Mr Poole a cover note which contained this warranty in the following slightly altered terms:

> 'Warranted: That the Assured will maintain the existing procedures contained in the Poole and Co Underwriters Manual dated February 1999 and that Underwriters will be informed of all proposed changes prior to their inclusion in the Manual.'

The text of the cover note showed that the policy wording was at that time still to be agreed. It was envisaged that cover under the Claims Direct Protect Scheme would come into force on 1 June 1999, and that underwriters would receive a premium on each case declared to them. The figure quoted was £90 (plus IPT).

[12] The negotiations continued, and eventually a scheme emerged whereby underwriters agreed with LPL (acting on behalf of Claims Direct) an ATE premium of £140 for each case. LPL's 32·5% brokerage commission was charged on this £140, and underwriters received their premium net of this commission. In addition, Claims Direct, with advice from LPL, fixed a 'premium' which represented the total price which a claimant joining the scheme would theoretically be liable to pay. This sum was arrived at on the basis of Claims Direct's broad-brush assessment of what they believed the market would bear, reinforced by their concern to ensure that their income stream should remain the same as it had been under the Portfolio Scheme. This thinking was explained in a memorandum sent by their board of directors to all their claims managers on 5 July 1999, shortly before a couple of two-day seminars were to be held in order to explain the ramifications of the new arrangements. They were justified to the claims managers on the basis that the changes had been forced on Claims Direct by the government.

[13] The new 'Claims Direct Protect' business model (which in many respects resembled the old model) operated along the following lines. (1) Television and other advertising was used extensively to encourage potential claimants to ring the Claims Direct number. Claims were handled at a call centre in Telford. Initial details were taken and, if certain criteria were satisfied, the call was returned by arranging for a claims manager to visit the claimant at home. (2) On the claims manager's visit the claimant was provided with a leaflet called 'Your Worry Free Guide to Claims Direct'. The claims manager helped the claimant to complete a questionnaire and obtained his/her signature to a fair trading statement (FTS). This set out an offer made by the claimant for Claims Direct to take on the claim in return for the payment of a 'premium' of £1,312·50 (£1,250 plus £62·50 IPT) for a Claims Direct Litigation Protection Insurance Policy. The claimant also signed a consumer credit agreement with a bank under which he/she borrowed the 'premium' of £1,312·50 and a medical release form. Repayment of the loan was deferred until the end of the case. It would be repaid by insurers if the claimant lost. (3) The case was then sent to Mr Poole's firm at Telford for 'vetting' (to decide whether the prospects of success were better than 50%). A fee of £72·50 plus VAT was later payable by a panel solicitor for this service if he took the case on. (4) If the case survived the vetting procedure, it was sent to a panel solicitor with an acceptance form. There were over 80 solicitors on the panel in November 1999. If the panel solicitor agreed to take on the claim he had to pay the vetting fee to Mr Poole's firm and a fee of at least £395 plus VAT to MLSS in respect of the claims manager's services. (5) When the solicitor accepted the case, Claims Direct sent a letter of acceptance to the claimant together with 'Evidence of Insurance' signed by Mr Raincock of LPL on behalf of the insurers. At about the same time the bank, acting on behalf of the claimant, paid £1,312·50 to LPL as an agent for the insurers. The way this money was distributed is described in [16] and [17], below. (6) The functions of the panel solicitor and the claims manager were set out in the Claims Direct documentation. It was the solicitor's duty to send the claimant a client care letter in a recommended form, to write a letter before action, to seek advice from medical experts and counsel as required, and to negotiate a satisfactory settlement of the claim, if possible. On the other hand his freedom of action was quite significantly curtailed by the scheme. (7) The solicitor had to rely on the claims manager to draw up any witness statements that were needed—including the claimant's own statement—and to procure plans and photographs and any other evidence he required. If medical advice was needed, he had to seek it from a member of a panel composed by Mobile Doctors Ltd (who paid MLSS £40 per case) and if advice from counsel was needed he had to seek it from counsel in a particular set of chambers in London (who paid MLSS £15 per case). The claims manager would undertake the task of arranging any necessary appointments and ensuring the claimant attended them. (8) In the event that the claim was settled the solicitor would claim from the defendants' insurer, in addition to his own profit costs, the £395 paid to MLSS, any disbursements on the fees of medical experts and counsel, and the vetting fee. The defendants maintain that the only actual change in the scheme after August 1999 was the replacement by an ATE insurance policy of Claims Direct's earlier liability to discharge a defendant's costs when a claim failed.

[14] From Claims Direct's viewpoint, the new scheme achieved the purpose of replacing one source of cash (the 30% share of any damages recovered by a claimant) with another (the £1,312·50 'premium'), with the added benefit that this cash flow was now achieved at the outset of each claim, rather than at its end. There is an explanation of all this in the company's annual report and accounts for the year 2000.

[15] Once the details of the scheme had been finalised, underwriters granted a binding authority to LPL (which was eventually extended to 15 August 2001), whereby they appointed that company as their coverholder to bind insurance and issue certificates to Claims Direct's customers, and thereafter to process claims on their behalf. The mechanics of the arrangements ran along the following lines.

[16] The customer's loan of £1,312·50 would be sent direct to LPL. They placed it on trust in a Lloyd's insurance broking account. They would then issue evidence of insurance to the customer, together with a receipt, as agent for underwriters. This document summarised the terms of a master policy which were incorporated in the customer's contract with underwriters. It provided for cover, up to a limit of £50,000, in the event that the claim or legal proceedings were unsuccessful or discontinued, for both sides' costs and the amount of the insurance premium, plus interest. The policy contained a term that in conducting the proceedings, compliance by the panel solicitor with the terms of the operating manual would be a condition precedent to any liability of the underwriters to make payment under the policy.

[17] LPL then accounted to underwriters, via Lloyd's brokers, for £140, plus the IPT of £62·50, less LPL's 32·5% brokerage on £140. Lloyd's brokers retained £7 brokerage for themselves before accounting to underwriters for the balance. Of the total premium of £1,312·50, £202·50 was paid out in this way. The premium was characterised in the binding authority as '£1,250 each case less £1,110 including underwriters' contribution to costs'. The remaining £1,110 was split up three ways. £110 was paid as brokerage or commission to Claims Direct. £775 was paid by LPL directly to MLSS for 'insurance services' (for which see [18], below). The remaining £225 was paid by LPL into an MLSS retention fund. This was a trust account created at underwriters' request. The money was to remain there until the end of each case, when it could be released to MLSS. The reason for this arrangement was that underwriters wished to know that there was a reservoir of money available to them in the event that anything untoward happened to Claims Direct or MLSS and they were left with the run-off responsibility.

[18] On 26 August 1999, at the same time as the binding authority was issued, Claims Direct made an agreement with LPL and MLSS whereby MLSS agreed to provide to LPL (on behalf of underwriters) what were described as initial insurance services and continuing insurance services for a reward of £1,000 per case. Relevant features of this agreement are set out in [52]–[54], below. A significant part of the master's judgment was taken up with an analysis of what was being provided to the customer under the description of insurance services.

[19] This, then, is the scheme which Claims Direct introduced in August 1999. After it came into effect, a number of challenges were made by liability insurers in cases where successful claimants sought to recover as the premium for ATE insurance the whole of the 'premium' for their Litigation Protection Insurance Policy. Test cases were then selected, and in November 2001 Master Hurst directed the trial of ten preliminary issues (divided into two tranches). Twenty-three test cases were selected for the trial of the first tranche of cases. Two of them fell away prior to the trial, and another was withdrawn by consent at the hearing. Of the claimants whose test cases featured in the trial, 16 are now parties to this appeal. The defendants were grouped according to the liability insurers who stood behind them. Of the cases taken to appeal, the defendants represented by one insurer were involved in five of them, and those represented by another in a sixth. Those represented by a third insurer were involved in all the rest. For convenience these three groups of defendants have been referred to as the first defendants, the third defendants, and the second defendants, in that order.

(3) THE ISSUES

[20] The first trial, with which we are concerned on this appeal, dealt with the issues in the first tranche. In the event these issues were reduced to four in number, and there is no appeal against the way that Master Hurst dealt with two of them. The two remaining issues were stated in these terms, so far as material to this appeal. Issue 2: is the sum payable by a claimant properly to be regarded as a premium within the meaning of s 29 of the Access to Justice Act 1999? Issue 4: (i) are any of the benefits purchased by insurance forming part of the Claims Direct scheme collateral or extraneous to such insurance; and (ii) to what extent should the costs of collateral benefits be recoverable?

[21] At the trial there was no real issue about the legitimacy of the premium of £140, the commission of £110 to Claims Direct, or the principle that IPT on an appropriate amount was allowable. For reasons I will explain, the master went on to hold that the claimants were entitled to recover an extra £311·50 as premium, £30 as the premium for other insurance services, and £29·58 as IPT on the sums he identified as reasonable premium. The defendants do not seek to reduce any of these sums. The claimants, on the other hand, assert that they should have been allowed the whole of the premium of £1,250 plus IPT, and they bring this appeal on this basis. They also say that this premium was reasonable and proportionate in amount.

(4) THE APPLICABLE LAW

[22] I gratefully adopt Master Hurst's statement of the applicable law. Section 29 of the 1999 Act provides:

> 'Where in any proceedings a costs order is made in favour of any party who has taken out an insurance policy against the risk of incurring a liability in these proceedings, the costs payable to him may, subject in the case of court proceedings to Rules of Court, include costs in respect of the premium of the policy.'

[23] The Court of Appeal in Callery v Gray (No 2) [2001] EWCA Civ 1246 at [59] and [60], [2001] 4 All ER 1 at [59] and [60], [2001] 1 WLR 2142 decided that s 29 should be interpreted so as to treat the words 'insurance against the risk of incurring a costs liability' as meaning 'insurance against the risk of incurring a costs liability that cannot be passed on to the opposing party'. The statutory framework is discussed in Callery v Gray (No 2) (at [6]–[10]), and important issues relating to the reasonableness of a premium (at [11]–[13], [21]–[26], [29], [32]–[33] and [37]–[47]).

[24] CPR 43.2(1)(a) defines 'costs' as including 'any additional liability incurred under a funding arrangement'. Rule 43.2(1)(k) explains that 'funding arrangement' means an arrangement where a person has taken out an insurance policy to which s 29 of the 1999 Act applies. Rule 43.2(1)(m) states:

> '"Insurance premium" means a sum of money paid or payable for insurance against the risk of incurring a costs liability in the proceedings, taken out after the event that is the subject matter of the claim.'

[25] MacGillivray on Insurance Law (9th edn, 1997) para 72 defines the word 'premium' in these terms:

> 'The premium is the consideration required of the assured in return for which the insurer undertakes his obligation under the contract of insurance (Lewis Ltd v Norwich Union Fire Insurance Co ([1916] SALR App D 509 at 519)).'

Rule 43.2(1)(a) includes 'the insurance premium' in a definition of the words 'additional liability'.

[26] Although s 29 of the 1999 Act is specifically made subject to Rules of Court in the case of court proceedings, many of the test cases settled without legal proceedings ever having been commenced. Those cases came before the master under the provisions of r 44.12A (costs-only proceedings).

[27] Rule 44.4 deals with the basis on which costs are to be assessed. The relevant part of this rule is in these terms:

> '(1) Where the court is to assess the amounts of costs (whether by summary or detailed assessment) it will assess those costs—(a) on the standard basis; or (b) on the indemnity basis, but the court will not in either case allow costs which have been unreasonably incurred or are unreasonable in amount.
>
> (2) Where the amount of costs is to be assessed on the standard basis, the court will—(a) only allow costs which are proportionate to the matters in issue; and (b) resolve any doubt which it may have as to whether costs were reasonably incurred or reasonable and proportionate in amount in favour of the paying party.'

[28] Rule 44.5(1) requires the court to have regard to all the circumstances in deciding whether costs, assessed on the standard basis, were proportionately and reasonably incurred, or were proportionate and reasonable in amount.

[29] Section 11 of the Costs Practice Direction (CPD) gives further guidance about the factors to be taken into account in deciding the amount of costs which are set out in Rule 44.5. The CPD states:

> '11.1 In applying the test of proportionality the court will have regard to rule 1.1(2)(c) ...

a 11.5 In deciding whether the costs claimed are reasonable and (on a standard basis assessment) proportionate, the court will consider the amount of any additional liability separately from the base costs ...

11.7 Subject to paragraph 17.8(2), when the court is considering the factors to be taken into account in assessing an additional liability, it will have regard to the facts and circumstances as they reasonably appeared to the b solicitor or counsel when the funding arrangement was entered into and at the time of any variation of the arrangement ...

11.10 In deciding whether the costs of insurance cover is reasonable relevant factors to be taken into account include—(1) where the insurance cover is not purchased in support of a conditional fee agreement with a success fee, how its cost compares with the likely cost of funding the case c with a conditional fee agreement with a success fee and supporting insurance cover; (2) the level and extent of the cover provided; (3) the availability of any pre-existing insurance cover; (4) whether any part of the premium would be rebated in the event of early settlement; (5) the amount of commission payable to the receiving party or his legal representatives or d other agents.'

[30] In costs-only proceedings under r 44.12A the CPD states:

'17.8(2) In cases in which an additional liability is claimed, the costs judge or district judge should have regard to the time when and the extent to which the claim has been settled and to the fact that the claim has been settled e without the need to commence proceedings.'

[31] In Callery v Gray (No 2) this court gave guidance in relation to ATE insurance, and its approach was left undisturbed by the House of Lords ([2002] UKHL 28, [2002] 3 All ER 417, [2002] 1 WLR 2000). In addition to the passages already cited, particular attention should be paid in this context to Callery v Gray, f Russell v Pal Pak Corrugated Ltd [2001] EWCA Civ 1117 at [65], [91], [94], [95], [99(v)] and [100], [2001] 3 All ER 833 at [65], [91], [94], [95], [99(v)] and [100], [2001] 1 WLR 2112; and Callery v Gray (No 2) [2001] 4 All ER 1 at [57], [63] and [68]–[70].

[32] In a judgment arising out of an appeal against the master's case g management decision in these proceedings Arden LJ said ([2002] EWCA Civ 428 at [44], [2002] PIQR Q11 at [44]):

'The expression "premium" is not defined in the Access to Justice Act 1999. The court has been referred to the Civil Procedure Rules and various authorities. It is not appropriate for this court to determine the meaning of h "premium" on this appeal, which is concerned with case management issues and orders as to costs. However, in case the matters determined by the Senior Costs Judge should themselves be appealed, the Senior Costs Judge will no doubt wish to make clear findings on all amounts which could properly be regarded as a premium if there is any doubt as to whether any j single amount constitutes a premium. I would observe that, for the purposes of section 29, it is the premium as between the claimant and the provider of the policy which is in issue. In my judgment, the premium is not necessarily limited to payments paid on inception of cover, but could include any further amounts paid by, or on behalf of the insured, pursuant to terms agreed with the insurer. The premium could also include sums paid to the benefit of the insurer. We are told that the insurer has, in effect, outsourced claims administration. The cost of this is borne by Claims Direct on behalf of underwriters. Any part of the sum paid by the insured which is devoted to this purpose may be capable of forming part of the premium.' a [33] She went on to refer to the decision of this court in Callery v Gray (No 2) in these terms:

'[46] ... The court specifically added "Satellite litigation involving such an exercise [ie examining evidence of insurance cover] is, however, unsatisfactory. The judge can only be expected to give broad consideration to such evidence. It is not part of a function of a judge assessing costs to carry out an audit of the insurer's business" ... The court may wish to check the overall result which it reaches by reference to the alternative methods of obtaining access to justice. This might involve looking at alternative rates of cover, or the costs which would be involved if litigation were to be funded in some other way. This has been called the "top down" approach. Nonetheless, in making that comparison, it may be necessary to bear in mind that like may not be being compared with like ... Nevertheless, in my judgment, the comparison between the cover provided by these appellants and other means of financing litigation, including other insurance cover, is a relevant consideration which the appellants could properly bring to the attention of the Senior Costs Judge. I say this, bearing in mind the general purposes of the new methods of funding litigation introduced by the 1999 Act and by the fact that it is obviously highly desirable in the interests of justice that these methods should be competitive. A premium may not be reasonable if there are alternative ways of providing the same funding at significantly less expense.' b c d e

[34] This court has now given guidance as to the correct approach to be taken to proportionality in the context of costs assessments in Lownds v Home Office [2002] EWCA Civ 365, [2002] 4 All ER 775, [2002] 1 WLR 2450. f

(5) ISSUE 2: THE MASTER'S JUDGMENT

[35] The master first addressed issue 2: 'Is the sum payable by a claimant properly to be regarded as a premium within the meaning of s 29 of the 1999 Act?' He said ([2003] Lloyd's Rep IR 69 at 99) that it had long been held that the cost of funding litigation was not a recoverable cost as between the parties: g

'[B]y established practice and custom funding costs have never been included in the category of expenses, costs or disbursements envisaged by the statute or RSC Order 62. To include them would constitute an extension of the existing category of "legal costs" which is not under the prevailing circumstances warranted.' (See Hunt v RM Douglas (Roofing) Ltd (1987) Times, 23 November per Purchas LJ.) h

This point was not considered in the subsequent House of Lords appeal (see Hunt v RM Douglas (Roofing) Ltd [1988] 3 All ER 823, [1990] 1 AC 398). j

[36] He said that it followed that the only costs of funding litigation which were recoverable were those permitted by statute, in this case s 29 of the 1999 Act. Section 29 was specific and had been interpreted by this court in Callery v Gray. Anything falling outside the scope of that section was not recoverable.

[37] He found that when a claimant entered into a contract with Claims Direct he was not exclusively a 'party who has taken out an insurance policy'. He was certainly given evidence of insurance, but this was only part of the package he purchased. In the master's view a claimant was entitled to recover the actual reasonable cost of the insurance element. He went on to accept the claimants' submissions that he should not further analyse the amount which he found to be properly the insurance premium.

[38] He said that the nub of these test cases was whether the sum paid by an individual claimant (£1,250 plus IPT) was a premium within s 29 of the 1999 Act, and if so whether it was reasonable. There was no dispute between the parties that the sum of £140 paid to LPL on behalf of the brokers and underwriters was indeed premium, and therefore recoverable. At the trial there was some argument, now no longer pursued, over the status of the £110 commission paid to Claims Direct. The main argument, however, centred on the £1,000 paid to MLSS in accordance with the agreement of 26 August 1999 (see [18], above). Although Claims Direct was a party to that agreement, the agreement imposed no duties on that company. The master considered (at 99) that the recital to the agreement explained the true position:

> 'LPL has agreed with Claims Direct to introduce an insurance scheme ... and ... has made arrangements for the issue of an insurance policy underwritten by certain Underwriters at Lloyd's ... in respect of which LPL has been appointed Underwriters representatives, which will provide an indemnity for clients of Claims Direct ... in relation to legal proceedings whether formally issued or not ...'

The next paragraph of the recital stated:

> 'LPL has agreed to engage MLSS to undertake certain services ... which will enable LPL as Underwriters representatives both to introduce and to manage the necessary insurance arrangements ...'

[39] The recital went on to set out the requirement for MLSS to undertake the initial and continuing insurance services. The agreement provided that in consideration of the premium allocation (£1,000 for each and every claim) MLSS would provide LPL the initial and continuing insurance services described in the agreement. Claims Direct was given no role to play under this agreement except, by implication, the introduction of prospective claimants.

[40] Mr Charlton QC, for the claimants, had argued, as he has before us, that since the contract between the individual claimants and Claims Direct was not a sham, the court could not go behind that contract to carry out an audit of the insurer's business. Similarly he argued that everything which a claimant received was sufficiently closely connected with the subject matter of the insurance (ie the risk that the insured might at the end of his case have a liability for both the costs of his own representatives and of the defendants' representatives) for the whole of the 'premium' to be recoverable, and that no part of these services should be regarded as collateral benefits of one kind or another.

[41] The master considered that the flaw in this argument was that Claims Direct was not the insurer, nor even the agent of the insurer. Claims Direct offered to members of the public a package which included an insurance element. He accepted that most of the claimants who purchased the Claims Direct product were not sophisticated, and that they would have taken at face value what they saw in the advertisements and what they were told by Claims Direct's claims managers. They could not be expected to analyse how the money they paid was to be utilised, and therefore what proportion of it was potentially recoverable from a defendant. None the less, he said, this situation could not of itself render the whole of the money paid to Claims Direct a recoverable insurance premium if it was not. a [42] He said that the true position was that this insurance was provided by the underwriters through their brokers and coverholder LPL to the claimant via Claims Direct. The claimant would, if asked, almost certainly think that he/she was making an agreement with Claims Direct, and not LPL or the underwriters. b

[43] Under the 26 August agreement MLSS had to carry out what were described as the initial and continuing insurance services, and the master accepted that some of these might indeed be insurance services, and therefore covered by the premium. Other activities, although nominally undertaken for the benefit of underwriters, formed no part of the actual insurance since they were part of a normal claims handling service. If these services had not been carried out by claims managers, they would have been carried out by solicitors in the normal way. To the extent that this work was reasonable and proportionate it might instead be recoverable as costs on behalf of a successful claimant. c

[44] He said that the agreement between the claimant and Claims Direct was not an agreement with an insurer, and that the money paid under it was not all premium. Part of what was provided by Claims Direct under its Claims Protect Scheme was, however, an insurance policy, the premium for which was recoverable, in so far as it was reasonable. He therefore had to identify the amount attributable to the insurance. d

[45] He added that if this was wrong, and if the claimants' argument that the whole of the Claims Direct premium was a recoverable insurance premium was soundly based, he would then have to decide whether £1,250 plus IPT was reasonable. He addressed this topic later in his judgment (see [89]–[90], below). e

[46] He said that in deciding what constituted 'premium' he would adopt the definition from MacGillivray on Insurance Law (see [25], above). He therefore had to decide what part of the money paid by the claimant was the true consideration for which the insurer was undertaking his obligation under the contract of insurance. In considering the sums which properly went to make up the recoverable premium he said that the starting point was the £140, being the figure originally allocated to underwriters, a sum which included brokerage and commission. It had soon become apparent to the underwriters, however, that this allocation was badly wrong, and they exercised their contractual right to a review. It is unnecessary for the purposes of this appeal to refer in any detail to the master's reasons for concluding that a further £311·55 per cover became recoverable as ATE premium in each case, because the defendants do not now challenge his conclusions. It is sufficient to say that after the review payments totalling £16·6m were made to underwriters. These payments were made in respect of all covers bound in 1999 and 2000, a total of 53,282 covers in all. It was by this route that the master accepted that underwriters received an extra £311·55 per cover. f g h

(6) THE MASTER'S JUDGMENT: CLAIMS DIRECT'S COMMISSION j

[47] The master then referred to the commission of £110 received by Claims Direct for every insurance which was accepted. The evidence showed that they used this money for advertising purposes. He said that there was in principle no difficulty over the inclusion of a referral commission in the overall cost of an insurance premium. Although the commission was high it did not appear to him to be unreasonable, particularly in the light of the fact that this was a new product which necessarily had to be advertised heavily in order to generate the business.

[48] As I have said, the master's findings in [46] and [47], above are not challenged by the defendants on this appeal.

(7) THE MASTER'S JUDGMENT: THE PAYMENT TO MLSS

[49] The master then went on to consider the breakdown of the sum of £1,000 which was paid to MLSS. Originally this fee to MLSS was described as 'Claims Managers' Profit Commission'. The amount payable to MLSS was later reduced, following the reallocation of premium. The master said that the question he had to decide was the extent to which the Initial and Continuing Insurance Services were part of the insurance being provided by underwriters and, in so far as they did form part of the insurance, the value which should be put on them.

[50] He began his analysis by following the guidance given by Arden LJ (see [32] and [33], above). In so far as underwriters had outsourced the 'insurance claim handling' services to a third party, this did not make any difference when answering the question whether such a cost was recoverable in principle, if otherwise it would have been reasonable to expect underwriters to do these specific tasks themselves in order to provide the insurance product in question. The claimants had argued that once it was accepted that the services were of benefit or value to the underwriter they did not need to show any more. The master did not accept this argument. He said that he had to examine each of the services provided by MLSS and to decide to what extent, if at all, they accorded with the guidelines suggested by Arden LJ.

[51] In relation to the work undertaken by claims managers the master bore in mind remarks written by Mr Raincock (of LPL) in a memorandum for underwriters dated 5 May 1999:

> 'Underwriters have expressed their reservations to [claim managers' profit commission] in principle because they were led to believe ... that claims managers had some "judgment" over claims pursued. This is not so; they are solely expected to provide a completed report form and are then effectively an "outdoor clerk" who is the "gofor" for the appointed representative ...'

(8) THE MASTER'S JUDGMENT: INITIAL INSURANCE SERVICES

[52] The defendants had conceded that item 1 (arranging for the completion of the Claims Direct application form) and item 2 (arranging for the client to complete a credit agreement application form) were legitimately related to insurance. The master agreed, and he added that he regarded item 3 (forwarding the application form) as a necessary and integral part of the first two items. Item 4 (obtaining further information), on the other hand, was clearly part of the claims handling process. It referred to obtaining such further information as might be requested by the panel solicitor prior to his agreement to commence the legal proceedings.

(9) THE MASTER'S JUDGMENT: CONTINUING INSURANCE SERVICES

[53] The master then turned to the items described as 'Continuing Insurance Services'. He said that item 1 (obtaining witness statements from clients, witnesses and experts) self-evidently related to claims handling. It did not constitute insurance services. Item 2 (monitoring the conduct of the panel solicitor during the course of the legal proceedings and reporting to LPL), on the other hand, seemed to him to be properly part of the insurance services.

[54] Item 3 (arranging for the Claims Direct client to attend appropriate medical examination) and item 4 (review by a costs draftsman) could not, in his view, form part of the insurance services, although he accepted that it was in the overall interest of underwriters that the claims were efficiently handled. Item 5 (maintaining relevant financial information as may be required for LPL), on the other hand, seemed to him without doubt part of the insurance services.

[55] He rejected a submission by the defendants to the effect that because these services, or most of them, were also being provided by MLSS in the days before the Claims Direct arrangements included an insurance product, this prevented them being part of the insurance under the Claims Direct Protect Scheme. He said that the items he identified as being genuinely part of the insurance services represented legitimate outsourcing by the underwriters.

[56] He then considered an argument by the claimants to the effect that because underwriters had an interest in the Initial and Continuing Insurance Services being carried out, and may indeed have insisted on them, and because the agreement with MLSS was not a sham, it was not possible to go behind it, nor to apportion the money paid to MLSS, unless it could be shown that the services were for the benefit only of the individual's underlying damages claim and that they were not required to be performed for the benefit of insurers.

[57] The master said that this approach was too narrow. He did not regard the whole of the money paid by a claimant to constitute premium. In order to assess what was truly premium it was necessary to consider the various elements which went to make up the total figure. In broad terms the Initial Insurance Services were to his mind properly part of the insurance services, particularly if item 4 of the Initial Services was exchanged with item 2 of the Continuing Services. This would mean that the whole of the Continuing Services (apart from item 5) were claims handling, and not recoverable as part of the insurance premium. Item 5 (the maintaining of relevant financial information) was, it seemed to him, something which would be undertaken in any event as part of the monitoring of the conduct of the panel solicitor and reporting to LPL. He did not think there would be any significant increase in the amount required properly to remunerate this insurance service.

[58] The master then referred to figures in Claims Direct's prospectus. He said that it appeared that about £400 per case was being spent on advertising, £75 on irrecoverable VAT, and £425 on services provided by franchisees. It seemed clear from the evidence that the amount actually paid for 'insurance services' was £425. Of this £395 was said to be financed by money from the solicitors and the other £30 from Claims Direct's funds. The defendants had conceded that £30 should be allowed in respect of the insurance services, on the basis that their liability insurers were also being asked to pay £395 to the solicitors as a disbursement. The premium element paid towards the insurance services could not, in the master's view, exceed the £30 to the franchisees paid from Claims Direct's funds. Money paid by the solicitors was not premium. He was satisfied that £30 was not an unreasonable amount to pay for the insurance services which he had described.

[59] Adding together the sums he had held properly to be regarded as premium, £451·55 plus £110 (see [45]–[47], above) and £30 (see [58], above) brought the total recoverable and allowable premium to £591·55 plus £29·58 IPT (as to which, see [21], above), being sums totalling £621·13. As we have said, the defendants do not appeal against this award.

(10) THE MASTER'S JUDGMENT: ISSUE 4

[60] Master Hurst then went on to consider issue 4. This issue, so far as it is still live on this appeal, was in these terms: (i) are any of the benefits purchased by insurance forming part of the Claims Direct scheme collateral or extraneous to such insurance; and (ii) to what extent should the costs of collateral benefits be recoverable? He said that in his view the word 'premium', properly understood, excluded the value of these items, so that this issue was relevant only if his decision on issue 2 was wrong.

[61] The claimants invited him to approach this issue from the point of view of a claimant. It was the claimant who was intended to be helped by s 29 of the 1999 Act. What mattered, therefore, was what was known, or ought reasonably to have been known, by individual claimants when taking out their Claims Direct policies. The claimants asserted that no benefits were provided by the Claims Direct policy that fell outside the insurance allowed by s 29. They said that everything that they received was sufficiently closely connected with the subject matter of the insurance to permit its recovery.

[62] They suggested that it would be anti-competitive and contrary to the notion of easy access to justice if collateral benefits were disallowed from a competitively priced policy. Individual claimants would have no knowledge of the detailed operations of Claims Direct, MLSS and their appointed solicitors. It was argued that claimants have to choose an ATE policy by reference to the overall costs to them, and by reference to the attractiveness of the services offered. The test of reasonableness should therefore be perceived through the eyes of the ATE cover buyer only. Accordingly any finding that a collateral benefit was not recoverable should be prospective only, because it would be only from the date of that finding that it could be said that a claimant was acting unreasonably in purchasing such cover.

[63] Mr Newman QC, who appeared for the second defendants, had argued that there was a distinction between insurance services on the one hand and claims handling services on the other hand. Claims Direct provided claims handling services to its clients, and these were collateral benefits in respect of which nothing was recoverable. He relied on the finding of Master O'Hare in his report annexed to the judgment in Callery v Gray (No 2) [2001] 4 All ER 1 at 30, [2001] 1 WLR 2142 at 2170 (para 51). Having described work done by claims managers (not necessarily in Claims Direct cases) Master O'Hare said: 'In my view these benefits are extraneous to legal expenses insurance and a substantial discount on the recoverable premium should be made in respect of them.' Lord Phillips of Worth Matravers MR in his judgment in Callery v Gray (No 2) referred to that paragraph of Master O'Hare's report and said ([2001] 4 All ER 1 at [33]):

> 'If a payment described as a "premium" entitles the insured to benefits such as these it is ... at least arguable that, to that extent, the "premium" does not fall within the ambit of s 29.'

[64] Lord Phillips MR (at [12]) gave guidance on the test of what is reasonable:

> 'It is important in this context to draw a distinction between two separate matters. The first is the nature of the benefits to which the litigant is contractually entitled in exchange for the payment of the premium. This falls to be determined from the terms of the contract under which the premium is paid. Section 29 of the 1999 Act permits the recovery of a premium where this is payment for insurance against the risk of liability for costs. If payment of a so-called premium buys a contractual entitlement to other benefits it is, to say the least, arguable that the premium cannot, to that extent, be recovered under s 29. Thus the court has to consider the terms of the contract under which the premium is paid to see whether it is simply a contract of insurance against liability for costs or whether it is something other than, or additional to, that.'

[65] Mr Hutton, who appeared for the first and third defendants, had argued that any benefits over and above those covered by the £140 paid to underwriters were collateral or extraneous and should not be recoverable. He referred in this context to the speeches of the House of Lords in Dimond v Lovell [2000] 2 All ER 897, [2002] 1 AC 384, suggesting that they should be applied by analogy. The House of Lords found that the claimant could not recover the full amount charged under his agreement with a specialist vehicle hire company for a replacement car when his own car was damaged in an accident. Although it was reasonable for the claimant to use the services of such a hire company, he obtained more from the agreement than the cost of a replacement car, and the additional benefits were not recoverable against the defendant. The House found that the recoverable loss, after allowance had been made for the additional benefits, would normally be the market rate for hiring from an ordinary car hire company. (See [2000] 2 All ER 897 at 910–911, 915, [2002] 1 AC 384 at 401–403, 407 per Lord Hoffmann and Lord Hobhouse of Woodborough respectively.)

[66] Reliance was also placed by the defendants on the points already made in relation to the content of the initial and continuing insurance services. It was said that the claims manager in effect held the client's hand throughout the entire legal process. His services went far beyond true insurance services and should not be paid for as part of the insurance premium.

[67] Master Hurst concluded on this issue that the starting point should be that any benefits over and above those covered by the payment of £451·55 to underwriters (which included an element of own costs cover) should be regarded as collateral or extraneous and should not be recoverable. If his decision on issue 2 was wrong, he would hold that the premium of £1,250 included payment for the extraneous benefits, namely the claims handling services, which he had already identified, and that the costs of those services were not recoverable as premium. On the other hand the actual amount paid by Claims Direct for insurance services was £30, and that element was recoverable.

(11) ISSUE 2: CONCLUSION

[68] The main issue we have to determine on this appeal is whether the master was correct in refusing to accept that the 'premium' of £1,250 identified in the binding authority must be automatically equated with the premium referred to in s 29 of the 1999 Act. We were told that if we were to allow the 'deconstruction' of a premium liability in the manner advocated by the defendants, insurers would raise endless arguments on the appropriateness of different elements of a premium, and that this would make the assessment of this type of 'additional liability' a nightmare for those concerned with the assessment of costs. All that was needed, Mr Charlton said, was a proportionality check of the type already required by CPD para 11.10 (see [29], above).

[69] I certainly agree that the court should apply a proportionality check whenever costs are assessed on the standard basis (see [34], above for the leading case on this topic). The courts will not sanction a situation in which the recoverable costs are altogether too high in relation to the value of a claim (but see CPD para 11.5—set out in [29], above—for the treatment of 'additional liabilities' in this context). But this consideration in itself throws no light on the distinct issue we have to decide, namely what constitutes the 'premium' on the facts of these cases for the purposes of s 29 of the 1999 Act. There is a particular feature here which is bound to excite attention. The services provided for the claimants were in most respects identical under the Portfolio Scheme and the Claims Direct Protect Scheme. How then can it be said that all the claims handling services (previously remunerated out of Claims Direct's 30% share of the award in successful cases) suddenly became insurance services when an ATE insurance element was added to the package? This consideration alone is sufficient to put a costs judge on inquiry.

[70] The insurance agreement was not a sham in the sense that it was intended to give the appearance of creating legal rights and obligations different from the actual legal rights and obligations which the parties intended to create (see Snook v London & West Riding Investments Ltd [1967] 1 All ER 518 at 528, [1967] 2 QB 786 at 802). But before a court could be satisfied that when the parties to these unusual negotiations adopted the word 'premium' in their arrangements in the sense of a premium paid for the purpose identified in s 29 of the 1999 Act it is necessary for it to conduct an exercise of the type undertaken by Master Hurst. In Street v Mountford [1985] 2 All ER 289, [1985] AC 809, for instance, the parties gave the word 'licence' to the agreement they had made as to the terms on which residential premises might be occupied. The House of Lords held, however, that the legal effect of their agreement could not be conclusively determined by the label they gave to it. Lord Templeman said ([1985] 2 All ER 289 at 294, [1985] AC 809 at 819):

> '[T]he consequences in law of the agreement, once concluded, can only be determined by consideration of the effect of the agreement. If the agreement satisfied all the requirements of a tenancy, then the agreement produced a tenancy and the parties cannot alter the effect of the agreement by insisting that they only created a licence.'

[71] In order to analyse the true nature of the arrangements more deeply, I must go to the evidence of the claimants' three witnesses which the master summarised in his judgment. He was clearly impressed by the experience and professionalism of each of them, and he accepted the evidence they gave.

[72] The master had taken as his starting point what Claims Direct told the public about its business at the time of its flotation. The relevant part of its prospectus reads:

> 'In total, the Group receives about £1,560 of gross revenue per claim, but incurs direct costs of approximately £425 and indirect costs of approximately £475. The Group makes a gross profit per claim of approximately £660.'

[73] Although Mr Doona (for whom see [5], above) had not been with the company at the time the original figure for the premium was calculated, he said that underwriters had arrived at it by looking at their costs and the profit ratio they wished to make and settling the figure accordingly.

[74] After describing the structure of MLSS's business (for which see [6], above) Mr Doona told the master that the direct costs of £425 related entirely to the payments made to the claims managers. In addition to the £395 they were paid by the panel solicitor, a further £30 came from other income of the group. He thought that the suggestion in the reply that this £30 came from the premium was not strictly accurate. It would have been better to have said that the £30 simply came from Claims Direct's general income, although of course the amount the company received from LPL was the largest single component of this income. a [75] As to the indirect costs of £475, he said that £75 represented irrecoverable VAT, and £350–£400 was his best estimate of the total cost of annual advertising. He said that there were also the indirect expenses of performing the claims handling services on behalf of underwriters, as required under the agreement. He found it very difficult to calculate a precise cost per policy for these services, because the b work was not costed that way. He said that they had never tried to apportion the expenses of claims handling by isolating the expenses attributable solely to the services provided to underwriters from any other expenses, and then seeking to apportion this total cost to each policy. He agreed that a profit of £660 per claim, as shown in the prospectus, was an extraordinary one.

[76] In his evidence Mr Doona was trying to identify the cost to MLSS of c carrying out the work which underwriters required them to undertake under the 26 August agreement. The origin of these obligations was made clear in the evidence given by Mr Raincock (see [10]–[12], above for the history). He said that underwriters were not willing to accept the risk offered to them unless the proponents of the risk were willing to undertake that they would continue to run d an efficient business.

[77] He explained that he was in the habit of carrying out random audits on individual files. If he was dissatisfied with what he saw, he would then report his dissatisfaction to MLSS, and they would then inspect the file to ensure that the panel solicitor was performing his duties in the manner required of him by the e operating manual. He told how the number of panel solicitors increased from 175 to almost 400 in order to cope with the volume of business. Solicitors were required to attend a seven-day training course run by MLSS. An accreditation system was also set up.

[78] Mr Raincock expressed the view that all these services were intrinsic to the insurance cover because without them the insurance policy could not have been f managed. He accepted that the monitoring service, designed to improve performance, was not only provided for the benefit of underwriters. It benefited the claimants as well. He conceded that there might be an element of damages claim handling in the work undertaken by Claims Direct and MLSS.

[79] Mr Primer gave evidence from the perspective of the underwriters. He said that underwriters had always approached this risk on the basis that virtually all the g work involved in promoting the project and in the work of vetting cases and claims handling and administration would be sub-contracted. Underwriters were concerned to ensure that these functions were properly carried out, particularly the vetting.

[80] Since most of these functions were being sub-contracted, underwriters took h the view that they should calculate the 'burning cost' per policy (with a margin for error, given their lack of experience with this type of policy) and then apply an appropriate margin for overheads and profit. (The phrase 'burning cost' means the frequency of loss (ie the percentage of policies in which a claim is made) multiplied by the average cost of each claim.) Underwriters' figures were originally calculated j on the assumption of a failure fate of 4–6%. In March 2002 the failure rate was about 25%.

[81] He said that underwriters would not have been prepared to underwrite the business without proper arrangements being in place for promotion, vetting, claims handling and so on, and that they were not in a position to undertake this work themselves. There was a relatively small allocation of premium to pure underwriting risk. Underwriters expected LPL to maintain a rigorous supervisory regime over the activities of Claims Direct and MLSS, including the vetting procedures, in return for the 32·5% commission they were to receive. The initial £91 net premium turned out to be a 'poor call' due to the excessive failure rate experienced in practice.

[82] So far as Lloyd's internal arrangements are concerned, underwriters are bound by an agreement with Lloyd's (which permits them to carry on business at Lloyd's) whereby a limit is placed on the total gross premium which a syndicate is permitted to underwrite. It is noteworthy that the figure which appeared in the syndicates' books as premium income was the net amount (originally £91), and not the £1,250, although that sum was described as 'premium' in the binding authority. Section 21 of that authority provided, in its final form, that—

> 'Unless otherwise agreed by the Underwriter in writing and endorsed hereon the total gross premium income attaching hereunder shall not exceed 21 million after the deduction of the Premium Allocation payable to MLSS.' (My emphasis.)

[83] In his witness statement Mr Primer said, like the other witnesses, that no specific costings were provided for individual components of MLSS's work. He would readily accept, however, from his experience in the industry and his knowledge of the work MLSS did, that the cost per claim would be likely to be several hundred pounds. In his oral evidence he put this figure at between £300 and £900. He said that he knew what it cost to bring third party administrators in, what coverholders had to pay their auditors, and what brokers charged for their services.

[84] In the course of his submissions on the appeal Mr Charlton relied on what his clients called a 'deconstruction schedule' which was based on this evidence. Their case was founded firmly on the contention that the only contract which the individual claimants had made was a contract with the underwriters, who undertook to provide them with protection against their own costs and the other side's costs in the event that their claims failed, and all this for a premium of £1,250 (plus IPT). Viewed in this light, the cost of 'risk control/claims handling/vetting' which underwriters required MLSS to perform for them could be put between £225 (the original amount paid into the retention fund) and £689 (the whole of the £1,000 paid to MLSS, less the £311 clawed back once premium was reallocated). Similarly, the sum of £475 mentioned in the Claims Direct prospectus as part of the indirect costs attributed to each claim could be properly treated as advertising and promotion costs required by underwriters.

[85] The master considered that there were two relevant contracts with which each claimant was concerned, and not merely one. Once Claims Direct accepted the proposal the claimant made in the fair trading statement (see 13, above) it expressly undertook to assist him with his claim. Consideration was given for this undertaking because Claims Direct expected to profit as a result of the obligations the claimant agreed to undertake. The task the master had to perform in these circumstances was to identify how much of the premium allocation to MLSS in truth represented the cost of the obligations Claims Direct undertook (to all its customers) to procure, even though in a quite different agreement, to which the claimants were not parties, many of these services were labelled 'insurance services'.

[86] In my judgment it is clear that the master attached too much weight to the figures quoted in the prospectus, about which Mr Doona was quite rigorously cross-examined. The difference between the minimum fee of £395 which a panel solicitor had to pay a claims manager and the sum of £425 quoted in the prospectus as a direct cost suggests a net outlay of £30 by MLSS on each claim, but I do not consider that this figure casts any particularly useful light on anything the master had to decide. It is clear that MLSS incurred significant expense in performing the 'insurance services' required of them under the 26 August agreement. The central issue under question 2 is whether the master was entitled to lift the veil and to be influenced by what was actually being provided in return for the premium allocation paid to MLSS (see [18] and [39], above).

[87] In my judgment, in this quite exceptional case, it was inevitable that the master should adopt this approach in order to identify what should truly be treated as the premium. As this court explained in Callery v Gray (No 2) [2001] 4 All ER 1:

> '[11] It was common ground, and rightly so, that the court, when considering whether to award an insurance premium by way of costs, has to consider whether the premium is reasonable. It was also common ground that, in so far as the court finds that the premium is not reasonable, it can and should reduce it. There was debate as to the appropriate approach to the application of the test of what is reasonable.
>
> [12] It is important in this context to draw a distinction between two separate matters. The first is the nature of the benefits to which the litigant is contractually entitled in exchange for the payment of the premium. This falls to be determined from the terms of the contract under which the premium is paid. Section 29 of the 1999 Act permits the recovery of a premium where this is payment for insurance against the risk of liability for costs. If payment of a so-called premium buys a contractual entitlement to other benefits it is, to say the least, arguable that the premium cannot, to that extent, be recovered under s 29. Thus the court has to consider the terms of the contract under which the premium is paid to see whether it is simply a contract of insurance against liability for costs or whether it is something other than, or additional to, that.'

[88] It was not, in my judgment, the intention of Parliament when it enacted s 29 of the 1999 Act to overload the recoverable premium by adding to the costs customarily embraced by such a premium the costs which a company like MLSS had to incur if insurers were to accept the risk at all. I would look equally askance at the recoverability, in similar circumstances, of a premium for a fire policy which included the cost the insured had to incur in installing and maintaining a sprinkler system as a condition for his insurance cover, or a premium for a household insurance policy which included the cost of installing and maintaining a burglar alarm.

[89] The obligation which the insurer undertook under his contract of insurance with the claimant was to provide an indemnity in the event that the claimant's compensation claim was dismissed or was discontinued. It was not an obligation to provide the 'Continuing Insurance Services' described in the 26 August agreement. The claimant would be provided with these services in any event, whether or not the claim was unsuccessful. If and in so far as the work done by a claims manager represented an appropriate disbursement for work a solicitor would otherwise have to perform himself, then the cost of that work would be properly recoverable as part of the solicitor's bill.

[90] For these reasons I am satisfied that the master's conclusion was correct, although I have reached the same conclusion by a somewhat different route. I would probably not have been as generous as he was in attributing expenses to the insurance element of the arrangements, but since the defendants have not cross-appealed, there is no need to go into this aspect of the case.

(12) ISSUE 4 AND THE REASONABLENESS OF THE PREMIUM

[91] In these circumstances it is unnecessary to deal separately with issue 4.

[92] Since the defendants do not challenge the reasonableness of the sum awarded by the master it is also not necessary to say very much about the final element in the appeal. In para 234 of his judgment Master Hurst explained why he considered a premium of £621·13 to be reasonable and proportionate. He was not given any evidence of comparable or alternative products. Nor was he told the then current premium rates for ATE insurance policies. He was therefore constrained to take as a starting point the award in Callery v Gray of an ATE insurance premium of £350 plus IPT (£367·50) plus a success fee.

[93] In 11 of the cases he was able to identify the actual base costs claimed, and these averaged £2,097 per case. A 20% success fee (as in Callery v Gray) would yield a figure of £419, while a 5% success fee (as suggested by this court in Callery v Gray as a preferred alternative) would yield a figure of £105. The master then added £367·50 to each figure, and considered the resultant range of figures between £472·50 and £786·50. He concluded that since his award of £621·13 fell within the middle of the range, it should be regarded as reasonable and proportionate, and the higher figure of £1,250 plus IPT would not.

[94] Mr Charlton submitted that the success fees adopted by the master in his calculations were far too low, and that if more realistic success fees were adopted the premium sought by his clients could not fairly be castigated as unreasonable and disproportionate, particularly as 'both sides' cover' was available under the Claims Direct policy.

[95] Our assessor has advised us that he considers that some of Mr Charlton's criticisms have some force. It appears that Master Hurst assumed that all the cases he examined were cases as simple as Callery v Gray, and that they all settled pre-issue. In fact, some of them were not particularly simple, and two of them did not settle pre-issue. On the other hand our assessor considered that most of the success fees suggested by Mr Charlton were too high. He said—and I would accept his advice—that a success fee of 40% would be reasonable in case 12, a success fee of 20% in cases 6, 10, 18 and 20, and a success fee of 30% in the remainder. Whereas Mr Charlton's comparison figures ranged between £801 and £2,982, our assessor's comparison figures ranged between £656 and £1,412.

[96] Provided that the sample is large enough, the 'one allowance suits all' approach adopted by Master Hurst is obviously the appropriate method of assessing the reasonableness of a premium in a situation of this kind. Our assessor adopted an average success fee of 28% for the cases he examined, (which had an average base cost of £2,130) and this provided a comparison figure of £979, in contrast to the figure of £1,518 suggested by Mr Charlton. These calculations are, however, based largely on the figures for costs claimed as opposed to costs agreed or allowed. It is also likely that a larger sample would produce a smaller comparison figure.

[97] It follows that the sum awarded by Master Hurst is both reasonable and proportionate. The sum claimed by the claimants (£1,250 plus IPT) would not have been.

[98] I would also accept our assessor's advice that the claimants' reliance on CPD para 11.10(1) as the sole determinant of the reasonableness of 'both sides cover' premium is likely to produce more uncertainty for a claimant than the possibility of deconstruction or further premium reallocation in an exceptional case would produce. This uncertainty would also be far greater if two-step success fees became the norm for most cases.

[99] Before leaving this case, there is one other matter I need to mention. There seems to be widespread misunderstanding about the role which this court can perform on particular appeals. There may be important occasions, of which Callery v Gray was undoubtedly one, and Sarwar v Alam [2001] EWCA Civ 1401, [2001] 4 All ER 541, [2002] 1 WLR 125, was another, when the court may seek the assistance of other parties in the relevant field in addition to the parties to the immediate litigation. On such an occasion the court will also do its best to derive benefit from whatever research evidence is available before giving guidance of general applicability in a variety of cases.

[100] Halloran v Delaney [2002] EWCA Civ 1258, [2003] 1 All ER 775, [2003] 1 WLR 28 was not such an occasion. It was concerned with an extremely simple road traffic accident claim which was swiftly settled for £1,500 with a minimum of fuss and bother. In my judgment I referred (at [32]) to the court's description of Callery v Gray as a 'modest and straightforward claim for compensation for personal injuries resulting from a traffic accident ... where there was no special feature that raised apprehension that the claim might not prove to be sound'. I suggested (at [34]–[36]) the approach that judges should adopt in future when appraising the appropriateness of a success fee 'in claims as simple as this'.

[101] Subsequent events have shown that I should have expressed myself with greater clarity. The type of case to which I was referring was a case similar to Callery v Gray and Halloran v Delaney in which, to adopt the 'ready reckoner' in Cook on Costs (2003) p 545, the prospects of success are virtually 100%. The two-step fee advocated by the court in Callery v Gray, Russell v Pal Pak Corrugated Ltd [2001] 3 All ER 833, [2001] 1 WLR 2112 is apt to allow a solicitor in such a case to cater for the wholly unexpected risk lurking below the limpid waters of the simplest of claims. It did not require any research evidence or submissions from other parties in the industry to persuade the court that in this type of extremely simple claim a success fee of over 5% was no longer tenable in all the circumstances. The guidance given in that judgment was not intended to have any wider application.

LAWS LJ.

[102] I agree.

SIR ANTHONY EVANS.

[103] I also agree.

Appeal dismissed.

Melanie Martyn Barrister.

Wermuth v Wermuth

[2002] EWCA Civ 50

COURT OF APPEAL, CIVIL DIVISION
THORPE, LATHAM LJJ AND LAWRENCE COLLINS J
17 DECEMBER 2002, 4 FEBRUARY 2003

Divorce – Financial provision – Jurisdiction – Husband bringing divorce proceedings in Germany – Wife subsequently bringing divorce proceedings in England – Judge granting wife's application for maintenance pending suit – Whether maintenance order 'provisional measure' – Council Regulation (EC) 1347/2000, art 12.

A husband and wife with German citizenship had homes in England and Germany. They separated at the end of March 2002. In May 2002 the husband filed for divorce in Germany and shortly after the wife filed for divorce in England. Council Regulation (EC) 1347/2000 (the Brussels II regulation) applied to the jurisdiction and the recognition and enforcement in matrimonial matters in both the United Kingdom and Germany and art 11[a] provided that where proceedings involving the same cause of action and between the same parties were brought before courts of different member states, the court second seised was to stay proceedings until such time as the jurisdiction of the court first seised was established. The husband applied to the German court for an order that it was first seised within the terms of the Brussels II regulation and a hearing date was fixed. He also applied to strike out the wife's English petition on the ground that the primary jurisdiction lay with the German court. The district judge adjourned his application to strike-out, ordering that no steps should be taken in the English divorce proceedings save under art 12[b] of the Brussels II regulation which provided that in 'urgent cases' the provisions of the regulation were not to prevent courts of a member state from taking 'such provisional, including protective measures' in respect of persons or assets in that state as might be available under the law of that state even if, under the regulation, another court had jurisdiction as to the substance of the matter. In September 2002, in reliance on art 12, the wife applied for and was granted maintenance pending suit of £12,500 per month, two thirds of which was intended to provide funds to enable her to litigate. The husband appealed contending, inter alia, that a measure did not come within the scope of art 12 if its provisional character were not guaranteed; that a court order requiring an unconditional interim payment could not be a provisional measure unless, if the payee were unsuccessful, the payer could obtain repayment; and that there was no evidence of urgency. The wife conceded that the order could not be classified as a protective measure.

Held – An application for maintenance pending suit could not be categorised as a protective measure. It could not even be categorised as a provisional measure since over-payments or payments obtained by material non-disclosure were at best given some indirect reflection in a later quantification of substantive orders. Furthermore if the duty to quantify the substantive order was to be discharged in a Article 11, so far as material, is set out at [13], below

b Article 12, so far as material, is set out at [14], below the court of another member state, the payee might well escape even that reflection. In the instant case, if viewed as a provisional measure, the judge's order had a substance and an undefined duration that were an unwarranted invasion of the proper function of the German judge as the judge of the court first seised. It had been conceded that it could not be classified as a protective measure. Nor could it be brought within a definition of 'urgent cases'. Accordingly, the appeal would be allowed (see [31]–[33], [36], [37], [43], below); de Cavel v de Cavel Case 143/78 [1979] ECR 1055, Van Uden Maritime BV (t/a Van Uden Africa Line) v Kommanditgesellschaft in Firma Deco-Line C-391/95 [1999] All ER (EC) 258 and Reichert v Dresdner Bank AG (No 2) Case C-261/90 [1992] ECR I-2149 applied.

Notes

For the stay of proceedings in matrimonial causes where proceedings are brought before the courts of different member states of the European Union, see 29(3) Halsbury's Laws (4th edn reissue) para 659.

Cases referred to in judgments

de Cavel v de Cavel Case 143/78 [1979] ECR 1055, ECJ.

Ghoth v Ghoth [1992] 2 All ER 920, [1993] 1 FCR 177, CA.

Mietz v Intership Yachting Sneek BV Case C-99/96 [1999] ECR I-2299, ECJ.

Reichert v Dresdner Bank AG (No 2) Case C-261/90 [1992] ECR I-2149, ECJ.

Van Uden Maritime BV (t/a Van Uden Africa Line) v Kommanditgesellschaft in Firma Deco-Line C-391/95 [1999] All ER (EC) 258, [1999] QB 1225, [1999] 2 WLR 1181, [1998] ECR I-7091, ECJ.

Cases also cited or referred to in skeleton arguments

A v A (maintenance pending suit: provision for legal costs) [2001] 1 FCR 226, [2001] 1 WLR 605.

F v F (ancillary relief: substantial assests) [1996] 2 FCR 397.

G v G (maintenance pending suit: legal costs) [2002] EWHC 306 (Fam) [2002] 3 FCR 339.

Appeal

Jochen Ralph Wermuth, who had commenced divorce proceedings in the Mainz Amtsgericht, Germany, against his wife, Tatiana Yurievna Wermuth, appealed from the decision of Johnson J on 22 October 2002 in English divorce proceedings subsequently brought against him by his wife, ordering him to pay maintenance pending suit to his wife at the rate of £12,500 per calendar month. The facts are set out in the judgment of Thorpe LJ.

Nicholas Mostyn QC and Richard Todd (instructed by Mishcon De Reya) for the husband.

Lewis Marks QC and Tim Amos (instructed by International Family Law Chambers) for the wife.

THORPE LJ.

[1] The issue in this appeal is the proper construction of art 12 of the Council Regulation generally known as Brussels II. Its official designation is Council Regulation (EC) 1347/2000 (the Brussels II Regulation). It came into force on 1

March 2001. The primary purpose of the regulation was to avoid jurisdictional conflicts between the states of the European Community in cases for divorce, judicial separation and nullity (to use our terminology). Thus the regulation is entitled 'On the jurisdiction and the recognition and enforcement of judgments in matrimonial matters and in matters of parental responsibility for children of both spouses'.

[2] In the event Denmark elected not to be a party to the convention negotiations that culminated in the regulation with the consequence that it binds only the 14 other member states. During the negotiating process the United Kingdom held profound reservations at the prospect of resolving jurisdictional conflicts in this field by the rule of lis alibi pendens rather than by the doctrine of forum conveniens, which had statutory expression in para 9 of Sch 1 to the Domicile and Matrimonial Proceedings Act 1973. That provision, of course, continues to regulate conflicts between this jurisdiction and jurisdictions other than the 14 member states of the European Union.

[3] The objection to the proposed convention was encapsulated in two arguments: first that an arbitrary rule of lis alibi pendens was a poor substitute for a balanced discretionary appraisal of fairness and convenience that the doctrine of forum conveniens permits. The second argument was that the introduction of a rule giving priority to the court of first issue would inevitably encourage a rush to be first, eliminating or minimising attempts at reconciliation or conciliation. However the experience of 18 months of operation has been reassuring. Research carried out by specialist practitioners in London and Edinburgh in preparation for the Fourth Anglo-German Family Law Judicial Conference in September 2002 did not suggest that the regulation had resulted in any significant shift in accepted standards of professional good practice at the stage when divorce proceedings are in contemplation. Furthermore, in relation to the first argument, the loss of an ability to conduct a balanced judgment of the more appropriate jurisdiction is compensated by the elimination of the need for expensive litigation (generally conducted concurrently in both jurisdictions) as each party manoeuvres to establish the jurisdiction of his or her preference as the more convenient jurisdiction.

[4] With that introduction to the regulation I turn to the facts in the present appeal. The parties are in their mid-30s, the husband being basically German and the wife Russian. They married on 20 September 1997 in Russia. Since 1999 they have had homes in England and Germany. On 28 April 2000 they entered into a marriage contract in Germany. On 13 February 2002 the wife became a naturalised German citizen. In the same month they seemingly decided to make London their main base but separated at the end of March 2002. On 12 April 2002 the lease on the wife's London flat terminated and thereafter the husband did not know her address. Accordingly on 8 May 2002 the husband swore an affidavit seeking an order for substituted service of the German petition that he was preparing to issue. The petition was filed in the Mainz Amtsgericht on 14 May. On the previous day the husband sent the wife an e-mail letter:

> 'Dear Yana, I have filed for divorce. For you to receive the papers, could you please let me have your address such that the documents could be delivered to you personally? Thanks. Jochen.'

[5] The wife responded at length on the following day but ignored the request. The request was repeated in an e-mail on 16 May. The wife's e-mail response of the following day stated that the papers could be served at Atelier 214, 176 Finchley

Road, which was a post office box set up by the wife on that very day for the receipt of mail. a [6] Accordingly on 20 May the husband applied for an order for substituted service. The order was made on 24 May and, under its terms, service was deemed to have been effected on 12 June.

[7] The wife's competing divorce proceedings in this jurisdiction were filed on 24 May and were deemed served by an order for substituted service made on 11 June. On 26 June the husband applied to strike out the wife's English petition on the obvious ground that primary jurisdiction lay with the Amtsgericht in Mainz. That application came before Deputy District Judge Solomons on 13 August 2002. Both parties appeared by counsel. There are two recitals to the order as follows: b c

> '(a) Both parties have agreed that it is their intention that the hearing in the German divorce proceedings fixed for 27 August 2002 should proceed;
>
> (b) no steps should be taken in the English divorce proceedings, including ancillary relief, save under Article 12 of the Brussels II [Regulation] pending the hearing in England referred to at paragraph 1 below.'

d

Paragraph 1 of the order provided that the husband's strike-out application be heard by a judge of the Division on the first open date after 15 November. The other provisions of the order regulated the filing of evidence in preparation for that hearing.

[8] The hearing in Germany referred to in the first recital was to have been the hearing of the husband's application for an order that the Mainz Amtsgericht was first seised within the terms of the Brussels II Regulation and that the husband had established the jurisdictional grounds for divorce. We were told that the hearing had to be adjourned since an interpreter had not been arranged for the wife. e

[9] On 24 September in reliance on the second recital to the order of 13 August the wife issued an application for maintenance pending suit. We were told that District Judge Million on about 15 October referred it to be heard by a judge of the Division and that hearing took place on 22 October before Johnson J. How the wife obtained a full hearing before a judge of the Division only seven days after the district judge's direction I do not know. f

[10] Before Johnson J counsel for the husband submitted that the wife's application for maintenance pending suit did not fall within the exceptions provided by art 12 of the regulation. Johnson J rejected that submission and ordered the husband to pay maintenance pending suit at the rate of £150,000 a year, two thirds of which was intended to provide funds with which to enable the wife to litigate. The order was backdated to 11 June 2002, the date of service of the wife's petition. The payment in respect of the period 11 June to 10 November (£62,500) was ordered to be paid on or before 2 December and future payments due on 11 November and subsequently were ordered to be paid monthly in advance by standing order. The judge refused an application for permission to appeal and for a stay. Those applications were subsequently granted by me on paper on 7 November. However permission was granted only to argue the Brussels Regulations points. By a further ground the husband sought to challenge the practice (approved in two recent first instance authorities) of including within a maintenance pending suit order a provision for litigation costs. I refused permission to advance that ground only in the circumstances of this case and this judgment is not to be read as an implicit approval of the practice. g h j

[11] The hearing in Mainz, adjourned from 27 August, duly took place on 10 October. Judgment was delivered on 14 November. The essential conclusions of that judgment are as follows. (i) The court had jurisdiction under art 2 of the regulation, both parties being German nationals. (ii) The German court was first seised under the provisions of art 11.4(a). (iii) The husband's application for substituted service was well founded since at the material time he did not know where the wife was living. The wife's contention that the husband had been devious in seeking substituted service of his petition was rejected. Furthermore the court made the contrary finding that the wife had been endeavouring to avoid service of the husband's petition.

[12] The husband's application to strike out the wife's petition, fixed by para 1 of the order of 13 August, was heard by Bracewell J on 9 December. There was no dispute that the court had jurisdiction founded on the wife's habitual residence throughout the 12 months immediately preceding the presentation of the petition. However Bracewell J, like the judge in Mainz, concluded that primary jurisdiction rested with the Mainz court as the court first seised. However, given that Mr Amos relied on the wife's intention to appeal the Mainz judgment of 14 November, counsel for the husband accepted that the appropriate consequential order was for a stay of the English petition rather than a strike-out.

[13] I turn now to the regulations and rules directly relevant to this appeal. Article 2 of the Brussels II Regulation sets out the basis upon which states acquire jurisdiction. Since it is common ground that both Germany and the United Kingdom have jurisdiction it is unnecessary to enter that area of the text. The relevant provisions of art 11 are as follows:

> '1. Where proceedings involving the same cause of action and between the same parties are brought before courts of different Member States, the court second seised shall of its own motion stay its proceedings until such time as the jurisdiction of the court first seised is established ...
>
> 3. Where the jurisdiction of the court first seised is established, the court second seised shall decline jurisdiction in favour of that court.
>
> In that case, the party who brought the relevant action before the court second seised may bring that action before the court first seised.
>
> 4. For the purposes of this Article, a court shall be deemed to be seised:
>
> (a) at the time when the document instituting the proceedings or an equivalent document is lodged with the court, provided that the applicant has not subsequently failed to take the steps he was required to take to have service effected on the respondent ...'

[14] Article 12, the article that governs the outcome of this appeal, provides:

> 'In urgent cases, the provisions of this Regulation shall not prevent the courts of a Member State from taking such provisional, including protective, measures in respect of persons or assets in that state as may be available under the law of that Member State, even if, under this Regulation, the court of another Member State has jurisdiction as to the substance of the matter.'

[15] Finally I refer to amendments to the Family Proceedings Rules 1991, SI 1991/1247 which came into effect in September 2001 as a belated response to the precipitate arrival of the Council Regulation. The rule most relevant to this appeal is r 2.27A(2) which is in these terms:

> 'Where at any time after the presentation of a petition, it appears to the court that, under Articles 9, 10 or 11 of the Council Regulation, the court does not have jurisdiction to hear the petition and is required or may be required to stay the proceedings, the court shall stay the proceedings and fix a date for a hearing to determine the questions of jurisdiction and whether there should be a stay or other order and shall serve notice of the hearing on the parties to the proceedings ...'

Given the clear terms of the rule Mr Mostyn QC rightly observes that what appears as the second recital to the order of 13 August should have constituted the first paragraph of the order.

[16] Before expressing my own conclusions I record the reasoning of Johnson J. It must be remembered that this was a brief hearing and I doubt whether the judge received much if any forewarning of the difficult and novel point upon which the husband's counsel relied. Accordingly Johnson J's reasoning is understandably and commendably brief. He said only this:

> 'The meaning of the term "provisional, including protective, measures" has been the subject of some discussion. I was referred to an explanatory report prepared by Dr Alegria Borras explaining the consequences of this European legislation. It would be surprising, give rise to the possibility of tactical abuse and be impractical if a right to support were to be suspended without remedy.
>
> In my judgment, the term "provisional, including protective, measures" does cover an application such as this, and I hold that I have jurisdiction to make the orders sought.'

[17] Mr Mostyn informs us that the third sentence in the above passage represents the judge's second thoughts. His instructing solicitor's shorthand note of the judgment has this for that sentence:

> 'It was common for English Courts to be asked to make financial provision for a wife in circumstances similar to this which were known as protective measures.'

Johnson J no doubt had in mind cases in which maintenance pending suit had been ordered during the currency of a jurisdictional challenge to an asserted domicile or habitual residence. The case of Ghoth v Ghoth [1992] 2 All ER 920, [1993] 1 FCR 177, is an instance.

[18] Of course the correction of a transcript of an oral judgment provides the judge with the opportunity to express himself differently and I only record both his first and second thoughts because each are independently legitimate and require separate consideration if this judgment is to cover comprehensively this fresh field of law.

[19] In relation to the judge's first thought I do not consider that prior practice cases involving a challenge to jurisdiction can have any application to cases that are directly governed by the regulation. We must find our answer in the words of art 12 and such guidance as there is as to its construction. Nor do I think that the judge's second thought provides a secure foundation for his conclusion. The right to support would not be suspended without remedy by a stricter construction of art 12. The right would be exercisable in the jurisdiction first seised and only suspended in the jurisdiction second seised.

[20] I doubt whether the judge's task was much clarified by the reference to the explanatory report prepared by Dr Borras. Article 12 is considered in paras 58 and 59 of her report but the text is dense and by no means easy to understand even after repeated readings.

[21] So what then is the extent and the effect of art 12?

[22] I come now to the rival submissions. Mr Mostyn took us through the terms of the Brussels Convention on Jurisdiction and Enforcement of Judgments in Civil and Commercial Matters (as set out in Sch 1 to the Civil Jurisdiction and Judgments Act 1982) (Brussels I) (both in its old form as adopted by the then six member states in 1968 and in its modern replacement, namely Council Regulation (EC) 44/2001) and particularly arts 21 and 24 of the convention and arts 27 and 31 of the regulation which are the provisions matching arts 11 and 12 of the Brussels II Regulation. The relevance of the mirror provisions in Brussels I is twofold: first Brussels I and not the Brussels II Regulation is concerned with jurisdiction and enforcement in relation to maintenance. Second the report of Dr Borras confirms that art 12 was modelled on art 24 of Brussels I and accordingly decisions on the construction of art 24 are directly in point. He prefaced his review of decided cases by reference to a published work of Lawrence Collins J The Civil Jurisdiction and Judgments Act 1982 (1983) where, at p 99, critical comment is directed to excessive claims to jurisdiction founded on the provisional measures exception. He also derives support from Jaffey on the Conflict of Laws (2nd edn, 2002) at p 139 where the authors state that art 31 of Brussels I—

> 'applies to measures which are intended to preserve a factual or legal situation in one member state so as to safeguard rights which are the subject matter of litigation in the court of another member state which has jurisdiction as to the substance of the matter.'

[23] On the same page the authors write:

> 'A measure does not come within the scope of Article 31 if its provisional character is not guaranteed; a court order requiring the defendant to make an unconditional interim payment cannot be a provisional measure for the purposes of Article 31 unless, if the claimant is unsuccessful, the defendant can obtain repayment.'

[24] The authorities for these propositions are first Reichert v Dresdner Bank AG (No 2) Case C-261/90 [1992] ECR I-2149. In that authority Mr Mostyn relies upon paras 32 and 34 of the judgment to this effect:

> '32. The court has already declared in the judgment in Case 143/78 De Cavel v De Cavel ([1979] ECR 1055 at para 8) that as provisional or protective measures may serve to safeguard a variety of rights, their inclusion in the scope of the Convention is determined not by their own nature but by the nature of the rights which they serve to protect. It added, in paragraph 9 of that judgment, that the provisions of Article 24 of the Convention cannot be relied upon to bring within the scope of the Convention provisional or protective measures relating to matters which are excluded therefrom.
>
> 34. The expression "provisional, including protective, measures" within the meaning of Article 24 must therefore be understood as referring to measures which, in matters within the scope of the Convention, are intended to preserve a factual or legal situation so as to safeguard rights the recognition of which is sought elsewhere from the court having jurisdiction as to the substance of the matter.'

[25] The authority for the second proposition is Van Uden Maritime BV (t/a Van Uden Africa Line) v Kommanditgesellschaft in Firma Deco-Line C-391/95 [1999] All ER (EC) 258, [1999] QB 1225. From this authority it is sufficient to cite only paras 46 and 47:

> '46. However, an order for interim payment of a sum of money is, by its very nature, such that it may pre-empt the decision on the substance of the case. If, moreover, the plaintiff were entitled to secure interim payment of a contractual consideration before the courts of the place where he is himself domiciled, where those courts have no jurisdiction over the substance of the case under arts 2 to 18 of the convention, and thereafter to have the order in question recognised and enforced in the defendant's state, the rules of jurisdiction laid down by the convention could be circumvented..
>
> 47. Consequently, interim payment of a contractual consideration does not constitute a provisional measure within the meaning of art 24 unless, first, repayment to the defendant of the sum awarded is guaranteed if the plaintiff is unsuccessful as regards the substance of his claim and, second, the measure sought relates only to specific assets of the defendant located or to be located within the confines of the territorial jurisdiction of the court to which application is made.' (See [1999] All ER (EC) 258 at 287, [1999] QB 1225 at 1257–1258.)

[26] Mr Mostyn also referred us to the earlier case of de Cavel principally since it was authority in relation to matrimonial property. His reliance is on para 8 containing the following short citation:

> 'As provisional protective measures relating to property—such as the affixing of seals or the freezing of assets—can serve to safeguard a variety of rights, their inclusion in the scope of the Convention is determined not by their own nature but by the nature of the rights which they serve to protect.'

[27] On those authorities Mr Mostyn observes that had the wife applied under art 31 of Brussels I (the regulation concerned with maintenance matters) these authorities would have been fatal to her claim. How then can she fare better by relying on art 12 of the Brussels II Regulation?

[28] In summary Mr Mostyn submits—(i) An application for maintenance pending suit clearly cannot be categorised as a protective measure. (ii) Nor can it be categorised as a provisional measure: the wife is penniless and would be quite unable to repay even the first instalment which would have fallen due on 2 December but for this court's stay. (iii) Article 12 is restricted to 'urgent cases'. There was no evidence of urgency in this case and the wife had failed to advance any reason why she had not moved the German court for interim maintenance when present and represented at the hearing on 10 October. The only inference is that her application to the English court had nothing to do with urgency but was founded on a perception that she would be awarded more in London than she would be in Mainz.

[29] Mr Lewis Marks QC in his response concedes that he cannot support the judge's order on the grounds that it constitutes a protective measure. He submits that the order constitutes a provisional measure and relies the Van Uden Maritime BV case as an illustration of the fact that the payment of money can be classified as a provisional order. He says that whilst a guarantee of repayment in civil cases may be a strict requirement there should be no such in family proceedings where the court has a wider interest in justice and the protection of the vulnerable. In the alternative he claims that his client is in a position to guarantee repayment since she is the owner of two flats in the Moscow area. His claim that they had a value of several hundred thousand dollars was modified on instructions to £60,000. Finally Mr Marks submitted that the requirement of urgency was met in the present case since by 23 September the wife's reserves had reduced to £14,000.

[30] In his reply Mr Mostyn was swift to contrast Mr Marks' presentation of the wife's financial circumstances with para 24 of her affidavit of means of 23 September in which the wife had asserted that she owned only one flat, that it was unsaleable and that the transfer of funds from Russia was difficult if not impossible.

[31] I accept the general thrust of Mr Mostyn's submissions. On the facts of this case I am quite clear that the order made by Johnson J on 22 October cannot be classified as a provisional measure. The order to pay at the rate of £150,000 per annum for an indefinite period has a substance and an undefined duration that I would classify as an unwarranted invasion of the proper function of the German judge as the judge of the court first seised. On the facts of this case there are simply no realistic prospects of repayment were the substantive judgment on the merits so to require. Plainly the order cannot be classified as a protective measure, as Mr Marks has sensibly conceded. Finally the order could not possibly be brought within a definition of 'urgent cases'. As Mr Mostyn has pointed out the wife could have had an earlier hearing in Mainz.

[32] However it is necessary to look beyond the facts of the present case to consider more generally the application of arts 11 and 12 to financial claims ancillary to the proceedings for divorce, judicial separation or nullity. Plainly the Brussels II Regulation has no direct application to such claims. In modern times the real issues litigated as a consequence of the breakdown of relationships are usually money and children. In modern times the utility of the power to order maintenance pending suit has much diminished and the right to apply for it is much less often exercised. For those with little means there is the safety net of benefit entitlement. The affluent generally have capital reserves or the ability to borrow. The procedures for the preparation of the substantive financial claims have been streamlined, partly in an attempt to avoid the unnecessary expense of a contested hearing to determine the level of temporary provision only to be followed by a contested hearing to settle the long-term future. In these cases with an international dimension the temptation on the parties first to manoeuvre and then to fight to establish the jurisdiction which one believes will be more generous and the other believes will be less generous need to be firmly kerbed. It does not require great insight to see that a judgment on pending suit provision is likely to impact upon the outcome of the substantive application, even if it does not pre-empt the operation of the alternative jurisdiction. It is manifest, in my judgment, that an application for maintenance pending suit cannot be categorised as a protective measure. The de Cavel and Reichert cases make that plain and the principles there stated should equally be applied to art 12 of the Brussels II Regulation.

[33] I am also myself of the opinion that an application for maintenance pending suit cannot even be categorised as a provisional measure. Over-payments or payments obtained by material non-disclosure are at best given some indirect reflection in a later quantification of substantive orders. Furthermore if the duty to quantify the substantive order is to be discharged in the court of another member state the payee may well escape even that reflection.

[34] If this last point be finely balanced then the balance should in my judgment be settled by a strict construction of art 12 for policy reasons. First we must espouse the regulation and apply it wholeheartedly. We must not take or be seen to take opportunities for usurping the function of the judge in the other member state. Once another jurisdiction is demonstrated to be apparently first seised, this jurisdiction must defer, by holding itself in waiting in case that apparent priority should be disproved or declined. Second one of the primary objectives of the convention is to simplify jurisdictional rules and to eliminate expensive and superfluous litigation. A divorcing couple that has to litigate the consequences of the marital breakdown is not blessed. The couple that first litigates where to litigate might be said to be cursed. In reality it is a curse restricted to the rich. Only they can afford such folly. This case is a paradigm example. Let me assume that the husband is a man of means. The wife is said to be destitute. Yet she has incurred costs here of £153,000, of which only £16,000 has been paid on account. Her solicitors have no security for the payment of the balance of £137,000, billed but unpaid. In that sense they have funded this litigation. The husband's costs are put at £108,000 in this jurisdiction. By contrast the costs in Germany are said to be £11,000 for the wife and £2,600 for the husband. The inevitable comparison should give the specialist practitioners in London pause for thought. All this might perhaps be prevented for the future were this appeal to contribute to the adoption of a narrow construction of art 12 here and in other member states pending a possible future ruling of the Court of Justice of the European Communities.

[35] There is one additional point that arose during the course of debate which I have yet to record. At the date of the hearing before Johnson J the identity of the jurisdiction first seised was disputed both in Germany and in London and determined in neither place. In such circumstances Mr Marks submitted that art 12 would operate as a denial of remedy in both. Of course we are now at the stage where there is a judgment in both jurisdictions establishing Germany as the jurisdiction first seised. But the German judgment is said by Mr Marks to be under appeal and with excellent prospects of success since the wife has Professor Schlosser on her side and he will outweigh the contrary opinion of Professor Danneman. (In this as in other family appeals expert witnesses on issues of law seem still to be available to deliver partisan opinions.) So it is said that until the exhaustion of the appellate process the identity of the court first seised remains undetermined and art 12 available as a defence in both. I would unhesitatingly reject that submission not only on the basis of the judgments recently delivered in Mainz and London but also as things stood at the date of the hearing before Johnson J. There must be a strong presumption that, absent a clear case of irregularity, the court of first issue is the court first seised.

[36] For all those reasons I would allow this appeal and discharge the order for maintenance pending suit. The husband is accordingly relieved from the obligation to make any further payment and is entitled to repayment of or credit for the single payment made prior to the grant of the stay.

LATHAM LJ.

[37] I agree.

LAWRENCE COLLINS J.

[38] I also agree that this appeal should be allowed, and I add these observations because we are differing from a judge with very considerable expertise not only in matrimonial proceedings, but also in cases with an international element. Provisional measures vary from one context to another, and from one country to another, but what they have in common is that their object is to ensure that the rights of parties and the ultimate effectiveness of a judgment are not frustrated by the actions of one party pending resolution of their respective rights. In the international context it is vitally important to ensure that provisional measures are not used to frustrate internationally-agreed principles of jurisdiction.

[39] The important features of this case are that prima facie the German court was seised by the husband on 14 May 2002, a day after he told the wife that he was filing for divorce, and ten days before she filed for divorce in England; that (subject to appeal) the Mainz court has now decided that it was first seised; and that on 13 August 2002 the deputy district judge ordered (in a form embodied in a recital) that pending the husband's application to strike out the English divorce proceedings no steps should be taken in them 'including ancillary relief, save under Article 12 of the Brussels II [Regulation]'.

[40] Article 12 (and the corresponding provisions in art 24 of the Brussels Convention on Jurisdiction and Enforcement of Judgments in Civil and Commercial Matters (as set out in Sch 1 to the Civil Jurisdiction and Judgments Act 1982) (Brussels I) and of the Lugano Convention on Jurisdiction and the Enforcement of Judgments in Civil and Commercial Matters 1988 (as set out in Sch 3C to the Civil Jurisdiction and Judgments Act 1982), and art 31 of Council Regulation (EC) 44/2001) do not, of course, require provisional measures to be taken. They give a power to a court which has no jurisdiction over the substance of the matter if: (a) the measures are provisional measures within the meaning of art 12 and the corresponding provisions; (b) the court has power to grant the measures under national law; (c) the court considers that in the circumstances of the case it is appropriate to grant them; and (d) the case is urgent (which is explicit in art 12, but must be implicit in the corresponding provisions).

[41] Article 12 of the Brussels II Regulation pre-supposes that the court which takes provisional measures is not the court with jurisdiction over the substance of the case. The court which takes the provisional measures is therefore acting in support of the main litigation. So in Reichert v Dresdner Bank AG (No 2) Case C-261/90 [1992] ECR I-2149 the Court of Justice of the European Communities held that art 24 referred to measures which were intended to preserve a factual or legal situation so as to safeguard rights the recognition of which was being sought elsewhere from the court having jurisdiction over the substance of the matter (para 34).

[42] Ever since Brussels I came into force in 1973 there has been controversy over whether orders for provisional payments (especially of damages) are within the scope of art 24. The principal objections to them were: (a) that they involved a preliminary determination of the merits of the case by the court purporting to exercise jurisdiction under art 24, when ex hypothesi the jurisdiction to determine the merits was vested in the court with jurisdiction over the substance; and (b) that in substance such orders granted the party some or all of the relief which he was only entitled to seek in the country with jurisdiction over the substance. The second objection, but not the first, has been met (at least in cases relating to contractual claims) by the ruling in Van Uden Maritime BV (t/a Van Uden Africa Line) v Kommanditgesellschaft in Firma Deco-Line Case C-391/95 [1999] All ER (EC) 258 at 287, [1999] QB 1225 at 1257–1258 (para 47) (confirmed in Mietz v Intership Yachting Sneek BV Case C-99/96 [1999] ECR I-2299) that the court taking provisional measures must therefore impose conditions or stipulations so as to guarantee their provisional or protective character, ie it must ensure that repayment to the defendant is assured if the plaintiff is ultimately unsuccessful in the main proceedings abroad, and so not pre-empt the effect of the ultimate decision of the court with jurisdiction over the substance. a

[43] I agree with Thorpe LJ, that in the light of the order which was made on 13 August 2002, there are no grounds for a successful argument that the order in this case (especially when two-thirds of it was to provide funds for litigation at the rate of £8,000 per month) could legitimately have been made under art 12. b

Appeal allowed.

James Brooks Barrister.

Anton Durbeck GmbH v Den Norske Bank ASA

[2003] EWCA Civ 147

COURT OF APPEAL, CIVIL DIVISION

LORD PHILLIPS OF WORTH MATRAVERS MR, BROOKE AND LAWS LJJ

3 FEBRUARY 2003

Conflict of laws – Jurisdiction – Civil jurisdiction – Special jurisdiction as regards dispute arising out of the operations of a branch, agency or other establishment – Civil Jurisdiction and Judgments Act 1982, Sch 3C, art 5(5).

The defendant, a Norwegian bank with a branch in London, agreed to provide a loan to three borrowing companies for the purchase or refinancing of three vessels. The security for the loan included mortgages on each vessel. The loan was entered into and administered by the London branch of the defendant and the loan agreement was governed by English law. A cargo of bananas was loaded on board one of the vessels for delivery to the claimant, a German company, in Europe. Shortly thereafter the vessel was arrested in Panama in an action in rem against the vessel commenced by the defendant on the instructions of its London branch. The London branch had given power of attorney to Panamanian lawyers to enable them make the arrest. The defendant claimed that part of the loan was outstanding. The claimant considered that the cargo was a constructive total loss and it was discharged overboard at sea. The vessel was sold by order of the Panamanian court and the claimant commenced proceedings in rem in Panama against the proceeds of sale, claiming damages for breach of the contract of carriage. The defendant applied in Panama to commence an action for a declaration that it was not liable to the claimant. The claimant thereupon brought proceedings against the defendant in England. The Panamanian court subsequently gave permission to the defendant to bring its claim for a declaration of non-liability and the defendant applied for an order setting aside the claim form in the instant action on the ground that the English court did not have jurisdiction to hear and determine the claim, alternatively for an order that the proceedings be stayed in favour of Panama on the ground of forum non conveniens. The judge held that the court had no jurisdiction to hear the claim, but indicated that if he had held that the court did have jurisdiction, he would have granted a stay. The claimant appealed, arguing that the provisions of art 5(5)[a] of the Lugano Convention on Jurisdiction and the Enforcement of Judgments in Civil and Commercial Matters (as set out in Sch 3C to the Civil Jurisdiction and Judgments Act 1982) (which provided that a person domiciled in a contracting state might, in another contracting state, be sued as regarded a 'dispute arising out of the operations of a branch' in the courts for the place in which the branch was situated) conferred jurisdiction on the English courts in the instant case. The claimant would also have wished to challenge the jurisdiction to stay the proceedings if they were properly founded under the convention, but accepted that binding authority precluded it from doing so.

a Article 5(5) is set out at [11], below

Held – (1) For jurisdiction to be conferred by art 5(5) of the convention, there had to be such nexus between the operations of the branch and the dispute as to render it natural to describe the dispute as one that had arisen out of the operations of the branch. Where the claim was in contract, that nexus could be derived from the negotiations between the claimant and the branch that gave rise to the contractual obligation the alleged breach of which was the subject of the dispute. Where the claim was in tort or delict, however, there would be no such nexus. The events that gave rise to liability in tort could vary very widely and it was not, therefore, desirable to formulate any specific test for determining whether a dispute had arisen out of the activities of a branch, since that would depend on the particular facts of each case. In the instant case, the activities which had given rise to the dispute had arisen out of London banking business conducted by the defendant's London branch. The loan in respect of which the security over the vessel had been taken had been negotiated in London; the decision to enforce the security had been taken in London; and the London branch had given instructions to enforce the security and the power of attorney to enable it to be done. Giving the words of art 5(5) their natural meaning, the dispute in the instant case had arisen out of the activities of the London branch and the English courts therefore had jurisdiction (see [40], [41], [46], [47], [50], [51], below); Lloyd's Register of Shipping v Société Campenon Bernard Case C-439/93 [1995] All ER (EC) 531 applied.

(2) It was not open to the claimant to challenge the decision of the decision of the judge to stay the proceedings in favour of Panama on the basis that it was made without jurisdiction. The court was bound by authority to hold that the judge had jurisdiction to stay the proceedings (see [48]–[51], below); Ace Insurance SA-NV v Zurich Insurance Co [2001] 1 All ER (Comm) 802 followed.

Notes

For matters giving rise to special jurisdiction, see 8(1) Halsbury's Laws (4th edn reissue) para 643.

For the Civil Jurisdiction and Judgments Act 1982, Sch 3C, art 5, see 11 Halsbury's Statutes (4th edn) (2000 reissue) 1206.

Cases referred to in judgments

Ace Insurance SA-NV v Zurich Insurance Co [2001] EWCA Civ 173, [2001] 1 All ER (Comm) 802.

Agnew v Lansförsäkringsbølagens AB [2000] 1 All ER 737, [2001] 1 AC 223, [2000] 2 WLR 497, HL.

Hill (Edwin) & Partners (a firm) v First National Finance Corp plc [1988] 3 All ER 801, [1989] 1 WLR 225, CA.

Kalfelis v Bankhaus Schröder Münchmeyer Hengst & Co Case 189/87 [1988] ECR 5565, ECJ.

Kleinwort Benson Ltd v Glasgow City Council [1997] 4 All ER 641, [1999] 1 AC 153, [1997] 3 WLR 923, HL.

Lloyd's Register of Shipping v Société Campenon Bernard Case C-439/93 [1995] All ER (EC) 531, [1995] ECR I-961, ECJ.

Martin Peters Bauunternehmung GmbH v Zuid Nederlandse Aannemers Vereniging Case 34/82 [1983] ECR 987, ECJ.

Myrto, The [1977] 2 Lloyd's Rep 243; varied [1978] 1 Lloyd's Rep 11, CA.

Kaliningrad and Nadezhda Krupskaya, The [1997] 2 Lloyd's Rep 35.

Schotte SAR GmbH v Parfums Rothschild SARL Case 218/86 [1987] ECR 4905, ECJ.

Somafer SA v Saar-Ferngas AG Case 33/78 [1978] ECR 2183, ECJ.

Case referred to in skeleton arguments

Harrods (Buenos Aires) Ltd, Re (No 2) [1991] 4 All ER 348, [1992] Ch 72, [1991] 3 WLR 397, CA.

Appeal

Anton Durbeck GmbH appealed from the order of Nigel Teare QC sitting as an additional judge of the Queen's Bench Division dated 13 June 2002 ([2002] EWHC 1173, [2002] All ER (D) 67 (Jun)) that the court had no jurisdiction to entertain its claim against the defendant, Den Norske Bank ASA. The facts are set out in the judgment of Lord Phillips of Worth Matravers MR.

Nigel Meeson QC (instructed by Swinnerton Moore) for the claimants.

Luke Parsons (instructed by Stephenson Harwood) for the defendants.

LORD PHILLIPS OF WORTH MATRAVERS MR.

[1] This is an appeal by a German company (the claimants) from the judgment of Mr Nigel Teare QC sitting as an additional judge of the Queen's Bench Division dated 13 June 2002 ([2002] EWHC 1173, [2002] All ER (D) 67 (Jun)). The judge held that the court had no jurisdiction to entertain the claim which the claimants seek to bring against a Norwegian company (the defendants).

[2] The appeal raises two issues of general importance on which the judge gave permission to appeal. The first is whether the provisions of art 5(5) of the Lugano Convention on Jurisdiction and the Enforcement of Judgments in Civil and Commercial Matters 1988 (as set out in Sch 3C to the Civil Jurisdiction and Judgments Act 1982) (the Lugano Convention) confer jurisdiction on the English court. The second is whether, if the English court has jurisdiction under art 5(5), it has jurisdiction to stay the proceedings under the doctrine known in the jurisprudence of private international law as 'forum non conveniens'. The judge gave a negative answer to the first question. We have to decide whether he was right to do so. Had he not done so, he indicated he would have stayed the proceedings on the ground that Panama and not England was the convenient forum.

[3] The claimants would wish to challenge his jurisdiction to stay the proceedings if they were properly founded under the Lugano Convention. They accept, however, that binding authority precludes them from doing so in this court. If they win on the first point, they accept that they must lose on the second, but will seek permission to appeal to the House of Lords.

[4] I wish at the outset to pay tribute to the admirable clarity of the judgment below. I could not improve upon, and will gratefully incorporate, some of the early passages of the judgment.

THE CLAIM

[5] The claim which the claimants seek to bring against the defendants is an action in tort based on the line of authorities ending with The Myrto [1977] 2 Lloyd's Rep 243. It is alleged that the defendants, who were mortgagees of the vessel Tropical Reefer, wrongly interfered with the claimants' contracts for the carriage of a cargo of bananas by arresting the vessel in Panama in or about July 2001. The defendants contend that the principle set out in The Myrto conflicts with the principle that a secured creditor is entitled to enforce his security without regard to the effects on third parties. On that account The Myrto is not to be followed. They rely on Edwin Hill & Partners (a firm) v First National Finance Corp plc [1988] 3 All ER 801, [1989] 1 WLR 225 and The Kaliningrad and Nadezhda Krupskaya [1997] 2 Lloyd's Rep 35. As the judge observed, the merits of this dispute do not need to be considered at this stage.

THE FACTS

[6] By a loan agreement dated 1 December 1997, the defendants, who are a Norwegian bank with a branch in London, agreed to provide a loan of $US 6m to three borrowing companies for the purchase or refinancing of three vessels, Spring Reefer, Blue Reefer and Tropical Reefer. The security for the loan included mortgages on each vessel. The ultimate beneficial owners of the vessels and the managers of the vessels were Cuban. The loan was entered into by, and administered from, the London branch of the defendants. The loan agreement was governed by English law. The mortgages and the deeds of covenant which regulated them were subject to the law of Cyprus.

[7] Between 10 and 16 July 2001 a cargo of bananas was loaded on board Tropical Reefer in Guayaquil and Puerto Bolivar, Ecuador, for shipment to Europe. The bananas were to be delivered to the claimants who purchased them for $US 1,192,013.

[8] On 24 July 2001 Tropical Reefer was arrested in Panama in an action in rem against the vessel commenced by the defendants on the instructions of their London branch, having received approval from head office in Oslo. The defendants claim that over $US 2m is outstanding on the loan.

[9] On 10 September 2001 the claimants considered that the cargo of bananas was a constructive total loss and on 12 September 2001 it was discharged overboard at sea. On 16 October 2001 the vessel was sold by order of the Panamanian court. On 22 November 2001 the claimants commenced proceedings in rem in Panama against the proceeds of sale claiming damages for breach of the contract of carriage.

[10] On 19 December 2001 the defendants applied in Panama to commence an action for a declaration that they were not liable to the claimants. On 20 December 2001 the claimants issued the claim form in the present action in this court and served it on the London branch of the defendants. On 20 March 2002 the Panamanian court gave permission to the defendants to bring their claim for a declaration of non-liability.

THE LUGANO CONVENTION

[11] The Lugano Convention is incorporated into the domestic law of the United Kingdom by s 3A(1) of the 1982 Act, as amended. The following provisions of the Lugano Convention are relevant:

> 'Section 1—General Provisions
>
> ARTICLE 2
>
> Subject to the provisions of this Convention, persons domiciled in a Contracting State shall, whatever their nationality, be sued in the courts of that State ...

ARTICLE 3

Persons domiciled in a Contracting State may be sued in the courts of another Contracting State only by virtue of the rules set out in Sections 2 to 6 of this Title ...

Section 2—Special Jurisdiction

ARTICLE 5

A person domiciled in a Contracting State may, in another Contracting State, be sued: (1) in matters relating to a contract, in the courts for the place of performance of the obligation in question; in matters relating to individual contracts of employment, this place is that where the employee habitually carries out his work, or if the employee does not habitually carry out his work in any one country, this place shall be the place of business through which he was engaged; (2) in matters relating to maintenance, in the courts for the place where the maintenance creditor is domiciled or habitually resident or, if the matter is ancillary to proceedings concerning the status of a person, in the court which, according to its own law, has jurisdiction to entertain those proceedings, unless that jurisdiction is based solely on the nationality of one of the parties; (3) in matters relating to tort, delict or quasi delict, in the courts for the place where the harmful event occurred; (4) as regards a civil claim for damages or restitution which is based on an act giving rise to criminal proceedings, in the court seised of those proceedings, to the extent that that court has jurisdiction under its own law to entertain civil proceedings; (5) as regards a dispute arising out of the operations of a branch, agency or other establishment, in the courts for the place in which the branch, agency or other establishment is situated.'

THE APPROACH TO THE INTERPRETATION OF ART 5 OF THE LUGANO CONVENTION

[12] Section 3B(2) of the 1982 Act provides that the report on the Lugano Convention by Mr P Jenard and Mr G Möller (OJ 1990 C189 p 57) shall be given such weight as is appropriate when interpreting the Lugano Convention. The material provisions of art 5 of the Lugano Convention are, as is most of the Lugano Convention, in the same terms as those of the earlier Brussels Convention on Jurisdiction and the Enforcement of Judgments in Civil and Commercial Matters 1968 (as set out in Sch 1 to the 1982 Act) (the Brussels Convention). They fall to be interpreted in the same manner. Thus, decisions of the Court of Justice of the European Communities (the European Court) on art 5 of the Brussels Convention apply, and reference may be made to the report of Mr Jenard on the Brussels Convention (OJ 1979 C59 p 1) (see the observations of Lord Hope of Craighead in Agnew v Lansförsäkringsbølagens AB [2000] 1 All ER 737, at 756–757, [2001] 1 AC 223 at 251).

[13] Jenard and Möller set out a number of fundamental principles that apply to the two conventions. The third of these begins with the statement that a defendant's domicile is the point on which the rules on jurisdiction hinge. The fourth principle states that the provisions of art 5 relate to 'proceedings which can be considered as having a particularly close link with the court before which the proceedings are brought'. It describes the provisions of art 5 as special in that both conventions directly specify which court has jurisdiction.

[14] Jenard and Möller have a specific commentary on art 5(5) to which I shall revert when I outline the submissions made by Mr Parsons on behalf of the defendants.

[15] In his report on the Brussels Convention Jenard remarks of art 5 that adoption of the special rule of jurisdiction is justified by the fact that there must be a close connection factor between the dispute and the court with jurisdiction to resolve it. This proposition is echoed by an observation of the European Court in Martin Peters Bauunternehmung GmbH v Zuid Nederlandse Aannemers Vereniging Case 34/82 [1983] ECR 987 at 1001. In Kleinwort Benson Ltd v Glasgow City Council [1997] 4 All ER 641 at 646, [1999] 1 AC 153 at 164, Lord Goff of Chieveley cited the same case in support of the proposition that—

> 'it is clearly recognised that art 5 is in derogation from the basic principle of domicile in art 2 ... and that as a result the provisions of art 5 are to be construed restrictively (see Kalfelis v Bankhaus Schröder Münchmeyer Hengst & Co Case 189/87 [1988] ECR 5565 at 5585 (para 19)).'

THE JUDGE'S FINDINGS IN RELATION TO ART 5(3)

[16] In the court below the claimants argued that they could establish jurisdiction under art 5(3) on the ground that England was the place where the harmful event occurred. The basis of this submission was that the loan and mortgage were transactions of the London branch of the defendants and that the decision of the London branch to enforce the mortgage by arresting the vessel was the event which gave rise to the damage. The judge gave the following reasons for rejecting this submission:

> '[15] In one sense the decision of the branch of the defendants in London can be said to have given rise to and to be the origin of the damage because the arrest is executed pursuant to that decision. However, it can also be said that the arrest is the event which gives rise to the damage and is the origin of the damage because, without the arrest, there would be no interference with the contracts of carriage. Having regard to the principles adumbrated in Kleinwort Benson Ltd v Glasgow City Council [1997] 4 All ER 641, [1999] 1 AC 153 the court should adopt a restrictive approach to the application of art 5 bearing in mind that the defendant can always be sued in his place of domicile. To conclude that the place where the decision is taken to commit a tort is the place where the event which gives rise to the damage occurs rather than the place where the first component of the tort occurs is to adopt a broad approach to art 5(3) rather than a restrictive approach. Further, I do not consider that the place of the decision to arrest can be said to be a "particularly close connecting factor" between the dispute and the English court. It is a connecting factor between the dispute and the English court but in circumstances where the contract of carriage is interrupted in Panama by an arrest in Panama it is not a particularly close connecting factor between the dispute and the English court. For those reasons it seems to me that Panama, rather than London, is the place where the event which gave rise to the damage occurred.'

There is no appeal against this part of the judgment.

THE JUDGE'S FINDINGS IN RELATION TO THE STAY APPLICATION

[17] The following findings of the judge in relation to the stay application have some relevance to this appeal.

> 'WHERE THE TORT WAS COMMITTED
>
> [33] The interference with the contracts of carriage occurred in Panama where the arrest took place and was maintained. The bananas became a constructive total loss by reason of being detained in Panama. I consider that the substance of the tort was committed in Panama.'

[18] Under the Private International Law (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1995 the judge held that the proper law of the tort was the law of Panama.

[19] While some evidence, including evidence as to the state of the loans secured by the vessel, when it was in default and to what extent, would emanate from London, this was not, on the judge's analysis, likely to be a significant factor.

THE JUDGE'S FINDINGS IN RELATION TO ART 5(5)

[20] It was and is common ground that the defendants' London branch was 'a branch, agency or other establishment' within the meaning of art 5(5). The issue was whether the fact that it was a decision taken by the London branch that led to the arrest of the Tropical Reefer in Panama meant that the dispute was one arising out of the operations of the branch. The judge summarised the claimants' submissions ([2002] All ER (D) 67 (Jun) at [24]) as follows:

> '... in circumstances where the loan documentation referred to the defendants as acting through their branch in London, where the notices of default were sent out from London, where correspondence concerning the default was with the branch and its London solicitors, where the instructions to arrest came from London and where the decision to maintain the arrest was taken in London, the action plainly arose from the activities of the defendants' London branch.'

In rejecting the claimants' submissions the judge said:

> '[25] In one sense the dispute can fairly and realistically be said to arise out of the decision to arrest which was taken by the branch of the defendants' in London. However, in another and more restrictive sense the dispute can be said to arise out of the arrest in Panama rather than out of the decision to arrest in London because it is the arrest which causes the interference with the contracts of carriage and hence gives rise to the dispute. Without that interference there would be no dispute. The court is required to give art 5(5) a restrictive construction. Strictly, it is the arrest which gives rise to the dispute. The arrest is an "activity" of the branch but it is an activity in which the branch is "engaged" in Panama rather than in London where the branch is established on behalf of the defendants (using the phraseology of the Somafer case). Furthermore, the connection between the dispute and London, though real, is not as close as that between the dispute and the place of arrest. I do not consider that the connection between the dispute and London can be said to be a "particularly close connecting factor". For these reasons I prefer the submission made on behalf of the defendants.'

The decision to which the judge referred is Somafer SA v Saar-Ferngas AG Case 33/78 [1978] ECR 2183.

SUBMISSIONS MADE TO US

[21] For the claimants, Mr Meeson QC repeated the submissions which had not found favour before the judge. He submitted, in essence, that the words of art 5(5) fell to be given their natural meaning. He accepted that there had to be a link between the activities carried on by the branch and a dispute so that it could properly be said that the dispute was one arising out of the activities of the branch. He submitted, however, that on the facts of this case this requirement was clearly satisfied. The arrest arose out of a London branch loan. It was the London branch which decided to arrest the vessel and it was the London branch which gave power of attorney to the Panamanian lawyers to enable them to arrest the vessel.

[22] For the defendants, Mr Parsons submitted that the judge's analysis was correct. What had to be demonstrated was a link between the dispute and the English court, not merely with the English branch of the bank. To establish such a link, it was necessary that the activities of the branch should constitute an element in the cause of action. Where a claim was brought in tort, the activities of the branch had to have produced the harmful event within the jurisdiction if the link was to be established. Mr Parsons submitted that in the present case there was no link at all between the dispute and the English court. He relied upon the findings made by the judge in relation to the place where the tort was committed and the proper law of the tort to which I have referred at [17], above.

[23] In support of his submissions Mr Parsons relied heavily on the decision in the Somafer case. He accepted that part of the reasoning in that case had not survived the subsequent decision of the European Court in Lloyd's Register of Shipping v Société Campenon Bernard Case C-439/93 [1995] All ER (EC) 531, [1995] ECR I-961. That part, however, related to claims in contract. So far as claims in tort were concerned, the observations of the court in the Somafer case remained authoritative.

[24] Counsels' submissions call for a careful analysis of the effect of the Somafer case and of the Lloyd's Register case. The issue in the Somafer case was whether a company which had its principal place of business in France had a 'branch, agency or other establishment' in Germany within the meaning of art 5(5). The questions referred to the European Court related to the tests to be applied in resolving that issue.

[25] The findings of the court appear from the following paragraphs of their judgment ([1978] ECR 2183 at 2192–2193):

> '11 Having regard to the fact that the concepts referred to give the right to derogate from the principle of jurisdiction of Article 2 of the Convention their interpretation must show without difficulty the special link justifying such derogation. Such special link comprises in the first place the material signs enabling the existence of the branch, agency or other establishment to be easily recognized and in the second place the connexion that there is between the local entity and the claim directed against the parent body established in another Contracting State.
>
> 12 As regards the first issue, the concept of branch, agency or other establishment implies a place of business which has the appearance of permanency, such as the extension of a parent body, has a management and is materially equipped to negotiate business with third parties so that the latter, although knowing that there will if necessary be a legal link with the parent body, the head office of which is abroad, do not have to deal directly with such parent body but may transact business at the place of business constituting the extension.

13 As regards the second issue the claim in the action must concern the operations of the branch, agency or other establishment. This concept of operations comprises on the one hand actions relating to rights and contractual or non-contractual obligations concerning the management properly so-called of the agency, branch or other establishment itself such as those concerning the situation of the building where such entity is established or the local engagement of staff to work there. Further it also comprises those relating to undertakings which have been entered into at the above-mentioned place of business in the name of the parent body and which must be performed in the Contracting State where the place of business is established and also actions concerning non-contractual obligations arising from the activities in which the branch, agency or other establishment within the above defined meaning, has engaged at the place in which it is established on behalf of the parent body. It is in each case for the court before which the matter comes to find the facts whereon it may be established that an effective place of business exists and to determine the legal position by reference to the concept of "operations" as above defined.'

[26] Paragraph 13 appears to be addressing the question of what it is necessary to establish in order to demonstrate the necessary nexus between the operations of the branch and the claim. The court had not been asked to provide guidance on this, but may have been influenced by the opinion of the Advocate General (Mayras) that part of the test of a branch was whether the branch carried out operations that were independent of its parent.

[27] The observations of the court ([1978] ECR 2183 at 2192–2193 (para 13)) appeared severely to circumscribe the effect of art 5(5). It was not enough that the branch should have entered into an undertaking in favour of the claimant if the undertaking was not one which had to be performed in the country where the branch was established. It would seem to follow that, if the claim was in tort, jurisdiction would not lie under art 5(5) unless the activities of the branch constituted or directly brought about the harmful event. It seems to me that, were the observations in the Somafer case (at 2192–2193 (para 13)) to represent the law, they would provide unshakeable support for the conclusion reached by the judge.

[28] In Lloyd's Register of Shipping v Société Campenon Bernard [1995] All ER (EC) 531, [1995] ECR I-961 the Advocate General (Elmer) observed that what the court had to say about 'operations' had been the subject of criticism both in academic writings and in the opinion of the Advocate General (Sir Gordon Slynn) in Schotte SAR GmbH v Parfums Rothschild Sarl Case 218/86 [1987] ECR 4905 at 4914–4915. In that opinion Sir Gordon stated:

'For my part, but for paragraph 13 of the judgment, I would have given "dispute arising out of the operations of a branch" a wider meaning. Equally, but for that paragraph, I would find it difficult to spell out of Article 5(5) the limitation that undertakings entered into "must be performed in the Contracting State where the place of business is established".'

[29] I turn to the facts of the Lloyd's Register case. Lloyd's Register of Shipping is an English registered charity established in London. It maintained a branch in France. Campenon Bernard, a French company, contacted the French branch in order to arrange for the testing of concrete reinforcing steel which it was to use in the construction of a motorway in Kuwait. Following negotiations, in a letter of 3 December 1985, Campenon Bernard placed the order with the French branch of Lloyd's Register. That letter specified that inspection would take place in Spain and would be carried out by the Spanish branch of Lloyd's Register. It also stated that payment would be effected in pesetas. On 9 December 1985 the French branch communicated its acceptance.

[30] Although the Spanish branch of Lloyd's Register issued certificates of compliance, the Kuwait Ministry of Public Works, for whom the concrete was being produced, refused to accept the concrete reinforcing steel on the ground that it did not comply with the United States technical standard.

[31] On 2 February 1988 Campenon Bernard paid the invoice issued by the Spanish branch of Lloyd's Register, having been pressed to do so by the French branch, but without prejudice to its rights. Alleging that Lloyd's Register had wrongly stated that the steel complied with the United States technical standard, it then brought a claim for damages in the Tribunal de Commerce in Paris. Lloyd's Register challenged the jurisdiction.

[32] The Cour d'Appel held that the Tribunal de Commerce had jurisdiction, pursuant to art 5(5). The Cour de Cassation referred to the European Court the question of whether the application of art 5(5) was restricted to cases where the dispute concerned obligations to be performed in the state in which the branch, agency or other establishment was situated. This put in issue the correctness of Somafer SA v Saar-Ferngas AG [1978] ECR 2183 at 2192–2193 (para 13).

[33] In his opinion, the Advocate General (Elmer) observed that the geographical limit imposed by the court in the Somafer case was in the nature of an obiter dictum. He went on to express his own view ([1995] All ER (EC) 531 at 539–540, [1995] ECR I-961 at 971–972):

> '16. ... decisive importance must be attached to the fact that art 5(5) would to all intents and purposes be devoid of independent content if it were applicable only to disputes regarding obligations which must be performed in the contracting state in which the branch, agency or other establishment is situated. The courts for the place of performance of the obligation already have jurisdiction under art 5(1) in matters relating to a contract, and the courts for the place where the harmful event occurred already have jurisdiction under art 5(3) in matters relating to tort, delict or quasi-delict. As emphasised by Campenon Bernard, the United Kingdom, the Greek government and the Commission, with such a limitation of art 5(5) would actually be reduced to cases of choice between several jurisdictions within the individual contracting state.
>
> 17. ... Rather than creating clarity, a geographical limitation such as that at issue raises a series of problems and thus gives rise to legal uncertainty.
>
> 18. Furthermore, art 5(5) serves two purposes. Partly to make it easier for the plaintiff to take proceedings in cases in which there is—"a place of business which has the appearance of permanency, such as the extension of a parent body, has a management and is materially equipped to negotiate business with third parties so that the latter, although knowing that there will if necessary be a legal link with the parent body, the head office of which is abroad, do not have to deal directly with such parent body but may transact business at the place of business constituting the extension" (Somafer [1978] ECR 2183 at 2192 (para 12).) —and partly, as mentioned in the United

Kingdom's observations, to approximate the situation just described to the point of departure of the first paragraph of art 2 of the convention regarding general jurisdiction arising from the domicile of the defendant. For agencies such as those listed in art 5(5)—non-legal persons—there is by definition no such jurisdiction arising from domicile. Article 5(5) should therefore in my view be interpreted according to its clear wording, which entails no geographical limitation.'

[34] The decision of the court echoed the opinion of the Advocate General ([1995] All ER (EC) 531 at 542, [1995] ECR I-961 at 980–981):

'16. First, the actual wording of art 5(5) of the convention in no way requires that the undertakings negotiated by a branch should be performed in the contracting state in which it is established in order for them to form part of its operations.

17. Secondly, the interpretation put forward by the appellant in the main proceedings would render art 5(5) almost wholly redundant. Since art 5(1) already allows the plaintiff to bring an action in contract in the courts for the place of performance of the obligation in question, art 5(5) would duplicate that provision if it applied solely to undertakings entered into by a branch which were to be performed in the contracting state in which the branch was established. At the very most it would create a second head of special jurisdiction where, within the contracting state of the branch, the place of performance of the obligation in question was situated in a judicial area other than that of the branch.

18. Thirdly, it should be noted that an ancillary establishment is a place of business which the appearance of permanency such as the extension of a parent body, has a management and is equipped to negotiate business with third parties so that the latter, although knowing that there will if necessary be a legal link with the parent body, whose seat is in another contracting state, do not have to deal directly with such parent body (see Somafer [1978] ECR 2183 at 2191 (para 12)).

19. A branch, agency or other ancillary establishment within the meaning of art 5(5) is therefore an entity capable of being the principal, or even exclusive, interlocutor for third parties in the negotiation of contracts.

20. There does not necessarily have to be a close link between the entity with which a customer conducts negotiations and places an order and the place where the order will be performed. Accordingly, undertakings may form part of the operations of an ancillary establishment within the meaning of art 5(5) of the convention even though they are to be performed outside the contracting state where it is situated, possibly by another ancillary establishment.

21. That interpretation is, moreover, in conformity with the objective of the special rules of jurisdiction. As the Jenard Report (OJ 1979 C 59, p 22) makes clear, those rules allow the plaintiff to sue the defendant in courts other than those of his domicile because there is a specially close connecting factor between the dispute and the court with jurisdiction to resolve it.

22. In the light of the foregoing considerations, the answer to the question referred by the Cour de Cassation must be that the expression "dispute arising out of the operations of a branch, agency or other establishment" in art 5(5) of the convention does not presuppose that the undertakings in question entered into by the branch in the name of its parent body are to be performed in the contracting state in which the branch is established.' a

[35] Mr Parsons made the following submissions in relation to these two cases. First, he drew our attention to certain passages in Ch VI of the Jenard and Möller report under the heading: 'Judgments of the Court of Justice of the European Communities Concerning the Interpretation of the Brussels Convention of 27 September 1968.' Under the heading 'General' is this paragraph (p 97): b

'As stated in the comments on Protocol 2 (see points 112 and 116) in the negotiations on the Lugano Convention it was agreed that the provisions of the Brussels Convention should be construed as interpreted by the Court of Justice and that the report would mention the various judgments handed down by the Court. This Chapter meets the latter stipulation.' c

[36] Mr Parsons submitted that the effect of this was that the findings in relation to the Brussels Convention of the European Court, as interpreted in the report, should be treated as definitive of the meaning of similar provisions in the Lugano Convention, unless expressly overruled by subsequent decisions of the European Court. d

[37] Next, Mr Parsons referred us to this commentary of the Jenard and Möller report on the Somafer case:

'The Court has given an autonomous interpretation to the concepts of "operations of a branch, agency or other establishment"—(a) the concept of branch, agency or other establishment implies a place of business which has the appearance of permanency, such as the extension of a parent body, has a management and is materially equipped to negotiate business with third parties so that the latter, although knowing that there will if necessary be a legal link with the parent body, the head office of which is abroad, do not have to deal directly with such parent body but may transact business at the place of business constituting the extension; (b) the concept of "operations" comprises—(1) actions relating to rights and contractual or non-contractual obligations concerning the management properly so-called of the agency, branch or other establishment itself such as those concerning the situation of the building where such entity is established or the local engagement of staff to work there, (2) actions relating to undertakings which have been entered into at the above mentioned place of business in the name of the parent body and which must be performed in the Contracting State where the place of business is established, (3) actions concerning non-contractual obligations in which the branch, agency or other establishment has engaged at the place in which it is established on behalf of the parent body.' e f g h

[38] Mr Parsons submitted that this passage made it plain that the Somafer case was intended to be the definitive and exclusive definition of 'operations of a branch, agency or other establishment' that were capable of giving rise to a dispute that fell within the jurisdiction accorded by art 5(5) (see [1978] ECR 2183 at 2192–2193 (para 13)). The adverse comment on the geographical limitation in para 13 made by Advocate General (Sir Gordon Slynn) in Schotte SAR GmbH v Parfums Rothschild SARL Case 218/86 [1987] ECR 4905 was made in relation to a contract case. Advocate General Elmer only described the geographical limit in para 13 of the Somafer case as obiter dictum in so far as it was made in relation to j contract disputes in a case concerned with non-contractual obligations. The Somafer case remained authority for the proposition that, in a non-contractual claim, the activities of the branch had to bring about the harmful event giving rise to the dispute within the jurisdiction of the court if art 5(5) were to be engaged.

[39] I consider this argument to be over-sophisticated and unsound. The effect of decisions of the European Court on provisions which are common to the Brussels and Lugano Conventions should not be artificially circumscribed in the manner suggested by Mr Parsons. They must be given their natural effect.

[40] In my judgment, the decision in Lloyd's Register of Shipping v Société Campenon Bernard [1995] All ER (EC) 531, [1995] ECR I-961 robs the geographical limit in para 13 of the Somafer case of such authority as it might otherwise have had, bearing in mind that it was an obiter dictum on a matter not referred to the court and in respect of which no submissions had been made to it. This must be true of claims in tort as well as claims in contract. What the Lloyd's Register case demonstrates is that there must be such nexus between the branch and the dispute as to render it natural to describe the dispute as one which has arisen out of the activities of the branch. Where the claim is in contract, that nexus can be derived from the negotiations between the claimant and the branch which gave rise to the contractual obligation the alleged breach of which is the subject of the dispute. Where the claim is in tort or delict, there will be no such nexus.

[41] The events which give rise to liability in tort can vary widely—compare the liability of the publishers of a defamatory book with the vicarious liability of a company for the negligent driving of an employee in the course of his employment. In these circumstances, I do not think it desirable to attempt to formulate any test to determine whether a dispute has arisen out of the activities of a branch. The answer to that question must depend on the facts of the individual case. I would, however, venture some general observations.

[42] As Laws LJ observed in the course of argument, para (5) of art 5 differs from the other paragraphs of that article. The other paragraphs address different specific causes of action. Paragraph 5 is of general application. It would seem designed to cover situations where the connection of the claim with the activities of the branch, agency or other establishment is such to make it appropriate in the interests of the due administration of justice to permit suit to be brought in the state where the branch, agency or other establishment is situated.

[43] I would endorse the conclusions of the Advocate General in the Lloyd's Register case that one purpose of art 5(5) is to approximate the place where a branch carries on business with third parties to the point of departure of art 2(1). Article 5(5) provides a quasi-defendant's domicile basis for jurisdiction. Once the existence of an entity which qualifies as a 'branch, agency or other establishment' of the defendant is established in a state, it accords with the due administration of justice from the viewpoint of the defendant, the claimant and the court to permit suit to be brought in that state in relation to disputes which arise out of the activities of the branch, agency or establishment, regardless of where those activities take effect.

[44] I have set out positive reasons for giving art 5(5) a meaning which is not subject to the geographical limitation suggested by the court in Somafer SA v Saar-Ferngas AG [1978] ECR 2183. There are, however, powerful negative reasons which point in the same direction. In the Lloyd's Register case, which was a case involving contract, the court observed that the Somafer interpretation would render art 5(5) almost wholly redundant having regard to the provisions of art 5(1). Advocate General Elmer made a similar observation in relation to matters relating to tort, delict or quasi-delict, having regard to the provisions of art 5(3). The only such claim that Mr Parsons could suggest in respect of which, on his interpretation, art 5(5) would make a difference was a claim in restitution.

[45] In considering the application of art 5(5), the judge considered it pertinent to compare the connection between the dispute and London with the connection between the dispute and Panama. Mr Meeson suggested that this was not a helpful comparison. Rather, the judge should have compared the connection between the dispute and London with the connection between the dispute and Norway. Had he done so, he would have reached the conclusion that this was a case in which it could properly be said that the dispute arose out of the activities of the defendants' London branch.

[46] I think that Mr Meeson is correct. The actions giving rise to the dispute arose out of London banking business, conducted by the defendants' London branch. The loan in respect of which the security over the vessel was taken was negotiated in London. The decision to enforce the security was taken in London. The London branch gave instructions to enforce the security and the power of attorney to enable it to be done. Giving the words of art 5(5) their natural meaning, the dispute in this case has arisen out of the activities of the London branch. It is true that in this case these factors do not point to London as the most convenient forum. If the jurisdiction to stay is soundly based, the action will be fought in Panama and not here. It seems to me, however, that if considerations of, or akin to, domicile are to govern the available forum, it makes good sense and accords with the due administration of justice that London should be available to the parties as an alternative to Norway.

[47] For these reasons I would allow the first limb of the appeal.

[48] That leaves the judge's alternative decision that the decisions should be stayed in favour of Panama. No attack has been made on that decision on the merits. It is not open to the claimants to challenge that decision in this court on the basis it was made without jurisdiction. It is common ground that we are bound by the decision in Ace Insurance Co v Zurich Insurance Co [2001] 1 Lloyd's Rep 618 to hold that the judge had jurisdiction to stay the proceedings.

[49] Accordingly, I would replace the judge's order with one staying the action. If my Lords, or at least one of them, are in agreement, it will remain to consider the application that I anticipate will follow for permission to appeal to the House of Lords against the imposition of a stay.

BROOKE LJ.

[50] I agree.

LAWS LJ.

[51] I also agree.

Appeal allowed in part. Permission to appeal to the House of Lords granted.

Kate O'Hanlon Barrister.

R v Drew

[2003] UKHL 25

HOUSE OF LORDS

LORD BINGHAM OF CORNHILL, LORD STEYN, LORD HUTTON, LORD MILLETT AND LORD RODGER OF EARLSFERRY

26, 27 MARCH, 8 MAY 2003

Sentence – Life imprisonment – Life imprisonment for second serious offence – Whether imposition on mentally ill offender of automatic life sentence for second serious offence compatible with provisions of human rights convention – Mental Health Act 1983, s 37 – Crime (Sentences) Act 2000, s 109 – Human Rights Act 1998, Sch 1, Pt I, art 3.

The appellant was convicted in 1995 of two offences which were 'serious offences' within s 109[a] of the Powers of Criminal Courts (Sentencing) Act 2000. Under s 109, other than in 'exceptional circumstances', a court was required to impose an automatic life sentence on a person convicted of a serious offence committed after September 1997, who had previously been convicted of another serious offence. In 1999 the appellant committed another serious offence (wounding with intent to cause grievous bodily harm) to which he pleaded guilty. The appellant was known to be mentally ill; he displayed psychotic symptoms and messianic delusions whilst in custody following his arrest, and was then admitted to a psychiatric hospital. However, he was not insane when he committed the 1999 offence, nor was he unfit to be tried when he pleaded guilty and appeared for sentence. The sentencing judge would have accepted a psychiatric recommendation that a hospital order be made under s 37[b] of the Mental Health Act 1983, together with an unlimited restriction order, but was precluded from making such an order since s 37 of the 1983 Act did not apply to a person convicted of an offence punishable by imprisonment where the sentence, inter alia, fell to be imposed under s 109 of the 2000 Act . The appellant was accordingly sentenced to life imprisonment with a minimum term of two years and eight months. His condition deteriorated sharply in prison without medication which had been prescribed for him in hospital but which the prison could not prescribe. After eight days the Secretary of State for the Home Department authorised his transfer from prison to the hospital, under his power contained in s 47[c] of the 1983 Act to direct the transfer of an imprisoned offender whose mental condition required treatment in hospital. The transfer was coupled with a restriction order. The appellant appealed against sentence on the grounds that it was wrong in principle to impose a punitive sentence of imprisonment on a person who was mentally ill and so not criminally culpable; that the imposition of an automatic life sentence on such a person was 'inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment' prohibited by art 3[d] of the European

a Section 109, so far as material, is set out at [5], below

b Section 37, so far as material, is set out at [8], below

c Section 47, so far as material, provides: '(1) If in the case of a person serving a sentence of imprisonment the Secretary of State is satisfied … (a) that the said person is suffering from mental illness, psychopathic disorder, severe mental impairment or mental impairment; and (b) that the mental disorder … is of a nature or degree which makes it appropriate for him to be detained in a hospital for medical treatment … the Secretary of State may … by warrant direct that that person be removed to and detained in such hospital …'

Convention on Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms 1950 (as set out in Sch 1 to the Human Rights Act 1998); and that s 109 of the 2000 Act and s 37 of the 1983 Act were, accordingly, incompatible with art 3. The Court of Appeal dismissed the appeal and the appellant's subsequent appeal against that decision was considered by an appellate committee of the House of Lords.

Held – (1) Under both national law and the jurisprudence of the European Court of Human Rights a sentence of imprisonment could be passed on a mentally disordered defendant who was criminally responsible and fit to be tried. In the instant case the appellant had not claimed to be unfit to plead and had advanced no defence of insanity. His mental illness could properly be relied on as mitigating the criminality of his conduct but not as absolving him from all responsibility for it (see [16], [17], below); R v Birch (1989) 11 Cr App R (S) 202 and X v UK App No 5229/71 (5 October 1972, unreported) considered.

(2) The effect of s 109 of the 2000 Act read with s 37 of the 1983 Act was not a ground for challenging the compatibility of those sections with art 3 of the convention as their effect was not to deny a mentally disordered defendant qualifying for an automatic life sentence the medical treatment which his condition required, since the Secretary of State was obliged to act compatibly with the convention, and s 47 of the 1983 Act gave him power to transfer a defendant sentenced to imprisonment to a hospital where he would receive any medical treatment he needed. In the instant case, while the interruption of the appellant's medication during the eight days following sentence had caused him ill effects, those were not of sufficient severity to engage the operation of art 3 (see [18], [19], below); Ireland v UK (1978) 2 EHRR 25 and Aerts v Belgium (1998) 5 BHRC 382 considered.

(3) In a case where the evidence showed that the assumption on which s 109 was founded, that a defendant who had been convicted of two qualifying serious offences presented such a serious and continuing danger to the safety of the public that he should be liable to indefinite incarceration, was soundly based, no issue of incompatibility with the convention was likely to arise. In the case of a defendant who appeared to present no danger to the public his convention rights would not be contravened if courts applied the section, using their powers where the circumstances were exceptional, so that it did not result in offenders being sentenced to life imprisonment when they did not constitute a significant risk to the public. Moreover, that approach applied equally to a mentally disordered defendant, relieving the court of the need to impose an automatic life sentence, and permitting the making of a hospital order, if it were established that there was no need to protect the public against him in future. Thus a complaint of arbitrariness and excessive force which could otherwise be made under the convention would be met first, by pointing to the court's release from the obligation to impose a life sentence where a defendant was shown not to be dangerous and, secondly, where a life sentence was passed, by the imposition of a minimum term reflecting the culpability of the individual defendant. Accordingly, the appeal would be dismissed (see [20], [23], below); R v Offen [2001] 2 All ER 154 approved.

d Article 3 provides: 'No one shall be subjected to torture or to inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment.'

Notes

For the prohibition on inhuman and degrading treatment or punishment, see 8(2) Halsbury's Laws (4th edn reissue) para 124, and for automatic life sentences for a second serious offence, see Supp to 11(2) Halsbury's Laws (4th edn reissue) para 1202B.1.

For the Mental Health Act 1983, s 37, see 28 Halsbury's Statutes (4th edn) (2001 reissue) 895.

For the Powers of Criminal Courts (Sentencing) Act 2000, s 109, see 12 Halsbury's Statutes (4th edn) (2002 reissue) 1885.

Cases cited in the report

Aerts v Belgium (1998) 5 BHRC 382, ECt HR.

A-G's Ref No 32 of 1996 (R v Whittaker) [1997] 1 Cr App R (S) 261, CA.

Ireland v UK (1978) 2 EHRR 25, [1978] ECHR 5310/71, ECt HR.

Keenan v UK (2001) 10 BHRC 319, ECt HR.

R (on the application of Von Brandenburg (aka Hanley)) v East London and The City Mental Health NHS Trust [2001] EWCA Civ 239, (2001) 61 BMLR 206, [2002] QB 235, [2001] 3 WLR 588.

R v Birch (1989) 11 Cr App R (S) 202, CA.

R v Buckland [2000] 1 All ER 907, [2000] 1 WLR 1262, CA.

R v H [2003] UKHL 1, [2003] 1 All ER 497, [2003] 1 WLR 411.

R v Hodgson (1967) 52 Cr App R 113, CA.

R v Howell (1985) 7 Cr App R (S) 360, CA.

R v Hutchinson [1997] 2 Cr App R (S) 60, CA.

R v Lichniak, R v Pyrah [2002] UKHL 47, [2002] 4 All ER 1122, [2002] 3 WLR 1834.

R v London South and South West Region Mental Health Review Tribunal, ex p Moyle [2000] Lloyd's Rep Med 143.

R v Mbatha (1985) 7 Cr App R (S) 373, CA.

R v Mitchell [1997] 1 Cr App R (S) 90, CA.

R v Offen [2001] 2 All ER 154, [2001] 1 WLR 253, CA.

R v Pither (1979) 1 Cr App R (S) 209, CA.

R v Wilkinson (1983) 5 Cr App R (S) 105, CA.

X v UK App No 5229/71 (5 October 1972, unreported), E Com HR.

Cases referred to in list of authorities

Doody v Secretary of State for the Home Dept [1993] 3 All ER 92, sub nom R v Secretary of State for the Home Dept, ex p Doody [1994] 1 AC 531, [1993] 3 WLR 154, HL.

Guzzardi v Italy (1980) 3 EHRR 333, [1980] ECHR 7367/76, ECt HR.

Johnson v UK (1997) 27 EHRR 296, [1997] ECHR 22520/93, ECt HR.

Pepper (Inspector of Taxes) v Hart [1993] 1 All ER 42, [1993] AC 593, [1992] 3 WLR 1032, HL.

R (on the application of Anderson) v Secretary of State for the Home Dept [2001] EWHC Admin 181, [2001] HRLR 693; affd [2001] EWCA Civ 1698, [2002] 2 WLR 1143; rvsd in part [2002] UKHL 46, [2002] 4 All ER 1089, [2003] 1 AC 837, [2002] 3 WLR 1800.

R v A [2001] 1 WLR 789.

R v Fairhurst [1996] 1 Cr App R (S) 242, CA.

R v Fleming (1993) 14 Cr App R (S) 151, CA.

R v Haynes (1981) 3 Cr App R (S) 330, CA.

R v Kelly, A-G's Ref (No 53 of 1998) [1999] 2 All ER 13, [2000] QB 198, [1999] 2 WLR 1100, CA.

R v Morris [1961] 2 All ER 672, [1961] 2 QB 237, [1961] 2 WLR 986, CA.
R v Moses [1996] 2 Cr App R (S) 407, CA.
R v Newman (2000) 57 BMLR 123, CA.
R v Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions, ex p Spath Holme Ltd [2001] 1 All ER 195, [2001] 2 AC 349, [2001] 2 WLR 15, HL.
R v Secretary of State for the Home Dept, ex p Hickey (No 1), R v Secretary of State for the Home Dept, ex p H, F, B and W [1995] 1 All ER 479, [1995] QB 43, [1994] 3 WLR 1110, CA.
Weeks v UK (1987) 10 EHRR 293, [1987] ECHR 9787/82, ECt HR.
Winterwerp v Netherlands (1979) 2 EHRR 387, [1979] ECHR 6301/73, ECt HR.
X v UK (1981) 4 EHRR 188, [1981] ECHR 7215/75, ECt HR.

Appeal against sentence

The appellant, Anthony James Drew, appealed with permission of the Appeal Committee of the House of Lords given on 7 October 2002 from the order of the Court of Appeal (Kennedy LJ, Bell and Cooke JJ) ([2001] EWCA Crim 2861, [2002] 2 Cr App R (S) 189) on 19 December 2001 dismissing his appeal against the sentence of life imprisonment with a specified period of three years and eight months imposed on him on 1 March 2001 under the statutory predecessor of s 109 of the Powers of Criminal Courts (Sentencing) Act 2000 following his conviction on 1 August 2000 of wounding with intent to do grievous bodily harm contrary to s 18 of the Offences against the Person Act 1861. The court certified that the following points of law of general public importance were involved in its decision: '(i) The Appellant was sentenced to a term of life imprisonment under s 109 of the [2000 Act]. He had been mentally ill at the time of the offence and was still so at the date of sentence. Had he not been liable to an "automatic life sentence" then the Appellant would have been made the subject of a hospital order subject to an indefinite restriction upon his release; (ii) Does the "automatic life sentence" in the case of an offender such as the Appellant amount to inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment in the terms of Article 3 of the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms?; (iii) Is the requirement that the Court shall impose an "automatic life sentence" upon an offender such as the Appellant incompatible with Article 3 of the Convention'? The Secretary of State for the Home Department was joined as an interested party to the appeal under s 5 of the Human Rights Act 1998. The facts are set out in the report of the Appellate Committee.

Huw Davies QC and Andrew Jones (instructed by Hornby Baker Jones & Wood, Newport) for the appellant.
Bruce Houlder QC and Duncan Penny (instructed by the Crown Prosecution Service) for the Crown.
David Perry (instructed by the Treasury Solicitor) for the Secretary of State.

Their Lordships took time for consideration.

8 May 2003. The following report was delivered.

LORD BINGHAM OF CORNHILL.

[1] This is the considered opinion of the Committee.

[2] At issue in this appeal against sentence is the compatibility of s 109 of the Powers of Criminal Courts (Sentencing) Act 2000 and s 37 of the Mental Health Act 1983, when applied to mentally ill offenders, with art 3 of the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms 1950 (as set out in Sch 1 to the Human Rights Act 1998).

[3] The appellant was born on 1 May 1963. His career after leaving school was marked by criminal activity and drug abuse. On 4 August 1995 he was convicted of two offences of causing grievous bodily harm with intent contrary to s 18 of the Offences against the Person Act 1861. He was sentenced to concurrent terms of six years' imprisonment for these offences and was released in April 1999. On 19 November 1999 he committed an offence of wounding with intent to cause grievous bodily harm contrary to s 18 of the 1861 Act. He pleaded guilty to this offence (and also to a more minor offence, irrelevant for present purposes) in the Crown Court at Cardiff on 1 August 2000. This wounding offence was a 'serious offence' for purposes of s 2 of the Crime (Sentences) Act 1997 and s 109 of the 2000 Act which replaced s 2.

[4] The appellant was not insane when he committed the 1999 offence, nor was he unfit to be tried when he pleaded guilty in the Crown Court and (later) appeared for sentence. But he was known to be mentally ill. While in custody following his arrest in November 1999 he manifested psychotic symptoms and messianic delusions and in June 2000 was admitted to a psychiatric hospital where, with treatment, his mental condition improved. Two approved consultant psychiatrists were of opinion that he was suffering from schizophrenia and would be a serious danger to the public if released. They recommended that a hospital order be made under s 37 of the 1983 Act with a restriction on his release, unlimited in time, under s 41 of the Act. This was a recommendation which the Recorder of Cardiff, before whom the appellant appeared for sentence on 1 March 2001, would have accepted had s 109 of the 2000 Act allowed him to do so. But the offences of which the appellant had been convicted in 1995, like that to which he had pleaded guilty in August 2000, were 'serious offences' within the meaning of s 2 and s 109 of the 1997 and 2000 Acts respectively, and s 109 of the 2000 Act, read with s 37 of the 1983 Act, precluded the making of such an order in the absence of exceptional circumstances. So, as the section required, the Recorder imposed a sentence of life imprisonment, although he did so with an expression of regret. He fixed the minimum term to be served at two years and eight months' imprisonment. On being sentenced the appellant was returned to prison where his mental condition deteriorated sharply for want of a drug which had been prescribed for him in hospital but which the prison could not prescribe. On 9 March 2001, following urgent and repeated representations by HMP Cardiff where the appellant was confined, the Home Secretary, acting with expedition, authorised the transfer of the appellant from prison to the psychiatric hospital where he had been treated before. This transfer, made under ss 47 and 49 of the 1983 Act, took effect at once, eight days after sentence. The interruption in the appellant's medication had a harmful effect on his mental health and it took several months after his return to hospital for the doctors to gain full control of his symptoms.

[5] Stripped to its bare essentials, the argument of Mr Huw Davies QC for the appellant rested on three main propositions. (1) It is wrong in principle to impose a punitive sentence of imprisonment on those who, like the appellant, are mentally ill and so not criminally culpable. Accordingly (2) the imposition of an automatic life sentence on such defendants is 'inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment' within the unqualified prohibition in art 3 of the convention. Therefore (3) ss 109 and 37 of the 2000 and 1983 Acts respectively, in requiring imposition of such a sentence in cases such as the appellant's, even where the offender is mentally ill, are incompatible with art 3 of the convention. Before considering these contentions it is necessary to cite the key provisions to which they relate.

SECTION 109 OF THE 2000 ACT

Section 109(1)–(4) provide as follows:

> '(1) This section applies where—(a) a person is convicted of a serious offence committed after 30th September 1997; and (b) at the time when that offence was committed, he was 18 or over and had been convicted in any part of the United Kingdom of another serious offence.
>
> (2) The court shall impose a life sentence, that is to say—(a) where the offender is 21 or over when convicted of the offence mentioned in subsection (1)(a) above, a sentence of imprisonment for life, (b) where he is under 21 at that time, a sentence of custody for life under section 94 above, unless the court is of the opinion that there are exceptional circumstances relating to either of the offences or to the offender which justify its not doing so.
>
> (3) Where the court does not impose a life sentence, it shall state in open court that it is of that opinion and what the exceptional circumstances are.
>
> (4) An offence the sentence for which is imposed under subsection (2) above shall not be regarded as an offence the sentence for which is fixed by law.'

There follows in sub-s (5) a list of criminal offences all of which are serious offences for purposes of the section if committed in England and Wales. The list includes offences related to murder (although not murder itself, for which a mandatory life sentence is prescribed elsewhere), manslaughter, offences under s 18 of the 1861 Act, rape and attempted rape, unlawful sexual intercourse with a girl aged under 13, certain of the most serious firearms offences and robbery involving the possession of a firearm or imitation firearm. All are offences carrying a maximum penalty of imprisonment for life. In sub-ss (6) and (7) the section contains broadly comparable lists of serious offences committed in Scotland and Northern Ireland.

[6] Section 109 reproduces (in its application to England and Wales) s 2 of the 1997 Act. The enactment of s 2 was preceded by a White Paper (Protecting the Public: The Government's Strategy on Crime in England and Wales (March 1996) (Cm 3190)), Ch 10 of which was entitled 'Automatic Life Sentences for Serious Violent and Sex Offenders' and explained the rationale of the government's proposal:

> '10.3. A wide range of serious violent and sex offences carry a maximum sentence of life imprisonment, including manslaughter, rape and the most serious woundings. In these cases the court has the discretion to impose a life sentence either because the offence is so serious that it merits the maximum available penalty, or because the trial judge feels unable to determine when it will be safe to release the offender. In either case, the trial judge will specify the tariff which must be served, and at the end of that period the Parole Board will determine whether the offender can safely be released.
>
> 10.4. The great advantage of the life sentence is its flexibility. It recognises that there are two separate considerations: the length of time the offender should serve as punishment for the offence he or she has committed (the tariff), and the question whether he or she can safely be released at the end of that period. However courts make very little use of the discretionary life sentence. In 1994, for example, 434 offenders were convicted of rape or attempted rape, but only 12 were sentenced to life imprisonment. In 1994, 217 offenders were convicted of a second serious violent or sexual offence, but only 10 received a discretionary life sentence.

10.5. This does not necessarily mean that the sentences imposed on violent and sex offenders are too lenient: long sentences are frequently imposed on offenders convicted of violent and sex offences ... But if a determinate sentence is imposed the offender must be released once that sentence has been served, even if there is every reason to believe that he or she will commit further serious offences. That has led to a number of tragic cases where offenders convicted of violent or sex offences have been released only to repeat their offences almost immediately.

10.6. It is essential that the public receives proper protection from serious, dangerous and persistent offenders. Long sentences are not sufficient, of themselves, to provide that protection: before potentially dangerous offenders are released an assessment must be made to see whether they still pose a risk. If an offender cannot safely be released he or she must continue to be detained—if necessary indefinitely.

10.7. This proposal is not designed to increase the time such offenders spend in prison as punishment for the offences they have committed. That will continue to be the responsibility of the trial judge, who will be expected to set a tariff appropriate to the seriousness of the offence, just as the judge would if he or she were imposing a determinate sentence. This will enable the risk presented by the offender to be assessed towards the end of the tariff, when it will be known in the case of a sex offender, for example, whether that offender had undertaken the sex offender treatment programme, and how he or she had responded to it. The proposal will ensure that when the tariff ordered by the court expires, offenders who represent a real risk to the public are not released unless and until the Parole Board is satisfied that it is safe to do so. Once released, they will remain on licence and subject to recall in the same way as other life sentence prisoners.'

It was said (para 10.10) to be one of the key elements of the government's proposal that—

> 'the court will also have discretion not to pass the automatic life sentence in genuinely exceptional cases. This is intended to allow for occasional quite unforeseeable circumstances where it would plainly be unjust and unnecessary to impose the life sentence. But it should be emphasised that this provision will be designed to cover only genuinely exceptional cases. The court will be required to explain what were the exceptional circumstances which justified some other sentence in place of a life sentence ...'

The chapter concluded (para 10.11):

> 'Too often in the past, those who have shown a propensity to commit serious violent or sex offences have served their sentences and been released only to offend again. In many such cases, the danger of releasing the offender has been plain for all to see—but nothing could be done, because once the offender has completed the sentence imposed, he or she has to be released. Too often, victims have paid the price when the offender has repeated the same offences. The Government is determined that the public should receive proper protection from persistent violent or sex offenders. That means requiring the courts to impose an automatic indeterminate sentence, and releasing the offender if and only if it is safe to do so.'

[7] The thrust of s 2, carried over into s 109, is not open to doubt. Those who have committed two qualifying serious offences have shown themselves to be a danger to the public. To protect the public an indeterminate sentence of imprisonment is required to ensure that they are not released, as may happen on completion of a determinate sentence, when they are still a source of danger. The criteria applied by the courts in imposing discretionary life sentences (laid down in cases such as R v Hodgson (1967) 52 Cr App R 113, R v Pither (1979) 1 Cr App R (S) 209, R v Wilkinson (1983) 5 Cr App R (S) 105, and A-G's Ref No 32 of 1996 (R v Whittaker) [1997] 1 Cr App R (S) 261) lead to insufficient use of the power to impose such sentences and thus to the imposition of determinate sentences on those who will remain a source of danger to the public on release. Thus where the qualifying conditions are met a life sentence must be automatically imposed unless the circumstances are exceptional. The court is not to enjoy the discretion (expressly conferred by ss 3(2)(b) and 4(2)(b) of the 1997 Act and reproduced in ss 110(2)(b) and 111(2)(b) of the 2000 Act in relation to repeated offences of drug trafficking and burglary) to decline to impose the statutory sentence where the court is of opinion that there are specific circumstances which would make that sentence unjust in all the circumstances.

SECTION 37 OF THE 1983 ACT

[8] As it now stands, s 37 of the 1983 Act, so far as relevant to this appeal, provides:

'Powers of courts to order hospital admission or guardianship.—(1) Where a person is convicted before the Crown Court of an offence punishable with imprisonment other than an offence the sentence for which is fixed by law or falls to be imposed under section 109(2) of the Powers of Criminal Courts (Sentencing) Act 2000, or is convicted by a magistrates' court of an offence punishable on summary conviction with imprisonment, and the conditions mentioned in subsection (2) are satisfied, the court may by order authorise his admission to and detention in such hospital as may be specified in the order or, as the case may be, place him under the guardianship of a local social services authority or of such other person approved by a local social services authority as may be so specified.

(1A) In the case of an offence the sentence for which would otherwise fall to be imposed under subsection (2) of section 110 or 111 of the Powers of Criminal Courts (Sentencing) Act 2000, nothing in that subsection shall prevent a court from making an order under subsection (1) above for the admission of the offender to a hospital.

(1B) For the purposes of subsections (1) and (1A) above, a sentence fails to be imposed under section 109(2), 110(2) or 111(2) of the Powers of Criminal Courts (Sentencing) Act 2000 if it is required by that provision and the court is not of the opinion there mentioned.

(2) The conditions referred to in subsection (1) above are that—(a) the court is satisfied, on the written or oral evidence of two registered medical practitioners, that the offender is suffering from mental illness, psychopathic disorder, severe mental impairment or mental impairment and that either—(i) the mental disorder from which the offender is suffering is of a nature or degree which makes it appropriate for him to be detained in a hospital for medical treatment and, in the case of psychopathic disorder or mental impairment, that such treatment is likely to alleviate or prevent a deterioration of his condition; or (ii) in the case of an offender who has attained the age of 16 years, the mental disorder is of a nature or degree which warrants his reception into guardianship under this Act; and (b) the court is of the opinion, having regard to all the circumstances including the nature of the offence and the character and antecedents of the offender, and to the other available methods of dealing with him, that the most suitable method of disposing of the case is by means of an order under this section ...

(4) An order for the admission of an offender to a hospital (in this Act referred to as "a hospital order") shall not be made under this section unless the court is satisfied on the written or oral evidence of the registered medical practitioner who would be in charge of his treatment or of some other person representing the managers of the hospital that arrangements have been made for his admission to that hospital ... and for his admission to it within the period of 28 days beginning with the date of the making of such an order; and the court may, pending his admission within that period, give such directions as it thinks fit for his conveyance to and detention in a place of safety.

(5) If within the said period of 28 days it appears to the Secretary of State that by reason of an emergency or other special circumstances it is not practicable for the patient to be received into the hospital specified in the order, he may give directions for the admission of the patient to such other hospital as appears to be appropriate instead of the hospital so specified; and where such directions are given—(a) the Secretary of State shall cause the person having the custody of the patient to be informed, and (b) the hospital order shall have effect as if the hospital specified in the directions were substituted for the hospital specified in the order ...

(7) A hospital order or guardianship order shall specify the form or forms of mental disorder referred to in subsection (2)(a) above from which, upon the evidence taken into account under that subsection, the offender is found by the court to be suffering; and no such order shall be made unless the offender is described by each of the practitioners whose evidence is taken into account under that subsection as suffering from the same one of those forms of mental disorder, whether or not he is also described by either of them as suffering from another of them.

(8) Where an order is made under this section, the court shall not—(a) pass sentence of imprisonment or impose a fine or make a probation order in respect of the offence ... but the court may make any other order which it has power to make apart from this section; and for the purposes of this subsection "sentence of imprisonment" includes any sentence or order for detention.'

[9] It is unnecessary to review the detailed statutory provisions governing the admission of offenders to hospital under s 37 since their effect was clearly and authoritatively explained by the Court of Appeal (Criminal Division) (Mustill LJ, Saville and McKinnon JJ) in R v Birch (1989) 11 Cr App R (S) 202 at 210:

'Once the offender is admitted to hospital pursuant to a hospital order or transfer order without restriction on discharge, his position is almost exactly the same as if he were a civil patient. In effect he passes out of the penal system and into the hospital regime. Neither the court nor the Secretary of State has any say in his disposal. Thus, like any other mental patient, he may be detained only for a period of six months, unless the authority to detain is renewed, an event which cannot happen unless certain conditions, which resemble those which were satisfied when he was admitted, are fulfilled. If the authority expires without being renewed, the patient may leave. Furthermore, he may be discharged at any time by the hospital managers or the "responsible medical officer." In addition to these regular modes of discharge, a patient who absconds or is absent without leave and is not retaken within 28 days is automatically discharged at the end of that period (section 18(5)) and if he is allowed continuous leave of absence for more than six [now twelve] months, he cannot be recalled (section 17(5)). Another feature of the regime which affects the disordered offender and the civil patient alike is the power of the responsible medical officer to grant leave of absence from the hospital for a particular purpose, or for a specified or indefinite period of time: subject always to a power of recall (except as mentioned above). There are certain differences between the positions of the offender and of the civil patient, relating to early access to the Review Tribunal and to discharge by the patient's nearest relative, but these are of comparatively modest importance. In general the offender is dealt with in a manner which appears, and is intended to be, humane by comparison with a custodial sentence. A hospital order is not a punishment. Questions of retribution and deterrence, whether personal or general, are immaterial. The offender who has become a patient is not kept on any kind of leash by the court, as he is when he consents to a probation order with a condition of inpatient treatment. The sole purpose of the order is to ensure that the offender receives the medical care and attention which he needs in the hope and expectation of course that the result will be to avoid the commission by the offender of further criminal acts.'

[10] As this passage makes plain, the detention of an offender admitted to hospital under s 37 alone may not be renewed if the medical conditions which justified admission cease to be met, and if those medical conditions cease to be met at any time the duty of the responsible medical officer, exercising a medical judgment, is to discharge the offender from hospital. Understandably, this benign regime was thought to provide insufficient protection in the case of offenders whose release might present a serious risk of danger to the public. Thus s 37 is fortified by the additional provisions of ss 41 and 42 which, so far as relevant to this appeal, provide:

'Restriction orders

41. Power of higher courts to restrict discharge from hospital.—(1) Where a hospital order is made in respect of an offender by the Crown Court, and it appears to the court, having regard to the nature of the offence, the antecedents of the offender and the risk of his committing further offences if set at large, that it is necessary for the protection of the public from serious harm so to do, the court may, subject to the provisions of this section, further order that the offender shall be subject to the special restrictions set out in this section, either without limit of time or during such period as may be specified in the order; and an order under this section shall be known as "a restriction order" ...

(3) The special restrictions applicable to a patient in respect of whom a restriction order is in force are as follows—(a) none of the provisions of Part II of this Act relating to the duration, renewal and expiration of authority for the detention of patients shall apply, and the patient shall continue to be liable to be detained by virtue of the relevant hospital order until he is duly discharged under the said Part II or absolutely discharged under section 42, 73, 74 or 75 below; (b) no application shall be made to a Mental Health Review Tribunal in respect of a patient under section 66 or 69(1) below; (c) the following powers shall be exercisable only with the consent of the Secretary of State, namely—(i) power to grant leave of absence to the patient under section 17 above; (ii) power to transfer the patient in pursuance of regulations under section 19 above or in pursuance of subsection (3) of that section; and (iii) power to order the discharge of the patient under section 23 above; and if leave of absence is granted under the said section 17 power to recall the patient under that section shall vest in the Secretary of State as well as the responsible medical officer; and (d) the power of the Secretary of State to recall the patient under the said section 17 and power to take the patient into custody and return him under section 18 above may be exercised at any time; and in relation to any such patient section 40(4) above shall have effect as if it referred to Part II of Schedule 1 to this Act instead of Part I of that Schedule ...

(5) Where a restriction order in respect of a patient ceases to have effect while the relevant hospital order continues in force, the provisions of section 40 above and Part I of Schedule 1 to this Act shall apply to the patient as if he had been admitted to the hospital in pursuance of a hospital order (without a restriction order) made on the date on which the restriction order ceased to have effect.

(6) While a person is subject to a restriction order the responsible medical officer shall at such intervals (not exceeding one year) as the Secretary of State may direct examine and report to the Secretary of State on that person; and every report shall contain such particulars as the Secretary of State may require.

42. Powers of Secretary of State in respect of patients subject to restriction orders.—(1) If the Secretary of State is satisfied that in the case of any patient a restriction order is no longer required for the protection of the public from serious harm, he may direct that the patient cease to be subject to the special restrictions set out in section 41(3) above; and where the Secretary of State so directs, the restriction order shall cease to have effect, and section 41(5) above shall apply accordingly.

(2) At any time while a restriction order is in force in respect of a patient, the Secretary of State may, if he thinks fit, by warrant discharge the patient from hospital, either absolutely or subject to conditions; and where a person is absolutely discharged under this subsection, he shall thereupon cease to be liable to be detained by virtue of the relevant hospital order, and the restriction order shall cease to have effect accordingly.

(3) The Secretary of State may at any time during the continuance in force of a restriction order in respect of a patient who has been conditionally discharged under subsection (2) above by warrant recall the patient to such hospital as may be specified in the warrant.'

[11] An offender subject to a hospital order under s 37 coupled with a restriction order under s 41 has statutory rights of application to a Mental Health Review Tribunal under ss 70, 72 and 73 of the 1983 Act, but his position is radically different from that of the unrestricted offender. This again was recognised by the Court of Appeal in R v Birch (1989) 11 Cr App R (S) 202 at 210–211:

'In marked contrast with the regime under an ordinary hospital order, is an order coupled with a restriction on discharge pursuant to section 41. A restriction order has no existence independently of the hospital order to which it relates; it is not a separate means of disposal. Nevertheless, it fundamentally affects the circumstances in which the patient is detained. No longer is the offender regarded simply as a patient whose interests are paramount. No longer is the control of him handed over unconditionally to the hospital authorities. Instead the interests of public safety are regarded by transferring the responsibility for discharge from the responsible medical officer and the hospital to the Secretary of State alone (before September 30, 1983) and now to the Secretary of State and the Mental Health Review Tribunal. A patient who has been subject to a restriction order is likely to be detained for much longer in hospital than one who is not, and will have fewer opportunities for leave of absence.'

[12] This, inevitably very summary, account of the hospital order regime omits reference to two problematical situations which have at different times attracted the attention of the legislature. The first is that of the defendant who is sentenced to a term of imprisonment but whose mental condition requires treatment in hospital. In such a case the Home Secretary may by warrant under s 47(1) direct the transfer of the offender to a named hospital. Such a transfer direction has the same effect as a hospital order (see s 47(3)) and may under s 49 be coupled with a restriction order. These are the powers exercised by the Home Secretary in the appellant's case.

[13] The second problematical situation arises where neither a sentence of imprisonment nor a hospital order, on its own, appears appropriate in the case of a particular offender and where the mutually exclusive operation of such disposals appears unsatisfactory. This problem was acknowledged in the White Paper (Protecting the Public) quoted above. In Ch 8, 'Sex Offenders and Mentally Disordered Offenders', it was said:

'8.12. The Government proposes changes in the arrangements for the remand, sentencing and subsequent management of mentally disordered offenders to provide greater protection for the public and to improve access to effective medical treatment for those offenders who need it. The central change, if adopted, would be the provision of a "hybrid order" for certain mentally disordered offenders for whom the present form of hospital order is unsatisfactory, particularly those who are considered to bear a significant degree of responsibility for their offences. The order would enable the courts, in effect, to pass a prison sentence on an offender and at the same time order his immediate admission to hospital for medical treatment.

8.13. The hybrid order, together with other proposals amending the detail of the Mental Health Act 1983, would substantially increase the flexibility of arrangements for dealing with mentally disordered offenders at all stages from remand through to rehabilitation. In particular, it would enable the courts to deal with some of the most difficult cases in a way which took proper account of the offender's need for treatment; the demands of justice; and the right of other people to be protected from harm.

8.14. Existing sentencing arrangements for offenders who are mentally disordered require the court to decide either to order the offender's detention in hospital for treatment, or to sentence him to imprisonment, or to make some other disposal. In some cases, an offender needs treatment in hospital but the circumstances of the offence also require a fixed period to be served in detention. This may be because the offender is found to bear some significant responsibility for the offence notwithstanding his disorder, or because the link between the offending behaviour and the mental disorder is not clear at the time of sentencing. The hybrid disposal would be a way of enabling the requirements of sentencing in such cases to be met. Under the order, an offender would remain in hospital for as long as his mental condition required, but if he recovered or was found to be untreatable during the fixed period set by the court, he would be remitted to prison. The hybrid order was recommended for use in sentencing offenders suffering from psychopathic disorder by the Department of Health and Home Office Working Group on Psychopathic Disorder. The Government is considering whether it might be made available in respect of offenders suffering from all types of mental disorder currently covered by mental health legislation.'

Legislative effect was given to this proposal by s 45A of the 1983 Act, inserted by s 46 of the 1997 Act. So far as relevant the section provides:

'(1) This section applies where, in the case of a person convicted before the Crown Court of an offence the sentence for which is not fixed by law—(a) the conditions mentioned in subsection (2) below are fulfilled; and (b) except where the offence is one the sentence for which falls to be imposed under section 2 of the Crime (Sentences) Act 1997, the court considers making a hospital order in respect of him before deciding to impose a sentence of imprisonment ("the relevant sentence") in respect of the offence.

(2) The conditions referred to in subsection (1) above are that the court is satisfied, on the written or oral evidence of two registered medical practitioners—(a) that the offender is suffering from psychopathic disorder; (b) that the mental disorder from which the offender is suffering is of a nature or degree which makes it appropriate for him to be detained in a hospital for medical treatment; and (c) that such treatment is likely to alleviate or prevent a deterioration of his condition.

(3) The court may give both of the following directions, namely—(a) a direction that, instead of being removed to and detained in a prison, the offender be removed to and detained in such hospital as may be specified in the direction (in this Act referred to as a "hospital direction"); and (b) a direction that the offender be subject to the special restrictions set out in section 41 above (in this Act referred to as a "limitation direction").

(4) A hospital direction and a limitation direction shall not be given in relation to an offender unless at least one of the medical practitioners whose evidence is taken into account by the court under subsection (2) above has given evidence orally before the court.

(5) A hospital direction and a limitation direction shall not be given in relation to an offender unless the court is satisfied on the written or oral evidence of the registered medical practitioner who would be in charge of his treatment, or of some other person representing the managers of the hospital that arrangements have been made—(a) for his admission to that hospital; and (b) for his admission to it within the period of 28 days beginning with the day of the giving of such directions; and the court may, pending his admission within that period, give such directions as it thinks fit for his conveyance to and detention in a place of safety ...

(8) Section 38(1) and (5) and section 39 above shall have effect as if any reference to the making of a hospital order included a reference to the giving of a hospital direction and a limitation direction.

(9) A hospital direction and a limitation direction given in relation to an offender shall have effect not only as regards the relevant sentence but also (so far as applicable) as regards any other sentence of imprisonment imposed on the same or a previous occasion.

(10) The Secretary of State may by order provide that this section shall have effect as if the reference in subsection (2) above to psychopathic disorder included a reference to a mental disorder of such other description as may be specified in the order.'

This section confers a power exercisable in the case of those upon whom automatic life sentences were required to be imposed under s 2 of the 1997 Act and (by virtue of para 1(4) of Sch 11 to the 2000 Act) s 109 of the 2000 Act, but the section only applies to those suffering from psychopathic disorder since the power conferred by sub-s (10) to extend the application of the section to other descriptions of mental disorder has not been exercised in England and Wales. This is perhaps surprising, given that in Scotland s 59A of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995, inserted by s 6(1) of the Crime and Punishment (Scotland) Act 1997, provides for a disposal by means of a sentence of imprisonment and an allied hospital order in any appropriate case, whatever the nature of the mental disorder.

THE COURT OF APPEAL DECISION

[14] Before the Court of Appeal (Criminal Division) (Kennedy LJ, Bell and Cooke JJ) ([2001] EWCA Crim 2861, [2002] 2 Cr App R (S) 189) Mr Davies for the appellant made submissions to very much the same effect as those before the House, although he placed some reliance on art 5 of the convention as well as art 3. The court rejected those submissions. Having heard argument on behalf of the Crown and the Home Secretary, as the House also has done, the court did not accept that the appellant was other than criminally culpable and held (at [27]) that it had been open to Parliament to say, as it had in 1997, that—

'in certain defined cases there is an assumption that the offender presents such a serious and continuing danger to the safety of the public that a hospital order with a restriction order will afford inadequate protection, and there must therefore be a sentence of life imprisonment. Given that a sentence of life imprisonment does afford greater protection to the public, and that the assumption is rebuttable, and that there is no evidence to show that an offender sentenced to life imprisonment will not receive appropriate medical treatment, we find it impossible to see how the introduction of the statutory assumption can be said to have infringed the appellant's Convention rights.'

THE ISSUES

[15] We return to the argument for the appellant, summarised in [5], above.

